3.6 Poverty in our cities then is often more expressed in terms of social needs than in terms of starvation, cold or exposure. Families go hungry to repair a television set, buy a birthday present, or to spare an older child the embarrassment in high school of not being able to buy a gym suit, join the student council, or participate in a class activity.

3.7 This poverty is felt by low wage earners and welfare recipients alike.

4. HOUSING

4.1 The effects of poor housing are too well known to require documentation. Welfare budgets designed to cover specific needs are often dissipated in maintenance and utility costs in inadequate buildings as heat is lost through windows and doors of improper fit or through uninsulated walls and ceilings.

4.2 The housing crisis is a crisis of the poor who pay most for the least acceptable accommodation. Rental accommodation at adequate rates is perhaps the single greatest requirement of the urban poor, where pressures of migration bring constant competition for existing stocks.

4.3 It is apparent throughout the public welfare system that high density housing will continue in many ways to aggravate the emotional problems of the total population, and these stresses will increase the need for welfare and social services in such areas.

5.1 The problems of the immigrant and migrant to the large industrial centres have been discussed at great length. Urban growth is most often a source of pride to the expanding community.

5.2 When such growth carries with it the often attendant rise in welfare costs, as some fail to adapt or to cope with industrial, urban life, however, reaction most often strikes those who are most vulnerable.

5.3 In this regard, overseas immigration has provided an example which might well be adapted to migration within the country. In general, immigrants have planned their arrival in a new land. Organizations at home and in the new land, private and public, have participated in their going and coming.

5.4 Certainly some comparable arrangement must take place in future migration of the economically displaced in Canada, particularly if such movement is stimulated by local government.

5.5 To some, it would seem an infringement on civil rights and mobility to register such movement in any way. There seems little civil liberty or humanity, however, in receiving people in family hostels, welfare offices, or police stations in the evening hours. Or in later registering them for welfare and placing them in high cost inadequate housing with reclaimed and donated furniture.

5.6 In the absence of a definite plan for movement and reception of migrants, too many persons travel to major centres on their last pay cheque, their last welfare allowance or their last unemployment insurance benefit.

5.7 Surely without having any compulsory travel regulations, settlement and travel benefits, migrant information services, and job placement services could make such voluntary registration and effective program without any compulsion.

5.8 Such services could aid reception municipalities in planning for health, education, housing and training needs as well as for welfare services.

6. CREDIT BUYING

6.1 It is often a necessity in our economic system to undertake credit purchases and such credit arrangements are good economic practice in certain family situations involving necessities which can themselves effect family savings.

6.2 The public and private agencies are, however, faced repeatedly with the disastrous effects of high pressure credit sales for luxury items purchased or borrowed by those who are misled or have little capability to realize the financial problems involved in high credit costs.

6.3 While some representations apparently criticize the restrictions on credit to the poor, much more might be said about the ease with which credit can be obtained to be claimed later in garnishees or repossessions.

7.1 Many statements are made currently with regard to the need to involve welfare recipients, consumers or clients in the decision-making process in public administration. There is a definite need for such contacts and to develop such processes.

7.2 There is also, however, a danger in a simplistic approach to such involvement. From many discussions with the consumer group, there often emerges the opinion that only a recipient of assistance can comprehend the problems.

7.3 Such complainants often, however, are the best educated and most intelligent of the recipient group who often assume a common capacity among all recipients. Too often these client groups have themselves displayed a lack of understanding and compassion for the illiterate, the alcoholic, the emotionally ill and mentally retarded.

7.4 In an effort to identify with such groups some workers now repudiate counselling, training, and education efforts because they are not pertinent to the group, but knowing full well they have complete validity among other parts of the welfare problem.

7.5 In this regard, it should be recognized that administration may be efficient or inefficient and should be dealt with accordingly. It is unrealistic, however, to pander to a belief that public administration is itself an evil to be eliminated.

7.6 The public administration should be simply a delivery system to carry out the policies of the government it serves. Any system of delivering 30 to 50 thousand cheques per month in a Metropolitan area will involve a complex and technical administrative structure.

7.7 Consumer involvement then must work to ensure that acceptable policies be effected by their government representatives.

8. WELFARE SERVICES AND INCOME FLOOR

8.1 Much criticism is levelled at welfare spending and at welfare recipients which should better be directed at inadequacies in comprehensive health, education and other programs. Lack of effectiveness in welfare departments has often resulted from attempting to do too much rather than too little.

8.2 As an example, if two married men at identical jobs are involved in a plant shut-down, one with a wife and one child may receive no welfare attention, while the other because of two or more children, becomes a welfare statistic. Both have earned the same, worked the same and receive the same Unemployment Insurance, only the number of dependents changes their status in the eyes of the community to that of a welfare recipient.

8.3 Much has been written concerning the provision of an income floor through negative income tax. Surely the mechanism for this exists to a great degree by a major increase in Family Allowances and Youth Allowance to restore them to at least the purchasing power of 1945, the year of introduction. While relatively insignificant to-day, the Family Allowances of 1945 were major income item to a family of 4 or 5 children, representing as high as 25 per cent to 35 percent of earned income.

8.4 If the Federal Government wishes to restore selectivity to such items, this can also be provided through the existing machinery for income taxation by including Family Allowances in taxable income.

9. ADMINISTRATION

9.1 Much of the confusion and resentment of welfare procedures stems from the confusion of governmental levels involved. While it is understandable that such services should remain at a local level for short-term need it becomes obvious that repeated calls from a variety of sources acts as an irritant to the recipient.

9.2 It is desirable that in the future, documentation from one municipality to another and from one governmental level to another be standardized and if possible, available through computer service to the various levels involved to eliminate costly and irritating duplication of reports and applications.

10. RECOMMENDATIONS:

1. That families with children be given priority in provision of an increased and realistic income floor through Family Allowances;

2. That in view of the pressing need for low-cost housing, consideration be given for rapid increases in public housing stocks in areas of rapid urban growth, and that standards be approved for provision of smaller, economical units of housing as single family dwellings;

3. That Federal immigration and migration plans be developed to provide for training and settlement allowances for families and single persons;

4. That earning exemptions and incentives be provided in income maintenance programs;

5. That welfare schedules be re-examined for inclusion to a greater degree of the social needs of family above the subsistence level;

6. That welfare schedules provide for incorporation of annual living cost adjustments at specified dates;

7. That documentation requirements be standardized to the various levels and departments of government to the convenience of the recipient;

8. That the senior governments undertake extensive public information campaigns relative to the dangers and costs of credit buying as it effects the low-income group and that increased protection be afforded this group through credit regulations.

Submission

to

The Special Senate Committee on Poverty

Prepared by Mayor True Davidson of the Borough of East York 550 Mortimer Avenue,
Toronto 6, Ontario.

Introduction

I.1 This is the brief of Mayor True Davidson of East York, a member of the Metropolitan Toronto Executive Committee, for some years a member of the Metropolitan Toronto Welfare Committee, a director of the Metropolitan Toronto Social Planning Council and a member of the Board of Governors of the East York Social Planning Council, for some years chairman of the welfare committee of the Association of Ontario Mayors and Reeves and subsequently president and past president of that body, founder and a member of the East York Community Services Board, and connected in various capacities with a number of local experimental community services.

I.2 It considers, first the criteria of poverty; then, the kinds of poverty which present problems within the proper scope of government; finally, possible remedial action which would improve the quality of individual life and preserve our civilization.

PART I: WHAT IS POVERTY

I.3 Most of the briefs I have seen or heard discussed assume that poverty is below-average income, income below the level of "human dignity", income which is not "adequate" in terms of lists made by some welfare agency or financial institution, or other purely material terms. I question these.

I.4 There is a degree of material poverty which may be called destitution. This involves insufficient food, clothing and shelter to maintain life at its simplest level. This should not include any but basic physical needs such as might be experienced by an anchorite although related, in the case of urban dwellers, to needs of the urban community such as fire safety and sanitary conditions.¹ In a civilized country destitution must be relieved. The only way to be sure of accomplishing this is through public assistance and mandatory relief should be geared to this.²

I.5 Much so-called poverty is comparative. To immigrants from an under-developed area, a modest degree of improvement can mean a great deal. To those who have fed on the type of life displayed and advertised through public media of communication, such a degree of comfort seems miserably inadequate. I call this type of poverty deprivation. If it provides an incentive to effort it is good. If it leads to increasing demands from the "have-nots" upon the "haves" it can have exactly the opposite effect. Some workers are noticing this already³. A wide-spread feeling of deprivation is unhealthy and should be combatted, but it must be attacked on several levels and is less simple to deal with than destitution.

I.6 The "honest poverty" praised by Burns has been recognized throughout history as healthy. The Bible is full of praise of the poor and pity for the rich. Among Chaucer's famous Canterbury pilgrims, the poor parson and the Oxford clerk were outstanding for the quality of their lives and their personal dignity, although they were unquestionably the poorest of the crowd. Modern materialism scoffs at both the Bible and the poets, but the honest poor—hard working, independent and ambitious for themselves and even more for

their children—are still the backbone of our society. They should not be taught shame and discontent.

PART II: RESPONSIBILITIES OF GOVERNMENT

II.1 In a large urbanized society destitution must be a responsibility of government. Mobility increases. The family unit breaks down. The aged and the orphan, the handicapped and the chronically ill are the first to become destitute under these circumstances. They have been historically the first to be accepted as a public responsibility. This is gradually extending to cover the incompetent⁵ and the unfortunate. It may be that the breaking-point of a civilization comes when too large a proportion of the population (including the Civil Service as well as the underprivileged) is being supported by the rest. After this point of no return the advance towards riots and pillage is accelerated, and the ordinary incentives to order and productivity gradually disappear. For this reason the relief of destitution must be kept within bounds however unpleasant such restriction may be to humane legislators. It should be absolutely basic.

II.2 Deprivation is only indirectly a responsibility of government. However, unthinking humanitarianism and political catering to pressure groups have lead many to view government as a combination of Santa Claus and Lady Bountiful. Furthermore, the sense of deprivation may focus on government because of what is considered excessive taxation or inequity in administration of benefits.

(a) In Metropolitan Toronto children of a "welfare" family of five receive free dental care, but the self-supporting working man with less income must often neglect his children while the taxes on his mortgaged house help to support the welfare family.

(b) There is considerable resentment among pensioners regarding those admitted to public housing projects who often seem better able to maintain themselves than are the pensioners.

(c) The increased burdens imposed by property tax have induced senior citizens to claim a "right" to be exempted from education tax.

II.3 As far as the honest poor are concerned, all they need is to be allowed to maintain themselves in independence and self-respect. Any re-assessment which creates heavier burdens on property taxation, any capital gains tax which compels a low income wage earner or independent pensioner to sell his little home because it has appreciated in value to others (although to himself it is still merely the home which he chose for his major life investment), any increased benefits to others which he cannot or does not share, any relief to business and industry or the rich which automatically places a heavier burden on low or middle income people—any of these can reduce the honest poor to the level of the deprived or even the destitute. The responsibility of government is first to see that this does not happen and second to see that benefits are distributed equitably with the preference, if any, going to the self-supporting⁶.

Part III: THE WAY TO A BETTER LIFE

III.1 Direct relief should be kept to an absolute minimum required to prevent destitution. The balance of the funds available for the relief of poverty should be applied as flexibly as possible to improve the quality of individual life and the total national achievement. This will not be done by increasing direct assistance, establishing a guaranteed annual income, or otherwise discriminating in favour of the unfortunate or incompetent.

III.2 Public housing should be related more intelligently to need. Building by-laws should be modified to permit smaller and less well finished houses which could be improved by ambitious owners or tenants. Until such housing is available in urban areas the destitute can be cared for better in smaller centres or rural areas where costs are lower, space is not at such a premium and facilities can be provided for gardening and similar self-supporting activities. As far as possible, however, the destitute aged should be cared for in surroundings similar to those in which they have spent their working lives.

III.3 The maintenance or establishment of work habits is an important factor in rehabilitation.

(a) There should be payment during retraining but it should be in proportion to ability and results as it is in business and industry.

(b) One apprenticeship should be permissible on the same basis as retraining.

⁶ Cf. The Parable of the Talents in the New Testament.

(c) Where unemployment arises from circumstances beyond the control of an individual, his retraining or apprenticeship allowance should be made commensurate with his previous and future earning capacity.

(d) Where university or similar advanced training is being provided the trainee should assume an obligation for at least a part of this as any other student would.

(e) Where the unemployed person is physically or mentally handicapped so that he is unlikely to find self-supporting employment in private enterprise, he should be encouraged to enter a subsidized sheltered workshop or to undertake supplementary community services which would not normally be supplied by the community and for which the community would have to be subsidized in order to pay him a living wage. Such services might include where appropriate; baby-sitting for working mothers, housekeeping in motherless homes, simple gardening assistance or household chores for senior citizens, helping to clean up streets and parks, snow shovelling, friendly visiting and telephone communication with the aged and the sick who are living alone, delivery of information, house to house, in connection with zoning, parking or other changes, etc.⁷

(f) There should be a sliding scale of percentages of earnings by which public assistance might gradually be phased into full self-supporting activity. People will not try to supplement public assistance by earnings if there is no additional incentive.⁷

III.4 There should be much more flexibility in the administration of welfare funds above the basic subsistence level. To this end administrative units should be as small as possible. In a community in which the senior welfare administrator has considerable freedom of action and knows his clientele, an expenditure of a couple of hundred dollars to help a family recover from an unexpected disaster can keep it from losing its home or the breadwinner from losing his job whereas a rigid adherence to the rules will put the family on the skids for perhaps a very long time.

III.5 Educational assistance such as day care and "operation head start" and better distribution and administration of children's libraries, local art centres, free concerts, etc., can so enrich the lives of children as to raise them from the level of deprivation to that of healthy poverty. Adult education should be increasingly available and at less cost, if not absolutely free, for similar reasons.

III.6 It is cheaper and healthier to provide some assistance to senior citizens in their own homes than to push them into public housing or homes for the aged before it is absolutely necessary.

III.7 Nursing home care for the chronically ill should be included in Hospital Care. Otherwise it cripples many poor and middle income families.

III.8 No capital gains tax should be considered which would compel low and middle income families to sell their houses to raise the tax. In owner-occupied houses below a certain cost and occupied over a certain period of time capital gains, like a proportion of the taxes in Ontario under certain circumstances, could be collectable only when the owner leaves the house.

III.9 There should be an end to discrimination against, and also in favour of, "the poor" as indeed there should be in the case of all mechanically classified groups. People are individuals. It is a weakness of many trained social workers that their dedicated humanitarianism leads them to attach a special merit to incapacity or misfortune.⁸ Thus they are ready to sacrifice the far-sighted to the reckless, the strong to the weak, and the useful to the useless. This presents problems in community strength. The chief goal of all effort for community betterment should be the prevention or reclamation of weakness, folly and uselessness.

Conclusion:

Je suis désolée de n'avoir pas eu le temps pour préparer un compte-rendu français à ce sujet. Je le discuterais volontiers en français mais très lentement, s'il vous plaît.

⁸ A prominent politician recently pointed out that it is folly to talk about giving the poor the responsibility of planning how to cure their own problems, since, if they were able to do so, they would not be poor.

The Municipality of Metropolitan Toronto
Department of Welfare Report,
May 19, 1969.

Introduction

The Association is most grateful to have this opportunity to lay before you our concern with regard to urban poverty.

The Association of Women Electors, formed to arouse among women an active interest in municipal government, has, over the past thirty years, observed all public meetings of City of Toronto and Metropolitan Councils, their standing committees and the City and Metropolitan Boards of Education. Reports of these meetings are available to our members and subscribers, and copies are filed in the Metropolitan Public Library. During those years our members have also served on numerous committees and boards involved with various aspects of poverty.

We do not, in this brief, attempt to define poverty lines, but have accepted the estimate of the Economic Council of Canada*. We agree with the Economic Council that these incomes do not err on the side of generosity. However, this level of income plus an annual adjustment to reflect the increase in the cost of living, would insure that all Canadians claim some share of the improved standard of living in the nation.

We are pleased, Mr. Chairman, that your committee is studying the feasibility of a guaranteed income. However, it is obvious that some method must be developed to build into any such scheme sufficient incentive, to encourage independence in the recipient. Also such a scheme should not be set up so as to imply encouragement to families to have large numbers of children which they cannot adequately care for, and equip, to cope with this increasingly demanding society.

We should like to make observations and recommendations with regard to the Urban Disadvantaged together with comments on:

Public Health
Manpower Retraining
Housing
Urban Renewal

THE URBAN DISADVANTAGED

It is possible to identify within that section of the population affected by poverty three main groups:

I. The Working Poor

II. Senior Citizens and other persons living on small fixed incomes and pensions

III. Individuals and families on public assistance, divided into

A. Those who have the ability and motivation to become at least partially self supporting

B. Those who are mentally or physically handicapped and who are basically unemployable.

I. The Working Poor

It would appear that insufficient income is the basic problem faced by the working poor. Attached is the May 14th, 1969, Report of the Commissioner of Welfare for Metropolitan Toronto to the Welfare and Housing Committee of the Council of Metropolitan Toronto (Appendix A). In this report the comparison of incomes earned by the working poor and allowances received by welfare recipients is clearly stated. It is obvious that families of four or more persons are financially better off receiving welfare allowances than living on minimum wages. In addition, welfare recipients pay no income tax or regular transportation costs, and benefit from a local free prescription service, dental programme and health services.

* Economic Council of Canada—Brief to the Special Committee on Poverty of the Senate of Canada April 1969, APPENDIX "A".

The present situation is grossly unfair to the workingman, struggling against overwhelming odds to support his family and pay the very high cost of shelter and food in a large urban area.

The Welfare Commissioner's report estimates that approximately 30,500 families within Metropolitan Toronto fall within this category of the working poor, that is, the group whose income is below the level they could receive on welfare. Surely this situation must be recognized as intolerable. Is it any wonder that we have so many deserted wives and families?

We are aware through our work and contacts that many men are driven to desert their families so that they can claim welfare. This is especially true if there is a long term illness in the family. Although the facts in this situation would be extremely difficult to uncover, we respectfully suggest that your Committee, Mr. Chairman, attempt to ascertain how large a factor desertion for the above stated reason is, when you are examining the problem of female heads of families.

The true dimension of the income problem of the working poor in the Toronto area can be realized by comparing the level of welfare (page 3 of the Welfare Commissioner's report) with the poverty lines as laid down by the Economic Council of Canada. An income of approximately $4,000. is considered by the Welfare Department sufficient for a family of seven whereas the Economic Council estimates that it is only sufficient for a family of four. Information may be available from the Dominion Bureau of Statistics which would show how many working families earn income below the Economic Council's poverty line.

We are aware that private agencies are anxious to enter into contracts with municipalities to supply counselling services. Valuable as counselling is for the disturbed and troubled family, no amount of family or budget counselling can overcome the basic deficiency of too little income. The working poor urgently require more money.

A constant unemployment figure of between 3 percent and 5 percent would suggest that we are incapable of maintaining, or it is not desirable to maintain, the economy at full employment. If this is the case, the very large number of families where the principal wage earner is unemployed, under employed, or periodically employed, must be maintained at a reasonable standard of living.

We recommend:

1. An income maintenance programme up to the poverty line defined by the Economic Council of Canada, adjusted periodically to reflect the increase in the cost of living.
2. A vigorous manpower retraining programme to upgrade the skills and productivity of this group.
3. Government subsidized 'rent-geared-to-income' housing in greatly increased quantity.

We recommend for immediate action:

1. Income tax relief for those families and individuals falling below the poverty level.
2. Financial assistance with dental costs, prescription drugs and auxiliary medical services.

II. Senior Citizens and other Persons Living on Small Fixed Incomes and Pensions

The meagre existence experienced by hundreds of our senior citizens need not be described here. Continuing inflation has diminished the value of their fixed incomes and in Metropolitan Toronto spiralling shelter costs have further threatened their living standards. As of June 30, 1969, 5,600 qualified applicants were on file with the Toronto Housing Registry for senior citizen's housing.

Our senior citizens, 65 years and over, are that part of the population whose earning capacity was affected by the depression of the 30's. However, in spite of severe economic hardship, most managed to raise and educate their families, pay their taxes and behave as responsible citizens. That many were unable to provide more adequately for their old age is understandable. Surely this affluent country can afford to approach the problems of the senior citizen in a spirit of generosity.

We recommend:

1. An income maintenance programme up to the poverty level as described previously, adjusted periodically to reflect the increase in the cost of living.

2. An increased supply of housing at rents geared to income.

We recommend for immediate action:

1. Income tax relief. The present exemptions are grossly unrealistic.

2. Immediate increased assistance with the cost of prescription drugs and dental care.

III. Families and Families on Public Assistance

Allowances available under the general welfare assistance legislation and family benefits acts are well below the poverty lines as described by the Economic Council of Canada. These inadequate allowances consign thousands of families to lives of poverty and deprivation.

The Province of Ontario has taken a forward step by setting up a Board of Review to enable persons receiving assistance through the legislation under the Family and Social Services Department of the Province to appeal against the allowances made by the municipal welfare departments.

However, it is in the area of special allowances that the difference between deprivation of essentials of human life and the opportunity to develop social capacity exists. The Board of Review has no right to exercise authority over a local administrator's decision with regard to special allowances. It behooves the Province of Ontario to publish what special allowances are available and to authorize the Board of Review to act on errors or injustices related to them. Amendments to the present legislation will be necessary to make these special allowances mandatory instead of permissive. It is the opinion of our Association that a guaranteed annual income would eliminate the majority of these problems.

We recommend:

1. An income maintenance programme up to the poverty line defined by the Economic Council of Canada, adjusted periodically to reflect the increase in the cost of living.

We recommend for immediate action:

1. That legislation governing general welfare assistance, family benefits, etc., plus special allowances be widely publicized.

2. That welfare workers as well as applicants be made aware of the legislation under which they are giving or receiving assistance and know exactly what assistance is available.

3. That the Board of Review's jurisdiction be extended to include the area of special allowances.

IIIA. Families and individuals with the ability to become at least partially self-supporting.

Welfare entitlements under the General Welfare Assistance Act, administered by the municipality are indicated on page 3 of the Welfare Commissioner's Report, Appendix A. In addition there is provision for special needs. However the Act imposes a maximum allowance of $300.00 per month to a recipient with 3 dependants and allows a maximum of $10. per month for each additional dependant.

All earnings are deducted from the allowance. The recipient is provided with no incentive at all to become partially self supporting. Also mothers of young children are deterred from attempting self sufficiency by the dearth of proper day care facilities.

Under the Family Benefits Act and Regulations, the pre-added budget, that part of the allowance providing for food, clothing, utilities, house supplies and personal requirements, is somewhat more generous than the provisions of the General Welfare Assistance Act. However the same maximum of $300. per month for a recipient with 3 dependants applies, plus $10. a month for each additional dependant. This Act encourages some incentive by permitting the recipient to benefit from earning up to $24.00 per month for themselves and one dependant, plus $12.00 per month for each additional dependant. A mother with 3 children would be allowed to earn $48.00 per month without a deduction from her allowance. She is allowed a further 25 per cent of any additional earnings without penalty.

We recommend:

1. Income maintenance as discussed above.

2. A realistic vigorous Manpower Retraining Programme directed toward this group to develop their potential for either partial or full independence.

We recommend for immediate action:

1. That the General Welfare Assistance Act and the Family Benefits Act be amended to raise the maximum to the level described as the poverty line and to allow those attempting to support themselves, (a) to keep an increased portion of their earnings; (b) to retain an amount equal to the cost incurred for family care.

IIIB. Families and individuals on public assistance where the head of the family is basically unemployable.

It is within this subgroup of the population that a high incidence of serious social problems is found. The retarded and marginally retarded, the emotionally and mentally ill, the alcoholics, the physically disabled, etc. These families, representing often the second or third generation on welfare, lack the necessary mental, emotional or physical strength to break through the poverty trap and re-establish themselves. They are caught in the downward spiral of ill health, despair and neglect. Radical new approaches must be found to reach the children caught in these situations.

The Children's Aid Societies of Metropolitan Toronto at present are able merely to scratch the surface of this problem.

During 1969 the provincial government imposed cutbacks on the budgets of these Societies indicating an indifference to the serious plight of hundreds of children living in the so-called problem families. The Children's Aid Society of Metropolitan Toronto has, since the beginning of 1969, reduced its social work staff by 11 workers.

These Societies have found it necessary to reduce considerably their preventive services so necessary if children are to be protected from serious damage. W. Ward Markle, Director of the Catholic Children's Aid Society was quoted in the Globe and Mail last summer as saying, "We are reduced to picking up the pieces". There is a great need for more foster homes, group foster care, remedial services for emotionally disturbed children, diagnostic services to seek out the perceptually handicapped, etc.

Generally speaking, the condition of children in families where the parents are retarded or alcoholic, or both, is deplorable. Only by changing the destructive environment or, failing that, removing the children from its debilitating effect, can any real change be brought about. In families where foster care is not the answer, long term supervision is the only way the problem can be controlled. Here the role of the Public Health Nurse and other supervisory workers is indispensable and should be increased.

We recommend:

1. Greatly expanded child care programmes concentrated on the depressed inner urban areas. We would stress the need for day care centres providing an enriched pre-school experience for culturally deprived children. Without such a programme these children cannot compete successfully at school.

2. Educational programmes for parents of long term disadvantaged families. There is no hope of combatting the culture of poverty other than by providing educational clinics in nutrition, house-keeping and child care.

3. That legislation be enacted to make attendance at such clinics mandatory for families with a history of neglect and abuse of children. The supervision of such families must be tightened.

4. That voluntary sterilization for both men and women and therapeutic abortion be made more freely available in our society. Where the recipient cannot pay the cost, the programme should be supported under public health services. While we recognize that it is extremely difficult for any government to legislate in the area of population policy, we feel it is necessary to draw to your attention the need to prevent children being born into totally destructive environments.

PUBLIC HEALTH

Our Association stands on record as having recommended a universal high standard of health care. The Province of Ontario has offered financial incentives to municipalities to set up health units or districts which have been largely ignored. It seems to us that the financial assistance available to each municipality could be flexible enough to allow for the special needs of the population of each area in addition to providing a basic standard of care. Ill health is a major cause of poverty. The high cost of prescription drugs is a contributing factor and there have been no government plans to extend the limited Medicare programme to include the cost of drugs.

MANPOWER RETRAINING PROGRAMMES

Our Association is on record as having brought the problem of inadequate counselling and medical services to the attention of the former Metropolitan Committee on Adult Retraining. We are convinced that sufficient trained staff should be available to make a proper evaluation of a trainee's potential, his interests and aptitudes. In addition, a careful medical assessment of a trainee's physical and mental health would add greatly to his chances for success.

While we agree that it is not always possible to adjust the character of the training to the availability of jobs, this aspect of the programme should be constantly under review. It is possible, however, to evaluate the earning potential of a trainee in a particular occupation in advance. To avoid the expensive and discouraging process of retraining for jobs insufficiently remunerative, the circumstances of the family must be taken into account, i.e. size of family, etc.

The medical services available at the counselling centre are not adequate. The staff is not large enough to examine all the trainees. In addition there appears to be no way at the present time to supply needed eye glasses and dental services. The medical examination by a Public Health nurse sometimes results in the prospective trainee being sent to a hospital for diagnosis. The hospital is not informed of the type of training that the trainee is scheduled to undertake. In addition the diagnosis frequently reaches the training centre after the trainee has been registered in a course. There is little evidence that any follow up is done and treatment arranged. Difficulty is experienced in switching a trainee from one course into another if he is unable to cope mentally or physically. In general, inadequate medical screening for physical and mental problems leads to serious deficiencies in the retraining process. We believe that expanded medical and counselling services should be provided in advance of any decision with regard to retraining.

HOUSING

There can be no doubt that high shelter costs are placing a tremendous burden on families, some of whom have to pay up to 40 per cent of their income on housing. The result is inadequate diet, insufficient clothing and overcrowded, deteriorating dwellings.

Within Metropolitan Toronto the stock of housing available at a moderate rent is being constantly depleted through demolition and private rehabilitation. Approximately one thousand dwellings have been torn down annually over the past six or seven years, to make way for private redevelopment, roads, schools, hospitals, etc. In addition, private rehabilitation is depleting that part of the housing stock which has been financially within the means of lower income people. The renewed buildings are far beyond the financial reach of low income families.

Subsidized public housing appears to be the only way the depleted housing stock can be replenished at rents people can afford to pay.

In June 1969, the Ontario Housing Corporation made a survey of the approximately 16,000 applications on file for public housing. The survey indicated that seven out of ten applications were actively interested in locating in public housing.

The following is a breakdown of the reasons given and the income level of those applying for public housing.

- (1) 36.6 per cent stated that high rents caused them to apply for public housing.
- (2) 40 per cent listed poor living conditions and overcrowding.
- (3) 13.2 per cent stated that they lived in rooms only.

Of the 60 per cent of applicants who were employed, $\frac{1}{3}$ had incomes of less than \$300. per month, while $\frac{1}{2}$ had incomes of less than \$400. per month. Surprisingly, $\frac{2}{3}$ of the applicants stated that they preferred renting to home ownership, given the choice and adequate financial arrangements.

URBAN RENEWAL

I. Rehabilitation of Housing

Within publicly financed urban renewal schemes, the rehabilitation of private housing must become of major importance. In this way we can eliminate the wholesale clearance of areas which results in the displacement of communities. However, unless public money within urban renewal is made available for private rehabilitation, the process will be self defeating because families will be forced to move, unable to sustain the cost of renovation. It is unrealistic to expect families living in run down areas to bear to cost of renewal of their property. Further, if landlords are excluded from any scheme of government rehabilitation loans or grants, they will pass on the cost of renovation to their tenants.

Our Association, along with other organizations, has consistently called for urban renewal schemes with a large rehabilitation component, but with protection for the tenant as well as the home owner.

II. The Social Development of Areas under Urban Renewal Planning

The Association of Women Electors has become increasingly concerned about the lack of adequate social planning within publicly financed urban renewal planning. Older, low income residential areas are beset by a multitude of social problems directly related to poverty. The physical replanning of areas represents only part of the task. Of equal importance is the renewal of the social fabric of the community. The quality of life in the renovated area will depend largely on the opportunities for individuals and families to participate in recreational, educational and health programmes. The Report of the Social Planning Council of Metropolitan Toronto, dated April 16, 1969, entitled "Urban Renewal, Policies and Procedures", emphasizes the need for social planning to develop concurrently with physical planning in any urban renewal scheme involving residential areas.

We propose that the Federal Government require the municipality, when it requests funds, to develop a plan for urban renewal under Section 23A of the National Housing Act; to file also a request for funds under The Canada Assistance Plan, Section 2, (m) (v); to bring forward a companion scheme for social renewal and community development. The two schemes, one for the physical renewal of the neighbourhood, and the other for the social renewal of the neighbourhood, would make up the urban renewal plan. The Provincial Government should be requested to pass enabling legislation to allow Section 2 (m) (v) of the Canada Assistance Plan to become operative as it applies to public urban renewal in residential areas.

Social planning for a neighbourhood will require close consultation with the people living in the area. Citizen participation can be facilitated by accessibility to a friendly meeting place and a project co-ordinator whose first duty is to reach out to the residents.

As a general guide for developing a plan for social renewal we suggest the following three-pronged approach:

(1) Services the people of the area are demanding, e.g. recreational

(2) Services which the community will recognize as necessary once the usefulness of the service is explained: e.g. information services.

(3) Services which can become acceptable after a period of consultation and demonstration, e.g. child welfare, health and educational services.

We think that the goal for citizen participation should be the development of a neighbourhood council or corporation capable of taking over the direction and co-ordination of the community recreational and service programmes.

The City of Toronto will soon be involved with the people of Trefann Court in developing an urban renewal scheme for their area which will have the approval of the residents.

We recommend this opportunity be seized to develop an action-oriented pilot project for social renewal and community development.

The Canadian Welfare Council staff states in its submission to your committee, Mr. Chairman, in Paragraph 60:

"development of integrated and co-ordinated methods of delivering services at the community or neighbourhood level can be one of the most important preventive measures in overcoming poverty"

Trefann Court offers a unique situation in which to bring forward a plan for community development. Over years of uncertainty caused first by the designation of the area for redevelopment, and later, by the unsuccessful introduction of an urban renewal plan and its withdrawal, the people of Trefann have developed a strong identity and awareness. They have learned how to cope with City Hall, have gained insight into their own needs and have a strong sense of neighbourhood.

We urge you to take whatever steps you are able to recommend for immediate consideration in the setting up of a pilot project in this neighbourhood.

Conclusion

Although we recognize that many recommendations presented to the Committee, involve study before implementation, we are certain that others can be introduced fairly readily.

We strongly urge, therefore, that the Committee search diligently for such, and would suggest as an example, income tax relief to senior citizens and working families at or below poverty levels.

Further, we wish to emphasize the great need for increased citizen participation and constructive recipient involvement in the programme planning.

We endorse the resolution of the Ontario Welfare Council's 1969 Conference Workshop on Poverty:

"Social Agencies should help the poor to help themselves—

(b) by encouraging consumer participation on all Boards of Directors of voluntary agencies providing counselling and social services and on Boards and commissions of government departments dealing in 'Consumer Services'".

It should be noted that many voluntary agencies provide highly professional services and the role of the volunteer is a supporting one. Our Association is of the opinion that as a general principle, any service that is accepted by the community as a necessary and reasonable service and has been part of the fabric of the community over a period of time should be supported by the broad tax base and not rely for funds on voluntary giving.

Recognizing the fact that a very small percentage of available social services are financed through the community funds, how much more constructive it would be to use this community effort to pay for innovative programmes that are highly relevant to the current situation in a given community. In this way a flexible approach could be developed to accommodate the need for a new programme. It is imperative that some funds be available to assist individuals or small groups of residents, especially in the less affluent areas, who are trying to help themselves with a day-care centre, a drop-in centre for mothers, or what ever it may be. At the present time there appears to be no way to support these efforts. Unless this flexibility can be found, in frustration, individuals and groups will turn more and more to encouragement from persons outside the existing structures.

We sense in our urban areas, a rising discontent, and an uneasiness, an ever widening separation between the affluent majority on the one hand and the minority of the poor. This minority consider themselves to be the victims of an indifferent system. We must seek out new techniques of communication with the disadvantaged so that together we can devise programmes which will respond to the constantly shifting need.

Appendix "A"

THE MUNICIPALITY OF METROPOLITAN TORONTO DEPARTMENT OF WELFARE

May 14, 1969

To: The Welfare and Housing Committee

As directed by this Committee, this Department has attempted to summarize the financial problems related to the group of persons in the lower level of earnings in the Metropolitan area. This report attempts to compare marginal earning levels with rates of welfare provided to single persons or families of various sizes under the schedules set down in the General Welfare Assistance Act.

For single persons, the basic welfare rate is made up of (a) pre-added budget, which includes food, clothing, and personal items, etc.; (b) shelter, (c) household supplies or utilities allowance, and, if required, (d) a fuel allowance.

A typical budget for a single person would be—

Pre-added budget	$47.00
Shelter	43.00
Utilities	8.00
Household Supplies	7.00
Total	$105.00

For families, the rate would vary from a married couple, no dependents, to a family with up to 14 dependents. Budgets for such families would also vary from an allowance of $181.00 per month for two persons to $410.00 for the largest family of 15 persons.

In the Metropolitan area, the last known average wage equalled $115.00 per week, so that it is indicated for a single person one week's wages would more than equal one month's welfare entitlement. Indeed, even at the new minimum wage rate of $1.30 per hour, a single person would earn the equivalent of a full month's welfare entitlement in two weeks or less.

It would seem, therefore, that, although the question of welfare for single employable persons has been and will continue to be a contentious issue, it cannot be assumed that welfare allowances should require incentives to encourage employable single persons to undertake employment at even the lower levels of wages.

In the family area, however, low incomes from marginal income certainly do compare with welfare rates and when these welfare rates are augmented by supplementary services such as drugs, medications, dental care, health and hospital services coverage, then the motivation of income alone is often removed from employment.

In Metropolitan Toronto, as previously indicated, the average monthly wage would be approximately $490.67. There are, of course, large numbers of employees who are earning wages for below this average. Unfortunately, insufficient information is available to state the total family income of some of these wage earners as income may be augmented by working wives, part-time work, roomers, boarders, rentals, etc.

It is reported that of approximately 884,000 employable persons in the Toronto area at the time of last reporting, roughly 51.4 per cent earned in excess of $4,000.00 per year, which would be close to the higher levels of welfare payment. Of the balance reporting income of $4,000.00 per year or less, there is no basis for estimating family size or welfare entitlement.

While it would first appear from this figure that there are some 433,160 persons earning less than $4000.00 per year, it must be considered that this is based on tax reported earned income. Many of these persons would represent family combinations of working wives and children where combined household income would be beyond the need level. In many other cases, particularly the group earning under $1000.00 per year, there would be a combination of earnings, pensions or savings which would further reduce the number involved. Many of the group will be students earning wages during summer months only. Others will be persons who, by choice, work restricted hours.

It is assumed that because of these factors and because lower earnings are often related to inexperience and short tenure that the proportion of single persons in the lower levels of pay will be considerably higher than in the upper levels of income.

With regard to wage supplementation for employed persons, a comparison can be made as to the degree of supplementation required for family units by a comparison between existing welfare rates and the minimum wage. While variations occur in rates paid due to age of family members, etc., the following table indicates average monthly payment per family:

Family Size	Minimum Wage 40-hour week	Welfare Entitlement	Supplement
2	225.00	172.00	nil
3	225.00	205.00	nil
4	225.00	245.00	20.00
5	225.00	285.00	60.00
6	225.00	320.00	95.00
7	225.00	330.00	105.00

all families in excess of 7 add $10.00 per month.

It should be stressed as stated previously that the average wage for the Toronto area is in excess of $490.00 per month and the minimum wage stated here would apply to less than 25 per cent of the total wage earners. Conversely, the bulk of family units, approximately 413,000 of 535,000 in the last record, are composed of 4 or less members.

Income supplementation to equal welfare levels would seem to apply then to a potential 30,500 families in Metropolitan Toronto at rates ranging from $20.00 to $100.00 per month, plus the benefits of prescriptions, dental and health services now available to present recipients.

While these latter items can presently be subsidized under the General Welfare Assistance Act, there is no provision under existing legislation for wage supplementation. Further, I would suggest that even drugs or dental care would require special consideration by the Government of Ontario in view of the cost implications.

It should be emphasized that the 30,500 is an estimate only. It would also include many or most of the general assistance caseload in the employable group.

Assuming the application of a needs test of the same degree as presently administered for existing cases, it will be seen that the caseload for the Department could more than double the existing caseload.

Verification of such earnings and wages as would be available to recipients would indicate a clerical task at least equal to that for processing existing cases.

While I do not believe such concepts as negative income tax or guaranteed annual income can totally replace income maintenance programs for the large group of chronically unemployed who require full assistance on a ready basis of two weeks to one month intervals for varying periods of time, I believe that income supplementation programs for low wage earners can be better handled on a basis of annual or semi-annual returns reflecting earned income rather than monthly needs. It is also my opinion that such programs are of a scale to be beyond the scope of municipal welfare services having regard to the finances involved.

The question has also been raised with regard to earnings exemptions to welfare recipients as an incentive to accept part-time employment with a view to complete vocational rehabilitation to fulltime work.

While I would support earnings exemptions for part-time work to raise living standards, it should be emphasized that earnings exemptions on part-time work for able-bodied employables would further increase the disparity between low regular wages and welfare standards of payment.

To clarify this point, I would suggest that exemptions on part-time employment for employables be restricted to definite periods of time or to definite employment goals to eliminate long-term dependency on a combination of welfare assistance and casual employment.

Some other reservations with regard to long-term supplementation of earnings or exemption of earnings should be pointed out:

1. Supplementation of earnings on a mass scale would act to eliminate pressure on the employer for increased earnings and could delay amendments to minimum wage laws;

2. Supplementation could create further anomalies in the income tax structure which would act as a deterrent for pressure by the individual for wage increase; e.g., present maximum welfare payment to a family of five equals $3660.00 per annum. In an employed family such income would be taxed beyond the basic exemption of $3000.00. It will be seen that to the wage earner, a tax free welfare supplement would be preferable to a comparable increase in earnings.

3. Wage supplementation should not be considered on a local scale without cognizance of the effect in attracting low wage earners from other areas. Even on a Provincial basis, this would provide additional incentive for persons of few marketable skills to enter the Province.

For these and reasons previously stated, earning supplementation should be considered on a national scale and preferably through some system of negative taxation based on family size, rather than on a welfare needs test basis. I believe it undesirable to introduce a large number of fully employed persons to the welfare rolls.

Should assistance be considered, I would suggest that it should first be considered in terms of special need such as high drug or dental costs, rather than on a wage supplement.

VICTORIA DAY CARE SERVICES

The Victoria Day Care Services has a service history to the children of working mothers which dates back to 1892. In that period the agency was known as the Creche, a name it retained until 1951, when it changed to Victoria Day Nursery. At the first of year 1968 it was changed again to Victoria Day Care Services, a name we believe more aptly comprehends our present programme.

Our function is to offer day-care service on a non-sectarian basis to preschool children within the Metropolitan Toronto area, whose families need this service for economic, social or health reasons. Children with special needs are also accepted. We are open five days a week from 7:30 a.m. to 6:30 p.m. The programme is provided through group care in nursery school for children two through five years of age, and in Family Day Care for children under two, for children attending school who need lunch-time and after-school supervision, for children waiting a vacancy in a nursery school group, and/or for those children who, though old enough for a group, are not yet ready for one, and require an additional period of individual attention in preparation. Family day care homes are located in the neighborhoods near the day nursery center.

Our aim is threefold: to protect small children; to prepare them emotionally, socially, and intellectually for school entrance; and to strengthen and stabilize their families through help to their parents.

The sole-support mothers and the working mothers comprise our major parent groups, although our service is not limited to them. Because we see ourselves as a prevention programme, we are particularly anxious to help young families "at risk", who need their parenting responsibilities shared and their capacity for meeting them strengthened.

A staff of eighteen undertake to provide the actual programme: 8 nursery school teachers, 1 nursery school supervisor, 2 social workers, 3 house staff, a secretary-receptionist, a book-keeper, a janitor, and the Director. A consultant psychiatrist spends two afternoons a month with the staff; a public health nurse visits weekly, and a public health doctor monthly, to supervise the health services to all the children.

The agency is managed by a Board of 15 Directors, and there is a membership, now numbering approximately seventy. More than half of this group serve as volunteers within the programme in such activities as driving, accompanying children to special clinic appointments, staffing the sleep-rooms, operating a Toggery Shop, providing clerical assistance, sewing and knitting, putting out a newsletter, staffing the reference library, raising funds and serving on community planning committees, etc.

Summary of Conclusions and Recommendations

1. The causes of poverty are complex and interactional; no single cause can be isolated, though some are listed;
2. Strategies for removing poverty must be directed at each of the identified contributing causes, not only at the problem of income access or distribution;
3. Repressive attitudes in the past have made it impossible to develop our assistance programmes as far as they needed to go;
4. It is too simple to hold "the welfare system" responsible for our failure to remove poverty;
5. We have not allowed the disadvantaged and the poor to tell us in fact "like it is", nor have we considered including them in planning ways to solve their problems. Rather, we have tended to treat them as though they were the problem;
6. Public welfare programmes in the past moved away from removing poverty to just reducing some of its stress. Financial equivalents were developed for identified human needs of shelter, food, clothing, heat, and light. Grants however tended to freeze at these items. They not quite met the costs of "allowed" need, but could not readily expand the meet, "real" need;

7. This rigidity "locked-in" poverty, and increased its costs. Anxieties about rising welfare budgets brought sanctions on the poor, not the system; demands for tighter budgeting set the cycle off again, and made the potential welfare costs even higher.

8. Public welfare staffs were not able to focus on the life situation of recipients nor were they helped to attempt such assistance;

9. Voluntary social work veered away from environmental concerns to casework with individuals directed toward personal adjustment. Its conservative approach tended to serve the middle and upper middle classes, with the consequence that it tended to reinforce the status quo and appeared irrelevant to the poor and disadvantaged.

10. The gaps between the public and private sectors effectively prevented until now any useful combination of the two approaches (large programmes directed at large numbers, and the know-how of bringing about change). Enabling and supporting services were as a result effectively shut off from those who needed them most.

11. Development of government-based patterns of social security available to almost all, combined with the pattern of concentrated fund raising for voluntary services, also helped to keep the poor invisible, and to lull many Canadians into believing that actual poverty did not exist;

12. While we agree that new systems are indicated, particularly of income access to those in need of more money, this is but one facet of the question; supportive and enabling services must go hand in glove with income access programmes if the chronically disadvantaged are to be equipped and mobilized toward upward mobility, and if the generational pattern of poverty is to be broken. Failure to recognize this inter-dependence will result in a repeat of the experience of partial solution: generalized failure to eradicate poverty.

1. We recommend that examination continue of suggested methods for income access to the poor and chronically disadvantaged and the near-poor.

2. We recommend that public-private cooperation patterns be changed to allow fuller use of one by the other; involvement in policy making of one with the other; and direct participation of recipients of services in planning for programmes, setting of policies, publicizing of information about services, etc. That citizen advisory boards be established in relation to all social welfare and public assistance departments at provincial and local levels in all provinces.

3. We recommend that direct assistance guide-lines, along with grants to fixed income groups, be re-examined each two years to consider cost-of-living implications.

4. We recommend that supportive services now generally recognized as needed to meet normal life crises, be made available to the poor as part of the public welfare system, but provided under both public and private auspices. Such services to include visiting homemaker services, day care, skill training in homemaking and child care, emergency help and support as well as emotional sustaining in crises, etc.

5. We recommend a major recruitment and public education campaign to attract to the public welfare field individuals who can

(a) work directly with the poor, the disadvantaged and the near poor to improve their own life situations and to take the steps necessary to do this; and

(b) undertake in-service training programmes which sensitize and equip welfare staffs for the emotional impact of their work, and which will direct attitudes in such a way as to treat applicants with respect and consideration.

6. We recommend an equally concentrated campaign of public education as to the genuine issues involved in the understanding and changing of poverty, as the Committee itself understands them, in order to prepare the citizens of Canada for future proposals and the financing basis which will be attached.

MAIN BODY OF THE PRESENTATION

1. Introductory Statement

1.1 The phenomenon of continuing poverty in the midst of the affluent society is a cause for much concern and thought. Considerable attention has been given of late to understanding the reasons for this paradox, and many contributing factors have been identified. These factors, which interact on each other, include the following:

(a) economic conditions in a given community, region, or country;

(b) inaccessibility of adequate income to some individuals because of lack of marketable skills;

(c) "locked-in" patterns of poverty which have become generational;

(d) attitudes which have hampered the development of assistance programmes and enabling services because of the suggestion that poverty was, after all, a matter of choice, poor character, or lack of ambition;

(e) political expediency which has slowed patterns of change because consensus could not be achieved about which priorities needed how much financing, or that "welfare" was a priority; and

(f) the slowness of the field of social welfare itself to shift its attention from dealing with the symptoms, results, and consequences of poverty to attempting to deal with poverty and its causes as a central social and societal issue.

1.2 There has not been, nor is there likely to be, agreement as to the emphasis any or each of these should receive as primary causal factors. What has emerged is increasing acceptance of the proposition that poverty is not the result of one single set of circumstances, nor can it be dismissed with a value judgment about the characters and irresponsibility of the poor themselves.

1.3 Access to solution to the problem is no simpler than understanding it. Just as it is not useful to oversimplify causation, it seems equally hazardous to hope that eradication of poverty is "simply" a matter of redistribution of money, or a new system of access to it for those who need more. Nor is it either fair or accurate to blame "the welfare system" as the visible agent of the failure of our society to remove poverty.

1.4 If Canada is serious about stopping poverty, action on all six areas listed above (a-f) will be required. Correlation of initiatives undertaken by public departments will be necessary, and public-private cooperation will have to both improve and change. Attitudes about the poor will particularly require modifying in those quarters which have hesitated to endorse adequate financing of services. But also a new element will require to be included: the voice and opinions of the poor themselves. If changes are to be useful and permanent, rather than illusory, we must ask them what they want and need, and be willing to listen when they tell us. Public-private partnership, long the accepted duality of approach to social planning, will now need to become a triad of public-service, private-service and service recipient. To date, we have not been willing to have the poor "tell it like it is".

1.5 It is not within our competence to discuss and recommend upon national economic policy, nor to suggest which programme of income maintenance is the best. Issues such as these are well documented by the Economic Council of Canada and the Canadian Welfare Council. Rather, we would prefer to limit our comments to areas relating to our own experience and some of the inferences we have drawn from that experience.

2. The Stated Goal of Social Welfare Programmes—and What in Fact Has Happened

2.1 There is general consensus that the present public welfare system is ineffective—or at least that it has not been effective in changing the situation of poverty. Modern programmes of social assistance once had as their goal the removal of poverty and chronic dependence; but the rationale shifted under pressure to that of ameliorating some of the strains of poverty. These strains were associated with identified human needs, and money was acknowledged as necessary to meet these needs: shelter, food, clothing, heat, and light. But attitudes made it impossible for adequate support to even these items (except in some jurisdictions at present), and closely watched guidelines for giving created a priority for guarding the tax dollar instead of meeting actual need.

2.2 Not surprisingly, a cause-and-effect interaction was set up, with the following results:

(a) the pressure of public attitude to watch the tax dollar caused equally strict scrutiny on the part of welfare administrators and their staffs of the requests that came to them for help. Prospective recipients were subjected to very close scrutiny and a mood of mutual suspicion was generated;

(b) social assistance programmes hemmed in by such fiscal accountability anxieties could not expand to meet actual need: they could meet only "allowed" need. These rigid restrictions helped to increase poverty rather than lessen it as families and individuals became trapped in their circumstances and ultimately defeated by them. As welfare costs increased as a result, misunderstanding of this cause-and-effect relationship often brought cries for even more stringent controls on welfare spending, thereby sending the cycle off on another self-defeating round.

(c) Such pressures affected the staff situation throughout the public welfare system. Restrictive policies, heavy caseloads, poor working conditions, combined with professional self-consciousness to keep trained social workers away from the public welfare field, low priority depressed salaries; bureaucracy buried workers under a sea of paper work. Involvement with the life situation of recipients was impossible and not encouraged. In too many instances welfare departments become "money dispensaries" (or withholders) dispensing something supposed to be a remedy with no idea of the nature of the illness or the diagnosis that should have been made of the extent of the malfunction.

(d) orientation and in-service training programmes for staffs, with emphasis on the legislation and enabling regulations, did little to prepare or equip untrained workers for the impact of their encounter with people who were so different from themselves and who were often incompetent, uncooperative, inadequate, hostile, confused and defeated and bitter. Offices which afforded little or no privacy did nothing at all to build in respect for the personal rights of the applicants, and fed the attitude problem constantly.

(e) because of the necessity of standardizing eligibility requirements and payment guidelines, administrative procedures tended to become ends in themselves. The thinking seemed to be that now that need had been identified and programmes set up to meet those needs, there simply remained the administrative facility which brought the two together.

2. The Field of Voluntary Social Work

3.1 The professional social worker and the profession of social work itself have played their own part in this pattern. It has already been mentioned that trained workers avoided the heavy demand of public welfare work, and sought employment for many years (particularly the '40's and '50's) in private agencies. Working conditions were often better, salaries higher, caseloads controlled, budgets more flexible because they were administered by available Board of Directors, etc. The primary focus of most agencies during that period was individual casework and the service seemed more fully related to the client's full life situation. Two very influential points-of-view largely determined the focus of such casework efforts:

(a) a preoccupation with "adjustment" as the casework goal. Casework during that twenty year period was strongly influenced by psychiatric thought and practice, and there was a heavy concentration on treatment, counselling, etc. in order to effect an improved adjustment of the client to his environment or life situation. This approach presumes that the environment is essentially "fixed", and that the individual should be able to manage competently in relation to it. Such an approach was most successful within the middle and upper middle classes. It turned social work in large measure away from its original attention to environment, and helped to earn the current criticism that it was a protector of the status quo and not considered relevant by the poor.

(b) a second point of view which played into the conservatism of professional social work was a conviction that children, especially small children, are always better cared for by their own mothers. This point of view of course echoed that of the general public. Even in the face of rising protection caseloads which indicated that many mothers were unable to carry this responsibility unassisted, the myth persisted that child-parent relationship problems were essentially a matter of parent attitudes and education and could most usually be resolved by counselling interviews. The development of the child guidance clinic movement, which attracted and served usually middle class and upper middle class families (the wealthy went to private psychiatrists and the poor went nowhere), strengthened this social work approach to parenting.

3.2 These two elements helped the situation of the poor to remain invisible. Poor parents who could not cope with their children were too often met at the point of failure, when the state had to intervene to provide wardship or other protective care. While individual private agencies gave genuine creative leadership to methods just now receiving generalized endorsement, by and large there was little being done to identify and dramatize the plight of the poor, or to initiate action against poverty as a fact in itself which needed eradication. That poverty victimizes its captive audience and acts upon them is only now, it seems, gaining credence as a fact.

4. Some Missing Elements in Social Welfare in The Past

A. Cooperation

4.1 With these many factors and influences at work, it ought to come as no surprise that the public sector and the private sector of the social welfare field grew apart rather than closer. It seems to us essential to face this fact openly and honestly. It is not a question of assigning blame, but rather of putting our finger on another aspect of the reason why poverty has been allowed to go on so long unchallenged.

4.2 Public departments can be subjected to political pressure, but they can also become inflexible, unapproachable, and secretive. Private agencies can be intimidated through their financing arrangements, but they can also be insular, over-professional, narrow in outlook, and protective of past glories. Whatever the case, there has not been a good use of the one made by the other, and a communication gap developed.

4.3 This communication gap led to a credibility gap which led in turn to a cooperation gap. It seems imperative to us that steps be taken to bridge these gaps; no pattern of programmes Federal, Provincial, or local will have much chance of success unless a new pattern of cooperation is developed. And this new pattern must involve access of the average man to information, and to actual involvement in policy formation. This will not be easy.

B. Awareness of Change as a Process

4.4 One of the most serious lacks in our pattern of public welfare programmes has been the absence of an "enabling" rationale. While we set up our services, regulations, and procedures directed at the poor and disadvantaged, we seemed unable to realize that bringing about change in human circumstances and behavior is a process: it does not happen automatically and very often it has precious little to do with money per se.

4.5 If we are correct, that the function of public assistance programmes has been to finance meeting minimal human existence needs, then it is not inconsistent, perhaps, that they developed few if any auxiliary services designed to help people out of the locked-in tunnel. But the absence of such services represents a central and critical failure to understand the nature of the task.

4.6 Ironically, while the public sector ignored the enabling support required to bring about change in the poor, the private casework field and its psychiatric mentors were concentrating particularly on developing the understanding and skills required to facilitate change in their clients. It was accepted that personality growth was often painful and uneven, that the attempt to change, however well motivated, required considerable consistent support and sharing, and that failures or crises were inevitable and needed to be met with emotional support and sustaining until people were again able to make decisions and choices for themselves. Hours were spent in interviews examining the problems, the possible solutions, and the details of next steps. This excellent support was made available to our more adequate middle and upper middle class clients, who know how to use conversation as the avenue for communication, and analysis of feelings and concepts as the device for change and understanding.

4.7 Yet with the victims of poverty we did the opposite. To those usually the least well housed, the least well nourished, the least well educated, the least resourceful within themselves because of lack of experience with solving problems—in other words—to those least able to manage their chronically disadvantaged lives we gave not quite enough money and expected them to manage it like Wall St. brokers. When they failed to manage it well (and it wasn't adequate anyway), our sanctions fell upon them instead of on the system. When the affluent couldn't manage we provided sensitive long-term supportive counselling. We have done until recently virtually nothing to work with the poor to help them move out of poverty.

5. Implications for Recommendations for Change

5.1 In mobilizing ourselves to overcome poverty attention to two main approaches (at least) is involved: the specific programme required, and the process involved in implementing those programmes so they do work. Developing the one without the other will be to court failure again.

A. Programmes for Poverty

5.2 As a rather over-simplification, it may be suggested that formalized programmes tend to cluster into two groupings:

- (a) those directed essentially to the provision of money; and
- (b) those directed to providing a service which facilitates, and improves individual functioning and coping.

5.3 Appendix B of the Guide for Submission of Briefs to this Committee lists some twenty-eight Federal-Provincial Assistance Programmes whose main aim is the direction of financial support to meet an identified need. The majority of the balance of twenty-three programmes would fit under (b) above as directed toward facilitating or improving the functioning level of citizens.

5.4 Reorganization of the many legislated programmes into a more cohesive and relevant package is necessary, and was initiated in the provisions of the Canada Assistance Act. Many organizations more competent than we to speak to these points are, we are sure, making representation to you. New patterns of income access are indicated, whether as guaranteed annual income, negative income tax, etc. More reasonable levels of direct assistance or family benefits grants will require action as well as the dilemma faced by the elderly or others on fixed incomes which do not adjust readily enough to cope with rising cost of living. We would like to see methods considered which would strengthen the Federal position vis-a-vis the provinces, so that there is more consistent and fuller use made of the provisions of legislation like the Canada Assistance Act by all the provinces. While such programmes languish as pieces of permissive legislation there seems little likelihood that "voluntary incentives" will be adequate to initiate full utilization.

5.5 While income access programmes as in (a) above will no doubt develop, more however is needed. The supportive services required, as referred to in (b), are absolute essentials. Identifying and planning for such services requires a clear look at what is required for family and individual functioning today. In a generalized sense this means that support and help and listening which were provided more generally in the past by relatives and close neighbors when something went wrong or people were ill or in trouble. Such as:

(a) visiting homemakers available on a subsidized basis for the poor as well as those who can pay;

(b) day care programmes geared to the education of children not just baby-sitting them and available not only to working mothers but to mothers at home as well, and to parents who are retraining under Canada Manpower programmes, and available where and as they need it (e.g. in public housing projects, for full-day, half-day or on an emergency basis) for children from birth up to ten or eleven years of age, provided under both public and private auspices;

(c) as another aspect of the responsibility to share parental responsibility, expanded Big Brother and Big Sister services to serve the 10 per cent of Canadian children now growing up with only one parent;

(d) basic homemaking and child care skill training programmes provided by public departments of welfare in cooperation with private agencies and recipients, directed at welfare families, protection department families, young unmarried mothers, etc., and geared to their own expressed needs and actual functioning levels;

(e) re-introduction of home economics programmes in junior high and high schools aimed at both boys and girls in all streams, geared to realities of modern marriage, homemaking, and child care, since so few of our high school attenders go on to post-secondary education;

(f) a concentrated effort to attract to the public welfare field social workers who can work with groups and individuals on public assistance, to help them mobilize themselves to change their situations. Such counselling and community organization function would direct the poor toward services of which they are unaware, toward legal aid service as required, toward marital counselling or family court as indicated, toward adult retraining courses, toward recreational opportunities, etc. And when necessary, such counselling should be free to direct grievance submission to public welfare authorities with and on behalf of recipients, without risk;

(g) programmes for before-and-after counselling, reception and "settling-in" services including adequate "tiding-over" financial help for the immigrant group in Canada; such programmes to be jointly sponsored by public and private agencies and subsidized by public funds. Without correlation of the personal adjustment factors involved in retraining and relocation of the poor from disadvantaged areas, the poverty will be the only thing that really relocated;

(h) encouragement for youth to remain in school through an assistance programme which allows sufficient income to the family that youths are not forced to go to work in order to help support the parents and younger children.

B. The Essential Oil to the Machinery

5.6 While it is encouraging to see Canada willing to examine its present situation in order to improve our attempts to eradicate poverty, we hope that one of the most critical mistakes of the past will be avoided this time. That mistake was the failure to build in to the core of the public welfare structure a recognition that money is not the only ingredient missing from the households of the poor. Supportive and enabling services must go hand in hand with any programme of income access. And in the provision of those supportive services there must be staff of the calibre and knowledge required to work with the chronically disadvantaged on their own rehabilitation. Such staff must be free to engage in such work, supported by a public welfare system more realistic and flexible than in the past. If we fail again to recognize the human component in public welfare planning, we will do little else than re-shuffle our existing and historic pattern under a new set of titles, then assign another committee in 15 or 20 years to examine why it hasn't worked and we still have poverty with us.

Introduction

Big Brothers of Metropolitan Toronto is very pleased to have this opportunity of presenting a brief to The Special Senate Committee on Poverty since the Agency has particular knowledge of one significant group in our society—the family unit made up of a mother with children in her care, who lacks the help and support of a father or father-substitute.

Definition of Poverty

The definition of poverty that we would like to present, therefore, is related to this family unit, and particularly has reference to the boy growing up in a fatherless home. Poverty for such a boy means: "Deprivation of the influence of a mature male from whom the boy learns much about adult masculine behaviour; who would normally be the means of introduction to the outside world of business and recreation; who would provide stimulus and companionship, and guidance in personal and vocational matters. Added to this psychological deprivation is the fact that, in most cases where the family head is the mother, income is barely adequate,⁽¹⁾ therefore the boy is likely to be disadvantaged through lack of financial resources in attempting to reach his potential."

The Population Affected

If the above definition of poverty is accepted, the consequences to the nation of not providing auxiliary services to assist the mother with her responsibilities are obvious since:

(a) boys in the dependent age range (especially up to age 16) constitute the next generation of male adults in our country,

(b) their development into responsible citizens is critically important to our economic, political and cultural welfare,

(c) out of an estimated 3,987,836 boys up to 16 years of age in Canada (DBS Census figures 1966, an estimated 332,340² are in homes where they do not have the consistent guiding influence of an adult male,

(d) there is evidence and opinion that boys growing up in such a home situation are likely to

¹ From: "Brief to the Royal Commission on the Status of Women in Canada, 1968" The Junior League of Toronto.

The following statistics point out the extent to which the single mother is responsible for the financial status of her family. The figures are taken from the 1961 Census published by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, Series 2.1, Bulletin 2.1-7, Cat. 93-516 (Vol: II-Park I). There are 400,000 families which fall into the single parent category of the total 4,147,444 families in Canada, as of 1961.

Canada: 1. Married, but separated (wife having custody), 8,120; 2. Divorced (wife having custody), 13,005; 3. Widowed (widows), 171,503; 4. Others (men & women) never married or common-law relationship, 9,326.

Toronto: 1. Married, but separated, 10,762 having 30,411 children; 2. Widows, 17,032 having 42,359 children; 3. Divorced (male & female), 2,722 having 6,721 children; 4. Never Married, 927 having 2,043 children.

Income statistics indicate that, whether she works, depends on separation or alimony payments, or receives welfare, the mother with dependent children falls into the lowest family income group in Canada. In Ontario, 20,615 mothers are on Family Benefits, and they have 51,934 dependent children.

² Based on estimated ratio of fatherless boys in the population.

- (1) do less well in school,³
- (2) develop personality and character traits that alarm and distress observers (teachers, social workers, mothers),⁴
- (3) become alienated through a sense of "differentness", loneliness, guilt or suppressed rage,
- (4) demonstrate anti-social attitudes in the class-room and community,
- (5) get in trouble with authority at school or with the police,⁵
- (6) become mildly or seriously emotionally disturbed.

We therefore submit that the population served by a Big Brother agency, made up as it is of mothers on their own and children growing up without the influence of a father, merits the special consideration of the Committee. We are presenting this brief to outline the particular problems of this single-parent family unit. We will make some specific suggestions on how mothers can be assisted in fulfilling their economic role as family head, and what programs can be introduced or expanded to help compensate for father-loss. Assistance to these families will be seen to convert them from liabilities to potential assets for the society, and is therefore to be viewed as a sensible investment. Some of the statistical information used in the submission about such families will be obtained from the Federally financed Research Study now taking place in the Agency. We feel that this information from our Research sample reflects accurately the current picture because:

- (a) families in the sample were selected from registered applications for Agency service, covering the two and a half year period—January 1, 1967 to June 30, 1969,
- (b) all types of referrals are included in the research sample,
- (c) the total referrals included boys in the service age range, 6 to 16 years, and the families represent a full cross-section of Metro Toronto.

⁴ Evidenced by referral to Big Brothers from these sources, intake statistics Dec. 15/69, (See Appendix I).

⁵ Completion of the Police/Court schedule showed that 4% of boys from two-parent homes had a police record, and 1% had a court record; this compares with 16% and 6% for non-referred fatherless boys and 28% and 16% for referred boys.

Figures taken from the Family Interview Schedule and the Police and Court Schedules indicate the situation of families with boys eligible for Big Brother service.⁶ The figures illustrate the size of the problem and the seriousness of the situation if it is agreed that fatherlessness during the impressionable early years of a boy's life can adversely affect his development into an independent, contributing citizen. We are talking about an estimated 332,340 individuals. The psychological deprivation in fatherless families is compounded by loss of income. The departure of the father from the family is most often a major catastrophe depriving the family suddenly of regular income. It may equal any other major catastrophe which wipes out a family's means of support.

In the population we serve, 4% of families depend on Public Welfare and 45% of mothers work to support their families. However, the large majority of working mothers' income does not exceed or even reach the subsistence level.⁷ The working mother has additional expenses with provision of care for children while she works. The situation remains precarious for many years and is resolved only when the mother remarries, which is infrequent, or when the grown-up children enter gainful occupation.

It is evident that some auxiliary services in the community are necessary; that such services in no way substitute for the mother's concern or physical care, but are needed to provide what she cannot by the mere fact of being a woman quite apart from lack of resources.

Community Services which help Compensate for Father-loss

Many organizations offering training and recreating programs exist in the community—Y's, Boys' Clubs, Cubs and Scouts Sea Cadets are a few of these. In this brief we would like to recommend that all such programs should receive necessary assistance from public funds, to ensure that no boy is deprived of their help because of their lack of financial resources. That boys do get turned away happens because most of these organizations provide a program based not on need but rather on expediency. (Their operating budget is determined by expectations of revenue, most of which is likely to come from community fund. The fund can only allocate what it receives, and this amount is not related to need, but to the possible.⁸ many such organizations remain after decades of operation, in essence demonstration projects; that is, they have vindicated their philosophy and proved their usefulness over the years, but financial support has never been geared to demand. Thus the Committee would find upon inquiry that camps where people of limited income can send their children turn away a percentage each season; that recreation programs requiring fee payments are not used by low-income families; that even Cubs and Scouts, where a uniform costs money, are beyond the means of many boys. If governments sincerely want all children to have the advantages of some children from community activities which help develop good citizenship then they should be prepared to offer subsidization on a cost basis to organizations offering approved programs, since even a small difference between costs and revenue adds to a deficit position which is already difficult enough.

Why Some Boys Need Special Programs

The programs described above are primarily group oriented, with minimal staff time available for individual attention. Some boys do not respond to this type of activity, or at least are not at the point where they can participate with ease. For such children, the program offered by Big Brothers is invaluable in that it permits a close personal counselling relationship to develop between a boy who lacks a father-figure and an adult male who has volunteered his service.⁹ The boy's need for such individualized attention often diminishes as he gains confidence or just through the growing-up process, and this is recognized by the professional worker who supervises the relationship. Ideally, there should always be alternatives available when the boy is ready for them, to make place for assisting other boys passing through a critical stage. This, however, is not always the case for the main reason described above (restricted service due to limited budgets).

⁸The goal of the United Community Fund of Metropolitan Toronto was $12,100,000. Estimated need was $13,194,262.

⁹The value of this one-to-one type of relationship is recognized by The Ontario Probation Service which now has 23 projects involving volunteers in its adult probation program, plus two experimental programs with juveniles in Metro. The average caseload of a probation officer in Ontario 83.

Cost of Preventive as Compared with Rehabilitative Programs

Unit of service cost to boys in a group is relatively inexpensive, and the figure is often kept low through the use of volunteer adults. Big Brother service, again because of its voluntary component, is not costly (approximately $300 per year per boy). This compares with rehabilitative service costs ranging from $2,000-$16,000 per year. Big Brother service is truly preventive, and expenditure on such a program is dramatically money-saving.¹⁰ In this brief we are not trying to belabour the "savings" aspect; nevertheless, there is nothing wrong in pointing out that saving to the tax-payer results when family disintegration and juvenile problems are prevented rather than merely coped with. We are working from the premise that, except in a small percentage of cases, there are real strengths in these one-parent situations; that it is not necessary to do the whole job, but that a mother bringing up a son on her own needs some help. When she doesn't get it, the costs, in human terms and in tax dollars, can be staggering. One can only conjecture about the saving that might have been affected if preventive services had been available to these families.¹¹

Two Canadian Myths About Poverty

This brief is intended to destroy two prevalent myths:

- (1) that parents not defined as "poor" do not require outside help in fulfilling their parental responsibilities, ¹⁰The number of children in care in Ontario (not in their own homes) in 1970 is approximately 20,000. In 1968, the Province spent $28,131,270 and the municipalities $8,987,121 (24%) for a total of $37,118,391 to look after children who for some reason or another could not remain with their parents. Average cost per child is approximately $2,000. In some instance, where special institutional treatment is deemed necessary, the yearly cost can be over $16,000 ($45 per day). These figures do not include children in Ontario Hospital Schools (except where the children are wards) or children in Provincial Training Schools. The operation of training schools (Dept. of Reform Institutions) in Ontario (estimated 1969-70) is $11,729,000. An additional $1,900,000 is budgeted for supervisory and senior administration costs, and a further sum is required for after-care programs.

¹¹For example, there are approximately 100,000 single parent homes in Ontario, but Big Brother service exists in only 25 communities. Although not every fatherless boy needs help, it is simply not available in most cities and towns in the Province. In many communities, there are men willing to give their time, but money to pay for administration is lacking. The senior governments could consider grants to get such programs off the ground, where need and available volunteer resources are validated by Big Brothers of Canada.

(2) that where such help is not obtained through private purchase (baby-sitters, household help, etc.) it is readily available in full supply by the community,

In examining the requirements of the "poor", we should look first at the requirements of the average, non-dependent family. What supportive services are needed in any situation where there is a father, mother and children? What extra services are required when father is no longer in the picture? We find that even where there are two parents, various ancillary services are required. They are supplied by relatives or are purchased. When there is no father in the home, even greater demands are made of grandparents, in-laws, etc. and there is increased expenditure for "hired" help. All of this is possible because there are relatives, and money is not a problem.

In the case of families of limited income, who lack the resource of relatives, the community is asked to fill the gap. The point here is, that such families demonstrate not more dependency, but fewer resources. Their inherent strengths remain the same—a mother devoted to her children, and children living in their own home. When one appreciates the value of this, as opposed to finding accommodation for children outside their own home, it it gives added emphasis to the importance of maintaining the family as a unit. The moral question is, how many would be in their own homes, with their own mothers and fathers, if our communities could bring themselves to providing:

(a) housing at a cost that did not eat up an exorbitant portion of the family income,

(b) relief services for overburdened mothers,

(c) supplementary income where the family head's value on the labour market does not match the cost of family upkeep (more realistic allowances for children and youths),

(d) and such special services as Big Brothers.

*We must ask ourselves what kind of a society do we have, that governments can pay forty-five dollars a day for institutional care for a child after he gets into trouble, but so few tax dollars are spent on a service like Big Brothers, which for less than one dollar per day may prevent at least a percentage of these troubled children from having to be removed from their homes? The question therefore has clear financial implications. We are avoiding a minimal investment to save spiralling costs in human and financial terms.

Why Voluntary Agencies are not Supported by Government

We urge the Committee to investigate ways and means whereby financial support can be given to non-government preventive agencies which have demonstrated the validity of their programs. Such agencies would have no objections in submitting to examination of their operations—in fact, few businesses undergo such close scrutiny as do voluntary agencies receiving support from charitable funds. To hold back tax dollars on the grounds that these services are the responsibility of private boards and community chests is to evade the issue, which is simply that the community need far exceeds the private financial supply.

We are well aware that getting tax dollars into the operating budgets of voluntary agencies is a complicated business, since governments must concern themselves to some degree with eligibility. There is the added difficulty of jurisdictions. However, it is perfectly apparent that where there is a will there is a way. Although health and welfare for instance, are provincial responsibilities: when it was decided that the development of a home care program would mean thousands of dollars saved in hospital costs, arrangements were worked out whereby municipalities took advantage of legislation for cost sharing with the Province of Ontario, and this provincial expenditure is re-couped from Ottawa under the terms of the Canadian Assistance Plan. Similarly almost all home maker and visiting nurse service offered to citizens in this Province are purchased from voluntary agencies (except in one or two instances where municipalities have hired their own homemakers.) A claim on the government¹² can only be made on behalf of recipients of the service who meet certain eligibility requirements, which usually implies that they have been means-tested. For service to these people, the agency is reimbursed at cost, allowing the voluntary dollar it receives to be used on behalf of those in the community who, although not indigent, need a subsidized service. Exactly the same principle could be used to purchase "other preventive services" mentioned so often our enlightened legislation. For instance, why can't Y's obtain the cost of a camp holiday for the child of a mother who receives family benefits? Or why can't Big Brother service be chargeable for a boy in such a family, if the service is recommended by the court, police, a children's aid worker, or a case worker in the Department of Social and Family Services?

* See Appendixes II and III—Quotes from Head of Police Youth Bureau and Family Court Judge.

The Effect of Purchase of Service by Government on a Typical Total Program

We accept the fact that governments must restrict their purchase of social services to those who have a genuine need and can demonstrate eligibility. We would like the Committee to understand what effect even such a limited financial contribution would have on our Big Brother service program in Metro. At the present time, approximately 40% of the service given goes to families in receipt of welfare (the other 60% of mothers work or have other income). Our unit costs for service is roughly $300 per year. In a total case load of 600 boys, therefore, service to 240 boys would be chargeable to the municipality, which would share the cost on a 20/80 basis with the Province. The Province would then collect 50% of its expenditure from Ottawa under the Canada Assistance Plan. The enabling provincial legislation is the Child Welfare Act, 1965.

Revenue to the Agency, at $300 per boy, would be $72,000. Although the contractual budget arrangement with the United Community Fund is in respect to an operative deficit, the fund traditionally has been in favour of expanded programs if they are related to demonstrated need—and what better demonstration of this—in our case, this need is demonstrated by a constant waiting list almost equal to the active cases.¹⁸ Payment on cost basis for eligible boys would therefore free more voluntary dollars to serve families where mother is working, or where income is adequate but the service is required for important psychological reasons—situations of acceptable for public subsidization, but most appropriate for the community dollar.

Reasons why provincial governments do not press for implementation of permissive legislation

It is apparent to the observer that the zeal with which politicians press for enlightened welfare measures does not carry over into implementation and the reasons are quite obvious. Such legislation looks good on the books, is a credit to the legislature, and costs nothing. It is only when the benefits of the legislation reach people that tax-dollars are involved, and unfortunately those who receive service are often silent while those who foot the bill are often very vocal. Few politicians are immune from the outraged cries of constituents. Many a Children's Aid budget, for example, has contained an allocation for services, put there by people who had carefully reviewed the Child Welfare Act and noted the stress on "prevention". Prevention often means more than the friendly counselling of a social worker (it may call for a homemaker to take the pressure off a mother; a pre-school program for a child who needs more stimulus to promote development; a camping experience for a deprived youngster). The case histories in protection files are often prophetic in the sense that they predict what is going to happen if the family is allowed to struggle on without supportive services. However, Children's Aid budgets are reviewed by municipal officials who may not interpret the legislation as liberally. They complain to their member of parliament, and the Minister is very apt to receive a call or visit. The Province can overrule the objections of a municipality, but one does not have to be very politically aware to see the implications. Where such pressures are not resisted, the whole flow of money to help people with their problems can be stopped, in spite of the good intentions of our senior governments.

CONCLUSION

The Special Committee on Poverty was convened to examine ways in which more help could reach those in need and, of equal importance, ways in which the rising level of welfare costs can be stemmed. It may seem that this brief is advocating more of everything, but we are in fact suggesting an attack on causes which would have the result of diminishing need, and the costly measures which must be taken once individual or family disintegration has taken place.

Since the acceptable standard of service has now risen so that social services must employ highly qualified personnel, and institutions must have trained staff, there is no chance that administrative costs will decrease. A similar situation obtains in the medical sphere where everything from building costs to intern's salaries has doubled or tripled over the past ten years.¹⁴ In that field, concerned people are now looking at alternatives such as better public health programs;¹⁵ home care for patients to get them out of costly hospital beds; motel units where less expensive medical supervision can be provided during the recuperation period. This example should be followed by welfare professionals and members of the community involved in social services. There are alternatives to taking children into care; there are alternatives to sending children to training schools; there are measures that can be taken to prevent boys and girls from becoming alienated and discouraged. We can assist parents in their roles. Such programs do cost money, but not nearly as much as we now spend on institutions, foster homes and the salaries of psychiatrists, psychologists, social workers et al, whom we employ to pick up the pieces. The main points of the brief are as follows:

(1) recent legislation at Federal and Provincial levels put great emphasis on prevention;¹⁶

(2) at the present time, government supplies most of the financial assistance required by people who are unable, either temporarily or permanently, to support themselves,

(3) while an adequate income is the basis for a secure family life, the whole family, or individual members, may from time to time require special services (which, in effect, improve their income potential),

(4) such special services (home makers, visiting nurses, recreational programs, services to youth) are mainly supplied by voluntary agencies,

(5) these agencies are, almost without exception, operated efficiently and designed to serve the whole community. They are able to keep operating costs low because they attract a great amount of volunteer help,

(6) the services provided by these agencies can be "costed" by unit. In this way the agency can sell service to government on behalf of families or persons who meet government eligibility requirements,

(7) precedent for this arrangement exists in the implementation by municipalities of the Visiting Nurses and Homemakers Act 1958, Revised 1965, and in the development of the Home Care Program in Ontario,

(8) if voluntary agencies are to develop their programs to the point where they are no longer "demonstration projects" with long waiting lists, more effort must be made by government to direct public funds into their operations,

(9) the only way to curb the rising cost of welfare in Canada is to prevent need, since programs are bound to become increasingly expensive as standards rise,

(10) it is evading the issue for such groups as the Economic Council of Ontario to talk of "pilot projects and experimental programs" when organizations that have proved their worth for over 50 years receive little or no financial support from government. For the government to leave the responsibility for these preventive programs on the doorstep of voluntary funds, and at the mercy of charitable impulse, is unjustifiable from the point of view of social policy or economy,

(11) in hard financial terms, this brief demonstrates that a shift in distribution of public welfare funds could bring about measurable savings.

We believe that parents who ask for help are not trying to evade responsibility, but are truly concerned with their children's welfare and that it is in the community's interest to supply these supportive services. If there ever was a time when the family was self-sufficient, it is long past, and clinging to such antique notions does more credit to our romanticism than our common sense.

betray a poverty of imagination and surely impoverishes all of us—rich and poor alike.

APPENDIX "F"

A Brief to the Special Senate Committee on

Poverty

by the

Ontario Federation of Citizens' Associations

Definition of poverty used for this brief—we have accepted a broad definition of poverty—the inability to enter and participate in the mainstream of society.

The Ontario Federation of Citizens' Associations does not have a staff of researchers, no paid employees; it does not have a team of experts and yet most member associations centre around lower income areas, and consequently many members are "experts" in terms of the lives they lead. Nevertheless, as we compile this brief we feel we are more likely to ask questions than to answer them, and better equipped to indicate what needs to be done than we are to tell how to do it.

1. Public Education

One of the major problems faced by Canada's low income people is the complete lack of knowledge and understanding displayed by the general, more affluent, public. This is most noticeable in the "just above poverty" income segment, and least detectable in the high income segment—who perhaps see themselves with the most to lose should the recent riots in the U.S. spread here. Naturally, there are many exceptions.

The public at large is most content to bury its head in the sand and pretend poverty does not exist. The average man in the street has no conception of how much a senior citizen must get by on, no idea of how much is given to a deserted mother with several children to care for and if faced with the prospect of existing on the same income would have no idea of where to start.

This general lack of knowledge, and apathetic viewpoint commonly displayed must make it extremely difficult for governments in power to gain the courage to make meaningful changes; they feel, quite understandably, that they would not be returned to power if really progressive social reforms took place that might possibly increase taxes or reduce services available elsewhere.

Letters to the press, comments received by individuals and observations in general appear to indicate that the welfare recipient bears the brunt of the public's spite; occasional reports are published of an individual "cheating" the Welfare Department by collecting while working. Attention is often drawn to the apparently employable man receiving assistance with no consideration given to the fact that he may have a severe heart condition, disability, or other responsible reason for being unemployed.

It is assumed by the public that most recipients of public assistance are lazy uneducated, heavy drinking social parasites. A few undoubtedly are, but we believe they are a much smaller percentage than those in the rest of the population who diddle on their income tax, and all are made to suffer equally. Implementation of the following recommendation should better educate the public:

Recommendation: We recommend that the Special Senate Committee ask the Federal government to publish reports not less than quarterly, giving breakdown of the number of people receiving assistance in the following terms:

- (1) Number of blind or otherwise medically disabled persons
- (2) Number of deserted, divorced or widowed mothers with families
- (3) Number of employable males in a depressed area (little work available)
- (4) Number of employable males in non-depressed areas
- (5) Total number of people receiving public assistance

Such report to indicate the national totals and the total applicable to each province.

2. Welfare—Public Assistance

From what we have observed in the press a frequent topic covered in briefs to this committee cover the field of public assistance—welfare, family benefits, old age pensions etc.

There is no doubt that allowances are totally inadequate and we feel confident that this is one area where the Special Senate Committee will recommend substantial changes.

Institutions are by their nature slow moving bodies, governments—perhaps the biggest institutions—perhaps the slowest of all. Therefore, it seems likely that structural changes in the whole system of public assistance will not be achieved overnight.

In this field, rather than attempt to present detailed suggestions for changes in the total system, we wish only to express our opinion that one basic change is required—people receiving assistance need more money—and concentrate on some lesser but still important amendments that could be made immediately.

(1) Christmas allowance. Children of families receiving assistance do not experience a Christmas that is considered normal in this country. "Santa Claus" is seldom able to purchase the gifts a young child has his or her heart set on. A four year old surely cannot comprehend why friends have Christmas trees, decorations, presents, a table loaded with goodies etc. when he has so little. Does he blame his parents? Can he understand the heartbreak his mother feels? Society attempts to salve its conscience by donating to charities—providing food hampers—passing along new or used toys—then promptly forgets the poor family for another 360 odd days. Doubtless people's generosity is appreciated by most of those who receive gifts. The children, at least, have something—although a jigsaw puzzle with two pieces missing is small consolation to the little girl who so desperately wanted a doll that talks. Accordingly, we ask, in the name of humanity, Recommendation: That the Special Senate Committee request immediate legislation providing for an additional gift of $100 payable on December 1st in each year to any family with a child or children under the age of 16 that has been receiving public assistance continuously for the preceding three months, i.e. since September 1st of that year, and that such payment be in addition to, and entirely distinct from, the regular budgeted allowance.

(2) It is recognised that some individuals, and some families, are better able to budget their income than others.

Those who have difficulty are of course those who have the worst problems in making ends meet. We submit that in most cases this is a result of lack of education rather than irresponsibility and we recommend: All county or municipal Welfare Departments employ expert home economists whose sole responsibility would be to assist family budgeting. They would spend time with individuals requesting help in preparation of shopping lists, store shopping and advise and instruct on choice and selection of bargains; in the field of cooking to make most economical use of purchases.

(3) Under existing legislation, a review board is necessary to examine the cases of persons who claim they are not receiving the amount to which they are entitled and it is our understanding that a province must have such a board to obtain federal funds to assist with their program.

Recommendation: We believe that the Federal government should insist on two very important changes in the composition of these review boards, and we make the following recommendations:

(A) That the review Boards be instructed to hear, and make rulings on complaints relating to the attitude or activities of departmental social workers

(B) That the review Boards must be comprised of ordinary citizens not in any way connected with welfare administration and/or recipients or former recipients of service by a ratio of 2-1 to past or present administrators.

We don't suggest any existing boards are biased, but are satisfied they lack the confidence of those they are supposed to serve.

(4) It has been the observation of many of our members that while municipal welfare given to families over a short period of time—temporary unemployment, sickness, etc. is inadequate, it does not necessarily represent extreme hardship on a short-term basis.

In instances where receipt of public assistance is prolonged the situation becomes vastly different, e.g. single parents with young families, permanently disabled men, etc. Even a budget conscious mother who can exist and feed her family from month to month on her allowance can find nothing to spare to look after occasional furniture requirements, costly repairs to household appliances, drapes, rugs, winter clothing, snow boots, holidays, etc.

The result, in effect, is a gradual but steady deterioration of such homes. As things wear out, or are damaged, they are not replaced or repaired and the family head faces increased depression as his or her home collapses around them. Family squabbles or full scale arguments may increase, and there is probably an increased need for an "escape" whether it be liquor, sex or desertion.

While we have never seen such statements in writing before, families obliged to receive assistance for substantial periods of time must face the fact that the Canadian public, through their governments and administrators, want:

- (1) their homes and families to eventually disintegrate
- (2) their children to always wear "hand-me-downs"
- (3) adults or children to turn to crime in an effort to keep pace with neighbours
- (4) to ensure they never enjoy a vacation together
- (5) their children to go without such things as Easter eggs (we know of one family allowance recipient criticised for buying a child an Easter egg), Christmas presents, birthday gifts, parties, outings, trips and adequate education.
- (6) Separated women to forego male company permanently.

This same public is always ready to criticise, but never to understand the teen-age girl who steals a lipstick, the adult who tries to "cheat" the system by working part-time, or the man who sees a case of beer as the only way out.

Accordingly, until permanent and adequate changes are made in the entire public assistance system, and regardless of budgets or any cost of living increases that may happen to be granted, We Recommend: That families headed by permanently disabled men or women with one or more children under the age of 16 who have been receiving assistance continuously for two years, receive an increase of twenty-five percent of the amount then payable, and after 5 years, an increase of a further fifteen percent.

Minimum Wage

We contend that the minimum wage is grossly inadequate, and Recommend: that the minimum wage be substantially increased.

3. Relationship of Poverty to Crime

To our knowledge, no comprehensive study of this topic has been undertaken in recent years, yet—as you will note from comments in the preceding paragraphs—we believe a relationship definitely exists.

Recommendation: That a comprehensive, coast to coast, study be sponsored by the Department of National Health and Welfare to explore the relationship between poverty and crime, with emphasis given to varying types of crime.

Such a study could further notify the public that it may be more costly to have poverty in its midst than to eradicate it.

Relationship of Credit to Poverty

Easy credit, we have noted, can lead to poverty. Not only in terms of illegal or quasi-legal fringe lenders who charge usurious rates but banks, finance or loan companies with money to lend or retail stores anxious to make a sale, will lend beyond an individual's ability to repay under some circumstances. The number of loan companies advertising consolidation loans with one easy payment indicate a recognition that they or their cohorts have extended credit too liberally.

Loss of job, extended sickness or changes in family composition (working wife pregnant) can have disastrous results.

We recognize that no government can legislate good sense; this problem must be tackled by other methods for the protection of the public.

Recommendations:

- (1) That the federal government should sponsor a study to examine and publicize the relationship between easy credit and poverty.

- (2) That legislation be proposed placing a limit on interest on any kind of loan at 12% per annum calculated on a reducing balance.

- (3) That limits be set on the interest rates payable by lending institution (Banks, trust companies, etc.) for depositors' funds of various types.

We believe the first of these is self explanatory. The second would eliminate loan being made to the poor risks—the people most likely to have difficulty in repaying while the third will avoid lending institution being caught in a squeeze between high rates on deposits and a "pegged" lending rate. Some restrictions may be required to govern the flow of money in or out of the country should Canada's rates differ from, say those in the United States or elsewhere.

Social Agencies

While naturally the prime concern of poor people at all levels is the improvement of their economic status, many have some degree of contact with, or dependence on, social agencies.

It would appear that social agencies frequently concentrate on preventative measures; we have a number of concerns relating to agencies that have dealings with the poor (We know few do so exclusively).

We voice these concerns in the hope that public airing may focus attention on them. We do so, too, without specific recommendations, since we are unsure of the extent any government could, or would, wish to intervene and legislate.

Some agencies have been around a good many years; they attempt to move with the times, and on the whole supply consistently good service in their field. Our question is, why must this category of agency depend for funding on the United Community Fund? Surely, soundly developed service, consistently supplied for many years, should render an agency eligible for public funding from the government directly, without a corresponding increase in external supervision.

Our second question relates to accountability. To whom is a social agency accountable? Funding generally derives from the United Community Fund who in recent years have arranged for the Social Planning Council to conduct "reviews". The logical question then follows—to whom is the United Community Fund accountable?

Should a government make a poor decision, or be guilty of poor planning or foresight, there are always opposition parties who will ensure the fault is rapidly made public, giving the government a chance to change its ways or risk public displeasure at the polls. Where is the "opposition" party in the United Community Fund?

Also, can the Social Planning Council, which itself is dependent on United Community Funds, really make objective reports on sister organisations? Is it possible that some thought might be given to whether a report might be unacceptable?

We fear the staff of the Social Planning Councils, or their equivalents, across the country must surely be caught between opposing pressures—between needs of citizens on the one hand and demands of Community Funds on the other.

We will be coming back to the functions of the United Appeals and United Community Funds later in this brief, but we thought your committee would be interested in the views of lower income people concerning social agencies and social workers.

In October 1969, this Federation held a 2-day conference under the title, "The Active Community". One workshop discussion was "Working with Social Agencies and Professional Social Workers". Below is a selection of comments and opinions expressed in the workshop, taken from our published report. Please read each paragraph as unrelated to that preceding or following.

"Agencies are competing against each other—represent only their individual Service, never together. They must work together for common good."

"Social agencies help to establish a climate of power for change—self help—not too much being done for fear of establishment. Must keep noses clean."

"People are not involved in running agencies—only on the receiving level." This is a way of maintaining the status quo.

A few agencies realize that recipients of service must be involved—this hinders agencies getting together.

Social workers (agencies) feel they are professionals and know what people NEED, not want.

There are problems—can social agencies help correct them? Do they really want to?

Most agencies patch up pot holes, never build anything new.

Agencies tend to be secretive, not letting people know about their service because they don't want to be swamped with work.

Agencies are shunning their responsibilities by not advertising.

The United Community Fund

Government-operated social services fall into the "corrective" or perhaps "rehabilitative" categories: Apart from the provincial assistance given the Children's Aid Society, governments do not operate to any degree in the preventative field. The needs in this area have to be met by private appeals for funds—a non-enforceable tax to support the preventative aspects of social services.

As agencies grew in both size and number, the number of separate appeals became both too great and too costly. Formation of some sort of "United Appeal" became a logical next step forward.

We believe the time has come for Canadians to take another step forward for several reasons.

We respectfully direct the Senators' attention to the City of Ottawa, where, according to reports, the goal of the United Appeal was not achieved. Quoting Judy Barrie in the Ottawa Citizen of January 30, 1970, this is what is expected to happen as a result.

"Family Service Centre will offer help to 300 families less than last year, and 600 less than its planned 1970 capacity.

The Y will not be able to develop hope for programs and services in the physical department.

The Maycourt Clinic will have to eliminate all plans for repairs and replacements.

Training of social welfare students will be erratic and training of professional social work students will be cut back 50 %.

The Victorian Order of Nurses increased its fees.

Community Development activity will be cut down."

Bill Huck, Central Budget Committee Chairman, is quoted as warning that United Appeal is close to a much more serious situation. After reviewing the 1970 recommended allocations he said "this is a mild way of saying what could generally be called a financial crisis."

We see a distinct possibility that within one or two years the Toronto goal will not be met. There are a number of reasons for this belief and we may not be learned enough to fully appreciate the significance of some of them.

Firstly, the attitude of the public in general. The United Appeal, for various reasons, has never had the support of all the people; in recent months, however, we have heard an increasing number of respectable middle or upper class people mentioning disenchantment with the United Community Fund.

Secondly, the amount of the appeal. At approximately $12,000,000 in Toronto, this represents roughly $6 a year for every city resident. A small amount, yet a large percentage of it comes as tax deductible donations from businesses and business men; how much and how many "ordinary" people are really committed?

Thirdly, our concern lies with the attitude of the UCF itself, and some of those involved in it. As an example, in 1969 some questions of genuine concern arose among our members regarding some aspects of the U.C.F. We believe the Metro Federation of Citizen's Associations acted responsibly with regard to these concerns. Instead of voicing them through the press, which would undoubtedly have harmed the appeal then under way, we requested the Executive Director to come and discuss them at an informal meeting with our members. He was unable to come due to a "conference on computer systems", but invited some of us to meet him in the daytime when we are working or seeing to the needs of our children.

When computer systems become more important than people, we believe an organization has ceased to be cognizant of, and responsive to, the needs of people.

It is not sufficient to simply say an organization has ceased to be relevant to present society—anyone can do that; to make a valid point suitable alternatives must be given.

The only answer we can see in giving the general public some say in its own affairs is for the United Community Fund to come directly under governmental jurisdiction, where the public can demand rather than request satisfactory answers to questions and when long-standing displeasure can be voiced at the polls.

Further advantages accrue—funds raised by direct taxation from both private and industrial sources would be far greater and would ensure "fair share" giving, totally independent reviews could be undertaken, valid and worthwhile new services could be funded without a ridiculous 3-year waiting period, and a full measure of independence and security could be offered to both public and agencies by careful legislation.

Recommendation: That United Community Funds should be placed under the direct jurisdiction of regional, county or metropolitan government, financed by direct taxation. We recommend that discussions relative to this change begin forthwith between all levels of government, the United Community Funds and representatives of the community at large to ensure no loss of autonomy faces the agencies and no reduction in service faces the public. Reviews to be conducted by independent bodies. (Greenholme Neighbourhood Association does not support this recommendation).

Cultural Improvement

At the beginning of our brief, we referred to poverty as the inability to participate in the mainstream of society. We used this definition deliberately since poverty in this sense does not refer only to those on the lowest rung of the economic ladder.

May we quote one example?

York University here in this city has a number of "continuing education" courses, as no doubt do most other like institutions. From a recent mailing some of these courses include Effective Public Speaking ($60.00 fee), The Violent Society ($35.00 fee), Man Alone; Alienation in the Modern World ($35.00 fee), Creative Drama ($35.00 fee).

Why is it assumed that only the affluent would participate in such "interest" courses? Fees of $35 or more are just as difficult to the $7,000 office worker with several children as they are to a $4,000 a year man.

There certainly seems to be a lack of awareness that many divorced or separated women have a reasonable education and would enjoy the opportunity to reach out for such courses, which undoubtedly can contribute to the quality of life.

Frankly, we do not see how the Special Senate Committee can act on this issue; making such courses available at reduced cost is a dubious "band-aid" answer at best, since it involves the indignity of applying and would probably result in reduced fees not being taken up by those who need them.

We have merely brought this in to point up one of the many ways in which the lower income segment of society cannot avail itself of the resources Canada offers.

Participation in Boards and Decision Making Bodies

There has been a great deal said about the need for citizen participation lately—in fact, it has been the "in" thing to talk about, even though implementation seldom exceeds tokenism.

We endorse the concept of citizen participation, and we lay stress on the word "participation". We are not at this time suggesting wholesale takeovers.

Rather than leave the topic on vague, ambiguous terms, we are prepared to quote examples of how such participation could result or has resulted in direct benefit to organizations. We will not name them since we do not wish to cause embarrassment or discourage useful energy which could be put to better use.

Not too long ago (last year) a volunteer organization decided to bring a circus to this city, and by soliciting donations from businesses, made tickets to the circus available to under-privileged children. This appears on the face of it to be a really worthwhile cause and we would not question the motivation. Undoubtedly, the organization raised thousands of dollars from businessmen who thought they were "doing their bit for the kids".

Tickets were printed entitling children up to 8 to free admission to the circus, and while we are not aware of all methods of distribution, we know some were handed out at schools. We ask the Senators to visualize the happy, smiling faces of little 5, 6, 7 or 8 year old children who perhaps seldom get a real treat, running home to mother—"Look, Mum, I've got a free ticket to the circus."

May we now direct your attention to the plight of the mothers. Few would allow a 5 or 6 year old child to go alone, yet adult tickets cost something up to $4.50, a small fortune to a mother on welfare. Then there are travel expenses—and what child could enjoy a circus without a bag of popcorn and a can of pop? Now perhaps you are beginning to visualize some of the crestfallen faces and moist cheeks of kids who have had a candy held out, only to have it snatched away when they reach out to grasp it. A few parents, meeting with the planning committee organizing the event, could have readily pointed out the pitfalls beforehand, and helped to make a worthwhile endeavour into an outstanding success with only minor changes.

In contrast, we hear of a group organizing a day care centre that brought a former user of day care services on to their committee and rapidly found her services and advice so invaluable that she became involved in even the smallest decisions. Not only was this group prepared to try out the concept of participation, they soon found that it really worked.

Recommendation: We therefore ask the Special Committee to wholeheartedly endorse the concept of full citizen participation in planning, policy making, or field operation, whether at governmental, or social or volunteer agency level, since only in this way will citizen groups cease to be forced into "protest" operations and be able to concentrate fully on meaningful, creative tasks.

Tenant participation at board or decision making level of Provincial and Municipal housing authorities would be an excellent case in point.

We ask this Committee to exert all of its influence on businessmen across the country to persuade them that they alone are ineffective in trying to operate socially-oriented organizations.

An insurance company executive, for example, does not try to tell a taxi company how many cabs are needed in an area; why should he think he can dictate policy to a social agency?

We believe the time will come when the social or business prestige that accrues to those who count the number of boards they sit on as a measure of success will become a social disgrace if they are unqualified, ill-attending and ineffective in that capacity.

Community organization

We applaud the steps taken by various levels of government to provide funds or "seed" money to foster community development. We particularly commend the Department of National Health and Welfare, the CMHC, Department of Secretary of State and provincially, the department of the Provincial Secretary.

The whole field of community development is relatively new; there is no agency dedicated to this purpose other than the C.Y.C. which we believe, despite criticism, is doing an effective job in many areas.

People with a near-sighted approach say governments cannot be expected to fund groups who will likely end up challenging those same governments.

We ask why such challenges are necessary in the first place, and suggest that because they are necessary a few people are sufficiently far sighted enough to realize that money spent this way—an insignificant part of our national budget—is going to have a far reaching effect in improving the quality of life for many—perhaps all—citizens.

Final Recommendation: We urge the Committee to recommend greater expenditures be made in the field of community development, responsive to the needs of people in communities and we urge creation of one department to administer such funds rather than the present multiplicity.

SUMMARY OF RECOMMENDATIONS

1. We recommend that the Special Senate Committee ask the Federal government to publish reports not less than quarterly, giving breakdown of the number of people receiving assistance in the following terms:

Summation

Whether governments or big business realise it or not, we are moving slowly but surely into an era when the needs of people demand attention—where the value placed on people must transcend the value placed on the dollar. Many of this country's young people have already reached this conclusion, and need only the experience, maturity and expertise to discover how to put their ideas into effect.

The influence of churches has, unfortunately, decreased; poorer people see some church leaders as outdated, while many congregations are regarded as living in the past, hypocritical, and unable to even see, let alone face up to the social ills that plague our society.

Some social workers are seen to be dedicated to the improvement of society, while others are merely content to maintain the status quo. We have nothing but contempt for those who laugh at suggestions put forward by the "un-educated" as happened on one recent television program. However, we see the role of the social workers as an enabler, not as a leader.

Governments are traditionally slow to react; the machinery does not seem to be there for a true quick response. Where then is leadership to come from, if not from people themselves? To go further, what better place is there?

We see a very real possibility of violence in the streets of many Canadian cities, and many of us feel this could occur within a relatively short time—five years. Those involved will lose, the affluent society will lose—heavily, and Canada itself will lose. This must be avoided at all costs. People will not live with frustration, indignity and degradation indefinitely.

There is an ultra conservative segment of society who refuse to acknowledge the inevitable and who cannot see beyond the end of their noses. They will not accept the possibility that re-assessment and re-evaluation of government spending can be a valid alternative to increased taxation. Improved social conditions do not have to mean higher taxes, and efforts spent in this direction may well be infinitely more rewarding than trying to keep "these people" in their place.

It has often been said that a part of our society needs the element of poverty for its own increasing wealth and survival. This segment, if it does exist, has the most to lose should poverty be eliminated. We contend it would have even more to lose if poverty is not eliminated.

Some of us have expressed doubts regarding the effectiveness of briefs to this Committee; denial of this would be an untruth. Others say, perhaps rightly, that they have sat on committees, written briefs, participated in discussions, held meetings and confronted authorities to the point where they are sick of talks, studies and surveys; they want action.

In travelling the country, members of your Committee have undoubtedly heard such sentiments, and we ask you to convey a sense of urgency to those who will create change.

Finally, these hearings are providing an opportunity to publicly air proposals, however radical they may seem, that can lead to change or reform as needed, and stimulate public discussion and education. This is itself is a worthwhile purpose.

In view of the ever rising cost of living, with no relief in sight, there are many groups in our country who feel the effects of our economy more than others. These, to be specific are the one's being subsidized by the government agencies. As you are probably aware, each subsidy brings with it varying benefits.

One area of benefit brought to our attention by our membership that we feel needs improvement is that of the prescription medicine.

In the case of families on welfare, we understand a card to cover the cost of prescriptions is sent out monthly to each family. The family then presents this card to his druggist, who fills the prescriptions when and if their doctor feels one is necessary. At the end of each month the druggist submits these cards to the Welfare Agency, and they are paid by them. This procedure certainly relieves the recipient of any additional worry concerning finances during illness.

In the case of a family receiving Family Benefits, the parent must have the cash on hand at the time of an illness, or he is forced to go from neighbour to neighbour, in an effort to find someone willing to lend him the amount needed immediately. In the cases where there are several children involved, it may prove to be an impossibility to borrow such an amount, and the parent would have this worry to contend with also. It is true that they could submit the prescriptions once a month to the Welfare Department, and they will be reimbursed to the amount of $20.00 total bills, but this aid is not available at the time most needed, and in the cases where there are several children, it does not take too long to acquire $20.00 in drugs at the present high costs of prescriptions.

We do not feel that a parent should be put in the position of having to choose which child should receive the medication, or in depriving the rest of the family of their food allowance in order that this medicine be purchased. Nor do we feel that the little privacy that these people enjoy should be exposed by having to beg neighbours, friends and relations for monies to pay for this.

There is no apparent reason why these people who receive the Family Benefits, in one form or another, should not be treated equally, and all be given this prescription card. They obviously would not be used if not needed, and would have that much freedom from worry.

We would hope that this step would help those involved to cope with our inflationary spiral and ease their minds somewhat.

This Section of the Brief has been prepared for the Special Senate Committee on Poverty

Lawrence Heights Neighbourhood Association.

We, the Committee of the Lawrence Heights Neighbourhood Association, offer this brief as a summary of Public Housing as we see it today, and as we hope to see it tomorrow. We suggest a change of attitudes and objectives, and offer our Government a way out of their ever-increasing, over-commitment in Low-rental Public Housing. We introduce some complexity, and do so without any embarrassment, knowing that there is no simple answer to this complex problem. There is the possibility that the mechanics of our suggestions may not be as complex as the present manipulations for collecting differential rents, land leasings, and N.H.A. Mortgages. Ours is the worms eye view, and is conservatively tailored to reduce the risk of its being rejected.

We have broken down our brief to cover the three types or classes of citizens who tenant Ontario Public Housing.

No. 1 The family whose affluence would allow them to save and move out of Public Housing if their income was not so heavily penalized by our existing rent scale.

No. 2 The family with a steady income, but who would require an initial subsidy to move out of Public Housing.

No. 3 The family whose earning power is so limited by physical, mental or social inadequacy, that they must obviously always remain the recipients of rental subsidy.

SUGGESTION FOR FAMILY NO. 1

This suggestion covers families whose earning power has increased subsequent to their becoming tenants of a low-rental unit.

Their difficulty in getting ahead is that the housing authority bases their rental system on differential rates based on the fluctuating income of the family, without regard to the size or cost of the housing unit involved. This was a just system in the country of its origin, but here in Canada where personal income tax exemptions are so low, this is not just. The outcome of its application here is that while still in a very low income bracket, the Public Housing tenant may find his earned dollar penalized by two government sources. This will hamstring the family's efforts to better itself.

An Example: A Public Housing tenant, who with an added effort increases his earning power by $1,500 a year. If this money is taxable income, it is a long way from his pocket.

Income tax will take 300; Increased rent, 500; Job pension 100; Total 900.

This means that this family will forfeit three-fifths of their new wealth, without the opportunity of spending any of it on food or clothing, or in the more affluent cases, having saved it. This harassment of a family's finances belies the Government's stated policy of protecting the lower middle income groups. It contradicts the Provincial Government's stated intention of stabilizing the outlay that the lower middle income groups must make for shelter. It cripples their own tenant's propensity to spend, and attacks their earnings in a more immediate way than the inflationary effects that have hit the open rental market. They in fact lead the field in this aspect.

OUR PLAN—RENTS

The first move would be to establish a permanent ceiling on the rents of the existing units. The Housing Authority should NOT follow these rent ceilings to the current market prices, but rather on the original cost of the units involved should be the key to the new rent scale. The cost of high-price projects could be excluded from the median used for its assessment. The Authority would still collect rents at the present scale, except that the monies collected in excess of the rent ceiling would be placed to the credit of the tenant as a H.O.M.E. deposit account. When these credits and the tenant's gross salary have reached the level of home purchase requirements, the Authority would be justified in terminating the tenant's lease. The tenant would have a deposit for his new home, plus a proven record of ability to pay.

The Authority would once more have a housing unit available to them at the low cost of the accounting procedures involved in the processing of the rental credits.

OUR PLAN—HOMES

We visualize the Province leasing a home-site for 99 years to a tenant who has a credit of $1,000, at a yearly ground rent of $150. Groups of 25 or 50 eligible tenants would form co-operatives, employing builders to erect new homes on the leased sites. Their full mortgages would be covered or backed by the monies normally made available to the Authority if they were erecting low-rental units on these sites. That the co-operatives would take on the costs of the building would lift the costly burden of guardianship from the shoulders of the Housing Authority. When they are established, Co-op committees would liaison defaulters or financial casualties among their members back into Public Housing. On the other hand, the Authority would channel eligible replacements from their projects into existing Co-op houses.

For example: If the Province had purchased a tract of land, which they did in 1956 and still have unused, which would provide 2,000 home sites. Say the cost of this land was four million dollars. The initial down payments, from credits or otherwise, of $1,000 per site would immediately return two million dollars. The ground rent over the term of the lease would return about three million dollars, bring their return to five million dollars. At which time, the Province would still own the land. In the interim period, the terms of the lease would provide the Province with control over the state of the buildings occupying their land, giving the Province a necessary slum control for the future. We feel that the Province could save vast sums of money if it is not the custodian of the premises involved. This method could provide immediate relief with home and apartment type Co-ops. The future would also be well planned for. It may supply the pattern for the nucleus of our satellite cities, and give our little man a working part in the development of our great country.

The family with a steady income, but who would require a subsidy to move out of Public Housing.

RENT and HOMES

We would find this family, with the implementation of our new credit system, paying close to or slightly above the rent ceiling. However, their accumulation of H.O.M.E. credits is slow. A small Government subsidy would get them on their way into a co-op home, and the Authority would again get a vacant unit at a very low cost.

For example: If in 1962 the Ontario Government had subsidized 100 of their young tenants to the extent of $1,000 for a down payment on a home, they could have reclaimed 100 housing and saved themselves hundreds of thousands of dollars. While the housing market has now changed, and manipulations of this kind might not be so simple, we feel that subsidizing these people into the protected housing we have suggested would be feasible and advisable.

SUGGESTION FOR FAMILY NO. 3

The family whose earning power is so limited by physical, mental, or social inadequacy, that they must obviously always remain the recipients of rental subsidy.

OR

Families No. 1 and 2 if the existing outlook on public housing is going to be maintained.

If our plans Nos. 1 and 2 are rejected, we must necessarily include the first and second type families in blanket coverage with the third. Governments don't seem to object to blanket coverage of complex groups, but we await their reaction when such coverage is slanted against them in favour of the other fellow—US. If people must live in Public Housing they should be allowed a respectable living, and not be governed by a semi-feudal tenant tax system. Our plan No. 3 to achieve this, follows:

PLAN NO. 3—RENTS

We believe that a differential rent scale should be maintained with the monthly rent ceiling set at 90 per cent of the prime wage earner's weekly income with overtime and bonuses excluded. The composition of the family's earning would be handled as follows:

(a) The first $2,000 of a working wife's earnings would be exempt when assessing rent.

(b) The earnings of a working child under 21 would be exempt when assessing the rent.

With regard to clause "B", we have found that rent penalties on a working child's earnings often lead to a breakup in family composition, by forcing a child to move out of the home prematurely. The children leave home to take the burden of the additional rent off the parents. Many of these children have become burdens to society in their new environment, i.e. unwed mothers, etc.

SUMMARY

We will expect Ontario to lead the way by putting the land they hold into the Land-Lease Co-operative Market.

We will expect Ottawa to break open the land speculation with the threat of heavy capital gains tax. As an incentive, Ottawa may guarantee lifetime tax exemptions on ground rents received by landowners who put their land in the Land-Lease Market within the next ten years.

We expect the landowners to awake to the fact that they can not hope for vast profits in their lifetime, nor any profit at all, if they do not participate in the new concept of land development.

The monies for the first 2000 homes, say 30 million dollars would not be returned to Federal coffers by way of mortgage payments. The income ground rents (Prov.) and mortgages would go into an easily accessible fund for the expansion of the Co-operative Home Building Plan. As the projects expand the income will grow, and as the income increases the growth will accelerate.

The tax will be removed from building materials.

Sanitary regulations, made prior to the scientific age, concerning septic tanks, and drinking water sources will be modified.

Laws concerning control of mutually owned or condominium properties will be changed.

It is quite obvious that Public Housing is here to stay, but not necessarily here to grow and grow. Our plans have provided for the Co-op apartment owner and home owner while it plans for the happy survival of those remaining in Public Housing. We admit that our brief is primarily directed toward the improvement of the lot of Ontario Housing Tenants, as their financial stability through the fair fixing of rents, is the goal of this Association. You may be surprised to know, as we were, that only the strong can decently survive in this environment that was designed to protect the weak. Financial instability is definitely the cause of many of the social problems in Public Housing, and has its source in the current unjust rent scale, with its accompanying dismal outlook for the future.

We believe that, with modification, our Plans Nos. 1 and 2 would help all home-hungry Canadians to join in the Co-op Home Purchase idea without passing through the "Limbo" of being a Public Housing Tenant.

A brief
Presented to the Senate Committee on Poverty
by
The Staff of Duke of York School of
The Board of Education for the City of Toronto

March, 1970

Ladies and Gentlemen:

We, the members of the staff of Duke of York School, extend to you our thanks for allowing us the opportunity to present our views to your committee.

Obviously, the solutions to the problems of poverty will not be found within one governmental jurisdiction. Therefore, we appreciate your interest in the programme being developed within a single school located in the downtown area of Ontario's capital and largest city, Toronto.

In presenting our views to the committee, we find it insufficient to rely solely on written and verbal communication. Therefore, we ask your cooperation and interest in joining us in a short tour of the school to gain some personal and visual impressions of our efforts. We hope that you will be able to take time to talk with the children and the staff.

Sincerely,
Walter Sinclair,
Principal,
Duke of York School.

Summary

The growing number of children coming from conditions of urban poverty, who also have been unable to benefit fully from the services of the Toronto school system is of grave concern. The Toronto Board of Education established a pilot project at Duke of York School to discover some possible ways of lessening the negative effects of poverty on the education of children.

The concept of inner-city schools was established and extended to a number of other schools. By the early 1970's approximately sixty schools will be involved.

In addition to the commonly accepted purposes of our schools, 'Inner-City' schools must have been unable to benefit fully from the that will explicitly provide for the special needs of children who are forced to live under deprived circumstances in the 'downtown' areas of our city. Some of these unique purposes have been identified by the Toronto Board of Education's Central Inner-City Committee as follows:

1. To help children learn those ways of behaving that are commonly accepted by society and that will enable them to remain in school.

2. To provide experience that will compensate for deficiencies in language development. (To develop competence in the basic communication skills.)

3. To help parents understand what the school is doing about helping their children remain in school, particularly understanding the relationship between having success at school and remaining in school.

4. To establish working relationships with community agencies that will help children to continue to go to school successfully and that will enable the agencies to focus on community problems that adversely affect school.

5. To establish a school-teacher-pupil relationship that communicates to each pupil that he matters and that as an individual he is worthy of the concern of the school staff.

The extremely poor conditions under which some families live are well illustrated in the Duke of York School area. In order to better serve the children, the school has found that it is required to adapt to the needs of the children and the community. It is the process of adapting which has revealed the inadequacy of the present method of operating. When educators look carefully at children as individuals the immensity of the problems becomes obvious.

Duke of York School as an example of Toronto Schools has undergone many significant changes. This brief is an attempt to describe the direction which these changes have taken. Children are being treated more individually. The programme is being adapted to the needs of children. The school is organized to facilitate the teacher's work with the children. Also, teachers participate in the making of decisions relating to the whole school. Parents are being involved more deeply in the school and the education of the children. The hope for the future is that this participation will continue and become greater in terms of the community school concept.

The nature of the school programme has necessitated the use of resource personnel and volunteers. A day care programme has developed to serve a small group of children with special needs.

Involvement with social and welfare agencies has become more intense especially with specific projects. The liaison role of the school among the agencies has increased.

The beginnings of the extension of the school day and year have been made. Each day and some evenings see children involved in the school. The summer programme has served to broaden the experience of children.

It is hoped that the brief reveals the intensity of the program and the complexities involved in finding solutions. The pressure on the school itself is considerable as it attempts to break new ground.

The criteria used to identify inner-city schools in Toronto themselves imply the fact that no single group can by itself solve the problems of poverty. All levels of government must be involved. Public and private awareness and participation in the search for solutions are fundamental.

Finally, the solutions to the inner-city school problems are not to be found within the schools themselves. Other factors such as employment, income, health, and housing are more basic in a family's search for growth and accomplishment.

The processes for working at the problem are most significant. These processes must include the involvement of all of the residents, agencies and groups who have responsibilities for the problem. This would bring new understanding, establishment of priorities in developing a plan for proceeding.

The school cannot afford to be identified as the sole agency responsible for the solution of the problems of poverty. At the same time, it must not be isolated from the main attempts to solve the problem.

RECOMMENDATIONS

1. The establishment of pilot projects with:
 - (i) the involvement at the community itself in solving its own problems.
 - (ii) the participation at the various levels of government, federal, provincial and municipal.
 - (iii) the coordination of various disciplines such as medicine, psychiatry, psychology, education, social work, sociology and urban planners.
 - (iv) the involvement of the public through private citizens and industry.
 - (v) constant feedback to the participants that will enable the development of new methods and direction.
2. Improved training for educators, teachers, consultants and administrators.
3. The encouragement of greater participation of the Universities in the realities of poverty.
4. The facilitation of cooperation among social and welfare agencies.
5. The establishment of Preschool nurseries for some children.
6. The establishment of Day-care programmes.
7. The development of the community school concept.
8. The allocation of more funds for inner-city schools.
9. The provision of more adequate housing.
10. The improvement of employment possibilities on an income for the unemployed and unemployable adults.
11. Easier access to adult retraining programmes.
12. The provision of more adequate means of feeding children who are under nourished or do not receive balanced diets.

Background of the Toronto Inner City School Programme

During the year 1965, Duke of York School was established by the Toronto Board of Education as a "pilot school for experimental purposes". The school was so designated for the development of "...experimental programmes designated to meet the needs of downtown children."¹

This step was taken, largely as the result of the efforts of certain administrators and teachers. These people with their concern for the development and improvement of education in general had become particularly involved with the problems the downtown schools were encountering with many children. The problems took the form of low academic achievement, undesirable behaviour and a high dropout rate. In other words, the school programmes seemed inappropriate for a large number of children.

A number of visits were made to some of the large American urban areas such as New York, Chicago and Philadelphia. Ideas and impressions from these centres were shared and conditions were related compared and adapted to those of downtown Toronto. Briefs were presented to the administrative staff and the trustees of the City. From these proposals, grew the programme for Duke of York School.

During the following few years it was felt that the programme at Duke of York School was sufficiently successful that there should be an extension of the concept to other schools. Thus by the year 1968, there were twenty seven designated inner-city schools.

Also during this time, a number of the other Borough Boards of Education in Metropolitan Toronto felt that some of their schools were equally in need of assistance for the same reasons as the City's schools. As a result a Summary Index for Inner-City Schools² was developed by the Metropolitan Toronto Board of Education's research Department. The Index, developed for application in 1968 included a series of criteria which were designed to indicate, by objective measures, whether or not a school should be designated inner-city.

The criteria are in the areas of:

1. Income
2. Public Housing

3. Juvenile Delinquency
4. Socio Economic Rank
5. Economic Achievement
6. Household Characteristics
7. Social Welfare.

In 1969, there were forty and by the early 1970's there will be approximately sixty inner-city schools within the City itself. Each year the Metropolitan School Board makes decisions regarding the financial maintenance and extension of the whole programme. Its decisions, of course, are based on budgetary questions that relate to the whole of Metropolitan Toronto.

When a school in Toronto has been designated and approved as inner-city, certain benefits accrue:

1. The regular class average is reduced to 30 children per teacher. This reduction may mean the employment of additional teacher staff as well as the acquisition of classrooms.
2. An initial financial allotment for each grade 1 class for necessary supplies, furniture and equipment. Each year an additional grade is added to the programme. The previous grades receive a maintenance allowance which is less than the initial one.
3. If the school population is large enough a vice-principal is added to the staff.
4. A resource teacher is employed. This is generally an experienced teacher whose work becomes related to a number of classrooms rather than one only.
5. Lay-assistants are employed for kindergarten and some primary classes. These assistants usually don't have teacher training or experience. We do prefer to hire those who have had experience working with groups of children.
6. A classroom for four-year-olds, that is, junior kindergartens, is opened if there is not one already in the school.
7. An increase in supportive services and other agencies such as the Attendance Department and the Child Adjustment Services within the Board of Education itself.

there are characteristics of the district that are similar to those of many other large urban areas in North America. There are many existing facilities and institutions which create a rich background in which the children may grow and learn. Within a few blocks of the school, we can find almost all types of transportation—air, rail, water and vehicular. There are many industries, commercial enterprises and governmental institutions within walking distance. Historic sites such as Mackenzie House, Scadding House and Fort York are nearby. As with many downtown areas there is a whole range of entertainment available. One finds a wide variety of ethnic groups who provide a wealth of interest and experience to the district.

This description probably coincides with the conception of the area held by the daily transients, those who work downtown during the day and those who come downtown to participate in the night life. However, behind this facade of action and interest exist conditions which make downtown living laden with dangers and pressures. The constant flow of traffic presents a danger to the health and safety of residents. Industry and transportation add to the alarming growth of pollution of both water and air. Much of the housing needs improvement. The Moss Park Apartment Complex operated by the Ontario Housing Authority is the only major low income rental development at this time.

"Many of the houses are old. A survey showed that 78 per cent of them are 60 years old or older, and that 62 per cent of all non-apartment properties required repairs or alterations to conform even to minimum physical standards of the Building and Housing Standard By-laws (by 1961, 95 per cent of these had been brought up to standard). Many of the buildings are over crowded, and almost 30 per cent have been converted to rooming houses."³

To say the least, these conditions present hazards and discomfort to many residents. For example:

"The district with about 3.5 per cent of the properties in the City had 11 per cent of all fires in 1960".⁴

"Today the area south of Wellesley Street between Sherbourne Street and Parliament Street is a low income residential area. In addition to families, there are concentrations of roomers, transients, and people with social problems. Two of these social problems appear to be the "skid row", located generally near Queen Street, and the "red light" area around Jarvis and Dundas Street."⁵

The existence of many cheap rooming houses and hostels for men tends to attract an inordinate number of transients to the area. These people in addition to the daily transients for work and entertainment have little stake in the community itself.

The income level of residents is low.⁶ At the same time families tend to be large.⁷ Most of the employed male residents are in the unskilled and semi-skilled classes.⁸ Many of the adults, who lack sufficient formal education feel the pressure of a shrinking labour market for semi and unskilled employment. Even where the desire to upgrade their qualification through the services of the Federal Department of Manpower exists there appear to be many factors which prevent their participation in such programmes. These factors include the loss of present employment, the impossibility of moving families to centres other than Toronto where desired programmes are offered as well as the fear of becoming involved in re-education because of previous unfortunate experiences with education.

It is not our intention to suggest that all of the residents of the Duke of York School district can be classified as poor, disadvantaged, unfortunate, inadequate or culturally deprived. This is simply and directly not the case. However, there is a significant number of people who are in the range of partial to complete inability to participate in an adequate way in the affluence, socio cultural mobility and excitement of life in society as a whole. It is with the families which fall in these areas, that we concentrate our greatest efforts.

The characteristics of this group of people include some or all of the following:

1. distrust of institutions,
2. a general resentment of authority

3. ignorance, crime, delinquency, illness, disease, malnutrition, apathy, a sense of hopelessness, withdrawal, isolation and day to day or short term view of life.

4. a lack of communication skills and low educational attainment in general.

5. physical and/or mental handicaps, victims of unfortunate circumstances.

6. transience of families.

7. rejection by society.

THE CHILDREN

As implied above, all of the children who come to Duke of York School do not have problems in participating in the programme presented. But many do. These are the children whom the school is partially or completely failing to help adequately.

These children come to school sorely equipped to benefit from what could be called a standard educational programme. They tend not to trust adults. They fear new experiences. They are not motivated toward academic learning. They settle differences by physical rather than verbal means. They are explosive in behaviour. They are not adequately rested or fed. Their language and intellectual development is retarded. Their experiences have been narrow and few.

Within the school system they can be easily defeated and their low achievement has made them candidates for special classes. The higher they go in the system the greater becomes their difficulty in coping. This inability to cope is within the areas of the demands of the system itself as well as from pressure from peers, either direct as with for example language and behaviour or more subtly through isolation from peer groups.

It is entirely possible that the child from an impoverished background will ultimately serve to point educators in a direction that will lead to a more effective way of operating our schools.

"...I want to maintain that the deprived child is more than a mere exasperating problem. He has without knowing it, and often without his teachers being aware of it, made a vital gift to the progress of education. He is so to speak, a mirror held up to our schools and communities in which we can see our shortcomings—our basic weaknesses which, of course, injure all children whether deprived or not, but which become critical when a deprived home and a bad community compound the weaknesses of the school."

It is our hope at Duke of York School that we are pointed in the right direction to help all the children develop adequately by adapting our programme to the particular needs of each child.

Before beginning the discussion of the school programme itself it is necessary to point out that the group of children which can be classed as deprived presents us with our most difficult and often seemingly impossible task. As much as we have tried to adapt our approach the daily challenge to the staff is physically and mentally exhausting. The school, by law and with very few exceptions, must include all children who come to it. There are not enough resources we have discovered that can make the job less exacting. We have not discovered enough ways of handling the problems of these children to make the job possible for the teachers or the students.

One of the most nagging problems to the school is in the rate of transience. Although 60 to 70% of the school population may stay during a school year, the other 30 to 40% are in constant motion. One year 1967-68, with a school population between 600 and 700 there were about 450 transfers in and about 500 transfers out. The amount of paper work that ensues is phenomenal. These pupils who may stay for a day, a week or a month do not get time to settle into the school. By the time the staff is in a position to help, the children have left.

School Programme

Generally speaking, the staff attempts to minimize undue pressures on children by furnishing programmes that involve acceptance support and encouragement of each child's development. It is essential that school be the least a happy and satisfying place in which children spend their time. Punitive measures help to accomplish neither this aim nor desirable learning in general. The staff utilizes the resources of the community by extending the classroom through visits and field trips. We thus provide as interesting, relevant and diverse a programme as possible within our present capabilities and facilities. We challenge the children in ways that hopefully avoid going too far beyond their present level of competence. Our emphases are on social, physical and academic development. These areas are, of course, inseparable. However, we find that for a number of children the psychological and social needs are most obvious and pressing and must through necessity be dealt with directly. Finally, we try to accept the children at their actual level and work from there in facilitating their development.

Each teacher is supplied with materials, equipment, furniture and books to develop the programme for his group of children. Resource personnel are available as a source of support and help for this programme. Some classes have the full or part time services of lay assistants. All teachers use the time and skills of volunteers from outside the school.

There has been a general move away from the use of a standard curriculum in most schools. We have participated in this trend. Children are not exposed to year end exams given for the purpose of deciding whether or not they should be promoted to the next grade. The pupils are placed in classrooms by age rather than achievement.

In September the teacher receives the group of approximately thirty children. His basic responsibility is for the development of a programme for this group. His other responsibilities as a member of a team are in relationship to the whole school and staff.

Although, each classroom in the school is different there are certain similarities that do exist. Each teacher sets out a routine of operation. These routines are often developed in cooperation and participation of the children themselves. The children are organized into various groups in which they work at particular tasks. Sometimes the whole class works together. Sometimes the children work individually. Various areas of the room are designated for specific kinds of activities. Frequently, children do not have their own desks, rather, they have a place in the room to store their work. Children move from centre to centre for various activities. At these centres teacher and children have placed various types of materials of interest as well as work assignments. These centres usually have a theme such as science, language, reading, mathematics, social studies, music and art. A centre at any particular time is much more specific within the context of the theme.

The basic element in each classroom is the teacher-pupil relationship. We find that most of the children who present problems have a low feeling of self-esteem. The most direct approach in dealing with this problem is through the teacher who assists the child by providing opportunities for success not only with the classroom tasks but in supporting his relationships with his peers.

Perhaps the following illustration will clarify the school's attempt to adapt to the child and his environment. One of the essential tasks for a child to deal with in order to develop personally and at the same time 'survive' in the educational system is to learn how to read with a high degree of competence. It is well known to us that factors essential to learning how to read are in operation long before the reading itself begins. His oral language development is one of the most important. The four-year-old brings with him a considerable experience with language. He has learned the language of his home and immediate environment. It is upon this base, however inadequate, that the kindergarten must facilitate fluency with language. In order to do this, frequent opportunities for relevant talk not only with adults but also with other children must be provided. The child must learn that speech is not the only way of communicating with other people. He can communicate through paint and modelling materials. As the child proceeds through the kindergarten programme he also receives many experiences with printed material. He is read to each day. He sees his name in print. He sees signs about the room. At some point the child may tell the teacher a story which she will write down during the telling. Although the child has had many previous opportunities to tell and listen to stories, this step of having it written for him is an important one. Gradually, most children begin to recognize words and other visual aspects of printed material. From here he will begin to experiment with his own writing and even attempt to read simple books. The perceptive teacher is able to decide when the child is ready to begin the more formal task of reading the work of others, either children's writing or material published for children. Frequent visits to our library have aided in this development. During the grade one year when most of the latter parts of this development are occurring, children have become ready to read and most parents understand the process.

This continues throughout the grades in a programme which includes writing, reading, speaking and listening as complementary aspects of an integrated process. In all grades, the children are called upon to use their own experiences as topics for discussion and writing. These experiences are supplemented by many field trips and enrichment activities, both during and out of school hours. For younger children these excursions are usually in the immediate community. However, for the older children there are experiences which take them beyond this area. As a result, we feel that the child comes to know his own community more adequately and gradually becomes aware of a community larger than his own.

What we have found at Duke of York School is that many children enter school with a meagre language development, general experience, experience with books and motivation for learning. As a result, this group does not learn how to read until perhaps the third grade and even later. We have found that even with attempts to allow the child to develop his skills at his own rate there is pressure on him from the fact that many children have in fact learned to read. Thus, there are many older children who are unable to read. Although we have access to a Reading Clinic, the waiting list for this facility prevents them from becoming involved in the service. The task falls to the teaching staff.

The discussion of the field of reading although it is only one of many aspects of a teacher's work serves to illustrate some of the difficulties. It is obvious that the teacher cannot, on his own, adequately meet the widely varying needs of all the children in his classroom. There has been a move from the teacher working in relative isolation to a position where he must learn how to utilize the skills of other teachers and resource personnel, some from disciplines other than teaching.

A teacher needs to know when and how to involve another professional in the solution of classroom problems. He needs to know how to translate information provided by another professional into educational terms. A difficulty here is that we often do not know the precise meanings of terms used in other disciplines. We tend to be action oriented. On the other hand social workers and psychologists tend to look at the behaviour of children from a casual point of view. The question most often asked by teachers is in terms of knowledge of causes as opposed to methods of changing undesirable behaviour.

It has been found in most areas of working with children—learning, health, both physical and mental as well as behaviour—that the major portion of the problems must be dealt with in the school because of the shortage of outside services and the strict intake requirements of most serving institutions.

As a result of this situation the teacher's skills are taxed to their utmost. The diagnosis of problems and the development of adequate methodology give a constant need for in-service training especially for young teachers.

In addition to the programme offered to the children during the regular hours of school there are many extra curricular activities provided. The gym is in action almost every day before school, at noon hour and after school. Such activities as chess, knitting, creative dancing are also available after school. A local community group encourages a number of children to participate in games three evenings per week. These activities help the children to broaden their experiences and become more deeply involved in the school. However, it must be indicated that they also mean considerable additional effort by an already busy staff.

School Organization

The staff of the school which serves the some 520 children consists of the following:

The school also has access to the services of a number of other resource personnel who serve a number of schools. These include:

Psychologist	General Academic Consultants
Psychiatrist	Kindergarten Consultants
Speech Teacher	Special Education Consultants
Subject Area Consultants:	Art, Music, Physical Education

Since the beginning of the project, the school staff have worked in groups and committees. The groups have been based on grade level; the committees on specific areas such as communicating with parents. At present, the staff is formed into three groups, each of which has a number of regular grade teachers, a special education teacher and a number of resource personnel. The groups elect two representatives each to an Advisory Committee. These representatives are all classroom teachers. This committee also includes one resource person as well as the principal and the vice principal.

The responsibilities of the three groups include the cooperative development of programme, the discussion of common concerns about the school, in-service courses for the group as well as other topics of interest. The Advisory Committee on the other hand is involved with the formulation of school policy and the provision of a means of communication through the representatives which bring their opinions, ideas and concerns of their group, so that these may be shared and discussed. The representatives take back and discuss the implementation action required with respect to the policy decisions of the committee. The committee also has the power to call ad hoc committees to deal with specific and immediate issues.

This cooperative work is in addition to and apart of the day to day educational function of the school. The resource personnel serve as support to the teaching staff. The vice principal, guidance counsellor social worker and public health nurse work along with the school psychologist in a referral system which begins with the teaching staff. Such problems as attendance, health, extreme behaviour, specific learning disability are dealt with in consultation with particular teachers. The outcome of these consultations may be a test being administered by the psychologist, a home visit by the social worker or nurse, long term visits with the guidance counsellor or referral to another agency outside the school.

The resource teacher works in a number of areas. One of these is the coordination of the volunteer programme. Much of her time is spent in assisting teachers choose suitable materials and books for particular groups of children. She also studies and tries out new materials from publishers in order to judge their suitability for the school. At times, she spends time in classrooms demonstrating techniques and helping in the solution of classroom problems. Although her work is mainly with adults she does on occasion work with small groups of children outside of their classroom.

The special English teacher works with children who are learning English as a second language. Groups of children, mainly Chinese, come to her classroom each day to participate in a programme which is designed to help them learn to speak and to read English fluently. Constant discussion with child's classroom teacher helps to avoid any duplication of effort and ensures that the programme is suitable in both situations.

The librarian is in charge of the resource centre which includes not only books but also many other non print materials such as records, slides, filmstrips, 8mm films and sound tapes.

The centre is equipped as are the classrooms with equipment appropriate to these non print materials. Children come in groups or individually to follow up on activities begun in the classroom. Research projects stem from the child's interest and the teacher's guidance. The classroom teacher helps the child articulate his problem or questions. The child then visits the centre to find appropriate materials that answer these questions. The librarian helps the child develop his skills of locating information. In addition, and particularly for the very young children the librarian brings large groups of children together for book talks and reading stories. The centre is also available to children for reading for pleasure. Many children find the soft furniture of the centre a warm and comfortable spot to curl up and read a book; it may be the only time of his life when the child is alone and in peace.

Parental Involvement

"Much depends on the teachers. Every chapter could end thus—but perhaps it is even more apt here than elsewhere. Teachers are already hard pressed, and nowhere more so than in the very districts where the cooperation of parents is most needed and hardest to win. We are aware that in asking them to take on new burdens we are asking what will sometimes be next to impossible. . . Yet we are convinced that to make the effort will not only add depth to their understanding of their children but will also bring out that support from the home which is still often latent. It has long been recognized that education is concerned with the whole man; henceforth it must be concerned with the whole family."¹⁰

Perhaps the greatest single error in the beginning of the project Duke of York School was the absence of any involvement of the school community with the proposed change in programme. The early attempts at communicating to the parents included a formal meeting at which the programme was explained. This, however, was sadly insufficient. The confusion of the initial stages are undoubtedly attributable in part to the lack of communication.

The first significant attempt at adequate communication came with the abolition of formal report cards. In their place were substituted parent-teacher conferences. Each parent was asked to come to the school and discuss his child's progress with the teacher. During that first year we reached over 90 per cent of the parents for at least one interview.

This development of a 'new' method of reporting to parents was reached with a great deal of effort on the part of the staff and particularly the Reporting to Parents Committee. The committee during many meetings, which by the way continued up until this winter, discussed many issues. These included such areas as methods of assessing children's progress, various topics of assessment other than academic, invitations to parents, methods of including the hard to reach parent and methods and techniques of interviewing. To assist the rest of the staff in the method of reporting, in-service meetings were held and also a substantial manual was prepared.

The novelty of interviewing caused some teachers anxiety. However, during subsequent evaluation of the idea, the teachers felt that in spite of the time and difficulty involved it was indeed effective. Many said that they learned much from the parents about the children. Furthermore, it was found over the long run that in this way of reporting the parents could learn more not only about his child in school but also about the classroom programme.

The method is still in use, however, with some changes. Each parent is now asked to come to the school at least twice per year. When the parent arrives, he is asked whether or not he would like to have a written summary of the interview. In this way, some parents who prefer to have some written record of his child's progress are satisfied.

No matter how successful a teacher tries to be with a child, he is usually defeated if there is an undesirable attitude toward the school and the teacher. It is this need for a cooperative and sympathetic relationship between the home and the school which is basic to the child's success.

We have found a number of parents who were not sympathetic to the 'new' methods of education. The children were occasionally of little help here. Some children were enjoying their activities to such an extent that when they arrived home they were saying that they really enjoyed their play in the classroom. Parents, used to other methods of learning objected. Our partial solution to this difficulty has been to invite the parents to visit the classroom while it is in operation during school time. In spite of these visits and the teachers' explanations, however, we have had to at times adjust the programme for a particular child in order to come closer to the parents' expectations where they are widely divergent from the school's. At the same time continual contact with the parents has brought greater mutual understanding and further adjustments to the programme.

Our general approach to parents has been to make them feel as welcome as possible in the school regardless of the reasons for which they visit. We attempt to show the parent that we are working toward the same end, that is the development of the child.

During the second year of the project, a parent-teacher group was organized and an executive was elected. The first few meetings were quite successful in terms of attendance. Although much effort was expended on the subsequent meetings the number of people in attendance dwindled considerably. The concluding meeting involved a discussion around the fact that unless the children were somehow involved parents would not attend. The staff of the school was already organizing such activities. It was felt this year that the parent-teacher group should become inactive.

The school has also tried to involve parents in other ways this year. We have held a number of open-house days for the parents to visit the school during the day. The parents have participated in excursions intended for parents and pre-school children. Both of these have met with success. A number of teachers have had parents into the school to observe the children in the classroom during the day.

A local residents group has formed during this school year. In discussion with the staff of the school they have inquired about the availability of the school for evening activities for both children and parents. This appears to be a most promising development.

Volunteers

The Toronto Board of Education has given the authority to schools of the City to utilize volunteers as aids to the school staff. Duke of York School has for the past several years utilized the services of many volunteers. This year there are approximately fifty. They come from a variety of places. Most are housewives from a more affluent area of the city. Some are retired teachers. Others are university and teachers' college students. A few are parents and residents of the school district. It is our immediate aim to expand this latter group not only because of their skills and assistance but also to develop a closer relationship with the community.

The volunteers work in many different ways in the school. Often they assist during field trips. Some work with individuals or groups of children under the guidance of the teacher. A number have been involved in music programmes. One participates in the school chess club.

At the beginning of the year, many of the volunteers participated in an in-service programme given by members of the staff. The volunteer is asked to complete a form which indicates such details as the age of the children they wish to work with, their particular interests and skills as well as the times they will be able to come to the school. Each volunteer is then assigned to a particular classroom where she will spend as a minimum a half day per week. There is at least one volunteer for each class. We have found this programme an excellent way in which to add to the variety of the programme and also to give children experience with a diversity of adults from different backgrounds. We are continually looking for additional volunteers as the need arises.

Social and Welfare Agencies

In the first year of the project, the Social and Welfare Agencies of the immediate and nearby community were asked to send a representative to a meeting at Duke of York School. The intent was to explain what the school was attempting to do and to develop some kind of coordinated approach to the problems of the area. About forty-five agencies were represented at the meeting. These included churches, juvenile court, Y.M.C.A., Central Neighbourhood House as well as many others. Very little came of this first attempt at coordination. It was discouraging to all because even though we knew that many of us were working to help the same families we were not coordinating our efforts or even sharing basic information.

During the following years of the project, a different approach was taken to the problem of cooperation among agencies. Two particular examples will be discussed below. The first, the Duke of York Day Care Programme included the following groups: the Toronto Board of Education, the Health and Welfare Department of Metropolitan Toronto, the Parks and Recreation Department of the City of Toronto and a number of private foundations. Secondly, the Duke of York Summer Programme included an even larger number of organizations. These were: the Toronto Board of Education, the City of Toronto Public Health Department, the City of Toronto Parks and Recreation Department, the Metropolitan Toronto and Region Conservation Authority and the Y.M.C.A. of Metropolitan Toronto as well as four private foundations and a number of individual sponsors.

The experience gained from these two programmes seems to indicate that for successful cooperation certain elements need to be present. First, there must be a specific project which is designed to meet a particular need. Secondly, is the need for a coordinator and a fund raiser who are deeply committed to the project. Thirdly, the necessary agencies who would have a possible interest. Those who express interest and are willing to provide some kind of resource be it staff materials or facilities should be asked to join in the enterprise. Finally, and not of the least importance is the employment of project staff members. Some evaluation of the success of the project should be made if it is to continue.

The school has continued to work cooperatively with individual agencies with respect to individual cases. We have invited workers to conferences devoted to the discussion of these particular cases. Also staff members have been invited to attend case conferences held by other agencies.

The school social worker has been most effective in acting as a coordinator of the involvement of families and children with agencies. Families who come to her are involved in discussions about problems. She discusses the services offered by various agencies in relation to the problems. The choice of procedure and method of attack on the problem is left up to the parents. In support of their decision the social worker assists in the referral procedure toward the particular agency chosen. Where a number of agencies are already involved with a family the parents not infrequently come to her for help in the coordinating of these efforts. The point of view taken is that the school should avoid imposing service but at the same time assist by discussion of the problem and encourage the family to decide upon and take a course of action.

The Duke of York Day Care Programme

The day care programme operated in the school is under the direction of a Board of Directors on which are a parent and the school principal as well as other members. The programme has a permanent staff and has a number of volunteers that help. It is financed largely by the Welfare Department with some assistance from private foundations. A further cooperating organization is the Department of Parks and Recreation for the City of Toronto.

All of the 35 children in the programme attend Duke of York School. They range in age from 5-9. However, the organization even though it uses the school operates rather independently but cooperatively with the school. The selection process for children begins in the school with the teachers, guidance counsellor and social worker but the final selection and approval is by a member of the permanent staff of the Day Care programme. Since the Department of Welfare finances the programme they set the fee to be paid by parents. There is a sliding scale for fees which varies with the financial status of the parents.

The children are taken at noon hour to the John Innes Community Centre for lunch. The afternoon activities take place in the auditorium of the school from 3:30 to 5:00 p.m. In addition to these, there are frequent field trips and excursions to such places as the Y.M.C.A. at Spadina and Bloor Streets where there is an arts and crafts programme provided. We have found for certain children this organization has fulfilled an important function.

Summer Programmes

During the first few years of the project the efforts of the school staff, particularly the guidance counsellor and the vice-principal were strictly those of referral and coordination. Institutions offering summer programmes, both day and resident camps, were contacted and asked the number of places that could be made available to the children of the school. The parents were informed and those interested were invited to the school to meet with representatives from the various camping organizations. Each representative at the meeting presented to the parents the details about the camp, including the programme, the cost and the method of applying for placement. The parents then decide which camp was suitable for their children and then filled out applications. A considerable amount of follow-up work was done by the guidance counsellor to make sure that those parents who were interested in having their children attend a camp were included in some part of a summer programme. This service has and will continue in the future.

During the year 1969, a summer day camp was organized for about 150 of the children of Duke of York School. The school cooperated with five other agencies and received support from a number of private foundations and individual donors. A chairman and the school principal obtained three supervisory staff members and selected young volunteers to operate the programme.

The programme was divided into two 2-week periods during each of which different groups of 75 children were involved.

The objectives of the Day Camp Project included ideas such as:

"—the provision of an outdoor education programme that is child centred and develops natural science and camping skills away from the usual environment of the children".

"—to encourage an appreciation for outdoor living".

"—to develop the growth of the individual child".¹¹

The camp was structured to best accomplish these objectives. Each day the children assembled at the school and then were taken by bus at 8:15 a.m. to a conservation region, Bruce's Mill, just outside of Metropolitan Toronto. They returned to the city at 4:00 p.m. Groups were kept small with approximately six campers per counsellor so that as much individual attention as possible could be given to the children.

The daily programme included a wide variety of outdoor activities as well as arts and crafts. Lunches were provided. A day was spent at the Black Creek Pioneer Village to learn and experience the life of pioneers of early Ontario.

An interesting comment appears in the Report '69

"Although formal swimming lessons were held at the beginning of camp, the lessons were disbanned. We found that the children were happier when allowed to progress at their own speed. By removing the lesson the pressure to achieve was eliminated".¹²

Needless to say the teachers at Duke of York have found that this concept applies in almost all areas of learning for the children.

The plans for a continued and expanded day camp programme for 1970 have been approved by the Toronto Board of Education. Since there is some financial expenditure involved, final approval must await the passing of the budget by the Metropolitan Toronto School Board.

INNER-CITY INDEX

To the Chairman and Members of the Academic Committee:

Inner-City Schools

During the summer of 1967, at the direction of the School Board, the Advisory Council of Directors appointed a committee of Metro officials to discuss criteria for Inner City Schools. From time to time, the Committee has considered applications from area boards for approval of schools as "Inner City" Schools and had made subjective judgments in each case on the basis of supporting data supplied with the applications, along with data pertaining to income and public housing.

At the same time the members of the Committee, in conjunction with the Metropolitan Research Department, have studied criteria that might be used in a more objective manner. As a result of these studies, an Inner City Index has been established. The Index takes into account such items as income, public housing, juvenile delinquency and economic and household characteristics, and translates these items into a point score. A summary of the Index is attached to this report, and the attached documents, "Schools Approved as 'Inner City'" and "Schools for Consideration as 'Inner City'" indicate how the Index may be used.

At the meeting of the Advisory Council of Directors held on October 2, 1968, approval was given by the Directors to the Index and to the procedure for its use as explained by members of the Metropolitan Research Department. In addition, a list of 37 schools submitted for approval as Inner City Schools by area boards of education was considered. The Directors gave approval to the following 26 schools:

Etobicoke	Lord Lansdowne
Braeburn	Leslie
Elmbank	Montrose
Scarborough	Old Orchard
Pringdale Gardens	Pauline
Warden	Perth
Toronto	Pelham Park
Christie	Palmerston
Blake	Roden
Bruce	Shaw Street
Brock	York
Duke of	Bala Avenue Jr.
Connaught	D. B. Hood Jr.
Dovercourt	George Syme Jr.
Davenport	Memorial Jr.

APPENDIX "A"

It is recommended:

1. That the Inner City Index prepared by the Metropolitan Research Department be approved for use in determining the status of schools as Inner City Schools.

2. That the above-named 26 schools be approved as Inner City Schools, effective September 1, 1969, subject to budget considerations.

3. That the schools listed on page 306 previously approved as "Inner City" Schools be re-confirmed.

METROPOLITAN TORONTO SCHOOL BOARD

Summary-Index for Inner City Schools

Following the direction of the Inner-City Committee, the Metropolitan Toronto Research Department proceeded to describe as many Metro-wide demographic factors as possible. Other than Juvenile Delinquency (1967), Ontario Housing (1968) and Social Welfare (1967), the balance of the factors are based on re-worked 1961 census data. (Factor maps are available for inspection).

For each of the following factors, if the school met the criterion, a credit point (+) was given:

- (a) Income—$4,100.00 or less (1961 Census, D.B.S.)
- (b) Public Housing—majority of pupils are from public housing (Ontario Housing Corporation data, 1968, and data from principals).
- (c) Juvenile Delinquency 7 per cent or over—Police contact (Metropolitan Toronto Police data, 1968).
- (d) Socio-economic Rank—lowest rank (Metropolitan Profile, Social Planning Council of Metropolitan Toronto 1965).
- (e) Economic Achievement—above 1.0 rank (High positive signs indicate low economic achievement) (Socio-Economic Correlates of Housing Condition, 1965).

(f) Household Characteristics—below 1.0 rank (High negative scores—deficiency of basic household amenities) (Urban Renewal Study, Metropolitan Toronto Planning Board, 1967).

(g) Social Welfare—estimated heavy density Family Service Association of Metropolitan Toronto data, 1968.

The Total Points column was arrived at by counting each + as one point with the exception of the Ontario Housing, and in that column each + was counted as two points.

The presence of more than 50 per cent of the enrolment from Public Housing has been judged to be a doubly potent factor in the determination of Inner-City School Status.

The school boundaries in some cases overlap two or three census tract areas. In those cases, information is given for all census tracts involved. Only one point (+) per column, however, is counted.

Additional factors may be developed as data becomes available.

Convenient Caring
or

Truly Caring

A Brief submitted to the Senate Committee on Poverty
Toronto, March 10th, 1970.

By Jim Steele,
Advisory Chairman,
Neighborhood Youth Corps.,
15 Forman Avenue,
Toronto 289, Ontario.

Convenient Caring
or

Convenient caring about the problems of the poor is that action that is limited to doing something that relieves us of temporary embarrassment or relieves our conscience. In the private sector, this is the individual or group that provides a hamper at Christmas for a poor family but then forgets that the needs of individuals and families are just as real during the other 364 days of the year. At the government level, it is usually making a study and then making recommendations in all sincerity but knowing that there is not a snow balls chance in hell of these recommendations being carried out.

Truly caring about the problems of the poor entails concern and action to meet as best possible for a long period of time those problems that are literally destroying individuals and families. In the private sector, this entails the long term support and government, it means the implementation of government programs and also the support of private groups by government. To put it as bluntly as possible, what I am saying that no level of government has the resources, financial or people, to alleviate poverty and bring dignity and meaning into the lives of people. It is only through the maximum involvement of people and their talents from the private sector, the volunteer, can we provide meaningful happenings and make people feel that they are important and that people care about them. I do not for one minute, mean the Lady Bountiful spreading of goodies but the going out into the larger community of many people who on a very personal basis work for and with people. We must get away from the idea that government must and can meet the needs of all of the people.

Truly Caring Involves Both Understanding and Action

It is all so easy to either say the poor made their own bed and now let them make the best of it or to even say that the problem is not serious and hide our heads in the sand until such time as all hell breaks loose.

"The Puerto Ricans have a wonderful phrase. They say: 'you can't cover up the sky with your hand.' You just can't cover up ugliness and misery and poverty. There is no point in trying. And I think that young people put us on the spot when they point out that we still try to cover up ugliness—even the best of us". Dr. Oscar Lewis.

When I am part of taking sixty children on an outing in the winter, I often find that about forty of them either have not mitts scarves or are even in running shoes. I have had occasion to see old people sitting at the windows of houses in a row on Winchester Street and only seeming to leave their station to either eat or go to the bathroom. I often have old people phone me up asking for people to visit them in rooming houses, or asking if I can find them part time employment in order that they can retain their dignity. When I see youngsters who are lovable and interested at seven or eight years become frustrated and hostile at eleven or twelve, I often ask myself why. Why should some youngsters live in houses where the sidewalk is their front yard and the backyard a junkyard?

Cold impersonal government programs that are based upon theoretical approaches and large expenditures of money will never answer the very personal problems of people.

We have only to look to the south of us, the United States, to see that despite the expenditure of billions of dollars that the "fat cat" theoretical approaches have done little to alleviate the problems of poverty there. In fairness, some of the programs have had some element of success but the empire building political wrangling and the cold impersonal approach have provided little to motivate people or to add dignity to their lives. Even the so called participation of the poor was nullified by giving them a minority vote in any decision making or putting them on city payrolls and thus making them civil employees rather than representatives of the poor group.

As the young people quite aptly put it, "The Way" are the problems of the majority.

people who low income to be solved with the absence of "grass roots" involvement. I do openly admit that serious emotional problems of some people can only be handled by professional people but when it comes to such a large problem as poverty that only the participation of many people, professional and lay, can we truly bring meaning, motivation and dignity into the lives of people who are often defeated, frustrated, confused and on the verge of hostility.

What is happening to people as a result of poverty

"I see a change that comes over young people in the slums at about the age of fourteen or fifteen. It's ironic but very young children—in Harlem, for instance—frequently seem brighter, more energetic, even happier than children of the same age whom I see walking with their nurses along Fifth Avenue between Fiftieth and Seventieth streets. But the slum children at the age of about fourteen seem to lose those positive qualities: the faces of some of them seem deadened and others antagonistic"—Senator Robert Kennedy

During the past eight years, living and working with young people in the downtown area for the entire fifty-two weeks of each year, I find the very young to be interested and lovable but as many get older the influence of the environment that they live in and the attitudes of their own community and the larger community as expressed by the news media definitely does much to create a feeling of frustration and hostility. On the other hand, the small group of youngsters that we do come into contact at about age seven or eight and continue to work with and for do become involved in their own community at the senior high school age. Unfortunately, there is a lack of continuity in working with young people and sufficient numbers are not being reached. Particularly, in the age group 11 to 15 there is a breaking down of involvement. It does seem that something is done for the very young and then this involvement gap, age 11 to 14 occurs and then we become concerned about young people at age 17 again forgetting that this gap may have done damage that will make it virtually impossible to motivate these youngsters.

Many old people in our so called "affluent society" are lonely, often hungry and in many instances living in rooms in inferior housing. Most people recognize that old age pensions are not kept abreast of the cost of living. Our particular groups find that the young can bring meaning into the lives of the old by becoming involved in doing chores for the old, visitations and by holding social evenings. While this does put meaning into the lives of old folk, we must step up our efforts and also recognize that not all older people are sick and can't do things for themselves. Many old people on the banks of the East River, New York City, are employed for a few hours a week in a subsidized factory doing light work which provides additional income, meaning and dignity. While not all old people are able to become so involved, those who do come out of these factories with a light in their eyes that no amount of money could provide. We also plan to open a store where donated food would be provided free or at a nominal charge—many old people insist upon paying something—for those who are ill or who after paying high rents from their meagre pension have little left for food. I also feel that regular visitations to lonely old people in rooms by the young would add much to the lives of both. Young families will also be asked to adopt old folk under a "Foster Grandparents" program which once again would add meaning and stability to both the old and some families.

Generalizations and categorizing of the poor

"Well I've been trying to urge people not to lump all the poor together and not to treat them as one homogeneous mass. As you study individuals and families you see that some rather crucial distinctions have to be made between the results of poverty in different social and cultural contexts. Dr. Oscar Lewis.

"And I think that our antipoverty program in this country should try to distinguish between families to whom poverty has given a whole way of life and families who are poor but still subscribe to the basic values of the system in which they live."—Senator Robert Kennedy.

We often, without intending to do so, destroy people by saying that all poor people are lazy, scroungers, second-class citizens, etc. As we are all aware, if we repeat something often enough we not only begin to believe it but so does the person or group that we are talking about. As many individuals as possible must be made aware that they are capable of certain achievement and that they are important as individuals. In all of our programs, we try and work on a basis of a volunteer to each two or three people and also we are concerned that the volunteer be involved on a continuing basis. One shot deals like hit and run raids in the war often do more damage for we raise the hopes of people and then slam one more door in their faces.

While it is important that people recognize the needs of people and the lack of the facilities for meeting these needs, I do feel that the press, radio, television and others can play an important role if they also give recognition to the potential that lies dormant in depressed areas. We must attack the creation of "economic ghettos" now or suffer the grave consequences of many societies throughout the world.

The involvement of people in meeting the needs of other people

"Open your eyes and seek another human being in need of a little time, a little friendliness, a little company, a little work. It may be a lonely, an embittered, a sick or an awkward person for whom you can do something, to whom you can mean something. Perhaps it will be an old person or a child. Or else a good cause needs volunteer workers, people who can give up a free evening or run errands. Who can list all the uses to which that precious working capital called man can be put?" Dr. Albert Schweitzer.

"No one has the right to take for granted his own advantages over others in health, in talents, in ability, in success, in a happy childhood or congenial home conditions. One must pay a price for all these boons. What one owes in return is a special responsibility for other lives," Dr. Albert Schweitzer.

"Your success depends on freeing yourself from blaming either the child, his parents, or his race or nationality. You will need to face honestly your own preconceptions about racial and national traits and about the whole poverty population. Instead of generalizing, learn to look at each child individually, value him for what he is, and explore ways of setting up the kind of rapport that sparks learning.

Self-esteem and self-confidence are basic to learning. The personal interest that you show in the child may well be the catalyst that makes him recognize his own worth and his ability to achieve"—Anna W. M. Wolf.

Everywhere I go, both within the effected community and out into the larger community, I find people young and old who do care and do desire to become involved in making the community a better place to live in and to grow up in. For instance, I recruited 50 young people for a summer of involvement at a church dance. One of the main difficulties that I find that churches, schools, etc. are over protective and want to limit the understanding and involvement of young people. It is little wonder that young people become involved in drugs, etc. for they have so much to offer but are often cut off from being of service to others by adults who neither have the same idealism or care enough about others. I find that young people who do go out into the community gain much from the experience and often find themselves in helping others.

Programs that we either have in operation or can put in operation that would have an effect upon poverty are as follows:

You will no doubt read many reports and many will involve large expenditures of money that put the possibility of becoming a reality in the remote area. What I am suggesting here, because of the involvement of the private sector and the establishment can become a reality within two months.

The Senior Citizen

1. A subsidized industry where old folk could work for a few hours a week and bring additional income and meaning into their lives.

2. A central food store where free food or at a nominal charge would be available for those who are ill or because of their meagre pension are not eating properly.

3. A Foster-Grandparents program whereby young families would make old folks a part of their family life. This does not entail the moving of the old person into their homes but rather the old person becoming a part of the family life.

4. Visitations to the old who need the company of people to overcome the loneliness.

5. Social happenings for the old.

Programs for the Young

1. Programs for the young must start at a very early age and continue without any gaps during the years up to 17 or 18 and must be for fifty-two weeks of the year for much of the good done can be undone during certain periods of the year particularly during the summer period when school is out and many programs cease to operate.

2. Tutorial programs and exposure programs on a personal basis are a must.

3. We have found that our farm and small town vacation program, making use of week-lies and dailies, not only takes youngsters out of the city but provides a solid family exposure.

4. Happenings must take place both within and outside of the effected community.
 5. The involvement of local and out of the community young people is important for this provides motivation for both groups of young people.
 6. A summer camp which combines both the joys of nature and also works upon school deficiencies is needed for such things as reading a grade behind can be alleviated during this period.
 7. Programs which go out into the streets during the summer, on vacant lots, etc., involved young volunteers, youngsters and parents. This program truly brings people together and many solid friendships are formed.
 8. The importance of preventative action and programs must be sold for we find it easier to reach youngsters at an early age than to wait until they become problems at age 16 or 17.
 9. The providing of proper food and clothing is as important in our own country as it is abroad.
 10. The recognition of the courage of the children by the general public rather than treating youngsters as misfits is important.
- Anything that is done to alleviate poverty must be based upon a long term basis for the band aid approach does little good and is a waste of money.

THE SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON POVERTY

EVIDENCE

Toronto, Wednesday, March 11, 1970.

The Special Senate Committee on Poverty (Subcommittee "A") met this day at 9.35 a.m. at St. Lawrence Hall, Toronto.

Senator David A. Croll (Chairman) in the Chair.

The Chairman: I will call the meeting to order. One of our committees is already out on the road this morning making some inspections and we have to join with them about 12 o'clock.

This morning we will be having four position papers from Alderman Horace Brown, Alderman Karl Jaffary, Alderman John Sewell and Alderman Anthony O'Donohue, all of whom have taken the opportunity to present their points of view as it affects poverty, for which we are most appreciative. Each of them will make a short summary, not longer than five minutes, and leave themselves open for questions. We will start with Alderman Brown.

Alderman Horace Brown: Thank you, Senator Croll. and my colleagues regret there is no official brief from the City of Toronto. That is why we are here. Our submissions were really intended to support the representations that might have been put forward by the City of Toronto.

I think what appals me greatly, senator, and it is not my brief but it is in my heart, is that in North America, and it is becoming incipient in Canada, there is a growing swing to the right in thinking, a feeling that we are no longer our brother's keepers, a materialistic outlook, a view that it is sinful to be poor. I find all of this extremely depressing.

As a product of the depression myself, I know, and you know, senator, what those days were like. I do not want to see them come again. However, the signs are all there: the growing unemployment, growing restlessness, the feeling of people, "I am all right, Jack; look after yourself." These are all the things which lead to a depression which none of us will forget. Of course now we call it inflation because it is the other side of the coin.

If we are going to take the position, the Victorian position from my point of view, that we shall always leave the poor with us, then I think we abdicate any sense of responsibility we have as public officials. It is a shame and a disgrace that in one of the most affluent nations of the world some of our people should be almost on the borderline of hunger, and in fact it is happening to far too many of our people. I know that two-thirds of the world goes to bed hungry. That of course is a crime against our so-called civilization. However, it hurts to know that this is also happening in Canada, sometimes right in this city. Perhaps it is not absolute hunger, but it is a case of never having enough of anything.

I have always said that welfare is a right and not a privilege. I have always said that welfare is merely a subsistence as it is handled now. I would repeat for the benefit of all that are here that that is still my view, that that is all it is.

I find it incredible that many of those who are among our marginal income families are working for wages below the income that they would receive if they were on welfare. I find it incredible because I find it just as incredible that there should be employers who would take advantage of such a situation.

I think that most of us are poor in many ways, and one of the ways in which we are poor is poverty of intellect. Our poverty of intellect shows itself in so many ways, senators, in so many, many ways. And when we say that these problems do not belong to us, to each and every one of us, to those of us who have been fortunate enough to at least receive some measure of security, then I think we are not being quite human.

I don't want to see a return to the past and yet the past is coming up on us in very rapid fashion. We see so many today who express the old woodpile philosophy: If he wants to eat let him go out and chop wood so he can earn his dinner. That of course would be a bowl of soup and a crust of bread. As far as I am concerned, that is not any kind of charity whatsoever.

I believe that every human being in this country is entitled to a decent living, and I believe that every human being in this country should get exactly that. What is a decent living to me may not be a decent living to someone else but I do feel that nobody should be on the verge of hunger, that nobody should have to go around in ragged clothing, that nobody should be without an adequate education. In that latter respect I am speaking of those who need re-education in order to come back into this technological age in which we all live.

Senator, you and I have spoken several times on these matters in past years and I think we have somewhat the same philosophy in regard to them. We came through it. We know what it is like. I pray to God that these same things will not happen again and that our young people will not have to go through it, because if our young people have to go through it I have enough faith in them to believe they will not go through with it, that they will take to the streets and change things—unless we change them first ourselves.

I think we can change them. I wish we could change them. I am very glad to see your committee at work, senator, because I do think you are bringing to the people of Canada some eye-opening which is very needed. Thank you.

The Chairman: Thank you, Alderman Brown. Now we will hear from Alderman Jaffary.

Alderman Karl Jaffary: My name is Karl Jaffary. I am one of the city of Toronto aldermen, one of the aldermen from Cabbagetown, as it turns out. The chairman was saying earlier this morning that poverty is no longer confined to Cabbagetown, and I suppose that is true, but we think we have as good poverty as anybody else has. Alderman Sewell and I are here to talk about it.

I am very sorry the city of Toronto does not have an official brief before you. Something may come in later. The two points I want to make are really points that were made in that brief that you do not have before you. The things that we wrote were things to support that brief. Since I was the man who at least put the words on paper I would like to bring to you the main thrust of that position on which the city is not agreed but on which I think the four of us are, and that is that poor people do not have enough power, that in fact poverty is a question of power quite as much as it is a question of money.

I am not necessarily talking about group power in the sense we hear of student power, black power and that kind of power. I am talking about the power of an individual to make real decisions that affect his life. A lot of it relates to money.

My colleague, John Sewell, was saying that, for instance, when he worked as a community organizer on a very low income he still wasn't poor. A lot of clergymen are in this position as well because they have options open to them. They can do all kinds of interesting things with their lives. People are poor when they cannot make those choices. And it often boils down to a question of choices: Where are you going to live? If you have no choice about where you are going to live, a significant amount of power has been removed from you. As long as public housing is something which we provide in poorer parts of town and in large projects, that situation of course continues. You either live in a public housing project or you live in a very bad room or flat somewhere, and those are the only choices you have.

There are the choices about education, about what kind of a vacation or what kind of recreation you are going to have. There are a whole range of choices that some people cannot make and when their choices are so limited that they are virtually prisoners, I think they are poor.

I was interested to see in the Star last night that the major brief about poverty seemed to be a brief being presented not to this committee at all but to the Honourable John Yaremko, which, in any event, seemed to get the major news coverage. What we are saying here seemed to be about the points that Alar Borevoy was making on that occasion.

In this context of the power of a person to make decisions affecting his own life I simply want to make a few comments about how one maintains financial power which can deal with some of these things. I think the place I would like to start is with the statement that everyone who works has the right to just and favourable remuneration, ensuring for himself and his family an existence worthy of human dignity, supplemented, if necessary, by other means of protection. That is Article 23(3) of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. That seems to me to be a position which we all accept intellectually.

If a man is doing anything that contributes in any way to the society, no matter how menial, he ought to be able to live decently on the money he gets. I am sure you have heard before this that that is not so in this country, that people who work for the minimum wage in Ontario at any rate cannot live decently and cannot support their families. That seems to me to be a problem that can have all kind of complicated overtones. The Workmen's Compensation Board have told me if we raise the minimum wage then there will be people put out of work. Surely we have to accept the proposition that if a man does work he has to be able to live decently. He cannot do that now.

I think the second stage we get to is one which we all accept intellectually as well, and that is that if a man cannot work for some reason or other that is not any fault of his, he still should be able to live decently. One of the two general categories of people I envisage in this respect is the man who has an accident, and the general scheme for dealing with him is workmen's compensation. There I am falling to the jargon, "the scheme for dealing with him." That is the attitude, of course, I am unhappy about.

Then if there is some malaise in the economy as a whole, we have unemployment insurance. It seems to me that as a society we pretend that these schemes deal with the problems and they provide really not much more than a comfortable rug under which to weep our leavings. The levels of remuneration under unemployment insurance are such that a man with a family of four, living on unemployment insurance alone, frequently can get more money living on general welfare assistance. In Metropolitan Toronto we frequently have to augment unemployment insurance benefits by paying general welfare assistance.

When you get an insurance scheme that is down to that sort of level, something that provides less than welfare, it seems to me that it is a travesty to call it insurance. What we are really doing is that we tax these poor people for a very inadequate welfare service. It is a bad welfare scheme because they are old sometimes they cannot qualify, but even if they do qualify, the benefits are too low. Workmen's compensation is in much the same category. They have a maximum compensable income which is lower than many men earn. The maximum they can get for 100% disability is 75% of their income. The result is that a man can be involved in an industrial accident, sometimes something which is entirely his employer's fault, if you want to assign fault, and he finds himself statutorily barred from anything but what may be about half of his normal income. And, as a result, he goes through great hardship.

I have really just dealt very briefly with those who work. I think they have to be paid more. And those who are compensated for being unable to work because of something that is not their fault, in that case too we have to pay them more.

We come finally then to the group of people who are not working and where traditionally we would say that that is probably their fault, that they don't want to work or they can't work, and general welfare assistance under the Ontario Family Benefits Act, which of course the federal government contributes to, seems to be the basis of their income.

It seems to me that we have kept those rates of income at a calculatedly low level in order to provide incentives for them to go out to work. Most of them cannot go out to work. If you ask why they are not working in the first place, you find a vast number of social reasons why, generally, they cannot. It may be that the husband was working at a minimum wage and he got disgusted with doing that, and in some instances he may have started drinking as a consequence. It is a bad life living on minimum wage. If he then finds his wife nagging him, he may leave. My wife would nag me if I earned the minimum income, if that were the level at which we were living. I think she would have a right to nag me. If she nagged me to the extent I think she should, I would probably desert her. At that point I am not sure whose fault it is, when there is a family with no means of support. The levels at which we attempt to support these people at the present rates of our welfare, in my opinion, are woefully inadequate.

I can only conclude with another article from the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, that everyone has the right to a standard of living adequate for the health and well-being of himself and family, including food, clothing, housing, and medical care and necessary social services, and the right to security in the event of unemployment, sickness, disability, widowhood, old age or other lack of livelihood in circumstances beyond his control.

Well, senators, we do not have that. People who live on general welfare assistance levels, I think, frequently live at a disgustingly bad level. There is a lot of talk about fancy schemes like guaranteed annual incomes and so on, and those may be a nice idea, but I think the first thing to do is simply raise the benefits under the schemes we have now. I cannot see a great deal of difference between family benefits and general welfare assistance and the guaranteed income except perhaps you could tax the poor people on the guaranteed annual income if you gave it to them that way.

It is something people have a right to. We know what the limits of it are. Let us start by making the limits, limits on which someone can live. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Alderman John Sewell.

Alderman John Sewell: I just wanted to make a few remarks about poverty in general. Like Karl, I define poverty in terms of power, and being a politician I define it in terms of political power. It is very obvious to me that the poor in our society have absolutely no political power. What that means is that those who have power make up the laws and those who do not have power do not make the laws and, therefore, they get nothing to protect them, which seems to indicate there is something wrong with society. We are denying power to poor people. They really cannot do anything to affect their lives.

The laws that are made are not made by them. Nobody wants to help them to get the power or re-distribute the power so they can begin to make laws so they are going to get some benefits. I think that is the crucial problem in poverty right there. The poor people are not involved in any way in the political system and therefore they do not get any of the benefits out of it.

I will give you two examples of that in terms of Toronto politics, which I think will somehow indicate what I am trying to say. Firstly, when the original motion was made that this city present a brief on poverty to your committee, the mayor turned to the other members of the executive committee and said, "Look, our problem is that we don't have any official in the city who knows anything about poverty." Now, I think that is indicative of what is happening. We just do not have anyone in Toronto in an official capacity who knows anything about poverty.

Various people have suggested that Mr. Anderson, the commissioner of welfare for Metro, perhaps knows something about poverty. He might know one aspect of poverty. However, in the city itself we do not have anyone in that position. The man the mayor suggested to do a brief on poverty happened to be the commissioner of development, the man who is responsible for getting big developments in this city. I don't know what he knows about poverty. That is one point.

The second point is that this city council has not yet defined what poverty is. They refuse to do that. I think that is a complete opting out of trying to do anything about poverty. It is very interesting that the city cannot even prepare a brief on poverty. You cannot expect them to do anything about the problem. They just are not interested.

Those are two points. Now I would like to give one third indication of why I don't really feel that the present politicians are going to do anything about the poverty problem. It is very interesting that the thing that is most talked about in the city right now is the Spadina Expressway. People are talking about it in terms of the cost, in terms of who is going to use it. It is very interesting that almost all the politicians who have the power of decision on the Spadina Expressway are in favour of it. In other words, they are against spending that money in a different way. They are not really interested in looking at the problem of the fact that the poor cannot use the Spadina Expressway because most poor people just do not have cars. I think that is a very crucial point, that the priorities of this whole city are wrong.

How do you get around that problem? To me there is only one way of getting around it and that is by somehow helping the poor to grab the power from those who have it. Once they have the power they are going to be okay. They can look after themselves because they would then be in the decision-making position.

I don't think politicians are going to do that because I don't think politicians really want to give up any of their power, and that augurs very bad in terms of poor people in our society. I would think that probably my job—and maybe the jobs of other people—is trying somehow to destroy what we have now so that the power will be redistributed so in fact poor people will have some decision-making capability. Thank you.

Alderman Jaffary: Alderman Sewell and I occasionally wave the flag of anarchy over Cabbagetown with some effect

The Chairman: Alderman O'Donohue, please.

Alderman Anthony O'Donohue: Mr. Chairman, think all the problems here have been well covered. I would like to go through my five minutes by reading a letter I have, one which I received yesterday from a family, which indicates the problems they have. I think it is a typical situation of people who are poor. I am not going to use the real names. It goes on as follows:

"Dear Sir: I am writing to you in desperation. I do hope you can find time in your busy schedule to read this and perhaps help me in some way by letting me know what I can do next.

I have four daughters living with me, Terry, age 10, Brigid, going to school, Kathy, 12, and Mary, 11 going to Queen Street School. I have been on mother's allowance since September, 1965, receiving $291.

We desperately need a low-rental house or apartment. In the past two years we have had to pay $150 a month for rent plus light and gas. We have gotten to where I just cannot keep this up any longer and feed and clothe the girls properly. We have been eating far too much starch and not enough meat every day because meat is so expensive.

I really don't know whether you are interested in the details or not. I just don't know where to turn next. I am so discouraged. I have lived in Toronto all my life. After my separation I wanted to start again, start a new life. I could not find any work over $60 a week. This just would not support us. The little money I had went for some furniture and upkeep for six months. A neighbour finally called welfare and I was so ashamed.

Mrs. Gold came to see me and was very nice. We were living in the east end at that time. The landlord raised the rent then from $150 to $160. We moved then. We have moved six times in twelve years, constantly running from cockroaches and landlords with greedy hands. If I complained they got our notice. No one wanted four girls.

Mary took rheumatic fever last March and spent three months in hospital. She goes twice a week still and must be watched all the time. I have a letter from the doctor stating she must not climb stairs. We have always lived on the third floor. It costs us $20 to $24 a month for drugs, Mary's and mine. I have had drugs as well because I have a very bad case of arthritis.

When I was put on mother's allowance Mr. Potter didn't tell me that they covered the drugs, so I paid out $126 for the drugs from September to January. I couldn't make ends meet. I finally called family service and told them they would have to place the girls in foster homes as I just couldn't manage them any more. We nearly froze in one apartment and had to move in December. I took this place because it had a thermostat. We are nice and warm now. We are again on the third floor. The plaster is falling from the ceiling and walls. It needs painting badly. The toilet doesn't work properly. There is one wall plug in the middle room and we have to use about 200 feet of extension cord to all the rooms and trip over it constantly.

The light in the bathroom doesn't work, so we have to use the extension through two windows to get around. The place is overrun with cockroaches. The landlord promised to re-decorate it before Christmas but hasn't touched it except to put in a sink. He took three weeks to connect the gas stove. Heat, gas and light was supposed to be included in the rent.

In February we had the lights go, so we had to sign for them ourselves. Mary still has to climb the three floors and I worry about her. We had nothing for Christmas but Terry found a Christmas tree six blocks away on Boxing Day. She brought it home and we decorated it. I just felt terrible. The girls are honest too and well-liked by the teachers . . ."

Mr. Chairman, I could go on with this but it is a very, very sad sort of letter to read because it indicates very clearly the problems of a family on subsistence this level. It goes on to tell about where the mother worked and that she had to give up her work because she was not making enough. I'm sorry, I cannot continue.

The Chairman: You can take a minute before going if you like.

Alderman O'Donohue: No, that's all.

The Chairman: Well, we have had a very cooperative presentation from four politicians. Have any of the senators any questions to direct to any of the aldermen?

Senator Fergusson: I was interested in Alderman Brown's reference to Canada Manpower, which apparently he thinks is doing a very good job in some areas. We have had others who have criticized very much what Canada Manpower was doing. It is rather encouraging to hear that some people think it is worthwhile.

Alderman Brown: Of course I believe I mentioned I am a governor of George Brown College, a college of science and technology which has replaced Canada Manpower in many areas, as many community colleges are doing.

My feeling is that Canada Manpower in many instances is doing a pretty fair job but that what is wrong is that those who should be the most encouraged are the most discouraged, simply because they have not the requisite education. I pointed out how difficult it is for a man, say, of 50 or 55 with a family of four or five children to go back to school. How would we like to have to do that? Yet we really do not give him enough money to live decently. If he has the wish and the incentive to go back, we should provide the incentive from our side as well, something greater than that which we are giving. I know that there are pretty fair incentives in some respects but they work better for a single person than the married person.

I am not saying that the single persons have a bed of roses in which to lie in respect to this; they have to economize when they take a Canada Manpower course. However, I do think that the concept is good, and I would hate to see it cut back. I would like to see it enlarged.

Senator Fergusson: You would like to see it extended beyond what it is, beyond the 52 weeks that are allowed?

Alderman Brown: Yes, and the financial incentive made greater too because I don't think it really is an incentive for someone to stand up and say, "Well, I am 50 years old but I am going back to school."

Senator Fergusson: How far back do you think we should take it? There are some with practically no education.

Alderman Brown: Madam senator, this of course is very true. In my work as former chairman of the committee on welfare in the city and chairman of welfare of Metro, it became very apparent to me that the majority of those who are caught in the bind are caught in the bind by lack of education. They were forced by economic circumstances to go on the labour market without the requisite skills. Now the world has moved on past them. They have no world any more. They have been discarded by society.

Senator Fergusson: They could be productive.

Alderman Brown: This is the point. I would much rather see a productive taxpaying citizen any time than pay out all the money on other things and not get some results for it. I think that our whole aim should be, where they are employable—and, as my brief points out, there is the increase of unemployables, which is very bad in my estimation—but where they are employable they should be given every incentive to be productive, taxpaying citizens, because that is good for the economy. I feel that same way about prisoners being rehabilitated. Our society seems to lack the will to do it.

Let me put it another way: Perhaps they have the desire to do it but they have not done it. Whatever has been done has been done too little and perhaps in most cases too late.

Senator Fergusson: Perhaps they have not the foresight. If we don't make these people productive they have to be kept alive anyway.

Alderman Brown: I could not agree with you more. What do they say it costs to keep a prisoner? $20,000 a year. How much better it would be if that man were re-educated and put outside and were paying taxes.

Senator Fergusson: Another idea of yours on page 6 rather took my fancy. I have been reading a survey about children from disadvantaged homes and how it is harder for them to be even interested in getting an education because they are not urged to do so in their homes as perhaps in the homes of the people in the middle class and people in the upper brackets where they may be urged to do this sort of thing. Maybe we do need somebody who will go out and talk to these young people and make them see how important it is to get an education.

Alderman Brown: I think the discouragement you speak of and the need for encouragement is quite true. It reflects in all areas of our society. For instance, you speak of the more affluent who seem to have the urge. Even if you just take voting records, in my ward, where there is probably a fair element of poverty and marginal incomes, in the last civic election 29.2% voted. In the more affluent wards, for instance, in ward 10, I think it was 47.3% voted. That was the highest, I am sorry to have report, voting percentage in the city.

So I think that state of affairs is reflected in almost everything touching on poverty. Mind you, there is the odd individual who will rise above this by sheer force of character and so on.

Senator Fergusson: In spite of it, you mean?

Alderman Brown: That is the way to put it, yes. When I say "missionaries" in the brief, I am a great believer in detached workers and community workers such as John Sewell was, the detached worker being the one who is completely out in the field and working with the people and getting to know them while living with them. I am a great believer in that.

They can talk all they want about the Company of Young Canadians, but I believe that the concept was very good and I think a great deal of good was done in many, many areas by that group. They were living with them and getting to know on a very personal basis about their problems. They were living at the same scale these people were living. They became confidantes of these people. I am sure that they encouraged quite a number to seek a better life. If democracy is ever going to work it is going to have to work at our lowest levels.

Senator Fergusson: Thank you very much.

The Chairman: Senator Everett.

Senator Everett: Alderman Sewell, in your verbal presentation you talked about the fact that the poor have no power. I don't think anybody would disagree with that, that as a group they lack power in comparison with other groups in our society. However, would you say that power is tending to increase?

Alderman Sewell: Yes, very much so. I think that society is moving into a position where everything is completely centralized, and where people are in fact losing the decision-making abilities over their own lives.

One example is what is happening with tenants right now. A lot of tenants are being forced to move into apartments where there is a standard lease, where they cannot change the colours on the walls or change anything, for that matter. That has happened basically to the middle class. What is happening to the poor while that is going on is that they are being forced to live in smaller and smaller units. They are packing them three and four families to a house now. I think the trend is basically to make everything centralized which means that one does not have the control over one's conditions that one wants to have.

In my written brief I tried to outline some ways in which we can get around that sort of thing in terms of housing, namely that we have to begin making money available to small developers, i.e. individual persons. Right now money is only available to the large developers, so it means they get control more and more.

I think we have to look at various ways of decentralizing what is doing on so in fact the decision-making ability can be returned to actual people rather than to corporations.

Senator Everett: That is your prescription. I don't know whether you answered my question or not, and that is whether or not you agree or think that the poor are gaining more power in society?

Alderman Sewell: Oh no, I don't think they are gaining more power. I would disagree with that 100%. What is happening is almost a form of tokenism where the poor are being allowed to say more but they are not getting anything more out of it. That, is my opinion, is what is going on right now. We are beginning to hear them but nobody pays any attention to what they have to say. In fact, they do not have any power.

Senator Everett: Let us go back then one step. You say that they are becoming more articulate?

Alderman Sewell: I don't know if they are more articulate. There are more people listening to them but that does not mean anything. I mean you can listen by listening alone is no good. The real crux of the thing, I say, is power. It is no good just to have someone saying something without being heard. That is my position. I can say all sorts of things in the city council chamber but I have no power. People listen to me only because they never vote the way I want them to vote. That is the real problem.

Senator Everett: Being a member of city council you know this situation of the poor with a complete sense of frustration, I gather?

Alderman Sewell: No, one always has hope. What I mean is, if you want to go around solving the problems of poverty, you have to continually confront the political system we have right now. I mean, you have to confront those politicians.

Senator Everett: It is not so much confronting the politicians as it is the question of confronting the average public as to what really goes on in society. That is why you interest me greatly because you say, "I understand you, 'Let's destroy society; let's get rid of society as we know it.'"

Alderman Sewell: When did I say that?

Senator Everett: If I understood your verbal brief, I thought that was precisely what you were saying.

Alderman Sewell: I was saying that we will have to change it, and I think it needs some very fundamental changes, the whole of society. If you want to call that destroying society, that's fine.

Senator Everett: That is not what I call it. I am interested in your definition of what you want to do and what sort of model you want to create. I can understand either one side of the coin or the other. I can understand evolution. I can understand the frustration if the evolution is too slow. I can also understand a complete destruction of all the values we live by to be replaced with other values. I would just like to know which side of the coin you are on so we can go on with the questioning, you see.

Alderman Sewell: Well, how does one state this? I would like to see some very fundamental changes in society because I don't believe we are ever going to get around the problem of poverty without some fundamental changes.

Those fundamental changes can come about through evolution in terms of changing values. Right? We can try to change the value system we have. If that is a valid model, I think you can do it that way.

I would think probably there is not going to be a revolution. It is going to have to be done through evolution. There is just not a revolution coming on, as far as I can see, not in this country.

I would think, if one is interested in seeing a change in poverty, one would have to put oneself in a position where one were willing to try to change the society, and the first part of changing the society is confronting it with what it is now. After you confront it, then you can begin banging away and try to get those people who are making decisions now to make different decisions, to come up with some distinctly different decisions.

That is the type of thing I am interested in. That is the type of thing I think will get us to understand what poverty is all about, defining it purely in political terms.

Senator Everett: I don't think we probably disagree except that I think that politicians tend to reflect the values and judgments of their constituents. To say that politicians are going to make the decisions is in a sense in a democratic society dictatorial, to say "We are going to decide this and this and this." In a democratic society, surely the function of the politician is to lead by changing the ethic of the people he represents. But he has to carry them with him, no matter what else he may do.

Now, Jerry Rubin says, "Destroy the schools, destroy the courts." He appears on television the other night in a judicial robe, takes off the robe, tears it in half and jumps on it. It is all destruction. But at no time did Rubin ever say what he was going to replace that destroyed society with.

Alderman Sewell: You are asking me what I would replace it with?

Senator Everett: I would, first of all ask you this: Do you want to destroy it? And, if you do, what sort of society, what model of society, do you suggest in its place? I want you to tell me what model of society you can point to in the world which you would like to see replace the society we have today, taking into account that our society probably evolved better than any other society in the world.

Alderman Sewell: First of all, it is very questionable whether in fact the society will evolve, because I do not believe that politicians generally reflect the mood of their constituents. I just don't believe in elections that much. I have been through one and I find it is a sham. I don't think I got elected for anything I stand for. I got elected because I had a good machine. The thing ran really well. That is one point.

The second point that I sort of adhere to is that it is not my job to go around making decisions about what this society is going to look like. My job is to get the people together who live in my ward so that they can begin making the changes they want. That means I am not the person who has the blueprint for what our society is going to look like. What I want to do is give the people in my ward the ability to make the decisions and carry out the action so they can get the type of society they want. That is not my decision; it is their decision. All I am doing is trying to provide a situation whereby they can make those decisions. That is what, for instance, the whole matter of Trefann Court is about, the whole fight we have had there. Basically it is trying to get the people into a position where they can make the decisions.

Senator Everett: Is your fight against the structures that exist in society today? Presumably it is because you are on the council for that reason?

Alderman Sewell: Sure. You fight wherever you can.

Senator Everett: You are fighting within the structure of society. Why are you so interested in destroying it?

Alderman Sewell: Because I do not think it is doing the things it should be doing. That's all. It has poor people in it.

Senator Everett: That is why we are here. That is why Alderman Brown is here. He doesn't think it is doing the things it should be doing.

Alderman Sewell: What I am trying to do is suggest a way that I think it is going to be changed, at least the way I am going to work to try to change it.

Senator Everett: So far you have not suggested those ways. You have said you are nothing more than a conduit for the people in your ward. I don't find fault with that. However, it seems to me you have not talked about some of the things that could happen to our society. You have not put that down in definite terms. I think you owe that to your electorate. Mr. Brown has. He has talked about what he would like to see in society. He has gone out on the end of a limb. But all you are prepared to say, seems to me, and I apologize if I am misstating it, is that you seem to be prepared to say is that society is wrong, let's get rid of society.

Alderman Sewell: I think what I said, and somebody has a tape recorder we can play the tape back, if you like—

Senator Everett: It will all be on Hansard anyway and we can check it out later.

Alderman Sewell: My position was that as a politician it is my duty to organize the poor so that they can take power away from the people who have it. Once they do that they can make the decisions that they want to see made. Okay?

Senator Everett: Yes.

Alderman Sewell: I think that is fairly specific isn't it? I have said what I want to do. I want to organize the poor so they can take over the decision-making power. That is not called destroying society; that is called playing the games of the society. That is what developers do all the time. They get into a position where they are going to convince council of something.

Senator Everett: Nobody can find fault with the concept. If your constituency is the poor, and God bless you if that is the case, then by all means you should do what you can within society to change society.

Alderman Sewell: But I am rather disappointed that you want to define it in terms of destroying society.

Senator Everett: No, I didn't want to do that. Lord knows I don't want to do that. Far from it. I don't want to see society destroyed.

Alderman Sewell: That is what I understood.

Senator Everett: Alderman Jaffary, you wanted say something too, I believe.

Alderman Jaffary: Just a couple of comments on this same discussion. I think of a speech by the former director of community programs in New Jersey which was made about ten days ago, in which he was talking about the whole structure of how we run society as being a system in much the same way as the new systems in computer science, the concept by which they figure how things work.

He was saying, and I thought this was very interesting, that the two groups of people who could deal with that system effectively are the kids who have been raised in our television world and the poor people who have been having to put up with the system for a long time. They know where to put a pressure on at one end in order to get an output at the other end. If you embarrass a senator's wife, ten days later a grant is announced for this community program. Sometimes that is the only way you get action. I am talking about senators in the American context here, obviously.

I am not terribly concerned about what the structure is, what the formal constitutional structure is, because I think we all know that, given almost any structure, things can work, and, given almost any structure, things can be solved. I feel there is an elaborate structure which is an interplay of the governmental structure, private sectors and a lot of other pressure that are asserting themselves and that, to make the kind of thing come out of that structure that I would like to see, pressure is going to have to be put on at specific places.

When you talk about tearing down the system, or changing the system, you are doing two things. First, you are making politicians aware of the pressures that may be on them to do things. That means organizing poor people who, first, are confronting their politicians, and to some extent this is all a great P.R. thing. It is trying to persuade the politicians that a poor person is as effective as anybody as someone else. It is also, as you say, trying to affect other people in the society who are talking to their politicians.

However, poor people at the moment, when they are talking to politicians, are talking most ineffectively. I don't think you can therefore say that evolution is ruled out or that evolution is the way it is going to go. What you say is that the present system creates stresses, that those stresses have to be manifested in political power being exercised by the poor, and one would hope by other people, and the result of those pressures, we hope, is going to be evolution. If the result of those pressures is no change, then something more drastic may happen.

Alderman Brown was saying that, if we don't deal with this better and achieve a better result than before, the people will take to the streets. I think we are all saying the same thing.

The Chairman: Alderman Brown, I think, wants to say exactly what he said before.

Alderman Brown: Yes, I still believe that too because we have to change, but what is bothering me is that our society is changing but, unfortunately, it is going backwards. That is what bothers me. That is what I was trying to say. We are going back in our philosophy. We are starting to neglect the things for which this nation has stood.

For instance, if you will forgive me for saying so, we have the deliberate federal government policy now of creating unemployment, which to me is atrocious. It is a complete negation of what democracy stands for, in my estimation. So we are changing our society, and it is being changed at a very high level, but it is being changed backwards.

In addition, the thinking of the people is going backwards. When I say the people I am talking, I suppose, about what Mr. Nixon refers to as the great, silent majority, the ones who don't bother to vote. They are the ones who are going backwards, moving backwards. Perhaps they are moving backwards faster in our neighbouring country to the south than we are, but all the signs are here too.

Senator Cook: You want a change in our policy. If there is an acceptance of unemployment now it is only because we honestly believe that there will be a great deal more unemployment in the future.

Alderman Brown: But how can you argue that, sir?

Senator Cook: That is the whole point of it. It is not a change in the thrust of thought; it is a change that we must accept some unemployment now or the alternative is that the whole thing may collapse, and we will have twice as much unemployment in the future. Whether it is right or wrong is not the point; it is an honest thought. It is not a hardening of heart and deciding to have unemployment just for the sake of having unemployment. It is putting up with a little unemployment now in the hope we will not have a lot of unemployment in the future.

Alderman Brown: I don't call 6% a little unemployment.

Senator Cook: I don't think we should quibble about words.

Alderman Brown: No. My argument is this, that that is fine, yes, but who are you creating unemployment for? It is the old story about, "Yes, I would be glad to have welfare cases integrated into the community, but please don't put them next door to me." The whole idea here, is, sure, we will create unemployment, but please don't create it for me. That is what is bothering me.

Alderman O'Donohue: Possibly, Mr. Chairman, I might make a comment here on the submission I made on the minimum wage?

The Chairman: I think Senator Everett was about to ask a question of Alderman Brown.

Senator Everett: It is with regard to what Alderman Brown just said. The policy of the government, as indeed it is that of most nations in the western world, has been to lick inflation, which historically has probably been the worst curse of all. If, as a result of licking that inflation by imposing monetary and fiscal controls, we create the type of unemployment you are talking about, then I think the federal government, or whatever government does that, is guilty of a sin. However, you don't have to exclude one just because you don't want the other. There can be programs such as retraining programs, manpower programs, relocation programs, and, as you were saying, better unemployment insurance. There can be programs that either stop the unemployment from increasing or direct resources to those who unfortunately have to be unemployed for a temporary period. So you make a choice.

If you want to say that we want continuing inflation, please remember that you are talking about the problems of the poor—and you go into housing developments and I am sure you see it a lot more than I do—it is inflation which has been killing them. They are the people who have really been hurt by inflation. So I don't think the two things run hand in hand. And indeed, if the federal government does not do something about unemployment within the policy of trying to control inflation, then I will join you in the criticism.

The Chairman: Alderman O'Donohue had a point he wanted to make.

Alderman O'Donohue: Mr. Chairman, there were a couple of points I wanted to make. First, it appears to me that over the years two of the three levels of society have been able to look after themselves in some way or other. The two, the white collar and the blue collar, have organized and they have done sufficiently well, as we are all aware. However, the other level, the third level of society is the unorganized level, which has not been able to do anything for itself, and has had to depend entirely on the generosity of the powers-that-be, that is the various levels of government, to set minimum wages, for instance, for them. Now, I happen to have a lot of this in my ward, where most of the people are people who we would call poor. In their own terms they may not be poor. They are hard-working people, working for something like $1.30 to $1.80 an hour. I personally feel that this is not sufficient to live on now for a man and wife with a couple of kids. This is why in my presentation I suggested we should increase the minimum wage.

I know it may increase the value of food in restaurants, the value of clothes and perhaps many other things, but I think it is something we have to bear across the board. I think politicians at the federal, provincial and municipal levels have to stand up and say that the minimum wage should be increased in order to keep these people really out of the poorhouse, because, as I have said before, I know from my experiences that some of these people are really in dire need of help. The only way we can help them is by taking a strong stand on the minimum wage matter, especially in the case of immigrants.

If they are constantly working from morning until night, from dawn to dusk, they never have a chance to get off the ground. They have a bad command of the language, to start with. They cannot really better themselves. They really have a double burden to bear. Not only do they suffer to some extent but their kids suffer as well because they have to leave school early and go to work probably for minimum wage as well, which, to my way of thinking, is the worst thing that could possibly happen to them.

The Chairman: Mr. Alderman, almost from the day we began our hearings that has been a matter of very serious concern to us and we have heard about it constantly. It is not just as easy as all that, and I think you can appreciate that. You cannot defend the minimum wage, the present minimum wage, in the present orientation and context with today's cost of living and all the rest of it. It is not an easy problem to deal with at all.

We have five minutes, and I am going to give each one of you one minute. This is my question of you. When you were younger, when we were all young, we put great faith in education, and during the '60s we have had massive expansion in education. Where are the results? Each of you might give that minute of your time.

Alderman Brown: I don't quite follow you senator?

The Chairman: What are the results? Here you went out with a great expansion of education, you looked upon that as being the solution to many of our problems, but, in fact, where are the results?

Alderman Brown: I would say that was forced on us by our advancing technology. We had to cope with the fact that Russia was turning out more engineers in a year than the whole of the North American continent was turning out in two or three years. They were turning out more doctors. They were making universities free for those who could qualify. We had to cope with this problem of education which, as in the case of medicine, suddenly went ahead. I guess medicine has gone ahead faster than anything else since, as I understand it, its progress has more than doubled in the last two years, a fact that in the past fifty years medicine has advanced more than in all the past 3,000 years of recorded history.

What have we done with it? Actually, I have a great faith in young people. I wish I had the brains that most of them have. I wish I had the education that most of them have. I never finished high school. That was my own fault, nobody else's. I wanted to be a writer and so I went out to be a writer in a very sparse market for writers in Canada even then. But, senator, just with computers alone, and I have had something to do with computers from a writing point of view, it amazes me that these young people eat these things just as a matter of course. To me they are all Greek, more Greek than Greece.

I think we are doing a great deal with it, frankly. I think that the results will begin to show. However, that I am worried about is the many, many that are being discarded by this technology, who no longer fit to society, who are on the scrap heap. Senator, if you and I had to go out and look for a job tomorrow, I think we would have a hard time getting one.

The Chairman: How about the others? And would you direct your answers more to this: Have we had the right sort of education? Who wants to take that one?

Alderman Jaffary: I think the money we have spent on education has probably been well spent. I think that what spending it has probably done has been to increase the gap between the upper and middle class amounts of power and the power the poor people have. We have not made massive injections of educational money into elementary education. I think that is where poor people are most vitally affected.

I think as well that the rest of the cycle of poverty, the state of housing and the pressures on a child to go to school and earn, and so on, have meant that the poor in society have not been benefitting from those educational expenditures to anything like the extent that richer people have.

The Chairman: Alderman Sewell?

Alderman Sewell: Just to back up what Karl has said, in our ward there are 17 elementary schools. There is not one 5-year high school. That is what education is about for the poor.

Alderman O'Donohue: I don't think that our educational system has worked the way I thought it would work or that it should work, primarily because we have had so much with respect to education, we have put so much money into it, and I think a lot of it has been wasted.

The parents in general have sort of thrown over to the educational system the whole family situation. I think they have suffered because of that. That would be my statement on it, senator.

The Chairman: One more thing, perhaps I will just leave you with this statement: somebody said it was necessary to confront the system; I don't know who made that statement. Mr. Sewell, I think, said something like that. Last night at one of the meetings a lady stood up and said to me: "I went to work. I have five or six children. I was earning $240 a month working. Welfare would pay me $300." She went on to say: "I went to the welfare department and said, 'I am working and I can earn $240 and I cannot get along on it. Make up the difference.' And they said, 'No, you are either on relief or off relief. That is the rule'". The result was that she goes onto welfare rather than continue to work.

In seven provinces in Canada, all of them poorer than the province of Ontario, that woman would have had her earnings augmented to the extent of what she would have got on relief, and on top of that she would have been permitted to retain 50% of her earnings above that up to a maximum of an amount I am not too sure about. So I am delighted when I see here four aldermen, young, vigorous fellows like yourselves.

Alderman Brown: Oh, thank you very much.

The Chairman: Mr. Brown is an old friend of mine. You have left us with some problems and I am leaving you with a problem on behalf of the committee, to involve yourselves with the proper authorities. From a purely economic point of view it is something of a disaster, as you can see. Here was this woman getting $240 and all she needed was $50 or $60 to pick her up. Those are the kinds of mistakes we are making. It is not the poor people who are making those mistakes at all. So, you young fellows, just keep at it. Thank you very much.

We are now to have the presentation of the Family Service Association of Metropolitan Toronto. Mr. William G. White, the supervisor, will be the spokesman, and he will introduce the people with him.

Mr. William G. White, Supervisor, Family Service Association of Metropolitan Toronto: Mr. Chairman, honourable senators, I will introduce the chairman of our social action committee, Mrs. E. Pearl and Mr. Ed Watson, who is our executive director.

I would say that you are a hard group to make a presentation to. When we hear what you have been saying to the press and on TV, and I saw Senator Croll the other day, well, I can understand the position of the preacher who said it was a lot easier to preach to the heathen than to the converted.

I am going to assume that you know who we are and what we do. I will just say that the Family Service Association is a service agency. We are convinced of the value of our services, and we are also convinced of the need for them away beyond what we are funded for. In spite of that we are not going to say anything about services in our brief at all. That is because we believe that poverty is a matter of lack of money and has to be met with money.

We think that most of the poor have the strength to participate in our society just as well, if not better, than many of those who are not poor. They will do so if they have an adequate income. They will probably do it more economically too.

We think that the cause of poverty has to be seen as deficiencies in our way of distributing income and that what we need are economic compensations for those deficiencies. Those deficiencies make poverty. There is no aberration in our society but it is just an integral part of our way of life.

In our brief, first we speak from our experience of the poor in Metropolitan Toronto. We cannot pretend that it pertains to all of Canada. We know there are things about Indian poverty, rural poverty, that we just do not understand, but we think that it is valid for most urban areas, certainly the larger urban areas.

We have chosen to concentrate on the working poor, and we have done that for two reasons. First, because we believe the position of the welfare poor has been much more adequately represented in front of this committee. I will add that we are as greatly concerned about the welfare poor, and probably more often, than we are about the working poor. Our second reason is that we know the working poor are not only most of the poor, but they make a reservoir from which all kinds of other groups of poor are replenished.

We see the working poor as most commonly families that are just too large for the husband's wages. These men are not just low-income earners at all. A man with no dependents, if he has a minimum wage, is probably not poor. If he has several dependents, even an average wage is not sufficient. In that case the man is below the poverty line. Poverty in the case of the working poor is a function of the relationship between the amount of a man's wage and the number of people who have to live on it. To put it bluntly, poverty in the working poor is a matter of having children.

We define poverty in our brief using the formula suggested by the Economic Council. We say that any family that is spending more than 60% of its income for minimum adequate food, shelter and housing is poor. We rejected the 70% formula as obviously and grossly inadequate for an urban centre like Toronto. Perhaps most of the working poor spend 10, 15 or 20 percent of their income in direct taxes that the welfare poor do not have to pay. We think poverty is an economic matter and the result of deficiencies in our way of distributing income. With respect to the working poor, perhaps it is mostly the fact that wages relate to the market value of jobs and not to the size of families or the needs of families. With respect to the welfare poor, poverty is simply a poverty of deliberate neglect, for which we are all responsible. It is institutionalized poverty.

We recognize that there are among the poor a number of people who might be thought to be creating their own poverty. These are people whose condition, with an adequate income, would not have changed much. We do not think that any general approach to poverty can be based on the conditions of these people. Their conditions result from all the unsolved human problems in our society, and poverty is only one of them. We piously hope that we are coming nearer to some sort of resolution.

I think lastly before I turn to the brief I want to call your attention to life cycle poverty in larger families with moderate incomes. These families are going to be seriously poor when they have a number of small children. It is not just because the income needs at that time will probably exceed the father's take-home pay but because mother and children simply cannot get out to work to add to it.

Now, later on these families may be rather well off with the older children out of the home and working or letting the mother work. However, if they do crack up as a family, there will be years in which the children are exposed to all the deprivations and tensions of poverty. That is what the situation will amount to at best.

We think that is the kind of poverty that is least understood. This is poverty of people with ordinary wages, poverty of people who are always poor. It is poverty of larger families. It is the larger families that raise most of our kids. When we think of the number of kids who are poor in those families and we add them the number of children who are in families that we know are poor, that are obviously poor, that are always poor, unfortunately we are forced to think that the period of poverty in childhood is really the birthright of our working-class citizens.

Now I will say a few words about our small survey. It is at page 12. We made a careful scrutiny of the income and expenses of 16 families who had three or four children in which the fathers were earning between $80 and $130 a week. These were ordinary working men. And we think that the 16 families are fairly representative of our whole experience with this group of people.

I may add that almost all of these people were made above the poverty line when you take the more realistic figures from the 70% formula of the Economic Council of Canada. It is totally ridiculous for an urban area where the housing is fairly expensive. It may even be ridiculous in other places. That is why we use 60%. These are, however, the well-off among the working poor. There are also large families and small families and the people who have really low incomes are infinitely worse off except that they don't remember families all that long.

Now, I am just going to read a few of the findings that are summarized here beginning at page 12. In all these families the father's wage alone was insufficient to provide for the family. The cost of shelter, food and clothing amounted to considerably more than 50% of the father's gross wages, with normal work hours, amounted to 75% or more in 13 cases. In terms of total family needs, the cost of shelter, food and clothing amounted to more than 60% of income in 14 cases. The addition of compulsory wage reductions brought the proportion of income required for basic costs to a minimum of 78% in all but one case.

The further addition of essential transportation costs at T.T.C. rates, telephone, and the interest costs of consumer credit brought the percentage up to a minimum of 86% or more—often 100%—with only one exception. The balance of income remaining was over $12 a person in only one case, and ranged from $6 to a minus quantity in ten cases. And I would repeat that these are pretty ordinary flows.

Fifteen families were using consumer credit. In 11 cases the expected monthly payments (less interest) amounted to more than the balance of income mentioned above. Usually it was a great deal more. Fifteen of the families paid between 9% and 22% of total income in compulsory wage deductions. The average was 16%.

I would add that all of these fathers were dependable working men. Thirteen had been with the same employer for the past three years or more, for an average of eight years.

I will turn now to our recommendations and try to get through them quickly. I think first I should say that the recommendations begin on page 15, but I am going to skip over the material and simply say that we vastly approve of the guaranteed annual income principle and we have vastly approved getting minimum wage standards up. We do not see that happening very fast. We don't hear the experts arguing on how you are going to make a guaranteed annual income program work and we are afraid of the waiting that seems to be involved. So we have made recommendations that we think could be implemented now while we are waiting.

First and most importantly, we recommend that substantial increases be made in family and youth allowances. By substantial we mean 50% of the actual cost of raising children or more.

It does not permit reading through this, but we suggest also that substantial enough family allowances could immediately help with a lot of the hang-ups in the welfare program, particularly the one that results from welfare rates getting higher than the incomes from a great many jobs. We think that, for a large part of the income for large working families came from family allowances, welfare would not have to be paying more than they can earn.

To go through the other recommendations so that they are not neglected, we recommend that government insurance plans should be extended to protect more adequately working families from the common hazards which may impoverish them. Specifically we recommend the extension of medical insurance to include the costs of drugs and dental care, the extension of hospital insurance to include nursing home care, the improvement of unemployment insurance to provide benefits that will cover essential living costs, and do adjustments in rates according to family size. Again with adequate family allowances we would not have to bother about that.

Pending the implementation of a more fundamental incomes policy, we recommend that families who are already poor should not be subject to direct taxation. Here we are not just thinking of income tax but all the insurance and pension plans that are nothing more or less than direct taxes.

We recommend that federal and provincial governments make every effort to increase our stock of public housing. We made this recommendation with a lot of discomfort because, to a considerable degree, we think that housing problems are just a problem of poverty. People cannot afford to pay a fair, going rate for the housing they need. However, we can see something else happening in urban areas that has made it even impossible to build reasonably cheap housing, to get land for it. The government seems to have to do that.

We recommend that personal bankruptcy be made available to the poor.

The place of consumer credit, as we see it, is indicated in the brief, in the details of our brief. However, I am going to read this because I like it:

Consumer credit is an integral part of our way of life. Our culture teaches its use as an ethic. Almost anyone with a wage can use it, and most persons who have children and are not very well off are using it to the point that interest charges are virtually a universal tax on the working poor. Entrapment in hopeless debt is a hazard as common and indiscriminate as any for which protection might be provided through a government insurance program. A suitable form of bankruptcy, at limited cost, is a necessary step toward providing protection from this hazard, and should have preventive value as well as an incentive to more careful lending.

Senator Cook: If I may interrupt here, Mr. Chairman, in Newfoundland we had a royal commission on indigents nearly 40 years ago at which time I presented a brief recommending this very thing, that we should be allowed to have personal bankruptcy, because many years ago we threw such people in jail if they could not pay their debts, and bankruptcy is, as we all know, a relieving measure and it is denied now to people who most need it, because one has to have money to get it. I think this is a very excellent recommendation.

Mr. White: I say again, senator, it is a pleasure to preach to the converted.

We recommend that family planning clinics become a regular and recognized part of public health programs. Although family planning has been given legal sanction, general acceptance has been slow. Few clinics have been developed and they are not well known. Family planning services should be developed to give all couples freedom of choice in the number and spacing of their children.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Senator Inman.

Senator Inman: On page 19 of the brief you deal with consumer credit. Of course I have always had the idea that credit was too easy to obtain. I am fully aware there is a great deal of advertising in the public media. People are trapped into buying by it being said that they cannot do without a particular thing: Buy today and pay tomorrow. However, when the bill comes they often haven't the money. As Senator Cook has said, there is no chance of them going into bankruptcy.

What, in your opinion, do you think could be done about this, to confine the extension of credit? In fact, some firms seem to invite credit, it seems to me.

Mr. White: I can only guess at what we can do about it. It is so much a part of our society I think it would be easier to eliminate poverty than to eliminate consumer credit. We suggest bankruptcy be made easier because we hope that if it were easily obtainable it would be a solution.

The only people who can really do much about it are the geniuses of our society, the businessmen. They can do anything, including limiting credit if it costs them money not to do so. That is only an opinion. It would take perhaps all the experts in Canada to come up with a final solution.

I would add this, that a lot of people are tempted into buying things they don't need but, believe me, among the poor there are things that are desperately needed to be bought by them. Unfortunately, so often the purchase is made this most expensive way.

Senator Inman: You refer to the fact that a proportion of the poor are sufficiently disorganized emotionally and culturally to be said to be contributing to their own impoverishment. What do you mean by that? Mismanagement of their affairs? Would education be a help to eliminate that?

Mr. White: This is a very broad statement. We know that there are older folks who are mentally ill, folks who are alcoholics, folks who are, forgive me, just not very bright and who find the world is pretty complicated. There are all sorts of people who are unwell in lots of ways. There are a certain number of people who are grossly ignorant as to the spending of the money. A lot of those people make a lot of mistake. They are the people who give rise to all these old ideas about how the poor waste their money.

We know all about this problem. It is just that what has made them a problem is the matter of so many things lying beyond poverty. An IQ of 75 is not a matter of poverty. A mental breakdown or alcoholism, while poverty sometimes relates to it, adds to it, it is still not a matter really of poverty. Nervous breakdowns are in the same category, I suggest. Anybody who is really disturbed, upset or incompetent is liable to drift into poverty because we decree that if they do not earn a good salary they are going to be poor. Therefore the poverty they are forced to drift into simply makes their situations worse.

Senator Inman: Is there anything we can do to help this situation?

Mr. White: I think this committee has heard a lot of briefs about the various kinds of services. I think there are very few we would not heartily endorse and there are certainly some we would rather like to emulate. However, those are the things you have heard about the way of services. I could not pick any one particular.

Senator Inman: Thank you.

The Chairman: Senator Cook.

Senator Cook: I don't seem to see anything in here about old age allowances, any recommendations about that?

Mr. White: I too notice that, and I hoped somebody would shoot us down about it. It was a matter of disciplining ourselves to deal only with the subject of the working poor in this brief. It is only that which has been responsible.

Mrs. E. Pearl, Chairman, Social Action Committee, Family Service Association of Metropolitan Toronto: I think though that is covered in our statement in the brief where we talk about the institutionalized poor and recommend that government allowances should cover the rising cost of living.

The Chairman: Senator Everett.

Senator Everett: Mr. Chairman, I think I would not like to make comparisons but I would like to say that this is a very excellent brief. I would refer at this point to page 16 of the brief where you state in paragraph 1:

We favour the use of the existing universal program (referring to family allowances) with modifications in the income tax program to recover benefits from families who do not need them.

The reason I mention this is that this keeps recurring. The point is made that the family allowance is tax-free and everybody gets it whether he needs it or not. In fact, when you get family allowances your education is reduced, so that the effect, Mr. Joyce tells me, is that with a gross income of about $12,000 a year there is a negative effect going the other way. In other words, the imposition of tax on the loss of education more than offsets the income from the family allowance.

Mr. White: You mean taxable income or total income?

Senator Everett: I think you use the term "total income" as a general thing. We could have the figures worked out to see exactly what it is. However, there is an offsetting tax on family allowances. It is one of the programs that is unique in that respect.

Mr. White: Yes. I have to admit I cannot follow how would be at that level. However, 20% of $200 is not anything like you get in the family allowance.

Senator Everett: Remember though, you must always calculate those on the marginal rate of tax. So you might be talking about 40%.

Mr. White: I agree with you, but as soon as we have family allowances about three times as large, that would not work. There would have to be more done. I leave that sort of thing to the experts. However, I am glad you are aware of it.

Senator Everett: The point of the matter is that there is an imposition on family allowances and it is a classic redistribution of income. It may not be perfect but it is unique in a sense.

Mr. White: Yes.

Senator Everett: You were talking about the guaranteed annual wage. Have you ever calculated in your mind an endeavour what the savings would be in direct payments if there were a proper guaranteed annual wage paid?

Mrs. Pearl: I'm sorry, I did not catch all that?

Senator Everett: Savings to the treasury in one form or another. In other words, presumably if there were a guaranteed annual wage, the welfare payments would no longer be necessary. That would be a saving. That is, there would be a series of savings down the way. I wondered, since you have been surveying, and since you have been dealing with this question of the working poor, if you had any calculations that indicated the offsetting state of affairs.

Mrs. Pearl: We do not have any economists at our agency to do that sort of thing.

Senator Everett: No, I am not being critical. I just wondered if you had those figures.

Mr. White: The sort of figure would be the sort of savings that have been talked about by the Economic Council as to the costs of poverty in general. If you think of the savings in welfare . . .

The Chairman: Offsetting that, yes.

Mr. White: Well, this is far, far beyond our understanding and knowledge. I can only say though that if a guaranteed annual wage happened to end up at the understood poverty line, there is not going to be much saving, as we suggest in our brief. It has to be a very good and extensively worked out program. What I am hoping is that the savings will all be piled into payments.

Senator Everett: You make a recommendation in your brief that family allowances be increased. Of course the whole tenor of your brief is that working poor poverty is exacerbated by the ties of the family. The health and welfare committee of Metro Toronto yesterday suggested that the requirement for a guaranteed annual wage would be satisfied by a proper family allowance program of the right size and under the right conditions. Is that your belief?

Mr. White: We say that this is a natural step that can be taken now towards a more complete guaranteed annual income program. It is where it is needed most, and that is our citizens who are born poor.

Senator Everett: What they say is this that this could be the guaranteed annual wage. Do you agree?

Mr. White: Honestly, I believe that probably . . .

Senator Everett: In other words, what they are saying is that the program already exists. Instead of going through a whole new legislative process, they say, take the program that exists and make it something that is in effect a guaranteed annual wage.

Mr. White: Amen, except that something could be done as to the people who don't need it.

Senator Everett: Let's look at the alternatives. What do you think of the negative income tax? You create two requirements for your guaranteed annual income other than the amount it should be. You say it should reflect family size because family size is the greatest problem in working poor poverty, and, secondly, that there should be no direct taxation levied against that income. Now, negative income tax, by its very nature, would cover those two requirements, because family size is part of your income tax return. Obviously if it is a negative income tax you cannot have a positive income tax at the same time.

Thirdly, there is no degradation involved in the thing unless you say filing a tax form is a degradation. Some of us might say that, but nevertheless we all have to do it. How do you feel about the negative income tax in comparison to your own recommendation?

Mr. White: I just don't know enough about the negative income tax to speak very sensibly. As I say, I just don't know enough about it. I have not heard how they are going to make sure about it. For example, I have the impression it has something to do with getting money back at the end of the year. Maybe I am wrong. That would not work, in my opinion, because I think you need the money through the year.

Senator Everett: I don't think it is necessarily getting it back at the end of the year. It can be in the form of an estimated payment. It is not like the problems, as I understand it, of people under the family benefits act who have to go and buy their drugs and get $20 a month back whereas the people on welfare get a card. In other words, the payments would be made down the road.

Mr. White: I should say I am really not expert enough in that to answer intelligently. I can only add that we are sort of waiting for all the experts to find something that they can agree on. It looks like we are going to wait quite a while.

Senator Everett: I just have two further points. You mentioned the problem on page 18 of hospital care, the extension of hospital insurance to include nursing home care. Do you have any idea of the costs in Toronto, the cost of hospital care in Toronto on a ward or semi-private basis?

Mr. White: A slight idea. Enough to know that it is high.

Senator Everett: Do you know what the per diem rate would be roughly?

M. White: You better tell us.

Senator Everett: I have no idea. I am asking you.

From the Audience: $75 a day.

From the Audience: $69.50 a day.

Senator Everett: We hear $69.50 a day to $75 a day. That is ward care, I gather. Does anyone have any idea what nursing home care would be?

From the Audience: It starts at $12.50 and goes to $25.

The Chairman: OMSIP I think allows $9.

From the Audience: Yes, $9.

Senator Everett: The government subsidizes to the extent of $9 out of that $29-odd?

From the Audience: One has first to appreciate that there are very few beds available for nursing home care and also it is subject to possible removal in the case of chronic cases.

Senator Everett: So, in any event, the government in its hospital plan could effect a substantial saving by extending its coverage to include nursing home care?

From the Audience: Well, as it is now, anyone with any assets must put them in.

Senator Everett: In Manitoba we have a limit of $600. Anything you have over $600 must go before the provincial government will step in with its contribution.

Senator Cook: This will be in addition to the hospital care?

From the Audience: Yes.

Senator Cook: In other words, when they go from the hospital they are still cared for?

Mr. White: I think it is only fair to say that this is not one of our best-researched recommendations. It arises from experience in finding some people impoverished by having to pay those charges.

Senator Cook: After they are out of hospital are they on their own.

Senator Everett: The fact of the matter is that they don't leave hospital because if they go out of the hospital they are on their own.

Senator Cook: Then they need it.

Senator Everett: It is because of that situation that they stay in the hospital.

The Chairman: Actually, the matter of including the nursing home care was first raised a long time ago and was pretty thoroughly researched before the Senate Committee on Aging in 1966. We made the recommendation at that time that it be included. The provinces of Alberta and British Columbia picked it up. The province of Ontario last year picked it up to some extent. I think Manitoba has also picked it up. However, the cost has become so excessive that politicians are reluctant to go too far.

Senator Everett: My last question. What is the Ontario law on personal bankruptcy now?

The Chairman: Well, there is a provision under the bankruptcy law whereby a province can, by declaring itself under a section—do you remember the famous Manitoba case where it was upset because the regular procedure was not gone through? We had to re-pass the legislation and then the provincial governments had to re-pass legislation providing for personal bankruptcy. So years later we adopted Senator Cook's recommendation. If a province accepts certain provisions of the Dominion bankruptcy act, a person can declare personal bankruptcy.

Senator Everett: Yes, I am aware of that but I wished to know what the law in Ontario was.

Mr. White: I will interpret your question to mean what do I know about it. I know you can have a personal bankruptcy but it costs you, unless you get one of the very rare subsidized jobs, $500. That is just life for the fellow who is well off anyway. It is lifeless for a fellow who is not.

There are some things in the bankruptcy act at present, some sorts of debts you cannot go bankrupt of, that you cannot get removed. I think the credit counselling service produced a statement at one point suggesting a remodelling of the act. But, as far as we are encountering it, we simply see all sorts of people who just cannot ever get out of debt, who are broken up by the continual economic pressures. These are the people who are dragged up to court once a month, that sort of thing, who just cannot ever get out of the race. We know a great many people are in that spot all only a very, very few can get the benefit of a bankruptcy. There are some efforts being made now to get a few out on that basis.

Senator Cook: It is already here, but it is the price of using it, you mean?

Mr. White: Yes, it is the price tag which is attached to that presents the difficulties, senator.

The Chairman: In talking about the working poor who are in the main drawing minimum or less than minimum wages with fairly decent-sized families...

Mr. White: I disagree, sir. With your wording, and would substitute, "who are in the main earning ordinary wages and very often with their wives working to supplement that."

The Chairman: Let us have that again then.

Mr. White: The people in our brief, most of them had wages which were between $100 and $130, the father's basic earnings. They also had other income in many instances. It does not mean too much. It could be about $120 or $125 on an average.

The Chairman: Net in the house?

Mr. White: No, that is gross.

The Chairman: What is net? What is coming in net? He has to pay union dues, unemployment insurance, that sort of thing. How much would it be on a net basis?

Mr. White: Perhaps it would be a net of $100 a week. In this group we studied, he could be making plenty more than that.

Mr. Chairman: If he is making plenty more, it is a comfortable sort of "poor".

Mr. White: It is not a comfortable sort of "poor". If you are in receipt of these amounts of money you are comfortable if you have no kids to support. You are uncomfortable if you have to support three or four kids.

By the way, I want to add at this time that I am not talking or thinking here about the families of one or two. I am talking about the families with four or five kids.

The Chairman: Our average family in this country is less than three.

Mr. White: But that is not the families we are speaking of here. Our kids grow up, most of them, in larger families, and what happens in larger families happens to most of our kids. This is one of the things that D.B.S. statistics do not help much with. I phoned the Dominion Bureau of Statistics and made four or five phone calls in fact, and they were very helpful and tried hard but nobody could tell me now many of our citizens grow up in families with three or more. They gave me ways you could get estimates, ideas, but it is not something that I could get an answer for.

The Chairman: I don't think there is any answer available for it. Those statistics are not kept because they are not important anyway.

Mr. White: That is the problem. The statistics for poverty are blamed important.

The Chairman: No, no. There is no importance in whether you come from a family of three or four or five or six. We are dealing with family units. What difference does that make to the individual?

Mr. White: It makes a difference to the working poor if a child grows up in a family that has had, say, over five or six years four children and is therefore desperately poor. Maybe later on dad and mother are working and they have two cars and they are buying a cottage in Muskoka, but while the kids are being raised it is touch and go whether they break up, whether father cracks up, whether he turns to drink, and certainly it is touch and go as far as the older child getting to high school because he is going out to work in so many cases. He just cannot stay there and sponge off them when they are so damned poor. So that is why I say it does make a difference.

The Chairman: Well, you are talking about an income of $100 a week for what size family?

Mr. White: Well, we spoke in our brief of families of three or more.

The Chairman: That makes a family of five.

Mr. White: Five and up, yes.

The Chairman: The figures usually worked on are four.

Mr. White: I think there has been a crippling tie-up with this family of four bit which has been so useful to statisticians who tried to find out where the poor were over the years.

The Chairman: Oh, no. These are not figures that the statisticians picked up. That figure we find from our own examination, the examination of welfare, that this is the norm. We start with the norm and build on it. So four is considered a normal family. We start from that.

You are saying $100 for five in Toronto? Is that what you are saying?

Mr. White: I am saying that is grossly inadequate.

The Chairman: Yes, that is the point you are making, that $100 for five in Toronto is inadequate. Well, the poverty line is $4,400, the Economic Council's poverty line.

Mr. White: Yes. We feel it is grossly inadequate. Perhaps that is not so for other places, but certainly it is so in Toronto. If anyone thinks these people are not poor in Toronto, I would not agree. I repeat that most of our kids grow up in large families.

Senator Everett: Do you make any reference in your brief to the minimum wage?

Mr. White: Yes, we did, only to say all hail to the minimum wage. We think it would be a great answer and that it should be higher.

Senator Everett: That seems to be in conflict with your point, if the minimum wage does not handle the family situation?

Mr. White: That is that the highest possible minimum wage is not likely to be the answer while the average wage is already inadequate for a family of three or more kids.

Senator Everett: The Economic Council uses the figure of $600 per child, I think, as a figure. I think the welfare in Toronto uses $10 per week for the child, which would be $500 annually. Is that right?

The Chairman: Yes, that is my recollection.

Senator Everett: Do you think $600 per child per annum is a fair differential, or do you find in your studies that it should be in some sort of geometrical progression, in other words, $600 for the first child and more for the second and still more for the third or should it be the other way around, a lot for the first child and then reducing?

Mr. White: I would have to think a while about that before I answered with any degree of intelligence. However, I would like to throw in something about the Economic Council's $600 per child. When they started to look to find out where the poor were, as far as I know, they stopped with the family of five. I would suspect that at least a third of our children are in families that are still larger.

The Chairman: No, they didn't stop with a family of five. You see, they took what was considered the average of three children, then they took two beyond that, and went from there. The $600 doesn't help you any because you have to go beyond the What Senator Everett says is quite right, that it was $600 roughly until you got to very large families.

Senator Everett: You say the majority are over family of five. Is that the majority of Canadians or the people you are studying?

Mr. White: No, I am talking about the families that raise kids. As far as I have been able to get it from D.B.S., something like two-thirds of children, or even more, grow up in families that happen to raise more kids. If they are spaced five years apart it might not make too much difference economically, but most of them are spaced closer. It matters quite a bit to the kids when there are the five of them as to what it is like at that time, whether the family breaks up, whether the man cracks up in one way or another because they are under the gun poverty-wise.

The Chairman: Have you then done any study at all about the female head of family and the children? The statistics are that there are about 100,000 of those in Canada. You know who they are and what I am referring to?

Mr. White: Yes.

The Chairman: Perhaps there are half a million children of all ages involved. What are your views on that?

Mr. White: I think that the ones who are working are in the position of being some of the worst off among the working poor. We know the Economic Council said 87% of the poor had a male head of the family. We didn't touch on that group—again because we thought they had been well talked about and we wanted to talk about the general problem. Our views are that they particularly need help in raising their children if they are working, more help. They are worse off than many working poor men.

The Chairman: Only 35% of them are working.

Mr. White: The rest of them are subject to institutionalized poverty.

The Chairman: I thought maybe you had some idea how those children particularly could receive attention, lacking a father, lacking a home and lacking the things that are normal or that are more normal.

Mrs. Pearl: Are we talking about services to the family?

The Chairman: No. How do we keep those children in school? How do we get them an education? What do we have to do? Do we treat them . . .

Mrs. Pearl: When there is more money in the home, these things are more available.

The Chairman: If you tripled family allowances, say, to $18, would that be the answer?

Mr. White: That would be the beginning of the answer.

Mrs. Pearl: With a single mother on welfare, the family allowance now is sometimes the difference between them eating a half decent meal and not eating a half decent meal. I think it should be something more.

The Chairman: If there are no more questions, may I, on behalf of the committee, thank Mr. White, Mrs. Pearl and Mr. Watson for presenting a most excellent brief and one that has real content and that is helpful in presenting one particular problem in a very understanding manner.

The committee adjourned.

AFTERNOON SESSION

Toronto, Wednesday, March 11, 1970

The Special Senate Committee on Poverty (Sub-committee "A") met this day at 2.00 o'clock p.m. at St. Lawrence Hall, Toronto, Ontario.

Senator David A. Croll (Chairman) in the Chair.

The Chairman: I call the meeting to order. We have first to apologize to the gentlemen here for our lateness, but I indicated to them that we had a meeting with our other committee elsewhere and they kept us a little longer than normal.

On my right is Mr. Ian McDougall and sitting next to him is Larry Taman. Both of them are law students at the present time. I am sure you have all read the brief. It is an excellent brief. It will appeal particularly to the four lawyers sitting over there on my left and myself. I have asked Mr. McDougall to make a preliminary statement, and perhaps Mr. Taman will also have something to say. Then they will subject themselves to questioning.

Mr. Ian Alexander McDougall, Community and Legal Aid Services Program, Osgoode Hall Law School: Mr. Chairman, honourable senators, the precept of legal equality has been given so much lip service it has become an obscure platitude accepted by all, but in reality it remains an infinite objective forbidding the common propensity in social and economic spheres. Rural and urban poverty do much to impair equal resources for all citizens. Perhaps nowhere is this assertion better illustrated than in recent criticisms of legal aid programs in the United States, Great Britain and Canada.

One such report, the working papers for the 1965 Conference on Law and Poverty enumerated four factors impeding efforts to provide legal assistance to the poor. Those were as follows:

1. The failure of the indigent to characterize a program as legal in context.

2. The low visibility of existing legal aid services.
3. The remoteness of the lawyer and his services.
4. Fear of reprisal.

On the basis of these factors it is apparent that one of the pre-conditions to a viable legal aid scheme aimed at promoting legal equality to a reality status must be to accurately convince indigents that remedies are often available. The United Kingdom report suggested five areas where the law can be of use in alleviating poverty. These were:

1. Criminal representation.
2. Family legal counselling and representation.
3. Landlord and tenant relations, personal injury and damage actions in tort, and consumer protection.
4. Property law including estate planning.

Within each category it is apparent that existing legal aid measures are of varying degrees of efficiency. For example, in the criminal area the refusal to grant bail to anything but financial security obviously disadvantages the indigent defendant. It may also take a toll upon his dependents. It may force them on the welfare reliance as a result. Further, the Ontario report of the Joint Committee on Legal Aid implies that such confinement may only serve to encourage uninformed pleas of guilty and that may undermine the effectiveness of the criminal process.

Regarding family assistance, some commentators have been tempted to assert that the preponderant need problems facing the poor are matrimonial and otherwise the ills facing the poor are psychological and economic and quite beyond the scope of the law. Such a conclusion is naive. It takes no account of here the legal ramifications of the problem are hard to avoid, the most unknown, and the law has a corner on most viable solutions. The indigent is therefore forced into legal confrontation despite possible distrust of the law.

This is hardly the case in areas such as consumer law, landlord and tenant and welfare administration. The legal recourse in such areas is a rare alternative to enduring the apparent power of the vendor, creditor, or landlord, or welfare bureaucrat.

As respects to some of those areas the availability of legal expertise is unknown to most indigents. The existing legal aid is biased in favour of the litigant. In this area the service in a jurisdiction such as Ontario is impressive. The legal equality raises more than mere representation at the remedial level. Higher income groups seek out consultation on a preventive basis perhaps more often than the welfare recipient.

We suggest on the basis of the foregoing that the mere fact of a legal aid system such as Ontario is being demonstratively, statistically successful, is no proof of it having satisfied the legal needs of the indigent.

It is suggested that the jurisdiction of legal aid must be considerably extended if it is to service the objective of legal equality. Basically, it must take on a more active characterization or, to put it another way, generate jurisdiction. In this regard perhaps six recommendations might be made for an improved scheme.

1. The creation of community legal aid centres.
2. Active efforts to probe the legal fields of the poor, employing such devices as educational advertising campaigns as to the legal rights in those areas discussed above.
3. A broad range of service offerings.
4. Integration with existing community services where possible.
5. Evening services.
6. Eventual adaptation of statutory provisions extending the duties of a legal aid program.

While there are hosts of social and professional difficulties associated with the above suggestions, not the least of which concerns professional reaction, buying of labour, funding and wage prices, it would be absurd to delay acting upon an expanded scheme simply for the difficulties involved. Legal equality implies democratization of justice which is probably fundamental to the survival of the system of law in the long run.

In this context costs are perhaps no criteria for procrastination.

Thank you very much.

Mr. Larry Taman, Chairman of Community and Legal Aid Services Program, Osgoode Hall Law School: I would just like to say a few words about what we have been doing in the community in the Legal Aid Services Program at Osgoode Hall, mostly for the purpose of relating to you that the remarks that Ian has made in his brief remarks have come from convictions which have been forced upon us in our practice, in our legal aid work. We have now eight different student legal aid projects involving something like 150 of the 600 law students at Osgoode Hall. Last year we handled about 500 cases as Ian mentions in the full brief. Next year, this coming year, this concluding year, we will probably have handled about half again that many, and the problems that Ian has alluded to are the problems that we have seen all the time in our work, the problems of people who haven't realized they have had a legal problem until it was too late, who have been unable to get help and had to rely on students, which is perhaps not that great a compliment to the profession of legal services in the province. And for every five or seven hundred cases we have, one can only wonder how many have gone unhandled, and the real difficulty in my view, and I think in Ian's view in the brief, is that historically the legal aid plan has never really been concerned to adopt an active stand towards the solution of the legal problems of the poor. There has always been the sort of motto of legal aid which would say, "We try to put the poor person in the same position as the middle class person who could afford services." And yet the realities that a goal like that would force upon you if you were really sincerely, or if you were really actively pursuing it, never really seem to have put themselves upon the organized legal aid program.

If you were trying to make, for example, lawyers equally as available to the poor, especially in civil matters, as to the better-off people, then it would be obvious that you might have to compensate for certain kinds of inhibitions that the poor have. You might have to make it easier for them to get there in terms of simple transportation. You might have to overcome the psychological factors that Ian has alluded to, the distrust people have of lawyers and so forth. And, more than that, I think what you would have to do ultimately is to look at what it is that lawyers do for a community.

Those of you who are lawyers and those of us who are students look at the Canadian Income Tax Act and you see thousands and thousands of cases where points in dispute in that Act have been clarified by the courts and the Tax Appeal Board. If you look at the General Welfare and Assistance Act, there is not a single case that has ever been litigated under that Act. If you look at the Family Benefits Act and all its predecessor Acts which have been in existence since before the second war, you will see that until a few months ago there was not a single case litigated under that Act. And, surely, we are not to conclude from that that there were no problems in interpretation. Surely what we are to conclude is that for the poor whose lives are substantially ruled by people who have control over the funds, whose lives are ruled much more by litigations of various sorts than any of ours, those people have never had an opportunity to have their rights interpreted and have their rights litigated, and it seems to us that it would be a worthwhile objective for a legal aid man to take a more active stand, to move into communities, to seek out problems and to seek out people with the problems, and to attempt to clarify the legal position of the poor vis-a-vis all the laws and agencies and institutions that affect their lives in exactly the same way that the commercial lawyer has done for the middle class community with the laws that affect his life.

Thank you.

The Chariman: Senator Everett, you have a very keen interest in this subject.

Senator Everett: Can you tell us just in a few words what the program of Ontario Legal Aid is in Ontario now?

Mr. Taman: The Legal Aid Act of 1966 divided the province into 46 areas and districts, provided for provincial area director of legal aid who is to appoint an area director for each of the 46 areas. The area director in turn has the responsibility of gathering together two panels, criminal panel and a civil panel, and these are the people who are willing to take legal aid cases and, of course, some people are on both panels in an area. I believe there are about 3,000-odd lawyers on the York County panel.

The way the system works is that you have to distinguish rather carefully between the two sides, the criminal and the civil. On the criminal side they have what are known as duty counsel. The duty counsel work in the jails in the morning, and in the afternoons they work in the courtroom. So that in a county like York County where the system is working well, it would be normal for every person who is in jail to be advised before he makes his initial court appearance, his remand appearance, to be advised that he is entitled to legal aid, so that normally what would happen would be that the duty counsel would tell them this. If the case was a complex one, the duty counsel would ask for a remand and then a certificate would be issued, assuming the person could get the financial, what amounts to a means test. And he could seek the lawyer of his choice.

In many cases the duty counsel would simply plead for the accused man right in the courtroom and, as you can imagine, that does create certain problems in the Magistrates' Courts in City Hall where they are prosecuting many, many cases a day. The duty counsel will tend to be rather harried.

On the civil side it is required that the person recognize that his problem is one that might admit of a legal solution. If he does he goes to the office and he is interviewed by an interviewing lawyer. The interviewing lawyer makes a determination based on Sections 12, 13 and 14 of the Act as to whether or not the problem is one for which a legal aid certificate ought to be issued. If it is, the person is then interviewed by a member of the Family Benefits Department, Social and Family Welfare Department of Ontario, who makes what amounts to a means test. And, assuming that a person has qualified both of those tests, then he is issued a certificate and is entitled to go out and take the lawyer of his choice, any lawyer that will take his case that is on the panel, and that lawyer is paid at a rate which amounts to approximately 75 per cent of tariff.

Senator Everett: You say a form of means test. Would you give us more detail on that?

Mr. Taman: I wish I could. Unfortunately, the Act is not specific on the point. The regulations to the Act are even less specific. Let me see if I can just find the section. I am afraid I can't find it at the moment, senator.

Senator Everett: Have you any idea of the sort of test that is supplied?

Mr. Taman: Well, it appears that certainly the value, the amount of assets which would permit a person to be granted a certificate will fluctuate according to the cost of the proposed action. So that people with quite large means, relatively, that is to say five or six thousand dollars, might well get certificates, for example, for a long criminal trial. On the other hand, very poor people frequently can't get certificates for more minor things which are, in fact, more serious to them. I really can't put a figure on that. As I say, it is interesting to look at the Act and to compare Sections 12 and 13 of the Act. Section 12 is the section which is mandatory, in the sense that assuming a person qualifies financially, the area director has no choice but to issue a certificate. Section 13 is a discretionary certificate which are legal matters for which the area director may, in his discretion, issue a certificate, assuming the client qualifies.

Senator Everett: What sort of matter are they?

Mr. Taman: Well, it is interesting in my judgment anyway, the discretionary ones are mainly on the civil side which would be the common problems of the poor.

Senator Everett: Do you have to have a cause of action before you can operate under the Act?

Mr. Taman: No, there is also provision for advice under the Act, but that is discretionary.

Senator Everett: Yes.

Mr. Taman: Any summary conviction is discretionary, any proceeding in a Juvenile or Family Court, in a Division Court, which is a small civil claims court, under $400 in Ontario, is discretionary, before a quasi or judicial board such as the Ontario Housing Board, that is discretionary. A bankruptcy is discretionary. A contempt of court is discretionary. The drawing of legal documents, negotiating settlement or giving of legal advice is all discretionary.

Senator Everett: Why, in your judgment, are those discretionary?

Mr. Taman: Well, my judgment is that the people who have been responsible for the formulation of the Act, while they have been sincere in their desires, have not fully understood the nature of the legal problems that the poor face. Indeed, again, to go back to another point, the Act has not adopted an active stance towards those sort of problems. When we have a client, for example, who comes into our office claiming to have been done out of six weeks' wages by a company in the city, wages amount to $360 for six weeks, the area director has chosen not to grant certificate because it is a division court matter. Well, that is a rather serious matter. It would appear to me. When we do work for a tenants' association that wants, for example, to prepare to submit to the Ontario Housing Corporation a counter-lease, the Ontario Housing Corporation had been coming out with a new lease pursuant to the new Landlord and Tenant Act. Well, when this tenants' association wants to be able to criticize that lease, to analyze its provisions and to make determinations as to whether it is a good lease, it is not possible for them to get a legal aid certificate to get a lawyer to assist them with that work.

Senator Everett: That is excluded?

Mr. Taman: It is provided for, I suppose, under discretionary item on drawing documents.

Senator Everett: What items are excluded from the operation?

Mr. Taman: There is very little that is actually excluded.

Senator Everett: Is divorce excluded?

Mr. Taman: No, divorce is not excluded. Divorce is also discretionary. A certificate shall not be issued to a person in proceedings wholly or partly in respect of defamation, breach of promise of marriage, etc., in realtor actions or in proceedings relating to any election. So that when the mandatory and discretionary sections are taken together they cover most of the conceivable legal actions, the difficult problem being that the ones that concern the poor or largely especially on the civil side, are all discretionary to the area director.

Senator Fergusson: What do you mean by discretionary?

Mr. Taman: Well, it would mean that he is not required by law to issue a certificate.

Senator Fergusson: Yes. That is what I thought it meant, but he can make his own decision?

Mr. Taman: Right.

Senator Everett: Is there any appeal from his decision?

Mr. Taman: Yes, there is an appeal to what is called the Area Committee, and there are statistics in the percent report of the number of those appealed. I believe the appeal may be to the Provincial Director, Andrew Lawson. And there are statistics in the recent report as to the success ratio of those.

Senator Everett: Who then takes those appeals?

Mr. Taman: Well, you can't get counsel to take them. You take them yourself. If you have been refused the office will give you a form which you can use.

Senator Everett: But you are not represented by counsel during the appeal?

Mr. Taman: No, not as far as I know.

The Chairman: What is the percentage of success?

Mr. Taman: Well, I just read the report the other day and I am afraid I can't remember; about fifty per cent, I would think.

Senator Everett: Now, let's deal for a moment with the Goodie Hall students and their legal aid program. Could you enlarge on that for a moment?

Mr. Taman: Well, there are a number of separate projects which are more or less federated in a body called the Community and Legal Aid Services Program. The largest in terms of clientele and in terms of student involvement is called the Student Defenders, and that organization takes referrals from the York County Legal Aid Office. So if an applicant qualifies financially but the matter is one in which the Area Director has chosen not to exercise his discretion and as the matter is one in which a student could act, then he would refer that case to our office, either to our office or to the office of the U. of T. which has a separate program.

Senator Everett: What matters can students act in? Are we talking about criminal here?

Mr. Taman: Yes, summary convictions on the criminal side, division court matters on the civil side. A large part of work being negotiation in particular projects.

Senator Everett: What do you feel about situations under which the present Law Society decides the students cannot act?

Mr. Taman: Can or cannot?

Senator Everett: Cannot.

Mr. Taman: Well, my frank feeling is that it would certainly be preferable if there were lawyers available to act. In situations where there are not lawyers available to act, then it is my personal opinion, but one that the profession at large might not share, that it might be preferable to have students act than to have no one act. For example, we are involved in a slight problem right now. Under the new Landlord and Tenant Act which requires a County Court motion in certain proceedings under the new Act, there is a question as to whether or not students are permitted to make such a motion.

Senator Cook: How senior are the students who are permitted to act?

Mr. Taman: Under this particular program they are all third year students, senator. In some of the other programs, however, we have students all the way through law school. We have a project called the Hostel Project which works at a home for temporary shelter for homeless women and children; working in legal problems there and taking referrals from the Welfare Board. We have something called the Y.M.C.A. Project which works with juveniles. We have a program called Project Ossington, which works with youngsters with drug problems. We have a project in the school in the Christie Pits which is working with the immigrant community that lives in that area. We have a project at Lawrence Heights, and I believe some of the senators were there last evening, which is a public housing development. We are acting in some capacity for a number of different tenants' associations about the city, tenants' associations in public housing developments.

Senator Everett: In these community legal aid services, almost what you are talking about is a community development project. How would you fund them? How would you operate if you were making the laws?

Mr. Taman: If I were making the laws I think I would fund them in much the same ways as the Office of Economic Opportunity has funded analogous offices in the United States. I would fund them with federal money which I would channel in through a provincial director who would run the program in the various cities in the province. The rejoinder that is made in the profession frequently is to say, well, you know, if you do that then what you have done is you have destroyed the independence of the lawyer, the advocate who is supposed to be working against the government is now an employee of the government. How can he possibly maintain his independence? Well, in my opinion, that is a fundamentally specious argument. I have never heard one say the same thing about judges, for example. I would imagine if one did he would be in contempt of some sort. No one seems to feel there is a problem existing there. And I am uncertain as to why the notion of hiring full-time lawyers to work with people in the community is such an obnoxious one. It has certainly worked extraordinarily well in much of the neighbourhood law office program under the Office of Economic Opportunity. The cases they have taken and fundamental changes they have made in the legal structure have been phenomenal all across the United States. Our legal aid plan doesn't have anything comparable to speak for its success in terms of changing the legal position of the poor.

Senator Everett: Do you think you could get lawyers to work in that type of an operation in Canada?

Mr. Taman: Yes, I think you could. There may have been a time when it would have been more difficult. Certainly now though, especially among the younger members of the profession, but not exclusively, there are people who would willingly do that sort of work and who would do it well, and I think it is a question, you know, obviously if you are looking for men who are, say, not completely junior but maybe men with five or six years of practice. If you are going to offer them $5,500 to do the job, well, you may well sort of get the dregs of the profession, which is what the profession would frequently respond to a suggestion like this. But if you are willing to pay people and to recruit people and to look honestly for the best possible people in the same way you would in any other recruitment program, I think there are definitely people around who would do that sort of work.

Senator Everett: Of the 800 students at Osgoode, you say 150 are involved in the legal aid program. Why are the 650 not involved?

Mr. Taman: Well, it is about 150 out of 600.

Senator Everett: I am sorry. I got your figures wrong.

Mr. Taman: The others are uninvolved for a variety of reasons. First of all, there is a long waiting list of people who want to get into the project and our difficulty now is that there are so many projects and so many students that the problem of supervision is getting to the point where it is nearly insurmountable as an entirely student-run organization. In other words, it is getting to the point where it requires full-time administration. So one of the big reasons is that we couldn't handle the program sufficiently expanded to handle everyone who would be interested in it, but I would venture that half of the people in the law school would be interested if the programs were available. As to the other half, there would be a large number who just wouldn't be interested, who aren't interested in doing that kind of work. There are many who do other kinds of work outside, community centres and things of that sort, and have their own work.

Senator Cook: You say the problem of supervision. Who does the supervision?

Mr. Taman: The way our program works is that from all we have an extensive orientation at the very beginning of the program so students are aware as to what kind of cases they are required to send to legal aid, what kind they have jurisdiction to handle, et cetera. And then every student is required to submit a file of the case as soon as he has initially interviewed the clients, and those clients, those files all come across my desk. If there is a problem with the case, if the case is complex or difficult in some way, or if the student doesn't appear to be handling it properly, then we have a panel of faculty advisers to whom the student would be sent to clarify the difficulty.

Senator Everett: I understand in the O.E.O. experiment that a lot of offices tended to get into the don't quite know how to describe it, but into that area of law that makes new law. In other words, that stake out legal rights of the disadvantaged citizen. It is pretty exciting stuff, and in many cases they have created decisions that really affect the position of the poor. However, that is so exciting that it tends to pull them away from the original concept which was to service the poor. Now, I am not making a comparison here. One is as important as the other and the form may be more important than the other, to create the body of law within which the poor can survive and improve themselves. But have you given any thought as to how you answer that dichotomy because I understand that it really is tending to in a sense wreck, or you want to look at it the other way, tending to make the O.E.O. program successful, depending on how you want to look at it.

Mr. McDougall: I shouldn't really think there would be any conflict in that, necessarily. Law reform is short-cut for legal aid. I think that was basically what was advocated in this brief, that by changing the law you might make assistance of the poor a lot more efficient. So I think perhaps it is natural for anyone who gets exposed to ponds of poverty to move into the area of law reform as opposed to helping directly with the problems as they exist.

Senator Everett: I think that is right. The trouble with it is that for the available manpower and the time that is taken in law reform, that there isn't the time available or the manpower available to deal with the initial problem.

Mr. McDougall: Well, senator, I think as matters stand now there isn't a manpower—you referred to earlier. I think even with a sign of support lawyers that we never have enough to fill the actual demand of legal services. So I think then the question of law reform is again trying to perhaps reduce the demand.

Mr. Taman: Take, for example, senator, the so-called example of the man in the house rule that Ian alludes to in the back of the brief and which is something that you probably heard of elsewhere. But which seems to be a general practice on the part of welfare agencies, to cut off welfare any woman who is receiving welfare as a single woman and is discovered to have a man living in the house. And, you know, the basis, the length of duration is a subject of some dispute. Certainly many of the women will tell you that the man was there for a short stay and the welfare people will say they don't step in unless the man appears to be a permanent resident. Well, there is no basis in the act for an exclusion of that sort. It is an interpretation which has been made by the welfare people. They are saying the Act says a single woman. If there is a man in the house, regardless of whether or not they know that he is contributing to her support, she is no longer single. Well, the result of that interpretation has probably been 75 cases that have come in to our office in the two years I have been in the program. Well, you know, you can act on those cases sort of individually and the temptation becomes very large in the problem you are alluding to. It also at some point becomes very intractable to say, well, why don't we see what we can do by appealing a decision of this court and see if the courts are willing to uphold this interpretation, and in that way cut off that whole body of work which otherwise you would have to deal with on a case by case basis. So that it is a difficult balancing problem.

Senator Everett: In that case, why haven't you appealed?

Mr. Taman: Because we don't have the legal resources to do it and we are not entitled as students to do it. But there has been a lot of agitation in the student legal aid community across the province and it was just done last month by Professor Christie who teaches at Queen's and at Osgoode, and my recollection was that he lost.

The Chairman: Of course, it is a natural question, but I think at the defence, the normal position that the Department takes is that there is undeclared income. They do it on that basis rather than on a normal basis. That is the basis for their doing it.

Mr. Taman: In response to that, though, Senator Gill, the same problem has been litigated in the Supreme Court.

The Chairman: In the United States?

Mr. Taman: In the United States in a case called The United States v. King, and the difficulty there is that if the welfare people were to make a determination as to whether or not such contributory earnings actually existed, that would be one thing, and in that instance might be supportable. Also, certainly what the Supreme Court said in the King case—they said, look, the family, the comparable Act, the Aid to Dependent Children Act, was designed to protect children and regardless of whether or not this woman is entitled either (a) to receive contributory earnings, or (b) to a private life of her own, that has little to do with the dependents, and it seems to me quite likely that this same sort of argument has a great deal of moral sway here.

The Chairman: What were the grounds for refusal here? I haven't seen the judgment.

Mr. Taman: The judgment isn't published yet so I haven't seen it either.

Senator Everett: What year are you both in?

Mr. Taman: Second. We are both in second.

Senator Everett: It is now a four-year course?

Mr. Taman: Three, with a year of articling and six months bar admission.

Senator Everett: Six months bar admission. Do either of you intend to carry on in the line that is outlined in this brief?

Mr. McDougall: I might, sir.

Mr. Taman: I do. The problem is whether or not the opportunities will exist. Assuming that I were so unfortunate as to have to support myself and assuming my wife becomes reluctant to support me after the five or six years and I had to work for a living, there would be no place where I could get a job doing this kind of work, and there would be no place in Ontario where I could get funds to do this sort of work. So it would be extremely difficult. I suppose at one time you might have fallen back on something like the Company of Young Canadians, but that doesn't seem to be a viable alternative at this point in time.

Senator Everett: If such a program is available do you intend to become part of it?

Mr. Taman: Certainly. And there are many, many people who graduated from law school all over this province who have been very, very upset at the fact that no opportunity has existed to do this kind of work. Certainly in the United States there has been, you know, the statistics are really astonishing and the change in trends at the best law schools, where initially there was a tremendous exodus to Wall Street, and now there is a comparable exodus to the community law offices of Economic Opportunity and other offices dealing with these problems. The best students, not the worst students who can't get employment elsewhere, but the best students of the law schools in the United States are doing this kind of work, and I would submit that if the same opportunities were available here that the same sort of exodus would take place.

Senator Everett: At what sort of salary?

Mr. Taman: Well, I would expect it would make sense to make the salary competitive, to make it a comparable salary. There may well be a large number of people who, given enough money to support themselves, would do the work. I am not sure, however, if I would be satisfied with that kind of support to the program. If you accept the position that legal representation is a correlative right of citizenship, a right that one is entitled to as a citizen of the country, then it doesn't seem to make a good deal of sense to me to say a group of junior barristers should be expected to subsidize the financing of that right.

Senator Everett: No, but it does tend to expose the amount of sacrifice that a man is prepared to make to help his fellowman, doesn't it?

Mr. Taman: I would argue, Senator Everett, that the notion of sacrifice is something that has been inherent in legal aid, at least in this province, since the very beginning. It has been said that the legal profession must sacrifice to care for the problems of the indigent, and that when the first Act was passed in 1951 and there was no remuneration, there was a great deal of enthusiasm about this sacrifice. As time passed, the enthusiasm waned and so did the involvement of the profession in the voluntary plan. It seems to me that, you know, I am not sure what the smallest amount of money a man is willing to work for is any indication of his conviction, about the quality and about the importance of his work. I think that in any other case if the government recognizes the need to provide for a service, I mean, certainly Piggot Construction doesn't feel any great need to sacrifice in order to build roads for the government of Ontario, and I don't see why the legal profession shouldn't feel the same way. I mean, there are very large numbers of people who, given any opportunity, would do the work. There are certainly people who have independent means who would do it for nothing.

Senator Cook: Medicare doesn't employ any sacrifice.

Mr. Taman: I beg your pardon?

Senator Cook: Medicare doesn't provide any sacrifice, so why should the legal aid?

Mr. Taman: Agreed. I think the really great problem when salaries become non-competitive is that many times the best people are people who, not because of greed, but for other kinds of reasons, are people who simply cannot afford to do the work.

Senator Cook: They have a bent that way sometimes.

Mr. Taman: Yes. A law student may well have been in university nine and a half years by the time he's through law school. Well, a fellow can build up a big student loan in nine and a half years and many students in law school are older fellows with wives and three or four children, and the problem is not that you pay people competitively the problem is not that you will get people who aren't concerned with the work, but rather you will lose all the people who would be the best people for the work because of other kinds of commitments that they have.

Senator Everett: I think your point is well made. I don't agree that if that commitment is there that the necessarily tends to follow.

Mr. Taman: Right. And I say in many cases that won't.

Senator Everett: In fact, the legal aid system can provide legal aid on a basis of paying the full way, the sort of thing you are talking about, the sort of community legal aid centre, will only get off the ground if, indeed, intelligent self-sacrificing lawyers are prepared to make it get off the ground. To be pragmatic, I don't think it is going to happen any other way.

Mr. Taman: Well, I agree.

Senator Everett: If those sort of lawyers exist, then suggest to you you have got to hope that that may happen.

Mr. Taman: Right.

Senator Everett: If they don't, then I think it will be a failure of the profession to provide that service more than the failure of the government to insist on it, although, indeed, the government should insist on it.

Mr. Taman: Well, although, when you start talking about lawyers and government, you are not—the seems to be a great deal of personal overlap between the two.

Senator Everett: You may come to it yourself.

Mr. Taman: Who knows what horrible things befall a man?

The Chairman: Senator Fergusson?

Senator Fergusson: I find this very interesting, but on page 5 and 6 you refer to the summary of the general areas of public interest that can directly be serviced by such a legal system including, among some other things, family law. I presume this would include divorce. And Senator Everett mentioned divorce, but I would like to know a little more about it. Now, divorce actions are not interesting for anybody to do, I well know, having sat for 15 years on the Divorce Committee of the Senate. And I am sure no one would want to take it on because it was an interesting project. And apparently from what you said to Senator Everett it is discretionary whether such a case would be accepted. Is this right?

The Chairman: Yes, it is.

Senator Fergusson: Well, then, I would like to know in Ontario, people who are on welfare or amongst the working poor, apply, are they generally accepted applicants for legal aid? Are there many divorce cases in which legal aid provides the assistance that these people need?

Mr. McDougall: I am afraid I don't know, I don't think that statistic is broken down, but it is in the legal aid report.

Senator Fergusson: The reason I ask is that in some provinces, at least one province we were in, some people said they couldn't get legal aid. Some people said it wasn't possible for people on welfare to secure legal aid for a divorce, and I would like to know. Apparently you can get it. It is discretionary, but I wonder if the discretion is exercised against such cases.

Mr. Taman: The statistics say in the province 60 per cent of the civil matters that were handled were divorces, so that is a very large number of cases, and it appears that a very large percentage of the applicants are accepted, although, you know, many times I have heard people on welfare, especially women on welfare in Ontario, complain about the difficulties in getting a certificate for a divorce.

Senator Fergusson: I think Mr. McDougall has found what I have been trying to find, because I read that on the reference you had, but I couldn't find it just now when I was looking for it.

Mr. McDougall: For the year ending 1969 there were 1,43 divorces.

Senator Fergusson: What page is it on?

The Chairman: This is separate.

Senator Fergusson: Oh, I thought you read some reference to that in your brief.

Mr. McDougall: I don't think so.

Senator Fergusson: I have been looking through it trying to find it.

Mr. Taman: Senator, there is a report, the 1969 report of the Law Society to the Attorney General, which we probably should have included in the appendix, but such a report exists and I am sure you could easily get copies.

The Chairman: I don't know whether they indicated the number of divorce cases that were handled by legal aid. It just seems to me that they didn't break it down.

Mr. Taman: It was perhaps so. I don't recall specifically.

Senator Fergusson: If you say 60 per cent of the civil cases, that is quite a large percentage. Apparently they are accepted.

The Chairman: Oh, he just said 60 per cent of the civil cases were divorce.

Mr. McDougall: No, I didn't.

Senator Fergusson: What did he say?

Mr. McDougall: I think the confusion lies, I mentioned in the report that in the United Kingdom they had experienced that it was 60 per cent, and the argument was that this was unrepresentative. Surely all their problems can't be divorce. They must have others, and perhaps the high incidence of divorce applications lies in the fact that this is one area where they could easily characterize the problem as a legal one and there are perhaps many others that they can't characterize as legal.

Senator Fergusson: There was just one other question I would like to ask. Are there other student legal aid organizations throughout Canada at other law schools?

Mr. McDougall: There are quite a number of them, yes.

Senator Everett: Have you discussed this brief with the Law Society of Upper Canada?

Mr. McDougall: No, I have not.

Senator Everett: Why don't you?

Mr. McDougall: Well, I understand they have just recently formed a legal aid committee to study it, and I think there may be some opportunity then, when they start acting.

Senator Everett: If there is no opportunity do you propose to bring it to their attention and go and discuss it with the Benchers?

Mr. McDougall: I think it may have been brought to their attention already.

The Chairman: These people are acting as the Company of Young Canadians as far as the Bar Association is concerned, activists. It has come to their attention.

Senator Everett: I tried to give them a little hand on the way.

The Chairman: That is one of the reasons we brought them here, to try.

Senator Everett: They won't be afraid to get in touch with the Society and demand a hearing on this.

Mr. Taman: I think the legal aid people are beginning to become aware of some of the problems. I mean, for example in York County, which is very large, I don't know how large it would be in square miles but I guess 40 miles in any direction. There is only one office and the office is on Richmond Street near the corner of Richmond and Yonge Streets. So that if you live in Sutton and you have just been cut off welfare you might have a hard time getting down to the corner of Richmond and Yonge Streets.

The Chairman: Senator Inman.

Senator Inman: I just have one question. I didn't think Senator Fergusson was quite true. Are you through?

Senator Fergusson: Yes.

Senator Inman: Well, on page 5 at the top you say, the low visibility of legal aid services as noted in a U.S. survey which indicated that the preponderate number of indigents were unaware of legal aid, and that fewer still aware of how to obtain it. And it goes on from there. I would like to ask the witnesses how do you think the poor could be made aware of this aid in the provinces? Now, Ontario does make them aware, but the other provinces, by what means could they become aware of this aid?

Mr. McDougall: Well, I think even in Ontario there are terrific deficiencies. I think one of the best ways of making it more visible would be through a community legal aid office, regionally oriented offices. I think the staff of this office would then have an opportunity to interact with the community. One of the common experiences from most of our projects has been an appalling sort of lack of knowledge about existing legal aid matters and I am sure this is true in other provinces. Mass advertising might be another technique. Holding community seminars might be another. Just anything that makes an indigent think about law and think how the law might help him.

Mr. Taman: Senator, there was a study that was done in New Haven, Connecticut, an attitude study which asked people to pick words to describe the view of lawyers and the words sort of went from saint at one end to shyster at the other, and sad for those of us in the profession, but the shyster one by quite a long shot.

I heard on the news last night that a similar study was done in Quebec and some 65 or 70 per cent of the senator, had very low opinions of lawyers. So, when you have that kind of a gap to overcome it is pretty obvious that you can't just sit in your Richmond Street office and expect people to start coming down to you with their problems. You have got a lot of work to do to overcome, you know, mistrust that has been built up over many, many years.

The Chairman: What legal aid provisions are there in the other provinces outside of Ontario?

Mr. Taman: I really wouldn't like to answer that question, senator. I am not familiar with the statutes.

The Chairman: You wouldn't like to answer because you don't know the answer or because it is embarrassing?

Mr. Taman: No, it is because I don't know.

The Chairman: I would be embarrassing for the other Provinces.

Senator Fergusson: One other thing I would like to ask, I am wondering if people who go into the business are going to change their office hours because so many people that need their help can't come during regular office hours?

Mr. Taman: I mean, just think of the problems of poor person. I am sure you have heard many, many times in your trip the problems that people from severely disadvantaged backgrounds have, which to me might seem as simple as going to the downtown court and going to an office. Imagine what it must be like for a man in that position to have to go down to Richmond Street between the hours of 9.30 to 4.00 between Monday and Friday.

Senator Cook: We might have to invent a system of house calls.

Mr. Taman: That is not entirely out of the question. Certainly it seems to me if you are going to say that poor people should have the same kind of legal aid that rich people have, you have to have lawyers who are willing to do preventative law in exactly the same way a doctor would do it. And a doctor, you know, nobody in the Ontario Department of Health would think if putting a clinic down on Richmond Street and saying all the people who can't afford doctors are free to go down there between 9.00 and 4.30 on Monday or Friday. It makes just about as much sense.

I was going to say about that, senator, that that was one of the things that the Toronto committee is looking at, the possibility of opening up branch offices in Scarborough. So that is a problem that they are aware of and I believe plan to deal with.

Senator Inman: Could it be done through the police, for instance? When they make an arrest or if they have to come in contact with anybody who is up against the law, would it be feasible for a policeman to say, "Now, you can get legal aid or you should get legal aid before you commit yourself in any way"?"

Mr. Taman: In my opinion, senator, the Ontario system works quite well on that side. If an individual is picked up by the police overnight he would be contacted by the duty counsel before the Court convenes the next morning, would be advised of this right to counsel and would be defended by duty counsel in some cases, or in other cases duty counsel would make a request for a lawyer for him so that he could obtain the lawyer of his choice. So that on that side in the kind of matters that concern the police and the criminal justice system, I think it is difficult to argue with the way the system runs. In theory it runs well.

The Chairman: There are about 7,000 lawyers in York County here, 3,000 of whom are on the list, who participate. They didn't have the exact figure, but I remembered the figure. The problem of transportation which is sometimes, as he pointed out, an insurmountable one, doesn't exist in the smaller places. It is very serious here because the county is a very large county.

Mr. Taman: Another problem, and I guess here I am really going out on a limb because if anybody would put me to my proof I would be hard-pressed, but I think it is probably true that the best lawyers in Toronto are not doing a great deal of legal aid work. When you speak to them they will all certainly say, "Yes, yes, I will take a case if it is an interesting one, or if it might take a legal aid case if it is the son of a client who suddenly come upon financial hard times", but you certainly couldn't say in the bulk, at least, and I am going out on a limb, but I think that people in the profession would agree that the bulk of legal aid work is not done now by the best people in the profession. At least, in terms of the most experienced people. It tends to be done by young men who I am sure do the work well and conscientiously but who, nonetheless, are not the most senior people. I think one of the advantages of the kind of community office that Ian has proposed in his brief is that there are senior people in the profession, I am convinced, who would be interested to do this kind of work and who could be persuaded to do it. There are senior people in the profession right now who are coming back to teaching, for example, all across the country, and I am sure that men at our own law school who have probably cuts of $20,000 to $25,000 in salary to come back to teach. And I think there are people like those people, senior people, experienced people, who would be willing to get into this kind of work and that would certainly do a good deal to clean up some of the problems that exist.

Senator Cook: Mr. Chairman, I think this is a very thought-provoking brief and I think the two young gentlemen should be congratulated on producing it. And I was wondering if perhaps the next step might be to suggest to them they try and get the Canadian Bar Association to have a conference from all the provincial legal aid associations, because the problems are different in urban centres than they are in rural areas, but to get together and have a conference on legal aid because I agree that eventually the next development has to come just as Medicare, because society gets more and more complex. There are more and more rules and regulations. Acts are published and there are regulations under the Acts and half the lawyers themselves don't know what they are about, let alone the people. So I think there is a good need for them and I think that you should suggest to the Canadian Bar they hold a conference on this whole subject to pursue it further. In the meantime I congratulate you.

The Chairman: Well, you have heard Senator Cook's congratulations.

Senator Everett: Mr. Chairman, have you wound up?

The Chairman: No, go ahead.

Senator Everett: I think that what interested me most about this brief is the concept of community legal aid centres. Could you tell me, in your legal aid program what laws that affect the poor do you think or have you found should be of priority as laws which should be changed?

Mr. Taman: That is a good question. Well, I would say a top priority, without distinguishing too much between them, I would change all the laws that have to do with consumer credit and with debt financing, chattel mortgages, conditional sales, finance companies and institutions of that sort. I would say there is a tremendous need for clarification and to attempt to solve some of the problems in that area.

Senator Everett: Well, now, we have had a spate of consumer protection Acts in Canada. I don't know what the situation is in Ontario, but one is just coming into force in Manitoba. It has just been proclaimed. Have you found fault with those Acts?

Mr. Taman: That is not an area in which I have a great deal of personal expertise. I do know that the people in our organization who work with those kinds of cases have been very dissatisfied and have been especially dissatisfied with the problems of finance as they relate to the over-committed debtor and to the way in which there appears to be no statutory protection for the person who is going deeper and deeper into debt. There appears to be no statutory cut-off line. I am sure that when you are in Montreal next week you will hear from an organization. They are called ASAF, if you haven't already, who have very strong and well-thought-out views on this subject, much more expert than my own. Secondly, I would refer to all the welfare legislation, the Family Benefits Act and all the Acts which were subsumed under that Act when the Family Benefits Act was passed. I am not sure of the exact year, but sometime in the mid '60's and supersided all the previous Acts for new people coming on to welfare, provincial welfare. But the old Acts like the Mothers' Allowance Act all still apply for people who were on that kind of relief before, and certainly in all that legislation there is a tremendous need to clarify rights.

Equally, under public housing, the statute in the administration of public housing. As more and more people come to live in public housing the problems become more and more difficult. And there is a great need there for legal assistance.

I think as well there is a great need in the Juvenile and Family Courts and the interplay between those and the welfare. The classic example that Ian alludes is the situation in which disadvantaged people are sort of, I think, frankly abused. It is the custom in Toronto to require a woman, a deserted wife seeking welfare, to swear out a support suit against her husband and they appear to insist and to have actually refused a number of women assistance because those women have refused to swear out a writ for support against their husbands. Well, it may well be that at some point in time that is a sensible course of action, but at the same time there is many a woman whose husband has left and she anticipates he will come back or she would like him to come back and she doesn't want to sue him. She doesn't want to drag him into court.

Senator Cook: Many more never want to see them again.

Mr. Taman: Well, there are those, too, and that has been a big problem. The case crossed my desk yesterday morning of a woman who was very upset because she had been compelled to sue her husband and her husband was coming back and she was perfectly happy if she would have never seen him again.

Senator Fergusson: I think it is cruel to get a wife start an action against her husband.

Mr. Taman: I agree. That is another example something that is not provided for in the legislation and given the proper resources one could litigate.

Senator Everett: Do you see the role as community legal aid officer as being one of clarifying the existing law? Does he create equity by clarification, by bringing actions, and by having these actions tested the court, or is he more a catalyst to create a pressure within that society to have legislation changes in the law be made?

Mr. McDougall: I think he can properly do both. I think if he doesn't do both he is probably not doing the job. I think the experience of the community legal aid offices will supply some pretty severe problems and pretty severe failings.

Mr. Taman: To sort of answer in advance the comment of the people in the profession which may well come about, I don't think what we are advocating is the activist lawyer. Although there may well be a room for that. John Sewell testified this morning, I am told. I am not saying that the people who work in these offices have to do the kind of work that John did. What I am saying, though, is that it seems fitting that a portion of the legal profession should devote its time to the legal problems of the poor the same way that the tax lawyer devotes his time to the tax problems of betteroff people or businessmen.

Senator Cook: And get paid for it?

Mr. Taman: That is right. And I am suggesting at this point that these lawyers conduct themselves in precisely the same way as a tax lawyer. Obviously there would have to be changes in mode of operation and in sorts of things, but basically conduct himself as a lawyer who has clients and who has problems to solve.

The Chairman: Are you finished?

Senator Everett: I think they have made an excellent case, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: The committee is quite anxious to you know that they appreciate the work that both of you have done. Four of them are lawyers, so you have passed the witness test very well and I may say to you that the brief will be very helpful to us because this is one of the subjects upon which we intend to report and we have made some inquiries and we are knowledgeable about what is going on in other provinces. For your information the Ontario Act is far ahead anything else, but that is the way it is at the present time. So, forgive us for being late. Thank you very much for coming.

Mr. Taman: Thanks for having us.

Mr. McDougall: Thanks very much.

The Chairman: We have next a brief from the National Council of Jewish Women of Canada, Toronto Section. On my immediate right is Mrs. Morris Vigoda. She is the President and she will introduce her legislation and then speak to the brief.

Mrs. Morris Vigoda, President, National Council of Jewish Women of Canada, Toronto Section: To my right is Mrs. Benjamin Gross, and behind me Mrs. Jack Oden and Mrs. Gerald Wiener.

Honourable senators, just as in today's society team efforts are required for the success of projects, so it is become a recognized procedure to develop within social institutions teams of professionals and volunteers who work with, rather than for, the people being served. The National Council of Jewish Women of Canada, an organization in existence since 1897, is committed to the principle of volunteerism, not in a term known as busy work or as ladies bountiful, but volunteers functioning in an engaging environment, provided by the structure and co-operation of the professional staff of the agency or organization.

Volunteers are unable to do a valuable job under certain conditions. If they feel that their duties are vital and important, if high standards exist and a career attitude is encouraged, if they see results and are faced with on-going challenge, and if their individual task is related to the broad community and its needs. We have experienced acceptance by recipients of services who find the warmth, sincerity and empathy a welcome change from the impersonal, often disdainful attitude of officialdom. Volunteers, of necessity, must work within an institutional structure, but we are saying that where some of these agencies and organizations, whether private or governmental, have become inflexible, insular and unapproachable in this rapidly changing society in which we live, our institutions and their leaders must be committed to constant examination of methods of operation and must be willing to learn and to change.

In our democratic way of life each citizen has a responsibility. We see the citizen volunteer's role as a catalyst for influencing change and for bringing about growth and development. Although the actual areas of service by the National Council of Jewish Women may have changed over the past 73 years, we have throughout these years attempted to help people to become full participants in our society. For the past six years Toronto Section has been closely involved with residents of Lawrence Heights. We are necessarily proud to point to the more than 20 pre-school programs within the North York Board of Education, schools which resulted from our pilot project beginning in September, 1964, at our own council house. The concept of community school and its acceptance by the community and the therapeutic day care centre are the other areas of our involvement in Lawrence Heights. As a result of our experience, and recognizing that other groups have been making similar presentations, we respectfully supply the following recommendations:

The federal government expand its program for day care centres; the federal government subsidize voluntary non-profit pre-school programs. By this we mean the day care programs as distinguished from junior kindergartens. That priority be given to the establishment of therapeutic day care centres in these areas.

Two, the use of volunteers be encouraged, especially those volunteers indigenous to the community. That facilities and physical and human resources within the community be explored and utilized.

No. 3, recognizing that the Senate Committee on Poverty has been federally initiated and aware that education is under provincial jurisdiction, the federal government encourage provincial departments of education to institute pre-school programs for disadvantaged children within the school system and (b) that community schools be an integral part of all communities, but particularly in areas of great need.

These are our actual recommendations. I would like to comment for a moment on pre-school programming because this appears to be a subject of question and certainly in the United States, Head start is a subject of great debate. Lest we be criticized as being chauvenistic, we still feel that we have overcome much of the criticism of operation head start. Because we, across Canada in some nine sections of the National Council of Jewish Women of Canada have such programs as pre-school programs which have family involvement so that not only is the child helped, but the whole family is helped and helped to understand why the child is helped.

Are there any questions?

The Chairman: We will get to the questions. Do you have anything else to say?

Mrs. Benjamin Gross, Research Volunteer, Service Department, National Council of Jewish Women of Canada, Toronto Section: Just a few words about the day care centres and why we feel we need day care centres, not only in low income communities but in most communities across Canada.

In many families, especially in the lower income families of course, many of the families are one parent. These one parent families of course have many problems and the children do not receive the same enrichment or the same wordly knowledge that children, say, in middle-class or wealthy families do receive, and their potential cannot possibly be reached by attending junior kindergarten schools without some background or extra enrichment that the day care centre offers.

The therapeutic day care centre which the National Council of Jewish Women, Toronto Section, has been involved in in Lawrence Heights Community is a very unique type of day care centre. It was really meant just to help out mothers who were ill and had to be away from home and children that were not cared for properly.

The need for making use of all physical facilities and human resources within the community. For those who aren't aware, in the Lawrence Heights community almost every facility that was available was used and is being used. To elaborate on that, the community centre, which is operated by the North York Parks and Recreation, offered its building free of charge for community activities and for a day care centre. A church basement was used as another nursery school and interest programs for mothers. As to physical human resources, of course, the volunteers were used both from the community and outside the community and I just have to mention something very wonderful that is going on in the Lawrence Heights community.

There are resident volunteers from the central committee of the Mennonite Church. There is one couple who have given their services to the community and are resident volunteers in the day care centre in the hot lunch program, and in the interests group and in the recreational program within the community.

So, therefore, this program, that could be a very costly one, is able to run with no cost for rent, no cost for staff. Families are charged 50 cents a day which includes 45 cents for the hot lunch which is provided by the students at Yorkdale Vocational School. I don't know what actual course it is called, but the ones who do the cooking have actual subjects for whom to cook. The other nickel goes to cookies and juice, so the only expenses of that program, which truly is a unique one, are for the telephone and the supplies. Other than that everything is paid for or donated. And, certainly, this is a unique situation. I don't think that as a result of our own pre-school program where we have operated in our first three years entirely with volunteers, when we proposed it to the Ontario Department of Education, we recognized that staffing by teachers is necessary, and the same would be true of day care centres, that there certainly would have to be professional staff, but I think that we must not overlook the tremendous value of the volunteers. Certainly financially it makes a tremendous difference, but also in terms of the human element that is brought into it.

I think that is all we wish to say to you.

The Chairman: Senator Inman.

Senator Inman: In regard to that, I notice on page 2 you are discussing the day care centres. Does this mean the children of working mothers?

Mrs. Vigoda: No, there are no children of working mothers. The Day Care Centre Act limits the number to 10, because of the staffing and the size of the facilities. Their usual number is 7. There is someone who is on a kidney machine several times a week. When I was there to-day, and I went in to take another look, there happened to be a young boy about four who had just been brought in. His sister had been choking and his mother took her daughter down to the hospital, and apparently it would be a several hour episode at the emergency, and consequently this young boy was able to have a place to go. There are two mothers who are back at school. They have many more children who do take part in the hot lunch program. The number fluctuates from 4 to 7, usually because there may be some children who go to school in the morning in kindergarten but will be there in the afternoon. Or, earlier in the year, there will be a large number in the morning, but this is not set up for working parents at all.

Senator Inman: But I just thought that if working mothers could go, I thought the hours would be longer.

Mrs. Vigoda: Yes, this would not be at all. If there are several children who are being taken down for doctors' appointments or for clinic appointments or for shots, and there are a number of families with many children, then several can be left while these appointments are being kept.

Senator Inman: Yes. And then, if I may ask another question on this supplement that you have put in Committee on Aims and Objectives. On page 3 you are speaking about the family involvement.

Indirectly, the father's interest is aroused (when there is a family living with the family) and opportunities are offered for the fathers to become familiar with the program and its goals.

Have you had a very good response to this program?

Mrs. Vigoda: Yes, excellent, extremely fine. If you will recall in our brief, some 30 per cent of the families are single parent families, so that decreases immediately the number of fathers to come out. We found the mothers, with their children, and we have sitting services for younger children because otherwise they would not be able to get out. At the present time we are operating on a two-day-a-week program, perhaps four or five times during the year, depending upon what the mothers plan, what they would like to see. No more than four or five times during the year would there be a total family involvement. It might be an open house type of thing. It might be a picnic. But certainly not a year round program as some of the mothers would be having at the present time.

There are English classes for some of the mothers who do not speak English. There would be good rooming. There would be cooking, cooking on a budget, how to manage your finances, the new maths, how to understand. The principal comes over to explain what is going on in the school, not only in the re-school program but for their older children. They are taken to many community resources, the Science Centre, the Art Gallery, many things they would not otherwise be exposed to and understand.

Senator Inman: I find this very interesting, because I find points I haven't noticed before in some of the other briefs to date. So to me it is very interesting.

Mrs. Vigoda: Thank you.

The Chairman: Senator Fergusson.

Senator Fergusson: Mr. Chairman, I would certainly like to commend the witnesses because I think it is a very excellent brief and there are a lot of points that are different to the ones we have had, and I think the dedicated work that this group does certainly deserves tremendous commendation. I only wish many, many organizations were doing the same.

On the brief to the Department of Education which you have attached, you refer on page 3 to qualified volunteers. What do you consider qualified volunteers and do they have to be qualified to take them on, or do you do sort of in-service training?

Mrs. Vigoda: I am going to ask Mrs. Wiener, who is our vice-president of the service, who certainly can speak most qualifiedly.

Mrs. Gerald Wiener, Vice-President (Service), National Council of Jewish Women of Canada, Toronto Section: The volunteers who are involved in the part of the program you are referring to, I believe in the student aid portion, in the pre-school and in the student aid, are either retired, semi-retired teachers or very well-trained laymen. They have a special interest in the program to begin with, and we have volunteer programs for them under the direction of the teacher. It is in the classroom they have a special training program from the school, but in our nursery school we use the resources of the qualified teacher that we have working.

Senator Fergusson: But you wouldn't just take anyone in to work there unless they had very good qualifications?

Mrs. Wiener: No.

Mrs. Vigoda: And also there are certain demands that are made on them in terms of consistency and responsibility. In any program this is vital. And I am very grateful that I am connected with an organization whose volunteers are as committed as they are.

Senator Fergusson: There is difficulty in having volunteers carrying on an organization and you find that you can't be sure that they are going to turn up, and you have no control over them because you are not paying them anything.

Mrs. Vigoda: We have found that when, providing good health, I think this is the one thing that does sometimes create a problem, but assuming good health within the family, that when there is a feeling of accomplishment, when a person does feel and does see that their role is a valid one, that our volunteers are above and beyond the call of duty, and I think that this perhaps is the crux of it, that the volunteer must feel that her job is important and she must get satisfaction, and I think that this is a very different thing from the prior history of volunteerism. If we accept this, that we are doing a non-paying professional job, that the quality of volunteers and the satisfaction that the volunteers get, does prevent the problem of the unreliable volunteer.

Senator Fergusson: There is just one thing. I would like to refer to the first recommendation in your brief to us on page 6 in which you recommend that the federal government expand its program for day care centres. Could you comment on that and could you tell me, do you think these could be extended to rural areas or would they be limited to urban areas?

Mrs. Vigoda: I have given it thought and I must admit being very much an urbanite, that I am not too familiar with many of the problems. And we spoke for a short time, could we recommend it, and we felt that we were not qualified to make these recommendations. Because does one speak of rural as small urban? We really felt that we were not qualified.

Senator Fergusson: I was just wondering if the distances would make it practically impossible to set up similar centres.

Mrs. Wiener: I think if we can acquaint it with the problems of getting the older children to their schools, we could include the pre-schooler as well under the same circumstances. There would have to be transportation.

Mrs. Vigoda: And certainly I think in terms of therapeutic day care centres, it is true there is a problem of transportation, but the need would be the same. Who looks after the three that are left at home if you are rushing someone to a hospital or if you have a weekly appointment because of some kind of physical condition that requires treatment?

Senator Fergusson: Thank you.

The Chairman: Senator Inman.

Senator Inman: With regard to what you were just speaking about, would there be a system of home-makers that could fill in there, what we call home-makers?

Mrs. Vigoda: Certainly, if there were enough home-makers and if one were able to provide the funds. I know that when many of us try to get a nurse for someone because of an illness it is difficult to get a nurse. I think at the same time the situation would be comparable, but it might be difficult to get someone in that emergency.

Senator Inman: Well, I just know in my own home town which is Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island, there are a group of women. They are not especially trained, but they have been mothers and grandmothers and they do that just with no special training. Speaking of the recommendations again, the recommendation to the use of volunteers being encouraged, especially those volunteers indigenous to the community. That would be a good idea, don't you think?

Mrs. Vigoda: We feel very strongly about it.

Senator Inman: I would like to give a little instance with regard to, again, I am speaking of my own province. A few retarded children and partially retarded children had a teacher who didn't do very much at all. Then one of the girls, a sister of one of these retarded children, went away and took a course and she came back and they all knew her, you see, and they just went along beautifully with it. So I was just thinking of this, where you have it there, the use of volunteers in the neighbourhood.

Mrs. Vigoda: Actually, this is why I made the comment. In the day care centre, where women in the community are acting as volunteers, to use another example, I get tremendous pride on seeing this. Lawrence Heights does not have a ratepayers' association because of the nature of its community, but when we see the leadership of this neighbourhood association, which is similar in function to a ratepayer's association, when we see the mothers who have been graduates from our mothers' program acting as leadership within the neighbourhood association, then we see the tremendous value of those people who are familiar with the problems of the area, and I think too, that once people are re-assured, in terms of their own potential and their own capabilities, that they can make a very valid contribution. I think that this is the horrible mistake that volunteers made for many years of wanting to do for people, and I think that we have come to realize that we must let them. And I think the resident volunteer, in any program, has a tremendous validity. If we can help to bring her skills out, to train her, and then to be a volunteer within his or her community, I think that we, too, have made a valid contribution.

Senator Inman: Thank you.

Senator Cook: Mr. Chairman, I join with my other colleagues in thanking the ladies for this very thoughtful and warm-hearted brief. I notice it is dated February, 1970, and attached to it is another brief dated October, 1965, which is somewhat in the same terms, addressed to the Ontario Department of Education. Would it be a fair question to ask you, have you had any results?

Mrs. Vigoda: Yes, very definitely. In the contents of our brief we have made reference to two special recommendations that have come from the Provincial Committee on Aims and Objectives of Education. That is their recommendation. I think there was some 156 recommendations, if I am not mistaken, but I am not quite sure, somewhere in that neighbourhood. But there was an entire section devoted to pre-school education, where their original term of reference did not include pre-school education, and we asked because of our experience with pre-school education could we make a submission, which we did. So we were delighted when these recommendations included an area on pre-school education.

There were two recommendations which we thought were particularly in response to our experience, that is permitting a school board to establish pre-school programs in accordance with the needs of the jurisdiction. That is on page 3 of the February, 1970, brief.

Senator Cook: Yes.

Mrs. Vigoda: At the bottom of the page, Recommendation 112. Require that all high density housing projects, pre-school and playground accommodation be provided by developers, the cost of such accommodation to be borne by them. I don't know what the experience has been in some of the smaller communities. In Toronto there are more than 20 pre-school programs. We worked initially with North York. Well, we still are working with them.

Senator Cook: With whom?

Mrs. Vigoda: With North York Board of Education. For three years we had it as our pilot project in consultation with them, but we did the entire financing. At the end of the third year we were delighted that North York took over the entire budget. That is, the transportation of the students, providing of the teacher, and providing of material. In the fifth year they started introducing pre-school programs to those areas in North York which they felt would benefit and at this time there are some 20 pre-school programs which we feel are a direct result of our program. There are, I think, four other sections of the National Council of Jewish Women in Ontario that have similar pre-school programs and in each instance they, of necessity, are working with the boards of education of those cities demonstrating the validity and the importance of this type of program to those children who, because of financial or cultural conditions, need the help of such a program to become integrated within the total school curriculum.

One criticism that was levelled at operation head start, which we feel we have overcome, is the family involvement. And right across Canada this is an integral part of our program, the involvement of the family.

The Chairman: Well, just while you are talking about that, we met an ethnic group this afternoon and their main complaint was that there was no involvement of the family with the teaching of the children.

Mrs. Vigoda: May I ask, is that the Portuguese Canadians?

The Chairman: Was it? No. But they were a very, very important ethnic group here, and who made it as their point to us, indicated there wasn't this involvement. When you said that you had improved on head start, or made some improvement by involvement of the family. We hadn't heard about it before.

Senator Cook: Excuse me. They are talking about different groups, age groups.

Mrs. Vigoda: Well, head start would be the same thing. Head start would be pre-school, four years old.

Senator Cook: But they weren't talking about pre-school. They were talking about school. These ladies are talking about pre-school.

The Chairman: Yes, these were children of the immigrants.

Senator Cook: But these ladies are talking about pre-start, the ones they are talking about are pre-school.

The Chairman: Well, there isn't any involvement. You are quite right in saying that. This is already in school, but if there had been involvement before they went in, there would be involvement beyond that. They haven't got either involvement at the present time. That is the point. Now, they may have it in a very local area, but generally that is one of the great faults. We have heard it for years. So when we talk about head start being a success, there is great doubt in our minds about the success of head start from everything we learned from the experiment in the United States.

Mrs. Vigoda: I think that the point is well taken and I think that this is one reason why the community school, about which we really said very little in our main question, I think that this is an area that does bring family involvement in where it is not only in the pre-school but the total family involvement, as long as children are at school. Of course, it serves those who do not have school-age children too, but this perhaps is a way of involving the total family in the community school situation, beginning perhaps at pre-school, but continuing on into the community school principally.

Senator Cook: We were out to the school last night and the headmaster told us that it was a community school. Well now, was that why you chose Lawrence Heights, because it was a community school, or just by choice?

Mrs. Vigoda: No, the community school is only about three years old. We have been connected with Lawrence Heights now for six years, but we were meeting with them for a year before that. There were some obvious needs within the community. We had approached North York about the time that head start was just beginning and of course it is still accepted that the early days of school education do affect one's whole attitude and success in school. We were fortunate that the director of special services in North York Board of Education suggested to us, and the principal was most receptive and most anxious that these students be helped and this is how we began. But actually, it was as a result of our successes and our success with the mothers and the mothers' awareness that they have more to benefit, and the whole family has more to benefit.

The community school was an offshoot of our pre-school program and of all its possible ramifications.

Senator Cook: And were you sort of the originators of the group mentioned on page 5? You refer to a planning committee. Were your ladies the ones who initiated the plan?

Mrs. Vigoda: This is on page 5 of the Committee on Aims and Objectives?

Senator Cook: You say, "A planning committee was formed of representatives of all interested groups and agencies." Did you bring that about?

Mrs. Gross: Yes. Do you want me to elaborate on that?

The Chairman: Yes.

Mrs. Gross: We were called in to assist in the establishing of the day care centre. And the social service consultant and I called in all the representatives from all the agencies who would be involved in the neighbourhood centre and the ones listed here are all the ones that were involved.

Senator Cook: And you feel now you have gone beyond the experimental stage? You feel that you have?

Mrs. Gross: Yes.

The Chairman: One of the things that is concerning us very much is the single female head of family and your first recommendation is that the federal government expand its program for day care centres. If you didn't know before you will know now that the federal government contributes 50 per cent of the cost of day care centres, without limit. This is how it is. If there is any need, and we think there is great need for day care centres, the pressure should be on the provincial government who can originate the scheme and continue with it. There is no problem as far as the federal Government is concerned.

Senator Cook: That is why I asked, ladies, on page 5 of this brief to the Ontario Department of Education.

The Chairman: Oh, yes, the second one?

Senator Cook: No. "Serious consideration be given to the establishment of pre-school nursery programs for disadvantaged children within the public school system." I was wondering what success you had with that particular recommendation.

Mrs. Vigoda: Actually, great success. For instance, North York has selected those areas which they feel have been of benefit. They have not done it across the board in production of pre-school programs. In some instances it may be because of English being the second language, and they may feel that the children would benefit from this type of program. But certainly, in Toronto and in North York, and I cannot speak for the other burroughs, but Toronto also has some 20 junior kindergarten centres in the areas of need, where there is either cultural disadvantage or a language problem, or whatever it is. I do not know about the other burroughs. I made reference to the other cities in which we have sections. We know that it has been well received. The Minister of Education keeps saying that it is up to each local school board to adopt those recommendations from the Hall-Dennis report. Not many of the recommendations need provincial legislation, but merely implementation. So it is up to either the local citizens to put pressure on the local school board or, where there is an organization like the National Council of Jewish Women or Junior League, which is also interested in similar types of programs, perhaps the individual voluntary organizations have a responsibility to put pressure on the local school boards where there is need.

I would like to just say as an aside, at the time that we presented this brief which is now five years ago, we were the first section in Canada to start the program and when, as a result of our success, the other sections went to other school boards and municipal councils: several of the cities said, "We have no poor in our city." And they were somewhat shocked when they suddenly realized that they do have poor in their city. And they now have thriving pre-school programs, but certainly community, citizen pressure is necessary for it to be broadened, even in Ontario.

Senator Cook: Let us hope you have as much success in your brief of 1970 as you did in your brief of 1965.

Mrs. Vigoda: We would be most grateful.

Senator Everett: I wonder if I might just ask one question of you. The chairman was referring to the fact that the head start operation does not, for one reason, have the best reputation as a successful program. Would you be able to comment on that at all and give us any enlightenment?

Mrs. Vigoda: From our limited experience it seems to be that it starts off well, but I think that any of these things have to be reinforced. You can't just teach a child at four and then sort of forget about them when they are five and six. So their horizons are expanded and they come into the public school system with teachers, many of whom are not well equipped, because of the training that they have had. They are primarily middle-class teachers with the same sets of values they came to the school with. And I think that this is where the weakness lies, that they merely that one year and the need for these students continues for many years. This was why we were concerned with follow-up, and this is why we are grateful at Lawrence Heights, that there are student aids within the school system, many of our volunteers and there are some volunteers within the parents who are there acting as student aids, but they need the reinforcement. One year is almost a teaser and I think this is where the criticism lies.

Mrs. Gross: Psychologists and child specialists tell us that children start to learn at the ripe age of one and a half to two years. Perhaps these children aren't being taken into these pre-school programs at an early enough age, which is a problem for day care centres because we keep children for two years.

Senator Everett: One of the submissions yesterday was to the effect that the head start type of program might not work because it is not integrated with the parents and that the child is getting some good out of it during the day which is being destroyed in the conflict with the parents at night. Have you found that?

Mrs. Vigoda: Very definitely. I remember one incident where we had to spend almost a whole session with a group of mothers explaining how important it was to stick up on the wall the works of art that their youngsters come home with, because the youngsters could come home with it and they would promptly throw it out. We spent some time about why it is important to encourage the youngster, who certainly isn't an artist, but just the fact of seeing his or her work up on the wall with that parent's acceptance. And I feel very strongly, I think we all feel very strongly about the importance of the parental involvement.

Senator Everett: Thank you.

The Chairman: Mrs. Vigoda, thank you very much, and the other ladies with you, for presenting a very useful and very imaginative concept of how things could be. You made a real contribution on two aspects of which we will take note. We thank you for coming.

Mrs. Vigoda: Thank you. It was our pleasure.

The Chairman: Senators, Mr. Walter Pitman, a former member of the House of Commons and a member of the Provincial House, a man with an excellent background in education for many, many years, has asked to be heard on a special aspect which I thought we ought to hear.

Mr. Walter Pitman, M.P.P.: Honourable Chairman, senators and ladies and gentlemen, thank you for this opportunity to say just a few words. I can assure you, senators, I won't be too long, but I just wanted to isolate one problem that bothers me about the way we treat the poor in our schools. I am convinced that schooling in isolation as we look upon it will simply not solve the problem of the poor, because, in essence, what we are doing, I think, is isolating the education experience, whereas I think what we must do is to bring the educational experience into the community as a continuous force. The thing that we are realizing now is that even in the pocket-strap program, head start programs that are taking place in the United States and other parts of the world, there is a great deal of feeling, I think, that we are not solving the problems, that these alone won't solve the problem.

I think the nursery school experience that goes along with charitable organizations. . .

The Chairman: He was not in the room when we were discussing it, so he does not know what was said earlier.

Mr. Pitman: I think we are realizing now that we must have some kind of co-ordinated approach and I am trying to find a role for the school in this whole area of poverty. I think we are realizing that just more and more education does not do it.

There has been a tremendous escalation in the amount of education that has been given to the poor people in the last 10 years, and yet they still tend to be drop-outs. Even when they stay in school they still tend to go into vocational areas and still tend to take courses that produce obsolete skills. It doesn't really break the poverty syndrome, and I think one of the probable problems is that the fact that the schools still purvey the values and attitudes, it still uses materials and teaching methods which are not conducive to education so far as the average poor student is concerned.

I think that our faith in education has to be rationalized at this point in time. I think we have tended to think that education will solve poverty just like education will solve world peace, education will solve unemployment. I think what we probably most need to do is to recognize that the school represents a threat to the home rather than a hope for the child so far as the poor are concerned.

I was very much taken by that woman. I was here yesterday morning listening for two or three hours, and there was a woman who I thought put a very poignant story of her child going, after they moved into another area, and her child going to school, and she suddenly found that her child didn't want to go to school any longer because she couldn't pay for the little extras, you know, the $4 for the activity fee, and so much for the running shoes, and all of these things. And, as a father of four children, I just simply am staggered by the amount of pressures put on parents of the poor in the educational system of any province. And I am sure there is scarcely a day, a week, that one of my children doesn't come asking for a dollar for school for something, and I think with compulsory education we are also giving compulsory amelioration for the poor. I think there should be something in the legislation of all our provinces that states that once a child goes into a school there can be no further requests for money from parents for any activity. What one child gets all of the children get. And the children should not be asked for pay $5 for a trip to Ottawa or something like that. It does represent a humiliation for many parents of the poor.

The other thing that bothers me at the present time is that we have a feeling at this point in time that the educational system is exacerbating the generation gap. At no time have parents been less able to understand what is going on in the school. We have the changes of courses, changes in curriculum. The kids bring home a curriculum that looks like a gas bill. He brings home a curriculum you can't understand. He is dealing with a mathematics they can no longer help the child with. This is true in all the subject areas, but I don't think it is true of any proof as it is for the poor, and I think that the poor are the least likely to go to the school, because for them in most cases the school is a place of humiliation, defeat and failure. So the ordinary programs of home and school and meetings of teachers and parents just don't work for the poor.

What I am suggesting in this brief is some kind of a program has to be initiated which will admit the school to the community, to the homes of the poor, and I am suggesting a program which will allow the school to provide short-term training programs for mothers of poor children so that they could come into the school and work in the cafeterias and classrooms and low-skill jobs, but ones that have some relevance to the school, and where the parents can see their children in school and perhaps end this gulf, this shadow, that gets between the poor parent and the school.

I think this is something which would also be relevant to providing some degree of money. I think the mother could well be paid two or three dollars to spend the morning in the school. I have seen a project like this for ordinary parents at work and the difference it makes in the way in which parents can look at the school and the way in which their kids look at their parents in the school. I think this is really exciting and I think it is perhaps one way we could break down this wide gulf.

I think we have to do something very specific in teacher education. I don't think the teachers yet understand the problems of poverty. I don't think a kind of amateurish search to discover where most of the teachers came from, and particularly principals, in our schools, and, you know, a young person who is in the teaching profession and who is a principal, certainly in the 1960s and 1970s, undoubtedly was from the middle class. In the '40s and '50s and early '60s, undoubtedly. It has only been in the last while that we have really been, if we have at all, able to get down below a certain level. At the university it is still pretty high. I think essentially there are middle class oriented people who are teaching. They don't understand the poor. They don't understand the problems of poverty, and I think this is a major problem, the attitudes, that we deal with it in a so sophisticated way that we end up with slow-learner classes or opportunity classes. We find all kinds of jargons to put on kids who are poor. I think this is a major problem.

In Ontario we are starting to teach education, that we will be able to find courses in psychology, economics, in these areas where we can have a clear understanding for teachers of what the problems of the poor are.

The other area which I am interested in really, and I hope it is to be the final area, is the area of the use of the school. To a large extent I think the poor look upon the school as the outpost of the establishment. I don't think they really look upon it as their school. I think getting the parents in the school is the first aim, but I am sure the committee, and I tried to follow your proceedings over the last several months, I think you have realized the great deal of dispersal that there is in all the activities in social agencies, the fact that poor people get passed from one agency to another. One deals with housing, one deals with the children's problems, one family counselling services. They get passed around and around and around and I think most social workers are beginning to realize the importance of a co-ordinated family oriented approach. I think this, more than anything else, is a role the school can supply, some role in co-ordinating. The school is the only building which represents the public interest which can be found in nearly every community. It is the only building. I think it is time we looked upon schools as public buildings. I think it is time we look upon the school as a place where we can co-ordinate social and family service organizations. They could be placed where we could begin to identify with people who are poor in every community, and we could begin to activate a program of action at the local level where I think it really has to happen.

I realize that every poor person doesn't have children, although I think the fact the rich have money, the poor have children, must be taken in sight. But, nevertheless, I think the school could be most effective local agencies for co-ordinating the services all kinds of services in helping the poor.

I would hope this committee will turn to a guaranteed income of some kind, but I think more than that will be necessary if we are going to get something exciting going about the problem of poverty.

In my personal view, I hope that what the '70's will be all about will be getting some distribution of our natural resources. I mean, after a decade of concentration on economic growth.

The Chairman: Well, I am not going to let you go for a while. Let's just talk about schools for a little while. When you hear a person talk about community schools, other witnesses have told us about something new that has cropped up within the last four or five years. Now, what do they mean exactly? What are they getting at?

Mr. Pitman: I think they are getting at the idea that the schools should be regarded as a public resource. Now, unfortunately, I think in many cases what the community school tends to become is simply an opening of the building. One of the most ludicrous aspects of our whole system of education in many cases in Ontario, I am sure across Canada, the school cept closed from 4.00 o'clock in the afternoon until 6.00 o'clock the next morning. You have billions of dollars worth of buildings sitting there doing nothing, and often recreational services are building other facilities to try to accommodate it, but it has to be more than the opening of the school. We have to find ways of getting the poor into the schools on their terms, not in terms of being organized by the home and school associations or some other group. It should be a place where tenants' associations and social groups are at home and are invited and encouraged to come and develop their own activities where they can be brought into theatre groups, art classes. I think we are going towards a leisure society and, strangely enough, many of the poor have a leisure which many of us would like to have, but they are not being able to effectively use it, either to improve themselves as human beings or to improve their skills as an effective part of the community.

The Chairman: Go ahead, senator.

Senator Everett: Just dealing with the first two recommendations you have made. It seems to me that in your first recommendation, and I put this in the interrogative sense, I wonder, in saying that there should be no programs in school that have any cost to the family if you are not, in doing that, replacing the right of the family or if you are not proscribing the right of the family to decide for its child and if you wouldn't be better, and replacing that indeed with a purely administrative decision, because I could see if you said that, then there would have to be some sort of curb on it. Otherwise schools would go ahead and have all sorts of programs. They would be all over the place on skiing junkets and everything else. So then the school board would have to be involved and eventually the province would have to be involved and they would say you have to have one skiing weekend a year and you can go to Ottawa once between grade 1 and grade 12. I wonder if you wouldn't give consideration to retaining the right of the family to decide and give emphasis on the ability to pay. Do you see what I'm hitting at?

Mr. Pitman: I see what you are hitting at.

Senator Everett: Do you want to deal with that before I deal with your other point?

Mr. Pitman: Perhaps I might, senator. I think you have got a very valid point, that we don't want to throw everything down to a very low minimum, but I really isn't it time that we began to realize that education is not something that goes on in a classroom, that out of classroom education should be a part of the curriculum and should be the responsibility of the school board through grants from the Department of Education. I see no reason why the kids living in a wealthy neighbourhood where there isn't any pressure in terms of family income, to have trips to Ottawa and trips to the zoo and ski weekends, if that is part of the educational program, whereas the kids who are living in the poorer areas should be deprived of those kinds of opportunities. I don't think if we are going to get any kind of exciting educational system it should be dependent upon family income. I am realistic enough to feel that I just don't believe that any committee, not even this committee, could suggest a level could become high enough that the children of the poor or going to have enough money to contribute to all of these various kinds of junkets.

Senator Everett: If you are talking about the educational program, let's call it the educational junket, that is available to all schools. That can be an administrative matter. There is no problem. The school administration provides the funds. I say, there is no problem, and I can agree on that.

Mr. Pitman: I see.

Senator Everett: It seems to me the problem you raised was the one raised by the woman yesterday, by the woman who had moved to the neighbourhood in which the difference in income was so great that the school program, this is over and above the educational program, it was very natural to the parents living in that neighbourhood, but was an insurmountable obstacle to her. Now, a ski weekend is not educational.

Mr. Pitman: I agree.

Senator Everett: But it exists in the school. Two of my children last week were on a ski weekend.

Mr. Pitman: Well, this is an extra-curricular activity.

Senator Everett: Yes, but like so many of these extra-curricular activities, they are sponsored by the school because the school is the centre of activity in a lot of these things.

Mr. Pitman: But some of these are part of the school program. They take place during the day.

Senator Everett: If they do that, that is another matter.

Mr. Pitman: But I think that woman gave an interesting insight into the problem. If we are going to have some cohesion in ordinary society, if we are going to get away from a ghetto, surely we can't have schools where poor people can't send their children. What happened to that woman? She went back to the part of the city where her child, she hoped, would at least be able to stay in school and not become embarrassed and humiliated.

Senator Everett: Well, I think where you and I differ is that what she brings out is the fact that if you are going to de-ghettoize public housing, then you had better provide enough income so that they can live in that new neighbourhood.

Mr. Pitman: We are both agreed on that.

Senator Everett: Just moving them to a new neighbourhood isn't going to be the answer.

Mr. Pitman: Exactly.

Senator Everett: I come on my second point and that is that it seems to me that part of the conflict between home and school that you refer to is that school tends to assault the dignity of the parent. I just wonder if whether putting the mother in, I think you used the term menial?

Mr. Pitman: No, I didn't. I said low skill. They are two very different terms.

Senator Everett: I don't know where I got that word, menial.

The Chairman: But just even having her there, working behind the counter with the other children.

Senator Everett: That is really the point. Does this not contribute to this lack of dignity, because that child doesn't see the other children's parents doing the same thing. I wonder if there isn't a danger. I am not trying to throw cold water on your very worthy suggestions.

Senator Cook: If some of the other mothers would volunteer.

Mr. Pitman: I think this is quite possible. I see situations where you have, in essence, the whole spectrum of parents. But the ones that I felt seemed to get the greatest degree of help and understanding from the school and what their children are doing in the school and also the greatest help from the students and feeling at one with the school were the poor parents. I don't see this as menial work. They could be teachers' assistants. There are lots of things they could do that would not require a great deal of skill. Certainly it would require teaching, training and education. I am not suggesting they could be sweeping floors, doing that kind of thing. I mean a part of the educational program and I think there are a great many things that could be done which would cut down the cost of teachers, if we could have some of these things done by people with lesser skills.

Senator Cook: Bearing in mind they only spend so much time in the schoolroom itself, what are your ideas or impressions of further organized sports, the cadet corps and the WRENS, girl guides and boy scouts and so on?

Mr. Pitman: Well, senator, I rather find it hard to deal with a missed bag because I don't place the cadet corps in the same areas as the girl guides and boy scouts. Quite frankly, I don't see much point in a school system which is being liberalized and we are talking about world peace and we are trying to develop an international concern, I don't really see much place for the cadet corps. I do see places for boy scouts and girl guides and I think that comes back to the community school. I thought occasions where the Home and School, because it would cost $7 to keep a caretaker there for a few hours, this is restriction of the use of these places. I hope this is starting to disappear.

Senator Cook: Well, the point of the question, doesn't matter if you call it the cadet corps. Anything you like, boy groups or girl groups, I just use that as a familiar term.

Mr. Pitman: I think they are very valuable. At the same time I think the poor are the least likely to use in the school. You have to make a substantial effort to get them to take part. For one thing, the whole competitive bit shows a difference in values. In many cases the poor child quite often does not have the same kind of competitive zeal which is demanded in playing a football game, and some of these forms of activities.

The Chairman: You know, from listening to you to-day I felt that you were saying good-bye to the Home and School Clubs and Associations and that sort of thing.

Mr. Pitman: No, I am one of the most earnest supporters that the Home and School has. I am trying to get them to become more active and to play an important effective part, but there again you see the Home and School is organized essentially, I think, to deal with the periphery. In many cases the Home and School doesn't really get into the nuts and bolts of the educational system. This is why people leave the Home and School Association, because they are doing things which are not really basic. They are not understanding the educational system any better, belonging to the Home and School. What I would like to see happen is have school counsellings where you would have parents as well as students and teachers and the principal talking about the administration of the curriculum of the school and making decisions which would advise the principal in the direction he should be going. I think this would be a tremendous input from the whole community, if you had school advisory committees of parents. I think the Home and School sort of gather to talk about gardening. Even to bring the parents together to have a one-to-one discussion with a teacher is not as valuable as giving the parents an opportunity to really find out what is happening to their kids and in this age I think that has become more and more important.

Senator Cook: It doesn't matter what you call it, I mean a good Home and School Association is much better than a poor indifferent one, where people are taking part.

Mr. Pitman: I agree. But I think that the school council which was actually taking part in what is going on at school would be far more likely to encourage an active Home and School, because there would be some feeling of input. I have a little feeling about this whole system of education and democracy. We are reaching a point now that our educational system is going in a very different direction to society. For example, in Ontario you have heard about the Hall-Dennis Report, which talks about a society which is non-competitive, the fact that we have got to get rid of this obsession of work, but society is still not aware of this. In some ways your schools become an almost subversive movement, completely changing the attitude of the children and the parents are away out in left field. They don't know what is going on. And I think we've got to educate the parents as to what the school system is trying to do or we have got to try to allow the parent to have some degree of input so they have some part in society.

Senator Cook: I want to make one comment. I don't know who is out in left field, parents or children.

The Chairman: Mr. Pitman, thank you for an interesting and stimulating half hour.

Mr. Pitman: Thank you very much.

The Chairman: The committee thanks you for your part. That concludes our meeting until tonight.

The committee adjourned.

EVENING SESSION

Toronto, Wednesday, March 11, 1970.

The Special Senate Committee on Poverty (Sub-committee "A") met this day at 8.00 p.m. at St. Stephen House, Toronto.

Senator David A. Croll (Chairman) in the Chair.

The Chairman: Ladies and gentlemen, I think I really need be introduced in my old riding, one that I represented for so many years. One man walked over to me just now and said, "Dave, I haven't seen you for 25 years, not since I canvassed for you." I guess I haven't been getting back often enough.

In any event, you did not come to just look at me. I am here in my capacity as Chairman of the Senate Committee on Poverty. Sitting on my right is Senator Inman of Prince Edward Island. The senator sitting next to her is Senator Fergusson of New Brunswick. On my left is Senator Cook of Newfoundland and beside him is Senator Everett of Manitoba.

You may wonder why there are only five of us here tonight. We have another committee sitting out on O'Connor Drive doing much the same as we are, all in an endeavour to cover as much territory as possible. That is the reason why there are only the five of us here with you.

Let me just say a few words to you at this time. As I have said, we are the Senate Committee on Poverty. We have been authorized to study poverty in all its aspects. When we go around the country — and I will tell you something about our trip — many people say to us, "Well, this has been studied a thousand times. You ought to know everything there is to know about poverty." It may surprise most of you, and I think I should tell you this, that never before in the history of Canada has there been a total study of poverty. There have been studies of welfare, studies of housing, studies of incomes, many small segments have been studied, but never has poverty in its totality been studied. For that reason we are devoting much dedication, and hard work. The members of the Senate Committee who are doing it are doing it almost to the exclusion of everything else. They are devoting themselves in a most dedicated fashion to the problem of poverty.

We have had hearings for four or five months now. Many national organizations have come before us. We have been out visiting in the various provinces. This is our first visit to Toronto. A week from now we go to Montreal for a week in an effort to hear and see and assess the feeling of the people there.

We are not novices. We are not new at this process. We have all lived in Canada. We know what it is all about. We have heard many, many stories, some pitiful, some hard; in any event, they were all about people who are in need, people who are poor.

We cannot just jump to conclusions about poverty. People say to us, "When are you going to get this ready?" Well, you know poverty did not come to us in a day. We have to do some thinking about it. We have to make sure that we have heard from as many people as we possibly can. That is why we have come here. I said to my fellow senators, if there are problems, this place has them, has all of them, a little bit of everything.

We hear this from time to time, that one of the things that the people complain about is the lack of information as to what is available or where they can go to find out things. That will be seen in one of the briefs to be presented here tonight. A man went to the Manpower office and was not told that he could go to the welfare office and obtain whatever he required as a matter of right. When that official was faced with this he said, "That is another department; it is not my business." Well, it is his business. We have to make it his business. Those are the sort of things where it is important for people to know what is available and where it is available, and we have to see what we can do to co-ordinate these services under one roof so that people who need them can go there and get them.

I know that there are many immigrant problems in this community particularly. I realize that immigrants are having the same trouble that we had as immigrants 50 years ago. However, don't forget that the one thing this country most needs is people, the best kind of people we can obtain, the best trained people we can welcome.

Now, we may make a mistake in not explaining to people at the far end that there are some difficulties in this country, that it is very hard to find gold on the streets of Toronto or any other place. That is not going to dissuade an immigrant from coming here. He has made up his mind and he wants to come. This is the greatest decision he makes in his life, leaving what is behind and going some place new. In the main, no matter how things are in this country, it is better than what he had where he was.

So he comes, and we have to make sure that we make things as easy as possible for him, arrange things in such a way as to place him in the community as quickly as possible, to reduce the hardships he has, such as the family learning the language and so on. These are not new problems; they have always been here. You faced them. They are problems that have to be overcome.

I cannot tell you what we will recommend. At this time we could not tell you because we have not heard the last of it yet, but you can rest assured that we know what people need, we know what they need in the way of income, we know what they need in the way of services, we know what they need in the way of decent wages, we know the things that they need and they require. We will make up our minds and make such recommendations as we think are fit and acceptable.

If we did not think this was all worth while, that we could be of some service, we would not be doing it. We could sit in Ottawa. It is comfortable there. Instead of that we are out listening to the people. We sat on Tuesday from 9 in the morning until 10.30 at night. I am not as young as I used to be. That is sort of tiring. It is tiring on all of these people. We are doing the same thing tonight, and we will be doing the same thing for part of tomorrow. We do it because we think someone should do it. Because we are older citizens we think the responsibility is ours and that we can do it better than anyone else can. That is why we are here. You can rest assured that you are in good hands.

I will now start the program by calling on David Maben to give us an outline of his brief. Let me just say this first, I am going to have half a dozen people who will come up and speak to you. When we are finished with the speeches, then we will have questions. The first questions will be those of the senators and then you will come in with your questions. If you have any trouble about interpretation of a language, just speak to Mr. Mira.

Mr. David Maben, Executive Director, St. Christopher House: Thank you very much, Senator Croxall. We are very pleased on behalf of St. Christopher House to have the Senate Committee here tonight. I am also very pleased to see so many of the people from the area who have responded to our invitation to come and participate along with us and speak out their own way about the things that they feel are the problems of priority.

We have a brief from St. Christopher House that we just finished today. We have not enough copies for everyone, but if people would like copies later on, they would give me their names, I will make sure they get copies. We have prepared a copy of our recommendations, which appear in this brief, and give them to each and every one of you, I hope, as you came in the door.

I would like, knowing that I only have a few minutes, to summarize the remarks that we have made in conjunction with the recommendations that you have before you. So, very quickly, I will go through some of the main points that we have raised.

First of all, St. Christopher House draws its membership from a broader geographic area than the two urban renewal areas that are closest to us here. We are in the midst of the Kensington urban renewal area, and just south of Dundas Street we have another comparable geographic area which was developed and whose development is not yet finished, known as the Alexandra Park urban renewal area.

In the Alexandra Park urban renewal area there was quite a number of Ukrainian, Polish and other European people who were landowners down there. Since the public housing units have gone in there, there has been some change in the ethnic structure of that area, so that there are fewer Portuguese in particular, I would say, than there were before, and a variety of other factors; I think there are a few more single-parent families than we had before.

In the Kensington urban renewal area we still have a great many ethnic groups represented, the largest being the Portuguese people, most of whom are from the Azores Islands. In addition to that there are creasing numbers of Chinese people who are starting to move across Spadina Avenue to our area.

Moving along to page 2 of the brief, in both of those areas there has been a noticeable number of Negro families. Within the last few years I would expect that there are a few more West Indian families than there have been in the past.

St. Christopher House has made a great effort, through the community development program that we've worked on in this area, to encourage people to organize and speak up on their own behalf about their own problems. Later on we are going to have representations from the two community groups of Alexandra Park and Kensington giving their points of view as to what the problems are in this area.

Our agency's brief, then, will focus upon the problems of poverty that have been brought by some of the neighbourhoods to the staff of St. Christopher House. I would like to point out that these problems do not necessarily express the concerns of the total, or even the majority, of the residents of this area as we do not pretend to have had direct contact with all the residents living in the area.

Generally, most of our younger children who come to programs come from these two urban renewal areas, but when you look at the teen activities and the adult and older adult activities, people come from a much wider area and some from very great distances abroad.

The brief deals with the problems under four headings: immigrants, youth, families and the aged. The problems encountered by immigrants are pretty general to immigrants anywhere, but I think those problems encountered by immigrants in low-income areas are perhaps more upsetting because many of them come with fewer financial resources and they have fewer language resources as well. Quite often they come with large families to support. One of the greatest needs for immigrants is the improvement of information services of the Canadian government in the lands of origin before they come to Canada.

Another problem that we raise on page 3, about halfway down that page, is the problem of the immigrant who is reluctant in many cases to seek help from government offices for a variety of reasons. Perhaps some of the people here who are immigrants themselves will speak on that particular matter.

The interpretation services available in most public libraries are, and I put this very strongly, disgracefully inadequate. The churches and social agencies in areas like ours are doing their best, I would say, to try to provide these interpreting services. "Best" may be too good a word because I think even we are very neglectful of this particular type of need.

I have put in, as Appendix A, which appears at the bottom of page 12, a story of a man who came to this country with his family. He happened to be an immigrant, but the problems of this man might apply to anyone.

The fact that he came across and learned English and learned the welder's trade, first of all, was quite an important accomplishment for him. He then brought his family across to Canada. He had about five children, as I recall. At one point he became unemployed and was receiving $38 a week. He then was evicted because he did not have enough money for his family to live on, naturally. The Ontario Housing Corporation found him an apartment, but this was in a very extreme west end suburb.

This man went to the Manpower office for supplementary assistance, but the Manpower officer did not inform him of the availability from the municipal welfare office of further assistance which he could get. When I spoke to the officer he also related to me that it was too bad that the provincial training centres had trained too many welders as there were hundreds of them out of work at that time.

This immigrant then hitch-hiked out west. He found a job out there and he came back for his family. I asked the Manpower officer if he would then provide the transportation costs of the family going west to where this immigrant had found a job. The officer said, "No, because there are welders' jobs in this area", and he mentioned where they were. However, they were in the very extreme east end of the city and the immigrant was not able to pay the transportation costs involved in getting there and back. So Mr. X went without any assistance other than the little help we gave him from St. Christopher House. He had in the meantime, unfortunately, incurred several hundred dollars worth of debts.

The recommendations that we would make then, briefly, are:

1. That the Department of Immigration take steps to improve the information services at their offices in foreign countries to ensure that prospective immigrants are informed of the difficulties they will encounter as well as the wealth they may anticipate in Canada; that the Department gather the appropriate information from existing organizations that represent immigrants:

2. That the Federal Government take steps to co-ordinate related government, social and educational services at least at the municipal and perhaps, at the community level; the recommendations of the Winnipeg Social Service Audit regarding public 'Community Health and Welfare Centres' have some merit;

3. That the various governments increase tuition and living grants to immigrants to allow them to 'survive' while they complete up-grading skills and training to enable them to obtain employment in the area of their competence;

4. That all levels of government improve their interpreting and translation services immediately using the many trained and competent immigrants now employed at much lower levels; that consideration be given to providing funds to churches and social agencies who now provide these services.

The next area is families. We found there were a variety of government regulations in this field. We have included in our brief at this point only a comment about the Ontario Housing Corporation and their restrictions on the occupants of public housing which limit the incentives of families who wish to increase their incomes to meet rising costs. I point out that if a mother wants to go out and work to supplement the income that the father is already bring in, first of all, if she is in public housing, she has to pay income tax, which is paid to the federal government, and then her rent will go up, as a result of which some money will be going to the provincial government, and then, if she has to put children in day care, that means she has to make additional payments to the municipal government. So you have three levels of government that are taking money away from her if she plans to go out and work and is living in public housing.

We also point out on page 5 that that type of situation arises with teen-agers who also wish to have increases in their incomes to not only help the family but help themselves. The same type of problems occur through these regulations. Sometimes we have had situations where the teens who have dropped out of school have found it cheaper to go out and live outside the home than stay in, and therefore the regulations in that respect contribute to breaking up the family.

We also point out that it is quite true that the poor pay more—for a great variety of reasons, among which are lack of money-saving devices such as sewing machines and freezers and other things like that, things that people with greater incomes have and which they can use to help in these times of higher prices of food, clothing, etc.

We also point out the need for day care services. There has been a lot of talk about day care for working mothers, but we point out that the non-working mother might also benefit from day care that is given on a day-a-week basis or something of that nature because in today's society there are a lot of tensions and pressures on the family and to have these kinds of services would be very helpful to a lot of mothers in present-day living, and particularly in crowded areas.

So the recommendations in respect of the family are:

That the regulations of government authority relating to working mothers and teens be coordinated and revised in such a way that those who wish to work can perceive the advantage in so doing;

That day care programs for nonworking mothers and working mothers be set up in densely populated areas of low income families to relieve some of the increasing tensions of the family.

The next area is that of youth. One of the points to make right off the bat is that at the present time in local elementary schools are very crowded. I think one of the schools, Ryerson Public School, has close to 100 portables on its playground. We show the effect of this has in our area. There are, I think, 60 pupils in Ryerson School at the present time in junior kindergartens, and there are over 1,500 pupils altogether at that one elementary school. What we point out here is that there must be greater room for many more people in the junior kindergartens.

We at St. Christopher House provide a nursery school for children a little younger than junior kindergarten and going right up to school age. However, back in 1967 the Canada Assistance Board regulations, as they were picked up by the Province of Ontario, made us impose a needs test on the parents of these families. We thought for some time that this would completely stifle our nursery school but fortunately, there was enough feeling between the staff of our nursery school and the parents in our area and sufficient depth of concern for the nursery school and the youngsters involved that we have been able to maintain that at 100 children. We are subsidizing with United Appeal funds at the present time, what we didn't have to do before. We still have a waiting list of 10 or 15 at least. And if there were more places perhaps we would have many more children.

The need for many more guidance counsellors in the area for people who are leaving elementary school at grade 8 is extremely important because the parents of these young people perhaps do not realize the type of jobs there are going to be in the future and that they should be getting training for. In some cases we know these parents do not speak the language or have limited reading skills, and so they don't quite know what is going on in that area. There are cases also of children with average abilities who have not developed appropriate reading skills themselves, or have not alone having learned a marketable trade. These types of youngsters have little hope of being gainfully employed in our society.

The youthful immigrant who is streamed into technical trades in vocational courses where there is limited opportunity for switching into academic courses later on is in very serious difficulty.

Another point we make is the development of studies which should take into consideration differences in cultures and interests in different ethnic areas. One point that someone made was that it is perhaps more important for students in this area to learn about the development of Italian leadership in Toronto's unions, for instance, than to study the rise and fall of the Roman empire.

The worship of affluence is reflected in the anti-social experiences of some, and I underline some, of the youths with whom St. Christopher House has contact. Every day our youngsters are deluged with mass media advertising which says:

"To succeed you must dress sharp; wear the latest styles."

"To be a man you must drive the fastest car."

"To live you must experience the latest and the newest night spot."

"You must because everyone else does; don't wait till you have the money; get it now!"

Nothing, of course, is ever mentioned in these advertisements about the penalty for car theft being, I think it is, 10 days or $30, or that a conviction for that offence will prevent you from being bonded for bail. There are many instances of young people from areas such as this who have undertaken these things just for the purpose of excitement without realizing they were going to limit themselves later on in their lives.

Our next point is in connection with students taking post-high school education. We have quite a number in this area. There is one student who was on government assistance, or at least the family was, whose living allowance was terminated after reaching the 21st birthday. That person now has to take out a $100-a-year loan. You can imagine what that is going to do upon graduation when that loan for several years—or those loans—are accumulated and have to be paid back. It would seem more appropriate in this case to extend the government's living allowance in such a case at least until graduation.

Our recommendations are:

That there be a better co-ordination of government plans in instances where the expansion of family housing units necessitates an equivalent expansion of local school buildings; such co-ordination should get particular attention in areas where 'special needs' have been designated as such by existing legislation (in this case the 'Inner City Schools');

That attention be given immediately to the improvement of guidance counselling and upgrading programs in areas of 'special needs';

That regulations governing public assistance and government grants to students of low incomes be examined and improved to ensure that all students who have the ability to undertake courses in higher education not only be enabled but in fact be encouraged to do so;

That the system whereby students are assessed and placed in secondary school technical courses from which they have limited opportunity to switch to academic course be studied thoroughly; it would seem that revisions are needed both at grade 8 termination stage and at various stages of the secondary school levels.

Now, the last but not the least important. There are many old age pensioners living in this area in single rooms. In an appendix to the brief there is a little story of a man who is attempting to live on this low income, on his old age assistance plus his supplement, who is paying a rent of around $60 a month, has debts each month of around $20, and has to pay a taxi fare of some $12 a month for getting to and from the hospital. In connection with this latter item, again it is one that can be picked up by another supplement, but in many cases people are not informed of this or just do not know about it. This man also pays $10.50 for some food on the weekends. This gentleman is a person who gets a meal a day from St. Christopher House, for which we do not charge him because how could we saddle him with additional cost when he has only about $5 to provide everything else in life?

Many of these people are living on the third floors of rooming houses with heart problems and other illnesses. They live up there because the rent is cheaper.

I ask then: what happens to an old person who becomes ill for short periods of time? There is no room for them in hospitals or nursing homes. Very seldom is there a close relative who can help them and drop in on them. The home-makers services are lacking in facilities for emergency cases like those. Most often what happens is that, because of this lack of care from any source, their minor illnesses lead to cases of chronic illness.

St. Christopher House has helped such people for the last four or five years with the "Meals on Wheels" program, but we have not been able to find a source of any federal, provincial or municipal government grants for this yet. The province, with its home care program, does not consider that meals are treatment in the same way physical therapy is. So that so far we have not received any money from those sources.

Our recommendations are:

That the old age assistance benefits be increased to more realistic levels.

Mr. Chairman, the comments that appear to have been made by you and which appeared in the newspaper this morning will be much appreciated by this type of person.

We further recommend:

That the governmental housing, health and welfare services to the aged be expanded as rapidly as possible in large urban areas as these are the most needful persons in the community;

That the governments undertake funding of experimental and operative 'meals' projects for the aged and handicapped that are now being developed by various churches and social agencies.

Finally, I have done quite a summary of what St. Christopher House has tried to do to get a new building in the last five years. Many of the neighbours around know about this so I will not repeat the facts except that I should say that we all realize now how people feel when they get a run-around from one level of government from another. In this neighbourhood you have to go to Jarvis Street for your Manpower services. If you want to get your supplement from the welfare office, that means a trip away over to Dovercourt. If you have to then go the immigration office, you have to go north up to around Davenport. So you do have these great distances to cover in order to get to these needed services. If you haven't any streetcar tickets, it can be pretty rough.

We of St. Christopher House have been trying to solve some of these problems by getting a new building right across the road in an urban renewal area of Alexandra Park in a nice big triangle of property. We too, instead of being able to set up a building where perhaps offices from these various departments could put branches, have been getting a run-around. We have gone from one level of government to another to another and to another.

The experience of being passed off by one level of government to another and back again without a sound commitment for major funds has been extremely discouraging, particularly when everyone has agreed that the need is great and the project a valuable one. And so our recommendation here would be a better system of providing funds from all levels of government be devised for community centres in a way similar to assistance for funding construction of housing. This goes to areas right across this city. And I know in places like Vancouver the same types of problems exist too, sir.

I am sorry to have taken so much time, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Thank you, Mr. Maben. I will now call on Mr. Paul Lane of the Alexandra Park Residents Association.

Mr. Paul Lane, President, Alexandra Park Residents Association: Alexandra Park is a low-rental housing project. We here are a group of many races with many problems. The main problem is trying to upgrade ourselves. This is very difficult. For example, if we earn a couple of dollars as a raise or working part-time our rent automatically goes up.

Secondly, there is a need for recreation and social buildings where we can go to relieve any tensions we may have.

We would like homes of our own, but, due to low wages and high cost of living, with lack of food, this cannot be as long as the big businessman keeps raising prices and the government permits him to do so.

It is a well known fact that the working class gets hit the hardest. For example, last week when you were shopping, a pound of meat cost you 59¢. This week cost you 79¢. Where is this extra 20¢ going? Certainly not to the working man. Everything goes up but the wages.

As a second example, let us take the car manufacturers. Every year the price goes up approximately $200. The worker gets out of this approximately 10¢ to 15¢ an hour after he goes out on strike.

Now, too, the other businessmen want to get in on some of these price rises. The landlord complains the maintenance costs have risen, and so up must go the rents. The other guy says, "Don't forget us." So it goes the price of your milk, your shoes and your clothes. There is also the next guy who seems to think it is a must that every year your car insurance must go up also. Then there is also the government who gets in their hands first.

Getting back to the difficulty of bettering oneself, is an expensive endeavour to send a child to university not to mention the average Joe who gets a job and then, due to automation, is laid off. The company should not just lay off a man because of automation; it should be made to retrain the man at their own expense. It should not be the government's job to retrain people whose former employers have reaped profit and will do so for years—while this man is turning to welfare and becomes everyone else's burden.

In summary, it must be put to a stop as follows: freeze on rising prices. Wages must be brought up in par with the prices that are now being charged when the freeze goes on. Retraining should take place at companies' expense instead of a lay-off. Welfare recipients should be sent back to school to become mechanics, bookkeepers, secretaries, etc.

That about concludes it.

The Chairman: I was waiting for the punch line. You had 15 minutes. Very well. It will give us more time for discussion.

I have an old friend here from the Kensington and Dan Martyniuk.

Mr. Dan Martyniuk, President, Kensington and Dan Martyniuk: Mr. Chairman and honours

enators, ladies and gentlemen, I have read a great deal about the activities of this task force. One thing is very much overlooked and that is the roots of where poverty starts. We are still a master-slave-oriented society. Poverty has always been at the level of the slave and then following along in order were the subordinates who enforced the slavery and the masters who reaped everything. We are still at the same stage today but are a little more modernized about it. A slave was whipped with a whip and now we are whipped with a tax.

If we want to really look into this problem, we must re-orient ourselves in a way that it would be more acceptable to the general public, more just to the general public. We are still destructive in our orientation to society. They did not have to have a task force to build the Arrow airplane that cost $400 million and which went to scrap. They did not have to have a task force to revamp the Bonaventure which also has gone to scrap. They did not have to have a task force to spend $5 million to develop a tank that went to scrap.

If you put all those millions together and consider what might have been done, we could have had something with all its problems and even poverty taken care of, including urban renewal and so forth.

You cannot blame the government only because we as a society are very destructive. If we orient ourselves rationally as to what we can afford and not afford, and if we want to take care of poverty and re-orient from a master-slave society to an equal society, we will have to put limitations on our expenditures on military hardware, most of which goes to scrap anyway.

If we were to put the money and effort into building houses, improving the lot of people, give a chance to those who have been neglected for so long, then we could easily solve these problems that have been around for so long in a term of something like ten years. There is no reason why we could not solve them in ten years if we put more limitation on expenditures of military hardware that is frequently garbage almost before they begin to build it.

Then what are we paranoid about? We think we are paranoid about to be attacked. Yet we do build obsolete weapons. They just spent $50 million on buying five airplanes so perhaps our honourable Prime Minister, Pierre Elliott Trudeau, can take trips here and there, or maybe it is for the use of somebody else. However, that $50 million could build a heck of a lot of houses.

As to urban renewal, our hopes were raised that something was going to be done here just as in other areas but, lo and behold, the government says, "Oh, this is $4 million; be happy with it."

Why couldn't they figure it out for themselves, that is all, maybe we have had the fiasco of the Bonaventure and these other things, but let us not have a fiasco with this thing. We have raised the hopes of the people. Why not carry it out? Why let them down?"

What is the problem? The government is not lacking the money. The money is there. It is the idea that we are still oriented towards destructive purposes. How can anyone, any task force or any individual, do anything about it if we do not change the ways we have been dealing with things from the time of the early Egyptians, the Macedonians, the Corinthians, the Romans and so forth? This has been persisting century after century after century. The religious people have said that there must be a master and there must be a slave. If you read the Bible it is right there. The master has one privilege and the slave has another. That was condoned by God, according to the Bible.

Now, that has been perpetuated. I am not questioning whether it is right or wrong. I am simply saying that we as a society, whether it be in Europe, here, or anywhere else, are destructive, are master-slave-oriented, and we can never overcome poverty by tokenism, paternalism, or anything of that nature. We must all completely change.

Mr. Chairman, I know that what I have said is radical beyond the most radical of radicals anywhere else, but even those radical radicals are still destructive-oriented. Any fool can take a glass and throw it down and break it, but how many people would it take to put that glass back together again? Any fool can light a match and burn down a building. However, how much money and effort do you need to build it again?

We cannot go on in this destruction-oriented manner because we will never solve our problems. I know perhaps more than anybody else what poverty is all about. I lived on grass for three months. I come from Europe. Constantly people were coming and saying, "well, we will free you from the torture you have had before." So they came and they took everything away. They freed us from everything we had. We were left hungry.

Then the next one comes along and takes the blood out of you. Then there is another one comes along. They just keep coming and coming. It is the same thing as in a war but it is done in a peaceful manner. The Liberal party will come and say, "We will give to you what you need." Okay. So they came. They increased the taxes, they were thrown out. And so the Conservatives come in and they give it to you, they increase the taxes and they are thrown out. And so everybody keeps on freeing us from what we have.

What would be wrong if the poor person who found himself in a situation where he cannot help needing a boost in his life and where perhaps that little bit of a lift would put him on his way, what would happen if he were to get that help? If he needs help in housing, why not give him that housing? Give him the needed money and then say to him, "Here, we have given you an opportunity which will last five years. We will support you during those five years. Go out and find whatever you can. Earn as much money as you can. Don't pay tax on it. In five years we will double the money you have saved." This would be an incentive to get out of the poverty cycle.

On the other hand, if you tell that same man, "You cannot earn that extra dollar and, if you do, we will cut you off", then where is the incentive? There is just no way that one can get out of that poverty cycle unless there is a way provided, and the only way, as I see it, is through an incentive program.

Anybody knows, if you find yourself in a hopeless situation, that your energy is at its lowest level, and you just have no will to go on. Why do people commit suicide? Because they find themselves at the level where their instinct is overpowered by the hopelessness of their situation and they think that there is no reason to live. It is the same thing with poverty. The only thing that keeps them alive is the instinct to survive. They don't know why they have to go on living and being subjected to all this but there is the instinct of survival that keeps them going, the hope for their children, and so on. But how long can anyone go on without hope?

I know that as I am saying this a lot of people are thinking, "You are full of a lot of hot air." May be so. However, we have been thinking this for a long time and we have not achieved anything better so far. Sure, there have been achievements, but why is it that when a man tries to upgrade himself somebody has to come along with a regulation and take it away from him?

I am still not beyond poverty. Perhaps it depends on the way you define it. I have to pay taxes on what I am earning, I am self-employed. I have five children and a father to take care of and also I have a wife. Now, I made out my tax papers. According to the law, you have to make a submission of what you made and how much you owe. However, you don't have to pay right away. I didn't have any money at the time, so I didn't pay.

Now, they phoned me and said, "You have to pay now." I said, "Are you short one tank or an airplane?" I have five children and I have my father to look after. I am darn sure that I will be looking after them first. If you don't like that you can take me away and you will have to feed them yourself."

Anyone tells me that this is against the law and that one should subordinate oneself to the master because the master says so, I would say he is full of hot air. And any time I have to pay tax and my children have to go hungry, that will be the day they will get me. Until this society re-orient itself and says to the government, "Now, look, enough is enough, and this is the time to change our total attitude, not our part-time attitude, not any piecemeal attitude, but the total attitude", until we do that, we will have no solution to these problems.

Of course there will always be the odd problem arising since we are human beings. There will always be additional problems arising. That is something that is part of life. However, basically, we keep creating the same problems. We take from Paul and give to Adam and vice versa, but we never make sure that Paul and Adam have enough at the same time.

I feel that this is one thing that the government should re-orient itself on. Sweden has done something about it. There are other countries that have done something about it. There seems to be still all about this destructive attitude which is so prevalent as compared to any constructive attitude. I was talking to this senator earlier. If I came to the government almost any government, and I said, "I have one weapon that will kill millions of people but I also have another one that will bring them up to the level of well-being we all seem to want", which one do you think they will ask for first? The destructive one? Why? Because destructive power is visible. They get a lot of excitement out of it. The papers will pick it up and so on. However, the thing that does good who cares? It is a big yawn.

I would also like to point out that this is a ridiculous system we have whereby we send a representative forward from the city of Toronto—or it could be from anywhere else—and we feel that representative shares our feelings and that he is going to speak for us in Ottawa. What does he do in Ottawa? They tell him sit down and shut up because he is not ready to go into the melting pot up there.

You all know the gentleman I am about to mention Mr. Givens. He is a very good example of what I am talking about. We thought he was an experienced man from the city who knew what was ailing it, and he would be going down there and telling them about the problems of the city. How many chances did he get to speak or how much was he listened to? He was reprimanded apparently, from what I read in the papers anyhow, because he spoke up against the mighty Trudeau. Who is Trudeau or anybody else to tell that person that he should not speak?

I believe that every M.P. or M.P.P. that is sent to represent us in government has equal rights from the time he or she is elected until the time he or she is thrown out. There should be no clique, no melting pot that you cannot fit into until you are conditioned to fit into it, conditioned to thinking the way they think. That is a fallacy, and I think that should be changed. Thank you.

The Chairman: Toronto has been the magnet for immigrants, and one of the most recent groups that has reached this city has been the Portugese. I am now going to call on their representative to address us.

Mr. Antonio Prates, Portuguese Canadian Congress: Mr. Chairman, members of the committee, ladies and gentlemen, my name is Antonio Prates and I am with the Portuguese Canadian Congress.

My major function in speaking now is to bring to record a letter that the Congress has sent to the rector of the committee in Ottawa, Mr. Fred Joyce.

After reading this letter I would like to introduce the president of the Congress, Mr. Manuel Mira, who would like to make a brief comment.

Dear Mr. Joyce: The directive body of the Portuguese Canadian Congress thanks you very much for your letter of the 25th February.

Due to the fact that the P.C.C. is a body formed by the mandate representatives of the major Ontario and some Montreal Portuguese groups, our internal regulations make it physically impossible to prepare, with such a short notice, a suitable brief, which could deserve your committee's scope and aims. With a more generous time lapse we would willingly present our opinions on the subject. However, we can, as directors of the Portuguese Canadian Congress, be present and discuss, as observers, the problem of poverty as the conference goes along.

We are aware that you have at your disposal literally thousands of scientific papers and journals on poverty. Duplication of such studies is a waste of time. Factual data, to be reliable, are to be collected carefully, and we do not have the physical possibility to do just that. This is why we are reticent in submitting any form of brief, and even hesitate to make verbal statements on facts that do not have relevant generalizations.

Respectfully yours, Antonio V. B. Prates, B.A., Vice President.

will now introduce Mr. Mira.

Mr. Manuel Mira, President, Portuguese Canadian Congress: Thank you, Mr. Prates. Mr. Chairman, senators, ladies and gentlemen, the Portuguese Canadian Congress patronizes the brief presented by the St. Christopher House officer.

It is well prepared and touches on the major problems of this geographical area. However, its scope is geared to a narrower area, namely the one served by St. Christopher House, than this committee is investigating. The recommendations of this brief follow logically from the premises developed.

The Portuguese Canadian Congress would like to add one or two facets of a more general scope. There may be a specific region, between the immigrant and the older officers, or figures of authority, that causes some sizeable unpleasantness and hard feelings between both. The lower echelons of authority in direct contact with the immigrants have become conditioned to react with abruptness when they are interacting with the immigrants who do not speak intelligibly the host country's language. This, together with the uneasy state of mind of the immigrant, who can not make his difficulties understood, make for the rest of what appears to be a guilt feeling—something is wrong with this man.

An apparently simple situation in the present may become a big problem in the future fraught with mistrust and misconstrued ideas of what the people in authority do and expect the immigrants to do.

When this by-product of a simple situation comes to the knowledge of the higher echelons it is so distorted that they have to spend much time and effort to grasp a clear picture of what has happened.

We therefore recommend that a much larger number of officers who speak the language of the immigrant be incorporated in the agencies of contact. These bilingual officers should be used to overcome the language barrier of the newcomers and guide them into their best productive roles in society. The immigrant should be helped not only upon his arrival but also for such period of time as is required for him to take the first acculturation steps and start faring for himself.

The bearing of the above on poverty does not require much elaboration. It leads to the several types of poverty, be it economic, sociologic, or psychologic.

Poverty is a relative concept. There are 'poor' with more than ten thousand dollars a year, and 'rich people' on only eight. The expected riches, as compared to the possessions of the moment, is the measuring rod of individual poverty. Therefore, when the immigrant is made feel so poor that he cannot even communicate his survival needs, something or someone should do something about it.

We praise this committee for the difficult goal that you have set for yourselves. May you attain a feasible solution without increasing too much our taxes. Thank you.

The Chairman: Thank you. I will next call on Mr. Ed Clarke, the Toronto Negro Veteran's Association.

Mr. Edward J. Clarke, Secretary, Toronto Negro Veterans' Association: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. One of the problems we are talking about is the poor, the people we commonly consider to have lack of desire and lack of motivation, all of which is usually due to a lack of opportunity, schooling, housing, etc. They are comprised of the following groups, the welfare, the disabled, the pensioners, the unemployed, the working poor, the immigrants, and the minorities. It also should be pointed out that a great majority of those same groups are functionally illiterate in our society today.

These problems have been paramount in this country and increasingly so for the last 300 years due to discrimination, bigotry, prejudice fostered by churches, governments, institutions, business, labour and our civil service. Another problem we have with the youth and teens is that we need an enlarged youth bureau to concentrate on the youth and teens and to promote counselling of the youth by themselves. Any research should be conducted by the people directly concerned, not by governments, not by institutions and not by social agencies.

Progress is not telling people how to live. It is letting people decide for themselves. This way we endorse full dignity of human beings instead of the apathetic, fear-guided persons that make up one in every five Canadians. They have no desire or will to take a stand or to tilt at windmills. If Ontario, if Toronto, if Canada wants to continue to advertise itself as being a place where a person can take a stand, then those in the majority, the businessmen, the industrial leaders, the bankers, the merchants, the government leaders, the bureaucrats, the institutions including unions, both professional and labour, must move over and let this 20% of the people share what is rightfully theirs.

The poor, the disabled, the pensioners, the old aged and the welfare recipients should also be entitled to better grants-in-aid. In fact, exemptions for churches should be removed. Schools are now state-supported whereas the churches used to support them.

The working poor and the poverty-living families should have a basic exemption of $5,000 per family in income before they are taxed, and that should include welfare or any earnings they might make, while everybody else that is more or less considered in the middle class or the upper middle class pays their regular taxes. Loopholes that are becoming more and more apparent every day in our tax structure, so that companies and individuals are not paying their right taxes, should be closed up. Everyone else on the tax rolls should continue to pay their regular tax load.

Churches, governments, corporations should provide money for the minorities in order to enable them to draw up their own programs to enable them to become first-class citizens.

The black man has lived, worked, fought and died for this country for 300 years. He has helped build this country. Yet our history books, the same as with many other minorities, like the Portugese, the Spaniards, the Italians and the native Indians, do not give them their due in our school curricula. As a consequence, the children grow up hating themselves because of their nationalities.

The bigotry, prejudice and discrimination that is applied in government and institutions to our people has continually denied them progress as a cultural group and withered the community's bonds of association.

Canadian immigration department inspectors and clerks have openly broken the laws when it comes to admitting immigrants to this country. The department should have its personnel trained continually as to what the law is so that when immigrants apply for immigration to this country they can get a straight answer and not be denied admission because of race, colour or creed.

Medical and hospital insurance should be available from the time an immigrant arrives here. The mental and sanitarium people should be covered under OHSP and other plans by the government.

The majority must be re-educated to enable them to accept all peoples on their abilities and not their colour or race.

The information services of government should be updated to include the multi-racial cultures that make up Canada.

Radio, press and TV, as well as periodicals, must update their staffs as to the society we are building and make it possible for more ethnic peoples to become part of their management and decision-making regarding what is news. This will help to restore the communication dialogue within the major and minority minorities of this country.

To handle this job we cannot wait until the discontent in Quebec and other isolated cities heats up and divides Canada into Balkan states. We need a department of civil rights and equal opportunities.

With the experience gained by Sweden, the United States, Japan and Britain in this sort of thing, our programs should benefit because we must be prepared to spend a billion dollars over the next three years on this problem.

More native cultural and ethnic groups should be handling these programs and the money, not the churches, and not the institutions, because they are not interested in making people equal; they are merely offering a benign attitude to the effect that, "There is this life for others and we will tell you how to do it."

We should be spending more of our subsidies providing aid to overseas countries, undeveloped countries, so that when those immigrants come here they can think of what the Canadian fabric is made of.

The lands of the Indian nation should be developed by themselves for themselves and they should have full citizenship on and off their reserves.

The following should be considered if we are going to help our people:

1. A city community council on teens and young adults' opportunities formed and funded to help administration and designate locations for summer projects.

2. Year-round projects be funded in addition to summer programs.

3. Large corporations, companies and institutions provide trained teaching aid for adults and youth in the city core, and provide regular permanent jobs with a future after such courses.

4. Schools be open during summer and other hours so that labs, shops and machines can be used in this training.

5. That all economic requirements and restrictions be lifted, including the local stipulations that parents on welfare benefits and/or their children who work in training or re-training and receive benefits in wages, take a cut in welfare cheques or are dropped from welfare rolls.

6. That where possible these training programs begin ere summer closes the schools or wherein cases like universities, high schools, trade schools, they are continuing, before, during and after regular hours, hat they be used.

7. Funds that are available should be on a continuing basis and not returned to their original sources but be used in putting more people into these programs.

8. Community communications be put on a permanent basis for use.

9. Recreational and social facilities be made available and run by each area's residents with the help f supervisory personnel.

astly, I have one other item here that I think is important. Because our country is in deep trouble wh racism, and as this has been a way of life for the minority against the minority for the past 300 years, w therefore ask that the government should have a fu and impartial inquiry into all of the problems of tl majority and their latent hostility towards the minorities in this country, and we suggest that the vious public and private agencies and the civil sants should be included in this inquiry.

e recommend that the enquiry study and detail the orin and probable solutions of the problems relating tche fields of economic, social, political and race ises that are past, present and possible in the future, an specifically to study the following in detail: authority, both bureaucratic and police; education; chesing; discrimination, cause or effect; fear; culture, an the social attitudes of people.

at committee or inquiry should be representative of the broad spectrum of our society including the olks, the Indians, the immigrants from Europe, Afca and other countries. Their findings should be oerned with the lack of participation by the minorities in the management and use of public-ured agencies and institutions such as the univer- sity and welfare. Their findings should also be concerned with the denial of suitable jobs and promotions in such jobs and the denial of a chance of starting or operating businesses for private gain by the minority and how this then denies the minority peoples their lawfully given right to become fully integrated as equal people with the same rights and privileges as the majority enjoy.

The inquiry should also be concerned with the accepted and unwritten laws which deny the minority peoples their rights in acquiring better educations.

The Chairman: Well, it is nice to hear it like it is. We hear a great deal of discussion about the poor participating. If this is any example of the kind of participation we are going to get, we welcome it.

I think at this time I will throw the meeting open for any questions that are to be asked. Would you make it short and give us your names in order that the reporter may make a note of them? We will be glad to answer as best we can, or obtain answers from some of the people that have spoken.

Mrs. Pauline Shapiro: I would like to express the opinion that the establishment is making people too dependent on the government. I was born in a small town in 1911 and I never heard the word "poverty" in that town or even in that county. People there planted their own potatoes, they looked after their gardens and orchards and they seemed to provide for themselves. Why now are people not providing for themselves and doing things for themselves rather than appealing to the government constantly for aid and help? Isn't this actually what is wrong with the approach?

I feel that a country is only as rich as the attitudes of its people. I feel the people are not being trained to have the right approach.

The Chairman: Is there anybody else who would like to say anything? Dan, would you like to answer that? Or is there anybody else who would like to answer?

Mrs. I. Smolsky: Mr. Chairman, I live in Ontario Housing and we are not allowed to plant tomatoes much less potatoes.

Mrs. Shapiro: May I add something to what I have already said? When a family is on welfare and a woman goes out to work she wants to buy something extra for her children at Christmastime but she has to give that money back to the welfare department, the money she has earned, the extra $60 or $70. Is that encouraging people to be self-reliant and to try to rise above the atmosphere they are in?

The Chairman: Well, madam, one of the purposes of the exercise that the Senate Committee has undertaken is to look into the welfare system. We have repeatedly said, as have many groups coming before us, that it is unsatisfactory and is not doing its job and needs to be changed in this day and age. There has been no voice raised in favour of the system in the respect in which you speak. I think it is generally felt that some very radical changes have to be made in the system.

Mrs. Shapiro: I object to the work "poor". I feel everybody in Canada is poor. We are breathing dirty air, we are drinking dirty water. I don't feel there are any people who are really well off. I don't like people being classified as poor just because they have no money.

In the little town of which I spoke we had very few people who had money but yet we were all rich in many respects. We had everything that money can buy today. We were healthy and we had clean water to drink and pure air to breathe. We had eggs from the chickens and we had lots of fowl to eat and everything was provided that we required. But, as I say, there was very little money floating around.

I feel that you are concentrating too much on handing out money and you are not concentrating enough on educating people how to make life interesting and how to solve their own problems and think for themselves. I don't like the approach at all. I think it is wicked. I think it is terrible. I think you are wrecking the country. I sincerely and honestly think that. I despise public housing.

The Chairman: Take it easy.

Mrs. L. Wood: I want to reply to that lady. She is talking about people who she says are constantly saying they should be given more. I don't think you realize that in Ontario, and in Toronto more specifically, today you cannot do too much to help yourself. You say that people should get out and do more. I am associated with a group of mothers on welfare. We each have three or more children and we are at the university. I am sure if you read the Star you would understand how much begging one has to do to the Ontario government to be allowed a chance—and I would like to underline this—to use our own brains and help ourselves. We are still in school. We are slowly starving to death on our welfare cheques while we are trying to keep ourselves going. I mean, we could break under the pressure. We are studying day and night subjects that are designed for young teen-agers just out of grade XIII. However, we are trying.

The Ontario government was extremely generous to me this year. It allowed me to borrow $600 to go to school. When I finish school and try to get back into the work force, still trying to support my three children, it is going to demand repayment of that loan.

When I tried to get into university I was ready to tell them almost anything. I am in there now. Hopefully I can keep my marks up. I would like to stay in there until I have a PhD. At that time I will owe the Ontario government a lot of money, and I will have to pay a lot of interest on it.

But is this the best way the government can let us help ourselves? Is this the best way that they can let us do our own thinking, use our own resources? No doubt a few can say, "I worked my way through university". There is no doubt that we should all be encouraged to help ourselves. You, for instance, are saying that. Everybody is saying that. But you have no idea how hard it is to stand on your own two feet and rear back and say, "Oh, I cannot live on this welfare want a chance, I am intelligent, I have a brain and want to use it."

If we are successfully graduated from the university the effect will be to turn out a group of people who have raised their social status by getting a diploma degree. Unfortunately, it will also turn out intellectuals who have to get down and take anything that comes along in order to immediately start paying back the Ontario government. I won't have a dime upon graduation when I am ready to go out and take on a job of work which I feel I am capable of handling and have to get out and work and support those children and pay back the Ontario government. However, I am very grateful to the Ontario government.

The Chairman: Yes. Thank you.

Mrs. Shapiro: This lady claims she has three children and she is going through university to get a PhD. The average taxpayer in Toronto, she feels, should keep her in university. Now, I agree if she is an intelligent woman she should go to university. I know lots of people with PhDs that cannot get a job and therefore cannot support one child, let alone three. When she is through school there is no guarantee she will have the money to pay back the government. The PhD too does not carry as much weight as the ability of a bricklayer when he goes out to get employment. It gets it faster.

The main thing that a mother should think of is her children, in my opinion. I want to know if she will be a better mother or if her children will get a better break in this world of ours if she has a PhD?

The Chairman: Madam, she thinks that she can improve her life and the opportunities for her children. The vast majority of Canadian people share the same view that she does and feel that people who do what she is doing are entitled to every possible support. I think we all encourage them to do that. That is the way it is now. That is the way it will be tomorrow. That is the Canadian life of tomorrow.

Mrs. Shapiro: Mr. Chairman, I know people who are going to university and getting one degree and another only because they are afraid to face society and our world today. I know people who are leaving this country after they get all their degrees because they cannot get established here.

The Chairman: Let us get on.

Mrs. Wood: Mr. Chairman, I would just like to say that I am sick and tired, for instance, of soup. I just cannot eat any more.

The Chairman: Mrs. Wood, you were delightful. Leave it at that.

Mrs. B. Adams: Mr. Chairman, could I say something on this subject?

The Chairman: Mrs. Adams, we don't want anything like a cross-fire here. If you have anything to say that advances the discussion, please say it.

Mrs. Adams: Talking about people on welfare trying to improve themselves, it is not a case of asking the government for a handout, it is a case of whether they will just remain idle. Nobody is asking for a guarantee. It is just a matter of being able to say to oneself, "I tried my best. If I cannot succeed, at least I have tried."

With the people in the welfare office here today, if you go and ask for help for a job, they say, "Where is your guarantee? We want a written statement that you can prove you are going to have a job; then we will help you." Who is going to guarantee it?

My husband had a chance to go for a course. He has been on welfare for ten years because he is not allowed to work. The doctors have told him not to work. So he went to a different hospital and he said to them, "Look, I'm fine, I can work." The doctor wrote him out a slip. Then the welfare said, "Where is your proof you can get a job?" He almost had to get down on his knees to beg for a chance. They said, "Where is your proof? Where is your guarantee you are going to get a job?" There is no such guarantee. However, if he had the course and couldn't get a job, he could at least say, "I tried".

The Chairman: There is somebody back there who wishes to say something. Go ahead. Stand up, please.

Mr. Sam Snyder: Sam Snyder is the name. First of all, I would like to say something by way of an opening. I can remember some years back when there were a couple of people in politics. One person was named Croll and the other was Roebuck. I kept fighting them both mixed up. One of those gentlemen said a very interesting thing at that time that has stayed with me for about 40 years. One of them said, "I would sooner walk with the strikers than ride with (M)." "

The thing I want to say is this, it was very nice to hear about these welfare agencies, and all the various social services. However, the underlying basic thing is lack of funds to provide the necessities of life. As far as basics are concerned, the basic trouble seems to be money and also our attitudes, our personal attitudes to one another with regards to ethnic feelings. I think we are all foreigners of one kind or another.

If the government would invest in our greatest resource, people, and see to it that nobody got less than a little bit above the cost of living, no matter whether they were employed, unemployable or whatever, this would create a world sensation. It would not just become a new kind of Toronto in which we live; we would have all the people of the world wanting to come to this city or country which had no poverty. It would be a great thing. It would be more important than going to the moon. So there, ladies and gentlemen, you have a great undertaking. It is really worthy of you.

There is one more thing I would like to say and this is perhaps a little off the mark, that when we fill out our income tax forms they say, "Male, female, married, single, widower" and so forth. I think it should say, "Adult male, adult female, with or without dependents." Never mind whether you are married, single or otherwise. That happens to be somebody's own personal business.

Mrs. W. Eisen: As to youth allowances, as you know, when a child goes on in school there is no way they will extend the youth allowances to cover them during the whole period they are at school. Why don't they continue to extend the youth allowances until they have gone as far as they can go in school?

The Chairman: Well, of course, the theory is that at 18 he is out working. If he is at school we have available for him a student loan. Those things are available at the university level. Now, we have had briefs before us . . .

Mrs. Eisen: I have my own daughter in that situation.

The Chairman: Just a moment. We have had briefs before us suggesting that we have loans at the high school level.

Mrs. Eisen: There is another question I would like to ask. A man of, say, 59 or 60 who is unemployed for, say, a year, cannot get retrained. What is he to do?

The Chairman: Well, of course, this retraining matter is an item that comes before us constantly. We are disturbed about this, madam. We think that is one of the important matters that have had brought to our attention most. It is usually advanced on two bases, age and education. We think, of course, as Mr. Clarke says, the functioning man is more important than any other sort of man. I think all people understand that. So the problem is not new. It is a problem that needs remedying.

Mrs. Eisen: Why don't they hurry up with the remedy? It is affecting me and my family. This has been going on for over a year, Senator Croll.

The Chairman: Well, we have it from you now, madam. We have had this problem presented to us frequently. That is all I can tell you at the moment. It is not within our ability to solve it tonight.

Senator Everett has something to say.

Senator Everett: Just so you don't go away angry, madam, we are here to accept your recommendations and use them as input in our eventual decision as to recommendations to the government. It is therefore pretty difficult for the chairman to answer your question. What I would like to hear is what your recommendations are, what you feel should be done.

Mrs. Eisen: I feel they should give the man I was talking about re-training or send him to school. I mean, he still has a few years to live. They should do something for that sort of person if they cannot get jobs.

As to the youth allowance, I feel that it should be continued on while they are in school.

Senator Everett: As long as they are in high school, you mean?

Mrs. Eisen: Well, I hope my daughter could get a grant from the government.

Senator Everett: Do you say the loan should continue as long as they are in high school?

Mrs. Eisen: Yes.

Senator Everett: All right.

The Chairman: Thank you.

Mr. Antonio Vaz: I came to this country as an immigrant unable to speak English on May 16, 1955. I started my first job on May 18th. I changed to a couple of jobs of my own choosing. I was never unemployed one day.

From The Audience: You were lucky.

Mr. Vaz: May be it was luck. It required faith sometimes. It was sometimes very hard. Sometimes when you go to a grocery store, when you want to eat something, sometimes you cannot buy it. You have to learn to say "water" in order to say "water". I couldn't even say "please" or anything. I learned as came along.-Anyway, I think I have made it.

By the way, there is one thing I would like to recommend to any Canadian immigrant, that when they hear the propaganda overseas asking to have us come over, in spite of all the social agencies that make recommendations, there was one thing that had to pass through that I think you would like to hear about. I was sent to Halifax because the man first spoke to, the Canadian immigration officer, who couldn't understand my language, looked at one of my letters which had in it the word "valve" which is normally used on ships, and so he said, "Halifax". It is too bad he did not send me to another industrial city like Toronto. I had to come here on my own.

Anyway, we have poverty not only in money but many other ways. But let us deal with money, which brings us all here. I believe you are all looking for answers, not for questions. I believe that there are a lot of millions of dollars spent to aid people, and all we see is a lot of social agencies asking for more. One of the answers the government is going to ask about is "Where does the money come from?" Well, I have ideas of my own. I think there is plenty of money if it is used all in the right direction and is not wasted.

We have a welfare system which costs us millions and millions of dollars, and nobody is taking advantage of it, not the welfare recipients, not the government, not the taxpayers, not the country. We have unemployment insurance which pays able-bodied people who cannot work a fair amount of money, but that money is going to waste. You have incentives for this and that. You have compensation. All of the money, if it was all channelled into one pot and that pot was run by a proper social service, there it would be, paying the disabled a fair wage, but the able-bodied could work. They could be working and producing something. There are a lot of things that need to be built in this country. Why not pay a little more and make that money of some use? If we keep having everybody on welfare, there will be nobody to pay the taxes. Where are you going to get the money?

The Chairman: Thank you.

Mrs. M. Lachapelle: My husband works at the Salvation Army workshop. He has been asking, as have a few others here, why can they not get a regular job somewhere? They don't want to live on welfare. I have four children. One is a teen-ager and another will be a teen-ager next month. Why don't the welfare raise the welfare a bit so we can get them some clothes because they don't want to go to churches and get their clothes there?

The Chairman: One of the problems we have, of course, is the one you have just mentioned; it is so unique. We realize the kind of problems you present are the hard case ones that have to be dealt with.

Mr. Donald Dolson: I would like to suggest something that seems to have been overlooked at the present time and that is that there are a lot of people who cannot take advantage of retraining due to their personal abilities. They may not be able to retain the training that the schools are offering. They may be just that. They may have too many things on their minds. These same people have had a lot of human experience, however, and there are lots of people, women in particular, who may not have been able to go to school who have had all kinds of experience with children. These same people are much more qualified than run children, look after them in day-care centres, than a woman who has spent 20 or 30 years learning social work in university. The women in university are admirable, they have the technical training, but they do not have what you might call the apprenticeship as human beings. These women who have spent so much time with children can look after children in these day-care centres, whether they have had only grade 10 or 11, they could be used there. They do not need to be unemployed. And the same thing with a great many of the trades. I have taken several courses. I was trained a couple of times but I was not physically able to utilize the training I got.

The training was good. I appreciated it. However, I ended up by taking what I could get, a job which I was not physically capable of doing. I think there must be many people in the same situation.

So, therefore, it is not a matter of the technical training, it is putting the people with the abilities in the places where they can use those abilities. I think we are wasting a great deal of our potential in this way. Thank you.

The Chairman: We have been told on many occasions that in the day centres it is the custom that they will have one trained worker and call on volunteers, untrained workers.

Young lady, I believe you are at the day nursery here?

Miss Barbara Neat: Yes.

The Chairman: How many children do you have in the day nursery?

Miss Neat: A hundred children. We have five trained staff.

The Chairman: You are under the provincial government scheme?

Miss Neat: Yes.

The Chairman: There is another day-centre in this area, isn't there?

Miss Neat: Yes. The city provides day-care centres.

The Chairman: Are the people there all trained too?

Miss Neat: Yes, they have to be trained.

The Chairman: As a social worker, or trained in what?

Miss Neat: No, nursery school, pre-school.

The Chairman: Otherwise they are not taken on?

Miss Neat: Yes. While you are speaking to me, maybe I could make a point. I came from England ten years ago. I have a pre-school teaching certificate, and this does not only happen with me, I think it happens with a lot of people who come from other countries. English is my native tongue, and I think I speak English better than a good many Canadians do. However, I was told that I must go to university and take another course. This happens with people no matter what country they come from.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that Canada is losing a lot of people who have the necessary training and who have a great deal of experience, are highly qualified people, because Canada does not bother to find out what their training is. I was told I must go to university, but the people who told me did not know what my training consisted of.

Now I have worked here long enough, I have worked with enough Canadian people, Canadian-trained, and I know that my training was adequate. I have trained a good many students myself in my time. And there are other people from other countries who are equally well-qualified to do a job, lawyers, doctors, nurses, engineers. However, they must go back to school again. As a result, they have to take some job which is not well-paying. They are not using their knowledge or experience or the qualifications they have.

Canada should find out before it makes these stupid statements to immigrants. And they are stupid statements, telling people they must go back to school when they don't know themselves why they must go back to school.

The Chairman: They are attempting to upgrade you.

Miss Neat: No. They told me my training was not adequate. I said, "In what area is my training not adequate?" They didn't know because they didn't know what my training consisted of. This happens, as I say, with all professions, no matter where they come from.

If a person does not speak the country's language, this is understandable, because they need the language. However, if you speak the language, and your training is adequate, I think it is unnecessary to have further training. However, as I say, I had to take another course, and I went through a great deal of hardship as a result. In fact, there were times when I didn't eat. Here I was trying to train myself for something I was already trained to do.

The Chairman: Well, Mr. Maben, I don't know what day-care centre you may have been referring to. I think there have been some day-care centres where they have used some assistants on a voluntary basis in other areas. I don't know if those people are supplementing the staff that are in those agencies or not. I think most of the municipal day-care centres, from what Miss Neat has been saying, have people who are trained people rather than have just one person who is trained. One person has to be trained as a supervisor, I suppose, but the other people have to have training in order to run the day-care centre.

Miss Neat: There are some private ones.

Mr. Dolson: There is more than just one specific example. There are so many people who are actually trained but, like you say, one fully trained person should supervise somebody else who has the functional ability. I find this every place I go. I myself have had training in television. I have been trained as an ordinary serviceman. However, I have a back problem. And once you are away from it the technical part goes ahead so fast you simply cannot keep up with it. There are many other people in that same position. They are mismatched with their abilities. You had the suggestion here about a PhD who cannot get a job. This is true everywhere you go.

You meet people unexpectedly, whether it is in a garage or in a factory, who have experience in a trade but since they have not a specific diploma which is recognized in Canada they cannot get a job unless somebody says that they are qualified. But they won't give them a chance first to see if they are able to do it. They have to have the piece of paper first.

The same thing happens when one seeks training. You cannot get the job unless you have the union certificate. You cannot get the union certificate unless you have had an apprenticeship. You cannot get a job unless you have had experience. How are you going to get the experience? There is just no way. I had to take anything I could get.

I learned auto body work, spray painting, in 1946, and worked at $20 a week. That was the salary I started at, coming right from the farm. Then I went through the television course, an oil burner course and then refrigeration. I had to go back to spray painting because then I was unemployed. I could not get a job I could handle because I did not have previous experience. So there you are.

Mr. Americo Desousa: I would like to make a remark on something that Senator Croll said in his opening speech. He said that in the case of many people who come to Canada the world was bad when they came from and that it is better here. I'm sorry, do not agree with you because many of these people not for a few weeks or a few months, but for a few years, experience hell here compared with what they have left back home.

In the case of many professionals such as electricians and plumbers, for instance, we are told about the ridiculous outlook that they have on our papers. The people are told they must go through a refreshment course in order to obtain the papers to work in Canada. I do not think they would be so eager to leave to come to Canada if they knew what the situation was really going to be.

The thing is that the government officials over Europe use English to pass the tests which is ridiculous compared to the English that is needed in Canada. Many of those people come here with the hope that they will just be able to change their papers or somehow and go to work and the language will not be that much of a barrier. However, if they knew the true state of affairs they would not leave what they have back home and come to Canada.

The Chairman: Thank you. There is somebody back there, a young lady.

Miss Darlene Morray: I am not sure that there is anybody here who can answer my question. I am talking mostly about the school system. I am a volunteer working with emotionally disturbed school kids. These are kids that could not cope with the school system but they are still in the system. We have approximately 120 kids between the ages of 4 and 18 and it is run strictly by high school volunteers.

Just by looking at the kids you can pick out which ones are going to make it in life and which ones are going to be down there all their lives. I was brought up in Regent Park and I know what it is like.

I have heard of one school, Beverley School, and toured it once. It is a school where these kids cannot read. However, are there any more of these schools? I was with one of the kids I had under my care to go to school, to a public school, and she was in grade 6, she couldn't read, she couldn't even spell her name properly. She was still in grade 6. I asked the teacher why and she said, "Well, you know, she is 13 and has been failing every year." After failing twice they just put her forward because there was no place else for her. They just kept pushing her up. She is never going to make it. She is never going to be able to get a chance. She cannot speak properly even. She is really though a mentally competent person; she could go to work if she were only given a chance some place. I think she has to be given a chance.

Why are there not more special schools, more trained people, more people who could deal with such people? She cannot cope with life as it is. There are hundreds of these kids, not just one.

The Chairman: What school are you at?

Miss Morray: I am not at school.

The Chairman: Where are you helping?

Miss Morray: In the inner city.

Mr. Clarke: That is why I raised the point in my remarks about the disturbed people, the kids. This is the problem that arises because we have in our classrooms, as somebody else mentioned earlier, I believe, as many as 30 to 40 children. The teacher does not have the time to deal closely with the children, so they gradually promote the children and they may be making even in basic reading and comprehension skills. The teacher says, "Well, I will have to pass you on."

When we take this subject up with the school board, they say, "We don't have the teachers to spend the time teaching those kids those skills." There are a couple of schools now, where during the summer holidays, they take children in for these special classes. At those classes cost $300 to $400. They are classes where they teach them these basic skills in order to bring them up to the capacity where they can understand and read.

Unless we put more money into our school system and reduce the number of children in these classes so that the child is not dropped into the opportunity or put into the emotionally disturbed schools, all we deal with these specific problems that the children have, just so that they can understand enough to read, write and to speak properly, all the rest of the school's academic program is wasted.

The Chairman: Well, that was in the report of the commission of government quite some time ago. There was quite a hullabaloo about it in the province.

es, Mr. Martyniuk.

Mr. Martyniuk: Mr. Chairman, there was one point raised here I would like to go into. The government spends approximately somewhere between $150 million to $175 million, and it may be more now, in revenues by way of taxes on alcohol. From what I have read in the papers, they spend about $180,000 a year on research into alcoholism. Alcohol has created perhaps more poverty than any other one item. However, taking in so much money, it hasn't put back a relatively equal sum into research as a guarantee that if you consume alcohol you have a certain type of assurance you will get help if you are unable to handle it?

You can say, of course, that you don't have to drink. That is true. However, not everybody can regulate themselves or is aware of what is happening to him until it happens. I believe you could have sort of an insurance included in the consumption of alcohol, part of it being money the government would relinquish, the tax part, and part of it the company would pay, so that if this person becomes alcoholic, and many do, as we know, he has a chance of getting free care until he either gets well or is cared for so that the taxpayers as a whole do not have to pay for it.

That, in my opinion, is a very logical program which could be extended to many other areas, into research in the fields of alcoholism or any of these potentially dangerous drugs of whatever nature they may be. In my opinion they should have that insurance so that if something happens to a person because of what they have consumed they can be taken care of by those that have made fortunes out of it.

The Chairman: Well, Dan, you have a unique idea there. Let me just say that there is constant research. However, I have no answer on that problem for you tonight. I can only say that the government does embark on research into this field. It is a very personal problem and it is one that belongs to the provincial government. It should not be within our purview of poverty in this Senate hearing.

Mr. Delfim Viana: I have a question. As you know, over the years, there have been many immigrants, not all, but say 80%, who have had retraining, ones that come from Portugal, Italy and Spain, say. Do you know how many, say, ten years ago were on welfare and how many of such immigrants are on welfare, say, three years ago? There might be a solution there. The solution might be to call back those immigrants who have had no re-training from ten years up to three years ago and start retraining more of them.

The Chairman: Mr. Joyce reminds me that Mr. Anderson, the welfare commissioner, told us something about that, that there were 1700 immigrants on welfare, I think it was.

Miss Brown, do you have the correct figures?

Miss K. Brown: I am quoting from memory, Mr. Chairman, too, but I think what he said was of the 1700 families who had gone on welfare, I believe within the first year of their residence in Metro, 1400 were Canadian migrants and 300 families were immigrants.

The Chairman: That's it.

Mr. Viana: So the schooling is not helping them at all.

The Chairman: Well, it must be helping them.

Mr. Viana: Why don't you retrain the people who don't have any schooling at all?

The Chairman: That is one of the problems.

Mr. Viana: Since I came here eight years ago, I listen on the radio and read in the newspapers that you have generations of families on welfare, generation after generation. Why don't you inform them, those who get cheques at the end of every month, why don't you tell them to get a cheque at school? Why don't you retrain them?

The Chairman: We will consider what you have said. I believe there is a young man back there who wishes to say something.

Mr. Brian Nasimok: Mr. Chairman, so far we have been mentioning a lot about money and goods and services. The point I would like to discuss is mentioned in the St. Christopher House brief. That is education for the young. I am talking about the universal accessibility of the young to get at least into high school and even into post-secondary education. As time goes on the education needs are growing more and more. You will find that in your post-secondary institutions you have an unfair majority of the middle and upper classes attending school whereas the lower or the poorer classes do not have the opportunity to get into the higher end of high school, let alone university or community college. I think this is another thing that must be looked into. That is how we can get the students who are forced or seem to be forced out in grade 9, and who have the ability to go on, to get them to go on. I think we should be concentrating on that and giving them the opportunity that others have.

The Chairman: Is there anyone else?

Miss Margo Kleiker: I wanted to mention something about a group that has been around for years and years, the older people. Their problems are hidden behind walls. The people I am working with are not able to get out. I just want to say that in spite of the fact that you don't see their problems you should, please, do something about them.

The Chairman: Thank you.

Mr. E. A. Edison: Senator Croll, ladies and gentlemen, I would like to speak about the members of our society. Man is a member of that society, woman is a member, students are members, and, last but not least, the Indian is a member. I think we have to look at all these things. I am going to say something on behalf of students because I am in Seneca College, which is a community college of applied arts and technology, which is in fact a retraining program.

Now, I worked for three years. I didn't know what way I was going to go. I decided I would go back to school, so I went to Seneca College. I worked at the House of Concord for a while, a place for teen-agers who have had various troubles, you know, usually with the law. So naturally I was oriented to social welfare work. So I said, "Fine, I will go to Seneca College." I went there and I am in a two-year course on social services.

Now I find that, after attending there a year, when you get out there isn't too much chance of really gaining a job in this area.

I don't care what anybody says, there really isn't much chance of gaining a job in this work. Since the college first opened three and a half years ago the first graduates have come out and 30% of them went into social welfare work and 40% of them have gone to teachers' college and 20% of them are sitting on the sidelines doing nothing. So the government has this retraining program but what the hell good is it doing?

The Chairman: Did you say social welfare?

Mr. Edison: Yes.

The Chairman: Well, they are as scarce as hen's teeth. Every advertisement in the social welfare council books I get is asking for them, asking for anyone at all who is a social welfare worker.

Mr. Edison: Out of a university, maybe. This is not a university I am speaking of.

The Chairman: When I asked you whether it was a social welfare worker position you were speaking of you said, "Yes." I assumed you were going to college. You say Seneca College doesn't give you a degree the same as a university?

Mr. Edison: No, it gives you a diploma.

The Chairman: A diploma for what?

Mr. Edison: For social welfare.

The Chairman: Without the degree?

Mr. Edison: That's right.

The Chairman: And it is a two-year course as against what? A four-year course?

Mr. Edison: Yes.

Mr. Clarke: The other one gives the M.S.W.

The Chairman: Yes, I understand.

Mr. Edison: Okay, if they want to go further in their education, the first two years at Seneca College are pretty well identical to the first year at the university. If I want to go on I have to go back to first year university. The government started this school, the provincial government started this school. They are putting quite a bit of the shot on this thing. I would just like to say that there are a lot of people in these colleges who are not from the middle class. A lot of the people in these colleges are from the poorer class because it is not an expensive thing to go to. The big problem is that once they get out of the college they still have trouble finding employment. I think the thing here is that the government, before they even accept these people for going through these courses at the college, should give them some sort of guarantee that they will have employment when they complete the course.

There is another point I would like to mention. You see, and I cannot quote your words exactly, but you see, if there is one thing this country needs it is people.

The Chairman: Yes, I said that.

Mr. Edison: With the number of people we have here and the amount of unemployment, the amount of welfare, I cannot see why you want more people here until we clear up the problems of the people we have here now. That is all. Thank you.

Mr. Ken Acton: Mr. Chairman, senators, I am very happy to have been at this meeting to hear the different speakers. There has been quite a lot of discussion from the floor tonight. I hope that there has been a note made of all these brilliant suggestions and if possible, you can put them into practice.

Now, with regard to the recommendation from St. Christopher House, I looked through it and I feel that it is quite feasible, and I would like to suggest that the senators take this matter under advisement and work out to the best of their ability and help to improve the community as much as possible.

I think the director of St. Christopher House did mention something about a new building to condense the activities of St. Christopher House. I think that is a very fine thought. This building has been here many years. Of course the community is much larger with all the people coming in and we need more space. Therefore I think this recommendation from St. Christopher House should be fully considered, Mr. Chairman.

I would like to hear from you or from any department of government about this. The time is getting late. It is after ten. Of course, we have been talking a long, long time, but we must come to the point. Thank you.

From The Audience: I would like to make a suggestion concerning education, and that is that there is only one person that I know of who can handle our problem and that would be Joey Smallwood of Newfoundland. He is the only one who has done such a good job, and that is in his advancement of education in the province of Newfoundland. If more people would accomplish things like that we would have advances in education.

Mr. Mira: There is one point I would like to bring to your attention again, and it has been mentioned by a few immigrants here, and that is the lack of information centres at the landing points of immigrants. It is the lack of co-ordination between the provincial authorities and federal authorities at the landing points. A lot of the problems with some of the immigrants lies in the fact that right at the landing point they do not know where to go outside. I know a number of cases where, if they did not get help fast enough, they would have wound up on welfare. Fortunately, they did receive help.

The airlines, when they land immigrants, try to get rid of them as fast as possible. The immigration authorities go through your health certificates and passports and say, "Everything is fine, you are in good health, go on." When he goes to look for his luggage, he cannot speak the language, he is alone, and if he does not have a friend to tell him something he is entirely on his own. Some problems, as I say, start right there like that, right at the landing point.

My suggestion or recommendation, and this is not very difficult, is that, after all the federal government spends in the way of money in overseas offices, they should do something about the situation at the landing points. There is a lot of money spent there already because a lot of immigrants or prospective immigrants receive a lot of interviews. I am not asking for very much, just that the immigration officer, when he receives the immigrant, be prepared with, say, a package, perhaps a questionnaire in the immigrant's own language, to be filled out and the information could be given back to the immigrant, enough information to carry on in his own language and get him started. That would not be very expensive. It might even be done in co-ordination with some of the social agencies at the landing points.

Mr. Chairman, I am talking about the landing ports where the immigrants make their first contacts with Canada. We should have someone there who speaks their language. This is just a recommendation, something that should be looked into. I have had very many experiences where mothers have landed with their children and their husbands were sometimes not waiting for them at the airport, and these mothers could not speak the language. Sometimes they haven't any money, they have children in their arms, and they have to go somewhere to meet their husbands. Sometimes their husbands live in northern Ontario or other places far away. They don't know where to go. The airlines don't want anything to do with them. They are finished with them. They collect the fares and that's it.

Fortunately, sometimes there is a helping hand about, a friend or someone who gives them board and room and sends them on their way, but in the case of many of them, mothers and children, they face problems in the way I have mentioned.

Would you please, Mr. Senator, consider that?

Mr. Maben: May I respond to that, Mr. Chairman?

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Maben: I started out in my concern with immigrants in 1957 when I was working in an immigrant welcome centre during the summer at an airport. This is the type of thing that I think to a certain extent Mr. Mira is suggesting. Why that type of service broke down I don't know. It used youth volunteers; it was run by the social planning council at that particular time. I would think what is being suggested could be run by volunteers. We used interpreters on the telephone, which presented an opportunity for us to pick up various languages, and I am sure it did assist a great number of people coming in when immigration turned the problems over to us.

Further to that, I think Mr. Mira may be saying that the immigration department might have a closer link to any services like that because it depends on whether or not they were accepting types like us in immigration offices at the time or whether they would kick us out, saying, "You have no authority, get out of here, we don't want you, you have no official status here, don't come inside our door."

Mr. Alf Barclay: The gentleman from the Portuguese Canadian Congress was advised on February 25th, was it, to present a brief to this meeting. Is it the policy of this committee to give organizations such a short time to present briefs, to gather up this sort of information? If so, how is this going to encourage people to come here, such limited time? It is all very well to come forward with a statement of basic interest but I think you gentlemen, in the limited time you have crossing the country, need more than just basic motherhood statements from the various organizations. I would like to know if that is your policy, to give such short notice?

The Chairman: We have had no complaints about short notice. If people asked for more time they could have it.

Mr. Barclay: How could you have given longer time if you were scheduled to be in Toronto on a particular date?

The Chairman: We have had 23 briefs ready for us. We could have had 46 from people who were prepared to come.

Mr. Barclay: We had one brief here that could not be presented.

The Chairman: They cannot all be presented.

Mr. Barclay: Well, do you think two weeks is sufficient time?

The Chairman: You could have prepared a shorter brief.

Mr. Barclay: Well, there is always the intensity of argument that might arise.

The Chairman: Well, here you are. There has been this intensity of argument here tonight.

Mr. Barclay: I am speaking of other groups that might have been affected.

The Chairman: I hadn't seen that letter at all.

Mr. Mira: We would have liked to prepare a lengthier brief with a more complex study.

The Chairman: As I say, I have never seen the letter. When was it mailed?

Mr. Mira: March 9th.

The Chairman: If you wish to send in a further brief you may.

Mr. Mira: We covered ourselves by stating we would be willing to present a further brief. We are not refused that opportunity, are we?

The Chairman: Oh, no. It has just been pointed out to me that if there is any doubt in your mind or if anyone has any form of brief that he wants to present, we will be glad to have it sent to us. Just send it to "O.H.M.S.", which means without a stamp.

We have had an excellent evening with you people and you have listened to us and we have listened to you. We will consider the presentations that have been made. We will make recommendations in due course. Thank you on behalf of myself and the senators of this committee.

The committee adjourned.

THE SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON POVERTY

EVIDENCE

Toronto, Wednesday, March 11, 1970.

The Special Senate Committee on Poverty, (Subcommittee "B"), met this day at 2.00 p.m., at Ryerson Polytechnical Institute, Toronto.

Senator Carter (Chairman) in the Chair.

The Chairman: The meeting will come to order. We have three witnesses this afternoon, one at 2.00 p.m., one at 3.00 p.m., and another at 4.00 p.m. The first brief will be presented by the Social Service Course students of Ryerson Polytechnical Institute. With us, spokesman, is Mr. P. A. Hanrahan, Chairman of this assignment.

I would like to compliment him on its excellence and the particular manner in which he selected different approaches and the general presentation of his findings.

Mr. Hanrahan can take it for granted that we have read his report and now if he would like to add to the report or if he would like to stress some of the highlights, I would ask him to take a few minutes for a brief opening statement and also to introduce, to the audience, his assistants who are here with him and then after that we will turn the meeting open for questions.

Mr. P. A. Hanrahan, Second Year Student, Social Service Course, Ryerson Polytechnical Institute: Thank you, very much. What I did want to do was to read out the summary that we have prepared. It is not quite as long as the brief but I hope we have included everything in it.

I will introduce, before I start, those who appear with me at this table. At my far left is Elizabeth Pers, who was secretary of the committee. Sitting on my right is Sue Fitchett, who is in charge of the group conducting inquiries into the attitudes of the middle class.

So, if I may, I will just start reading the statement of the summary of the brief.

The students of the Social Services Course at Ryerson Polytechnical Institute originally set out to present a brief which would illuminate the factors leading Welfare Recipients into the Welfare System. There was a consensus of opinion that not only are welfare recipients living in poverty, but they are in general unable for some reason to become self supporting. We were soon to learn why they continue to live in poverty. The absolute hopelessness of their situation and the futility of attempting to do anything about it makes them adjust to their impoverished circumstances, to make them somehow more comfortable. They must, because they have no other choice. There is not only the problem of living in poor housing, the problem of having limited education, the problem of poor health, the problem of being unskilled, the problem of being snubbed by society, the problem of poor nourishment, the problem of cheap and shabby clothing, the problem of over crowding, the problem of insufficient recreational facilities, or the problem of social attitudes twisted through deprivation. Any one or two of these problems could possibly be treated successfully, but when families have all these problems to deal with at the same time, is there any wonder that they become bewildered, apathetic and eventually drop out?

Poverty has been studied for hundreds of years, and yet we have as much poverty now as ever. The poverty may not be of the same quality, but has the quantity changed? Certainly no one starves to death these days, but can we say that merely because everyone has daily meals of a sort, we are any further ahead?

Obviously not, otherwise we would not be here today looking for solutions.

Our committee meetings and enquiries produced no new facts. Everything we came up with had been studied and documented long before we got down to it. The areas we selected for deeper investigation were Assets and Income, Housing, Education, Attitudes of Welfare Recipients, Attitudes of others towards Welfare Recipients, Supportive Services, and Vocational Training, re-training and up-grading. Some Welfare Agencies refused us assistance in contacting welfare recipients, and some welfare recipients wanted no part of our survey. This would indicate to us that sufficient probing and questioning has been carried out, and that everyone, welfare recipients included, are weary and skeptical of surveys, studies and discussions.

You gentlemen and your companions have been travelling the length and breadth of the country, learning some of the problems of the poor. Any which you may not have been told about can be found documented from previous surveys. You will attempt to find solutions to these problems, but all that this will accomplish will be to treat a symptom of poverty, not poverty itself. Another band-aid will be placed over the festering sore, and hopefully that will hold for a while, only to grow worse under the mass of band-aids. A way may be found to give some poor person a mattress, or a suit of clothes, but can this take him out of poverty?

Whatever the causes of poverty might be, poverty is essentially economic. The resources of this bountiful country are not being distributed to all of its residents. If our capitalistic system fails to funnel a fair share of resources to all, another way must be found to induce this artificially. The poor must be enabled to earn sufficient money to sustain themselves at a humane and dignified level. If this can not be achieved, then what they are unable to earn must be given to them as a right. In order to re-distribute anything at all, the "have-nots" must receive from the "haves". This will not occur as a voluntary measure by those who have. Government therefore must enforce it. If we could not see the necessity for this, we would not now have a Welfare System at all, because this is all that Welfare consists of. The reason it does not eliminate poverty is because it is too meagre. The nation as a whole is too miserly. Whilst we eat steaks, we allow those who have no food to lick our plates so that they do not starve, then we pat ourselves on the back for feeding them. The wealthy think nothing of spending an amount for a good night out which would feed, clothe and shelter a poor person for a month.

The poor need money. Money is a basic necessity in a capitalist society. With this in mind, we propose the following economic measures:

- 1) For those unable for any reason to earn a living through employment, there should be a built-in increase in Welfare and other Social Assistance Allowances, to coincide with increases in the cost of living.
- 2) There must be an increase in minimum wages. When we hear of people who are better off on welfare than they would be if they worked, there are two possible reasons:
 - a) Welfare is too high,
 - b) Wages are too low.

Take a look at how the average welfare family lives, and then try to tell me that Welfare is too high. The fat profits being taken by industry can well afford to be diluted, so that the man who works hard five or six days a week may take home a wage on which he may live contentedly. For those small businesses which can show that they would be unable to operate profitably by paying an increased minimum wage, Government subsidies, or tax relief could be given to defray those extra costs. How many people, fit and able to work, would remain home on Welfare then?

- 3) Legislation and enforcement of equal pay for women doing the same job as men, since many poor families are headed by women.

- 4) Work incentives for the able bodied in the form of retention of earnings over and above welfare, the poverty level of income as defined by the Economic Council of Canada, rather than the reduction of welfare allowances by the amount earned as is now practiced. Unless this is permitted, the Welfare recipient is quite obviously destined to remain below the poverty line.

On Housing: Once again it was felt that all that could be said has been said. Talk, enquiries, investigations, etcetera, do not build houses. Surveys and commissions are expensive. Let the cost of such surveys be put towards action.

Government rent control is a must. The ridiculous spiralling of housing costs is nothing short of black market activity. I have seen rooms not fit to keep a dog in, where the rent is $15.00 per week, more than half of the welfare recipient's total allowance. The recipient has no option but to accept the landlord's terms, because it is a seller's market. $15.00 per week may seem ridiculously low to those living in $190 to $250 per month apartments or houses, but the quality is also ridiculously low.

Education: We know that education is necessary for eventual job opportunity. The very people who need it most, have to choose between their children continuing in school, or bringing home wages, which incidentally causes the parents' welfare allowance to be reduced. When you have been short of money for possibly years, which do you think is seen as the more beneficial by the family? Children in turn are anxious to buy from their own earnings some of the things which their parents have been unable to provide. With a decent standard of living the children would be able to go on to that higher education which our system demands.

Attitudes:

Our research into attitudes of others toward welfare recipients clearly shows that the middle class in general have little real knowledge of the problems of the poor or of the welfare system. The task group on attitudes of the working classes toward welfare recipients arrived at one main conclusion from the survey conducted — the locked-in welfare recipient is kept locked in also by the attitudes of the working class. They have no factual conception of the welfare system, and the individuals who are socially outcast because they do not produce money. Their ill-informed influence legislation, the people who work within the welfare system, and the attitude of the recipient toward himself. For these reasons we call for so far more form of public education about the system of welfare in Canada.

Retraining:

Industry should be required to assist in the retraining process. This could be effected by legislation requiring all large businesses to hire a percentage undicapped people, and also requiring that they have facilities for retraining people with handicaps. Industry takes, let it also give. Retraining is only useful however if the individual is able to earn enough after training to support himself. This must therefore be coupled with the recommendations on income, i. e. minimum wage increase and/or supplement of earnings through Welfare.

Supportive Services:

It was noted that counselling services were sadly lacking. Approximately 40% of those interviewed who did not receive any counselling, felt that it would help. Who better to train and employ in the Welfare field than Welfare Recipients. Their first hand knowledge would be invaluable, and they would be more likely to gain the acceptance of others in the same unfortunate circumstances.

In conclusion, we must point out that poverty in a capitalist society is inevitable. In order to eliminate it, some must give and others must take. Those who suffer from poverty are expending all of their energy to merely survive. They have no time or energy left to achieve. If lifted out of this vacuum, to where they do not constantly have to strive to keep their heads above water, we may see some more people able to swim. We want capitalism and free enterprise: therefore we must pay for the consequences and inadequacies of that system. Why should those in poverty feel any sense of responsibility towards society? Look what society has done for them. Rapid technological advances result in more skills being learned by better educated people. They also mean less manual work. The unskilled and semi-skilled are rapidly becoming obsolete. Do we cast them aside to suffer deprivation, or do we use those technological advances to permit everyone to live abundantly? Before we can expect the poor to have faith in a system of improvement, we must give them proof that we are willing and able to improve their lot. How long do we expect them to keep faith with no reward for that faith? Do something other than research the problem and we can make believers out of them. Sympathy and understanding have their place, but they do not lessen the suffering.

We have an example very close to home, in the U.S.A. of the results of continuous frustrations suffered by the poor. When there is no legal way out of the situation, violence becomes the only other means. Let us prevent riots and revolution by giving the help that is talked about so much but never forthcoming.

The Chairman: Thank you, Mr. Hanrahan.

Before I open the meeting to questions, I think I should introduce the other senators, my colleagues, who are here with me. On my extreme right is Senator Pearson and on his left is Senator McGrand and on my left is Senator Sparrow.

Now, Senator Pearson, do you have some questions?

Senator Pearson: First I would like to ask a question; you seem, in this brief, to be very much down on the capitalist idea of the way we run things and I am inclined to agree with you that there are a lot of things that could be changed, but are you, in this polytechnical school here, laying more stress on socialism than on the capitalistic system or not?

Mr. Hanrahan: I think we have capitalism and this is what the people want. We have to be able to sort out some of the inadequacies that come with it.

Senator Pearson: Yes.

Miss Elizabeth Peters, First Year Student, Social Service Course, Ryerson Polytechnical Institute: May we join in?

Senator Pearson: Yes, definitely.

Miss Peters: It struck us particularly that people accept capitalism without realizing the consequences. I think this is the thing that struck home to me that the majority of people like the things that capitalism brings, but they don't realize that inevitably it is the people at the bottom who are going to suffer and I think the general public, especially from the attitudes, is not aware of the fact that if you are going to have a capitalistic society, you are going to have people who do not have enough money unless you do something about it. It is this sort of attitude that it will work itself out and everybody will get an adequate standard of living and they do not. I think this realization, somehow, has to come across.

Senator Pearson: One of the problems, as I see it, in the capitalistic system is that technological advances in the present age, especially in the western world — and it could be in the socialist world too — is throwing so many people who were semi-skilled and probably well-skilled in their particular line but now are unskilled, it throws them out of the picture. It throws a tremendous burden on the people on the lower rungs to keep up with this thing.

Miss Peters: Yes, but does the general public really realize this? I don't think they do.

Senator Pearson: This is what the general public does not realize and this is one of the problems that this committee is facing as we go across Canada. We are trying to find out, from the people at each locality, as to what is happening and what we can do, the government can do to rectify this problem.

Senator McGrand: May I ask a question just supplementary?

Did I understand you to say that people accept capitalism regardless of its consequences. Is that what you said?

Miss Peters: I think so, I think most of us do.

Senator McGrand: Now, what is the alternative to capitalism? Is it socialism?

Miss Peters: I think we can have capitalism with adequate social security.

Senator McGrand: Now you have capitalism or socialism and would you accept socialism with its consequences or is it capitalism that is geared to the needs of the people?

Miss Peters: Yes, I would say that.

Senator McGrand: Rather than socialism?

Miss Peters: Yes, we are representing the body of students so obviously we do not like to say whether we are either socialists or capitalists. As individuals, I would imagine if Canada needs a capital . . .

Senator McGrand: That is supplementary to Senator Pearson's question.

Senator Pearson: On your page 3, down half way:

Government rent control is a must. The ridiculous spiralling of housing costs is nothing short of black market activity."

Rent control is a very hard thing to handle in a sense because you have not only to think about the rent control, that is you are controlling a landlord and he cannot increase his rents. His cost of keeping his property in shape and his cost of taxation on that property is going up all the time and the question is where to draw the balance between the two. You said that $15.00 a week, in a room where you would not put a dog. I went into a house in Halifax where a deserted mother was living with two little children. One child had just come back from the hospital from having a bad case of pneumonia and another one had a bad cold. She was in two rooms. Each room was the same width, just wide enough for a double bed where she and the two children left a little passage between the bed and the wall. Both rooms were the same. They lived in the one and slept in the other. No air in that place whatever. The windows were sealed up to save heat. In that place she paid $70.00 a month for this obligation to live there.

Mr. Hanrahan: Is that not exactly what we are saying? It is a black market.

Senator Pearson: Yes.

Mr. Hanrahan: It is extortion.

Senator Pearson: It is extortion, yes. Is what you are going to do with the landlord is take over his property or is he going to be allowed to live too? This is quite a problem just to figure out where the balance is between these two.

Mr. Hanrahan: Nobody said it is easy.

Senator McGrand: I don't think anyone would want to take over his property and try to make a profit of what he has with the rundown condition of property. We saw that. We went through it. I would not want to own his property and try to make a profit on it.

From the Floor: Can't hear a word you are saying.

The Chairman: You will have to speak a little louder into the microphone.

Senator Pearson: On page 4 of your Attitudes, page 4, you talked about attitudes:

Our research into attitudes of others toward welfare recipients clearly show that the middle class in general have little real knowledge of the problems of the poor . . .

This is one of the big problems that we have in this committee, to try and make the public aware of the poverty that is in Canada. We go along on our daily task, it is a rush, rush, rush all the time and we go past these people all the time and never see them and this is what we are trying to do in this committee, trying to bring this point to the public.

These meetings, as we are having here in Toronto supply us with a fair amount of publicity and we hope it will stir people up in the City of Toronto and Ontario and of course, right across Canada on the problem of poverty. This is our function at the present time.

At the same time we are asking the people in the communities for their opinions and ideas so that we may eventually come to some solution on behalf of the committee and the government.

The Chairman: Do you have any comment?

Miss Sue Fitchett, First Year Student, Soc Service Course, Ryerson Polytechnical Institute: I can say this, this is what we found from our Questionnaire that we ran, that the public had a conception of what the welfare system was. Most people thought that at least 50% of their tax dollars was going in direct payment to a welfare recipient. They did not realize that the baby bonus, Canada Pension, all comes under Health and Welfare. We find that we cannot make effective changes in welfare legislation in the attitude of the poor towards themselves. Some form of self respect without changing the attitude of the middle class, the working classes, because they are obviously people who affect legislation.

So what we recommended was some form of public education and this is one way. We would also suggest perhaps that they be more aware of who the poor are. This is a very difficult question but they have the idea that welfare recipients are all able bodied men who sit in front of their television sets and imbibe in beer and cash welfare cheques. This is totally wrong. The percentage of able bodied on welfare is very, very low. They just do not seem to realize this.

Senator Pearson: We also ran across the problem, we had lunch at the Italian Service Centre this afternoon. I was talking to one chap there and he said one of the big problems is the variety of the welfare agencies and people get into these classes of poverty for some reason or other, a man may lose his job or become sick and then he doesn't know where to go to get assistance and this is one of the problems they find among the Italian people to get them on the road to know where they are to go when they get their welfare. There should be one, central fund, so that anybody who is injured or hurt knows this is the place to go and will not have a dozen places. This is one of the problems we found.

Miss Peters: I was going to say that I think this is very true of all the acts. I was up to Elliot Lake recently and came into contact with a paraplegic who had no idea of the Vocational Rehabilitation Act. Especially in the smaller centres people just do not know what is available to them and I think one very good way to advertise what is available is in the newspapers. Quite honestly the recent things they have heard up about unemployment insurance, I think, could be adapted for disbursing information; so much goes to welfare, so much goes to, you know, other things and also the very fact that only 5% of welfare recipients could work. Simple facts like these could be disseminated some way so the general public becomes aware of it.

Senator Pearson: He suggested that one chap injured his back and was out of work but his union took care of his hospitalization, OHSIP and such like all of a sudden his dues there were swallowed up from the union. He had been out of work too long and he did not know where to go. Suddenly he felt he was out in the cold and nobody was paying his health insurance and this is one of the problems of this variety of welfare agencies.

I think that is all, Mr. Chairman.

Senator McGrand: Could I follow that up?

You said the percentage of able bodied men is very low. What research have we got? What evidence have we got that this is really so, because I still feel there are a lot of able bodied men on welfare and they are on welfare perhaps not because of their own fault, you need more than just an able body to be a good worker, you need something besides that. What evidence have you got? What research has been done to prove that there are few able bodied, physically fit, mentally competent men who are on welfare?

Miss Peters: I quote only from figures that I have read.

Senator McGrand: What is the source of your figures?

Mr. Hanrahan: Senator Croll is one.

The Chairman: He has not done the research.

Senator Sparrow: The Americans on the poverty programme did a study on this and these are the figures being used. In Canada, the Province of Alberta is the only province that has done a study as such. There are individual community studies that I think we have access to and the Alberta study and the American study coincided in their figures very closely as to the people on welfare being 48% or—I should not say, "welfare", the people below a poverty level, there were 48% of them working poor, 38% are the one family—one parent families, 10% are the disabled and so on and 5% are the people who might be able to work but just too lazy to work. I think these are the figures they are using.

Senator McGrand: Five per cent, senator?

Senator Sparrow: Five per cent.

Senator McGrand: Of the welfare recipients?

Senator Sparrow: Five per cent of the people below the poverty level.

Senator McGrand: Are able bodied?

Senator Sparrow: Yes, not classified in any of the other groups.

The Chairman: You have a question, Senator Sparrow?

Senator Sparrow: I would like further comment by this group.

Mr. Hanrahan: Well, in that case, if you would like comments from the group, I would like to invite comments from the students who participated.

Senator Sparrow: Perhaps, senator, if I might, just to encourage perhaps questions, you wanted questions from the audience or are you suggesting that in your questionnaire, I think this questionnaire, the answer to it at least shows up not only the problem of the middle class and when I say "class" I am referring to economic class or group, you mentioned that of the middle working class having to be better educated as far as poverty is concerned. Would the people from your survey, would they indicate that they in turn do not really understand the problem or the answers to it? I just refer to question 15:

Do you feel your children are getting enough education?

And 64% of them said, "yes". I think that any one of us in this hall today would agree that they are not getting enough education as such and it surprised me that of that interview group that 64% of them would in fact feel that their education, when you proceed further into the questionnaire, I think the figures that only 5% in fact ever go to university. Surely we have to find some way of giving these people the knowledge of the importance of education and the incentive for their children to get a better education than they are getting so that the next survey 64% of them will say that they think their children are getting enough education.

Mr. Hanrahan: I would just like to reply to that. 64% of them are probably right when they say they think that they are getting enough education because of the opportunities that do exist. They are getting enough education for these opportunities, this education is realistic for what they are going to be able to do afterwards.

Senator Sparrow: I would like further explanation on that one.

Mr. Hanrahan: I think that if the poor people—the children are getting Grade 9 education—then probably the poor people think this is quite enough for the type of jobs that are going to be open to those children.

Senator Sparrow: Is that not what I said? We have to educate them, inform them that this is not enough. They have got to overrate their education. Is that not right?

Mr. Hanrahan: Yes, but we have to give them the opportunity to get better jobs, to get a little higher education.

Senator Sparrow: Definitely.

The Chairman: That 64% was taken from a sample of 150?

Mr. Hanrahan: Just a small sample, 21.

The Chairman: Twenty-one, yes. That is a rather small sample to draw conclusions from, don't you think? I would like to ask you a question myself. Gather that all three of you are social workers?

Mr. Hanrahan: Social service—unpaid.

The Chairman: Tell me when you, as a group, became interested in poverty in Canada? When did you suddenly become aware that this was a national problem?

Mr. Hanrahan: I would think that would vary from individual to individual. Some before they came here and some since they came here. I was working in the welfare field before I came to Ryerson and some have worked in the welfare field for years, many years before coming to us, so they have been involved with this problem much longer than the two years or so year they have been at Ryerson. Some have not.

Senator Carter: You were aware of it as a national problem before you came to Ryerson?

Mr. Hanrahan: I was aware there was poverty in Canada, yes.

The Chairman: Well, that is not my question. We know there is poverty in Canada. We all meet it in our daily lives. We run across poverty somewhere and think that we are inclined to accept it but that is nothing. To look at it as a national problem that should not permit to exist is quite another thing and that is my question; when did you become aware of this as a national problem that is a blight on our society and that should not be permitted to exist?

Mr. Hanrahan: Well, myself, probably since I came to Ryerson. You know we all see poverty. We realize it is unfortunate but we probably do not think of it as a national problem until we actually start selling it.

The Chairman: May I ask the same question of your other two assistants?

Miss Peters: I came to Canada as an immigrant. I was then employed in the medical field and I found it a wonderful country. It did not take me long to realize that Canada was not such a wonderful country once you became sick or disabled. You rapidly lost your source of income. You rapidly lost the finances you had. I also became involved with boys on probation from small families. I again found out that there were poorer families in Canada. It is fine if you are young and healthy and fine if you have got a skill—Canada is a wonderful country. Just become poor and disabled. It is not such a poor country, I must admit, till I came to Ryerson and examined probably my own attitude that I did not realize that some of the causes of poverty—I mean the radical causes of poverty—does not start to analyse them because one is quite so comfortable, you know. One may be concerned but one is so comfortable oneself one does not really stop to find out why other people are poor and what you can do about it. I think this is a major problem. Again because of apathy, you know.

Miss Fitchett: I started to work with poverty groups when I was fourteen and I lied about my age and started working in a camp, but I did not realize really at poverty existed as a problem until I started to work on this committee on attitudes and I started to take surveys and I began to realize what it must be to live under the stigma of Welfare the way we investigate welfare cases. I was appalled at the attitude of my father that, you know, poor people are, you know, parasites on the community and I began to realize just that they have to go through to live in a society where they are always outcasts and you are always forced to be put under investigation as we are investigating them now. Of course when they are receiving payments they are investigated far more in a way that leaves them no self respect and I think this is when I realized poverty was the problem it is.

Miss Peters: Can we ask the senators the same question?

Senator Sparrow: First of all, Senator Carter, I think your question was excellent although I do not think it was accepted in the way it was asked because this is a problem, how are you going to have people aware, at least think this group is here, that there is poverty. How do they become aware because our problem is making the rest of the people in Canada aware of the problem so that if any individual can ever give us their experience we get to everyone to get those experiences. Maybe we can relate that in the method of informing the mass of the Canadian people of this problem. There is your father and perhaps my father and perhaps everyone else's father, who have come up through a different era of lack of understanding, and I believe that is all it is, it is a lack of understanding, where they think when you talk of Welfare they don't understand it is only the 5% you referred to that are perhaps lazy, the no-goods, so to speak, and that we have to get that message across to all of the people of Canada because they are the ones that have to make the decisions. Fortunately, or unfortunately, our society is governed by this middle class society and the higher income people and it is those people we must get this message across to. I am sure that is what Senator Carter was asking, tell us your experiences so we can turn can take these experiences and relate them to the rest of the people of Canada.

You mentioned the word "stigma" on welfare, and I think there are two things that most of us are aware of as I know you are, the word "welfare" is not a good word. The word that should be used is "social services," so that we can encourage the use that and in fact there would not be a stigma, as such, for receiving social services. We do not want to see a stigma and we do not think there should be a stigma on it. We have to in turn get that across that there is no stigma. If we can assist people and give them an incentive then there should be no stigma to it because we want to raise their level.

Senator Pearson: May I ask a question here? In this class of social services that Ryerson School has, how many are taking the course, how many years does it last?

Miss Fitchett: Approximately 150, is it?

Mr. Hanrahan: Seventy odd in the second year, I don't know about the first year, about 150.

Miss Fitchett: It is a three year course, two year option. It is not a social work course but a social services course. If I could just say that Senator Sparrow was mentioning about how to get across to the general public this idea of poverty. One thing I would discourage is the printing of sob stories about the United Appeal Fund. When we ask people what their opinions are on welfare recipients they first of all tell us that they have personal experience. When we ask them to qualify that we get things like, "my second husband's brother-in-law is on welfare". I question the validity of that and I question the validity of the stories in the press. I don't think there is any way that these two areas get across the real situation.

The Chairman: Is there somebody down there who wants to add to this?

Mr. Dennis Colby: I was just curious at the reactions of the students taking the course here at Ryerson. For instance, how do the municipal governments and the boards of education, for instance, come into this aspect? I know, for instance, in let's say the center part of the city in Ward 7 which is one of the very poor parts of this city, education in academic institutions is discouraged. There is not one academic institution of learning, they are all technical and vocational. I was just wondering what is the reaction, the attitudes of people you reviewed on the subject of education?

Miss Fitchett: Do you mean the attitudes of the middle working class?

Mr. Colby: Yes, you know, the attitudes of the municipal governments and the boards of education. Do they tend to discourage people in their own incentives in seeking higher education, especially in poorer areas of the city?

Miss Fitchett: I cannot really say. I will give you an example. I just found out the other day, I am not sure how accurate my facts are, Ryerson Public School is one of the largest public schools in all of Ontario. It is situated at Dundas and Bathurst. I think something like 1600 public school kids are there and there is one social worker who they share with twelve other schools. I think their recesses have to be staggered because they do not have a playground and they have too many kids to let out at the same time. Their classes are very large and it does not seem to me to encourage education where it should be encouraged.

The attitude of the working class? We ask a question on children, most were sort of sympathetic to deserving cases — the true poor — but there were cases where people felt it was the parents' fault and "retraining" was the more common word, that there should be more education and some sort of training in a level of vocational training.

Mr. Colby: I wondered whether or not the government tended, as I say, to encourage this by not building academic institutions. In the streaming everyone is directed into the vocational and technical school. Surely there must be some academic students who come from the area.

Miss Mary Long, Student, Social Service Course, Ryerson Polytechnical Institute: I would like to ask Senator Sparrow a question. You said that one of the ways to solve the problem of the stigma of being on welfare was to change the name. From what I have heard the name has been changed many times and it doesn't matter what word you give to it, "flower people" is a nice word but it is always attached to being poor. It becomes a stigma and I don't see how changing a word can do anything.

Senator Sparrow: I did not suggest that by changing the name we would change the stigma. The point I was trying to get across was that I do not think there should be a stigma attached to people who require assistance in society and receive it. I do not think there should be a stigma attached to it. All I am saying is that we have tarred, generally speaking, all people who receive something as welfare or social aid and there is a stigma attached to that. I said that in this total services aspect, whether it is a retraining programme or something, there is a stigma that appears to be attached to all of those things and I like the broad term though of social services rather than welfare, as such, because we can have those social services and I consider education a social service. There is no stigma attached to that.

Miss Long: Well, our course was once called, "welfare" and they changed that to, "social services". It has still got the same stigma it had when it was called, "welfare".

Senator Sparrow: I think we are getting better though in society. I think it goes back to the era of relief. That had a worse stigma than even welfare has. So we are progressing. Relief as such was a very definite stigma in the period of time I came from. Perhaps a little extended beyond your time.

Miss Long: I would also like to say something else.

The Chairman: Just a minute, please. I must warn you that we are running short of time. We have about five minutes left and I would ask you to make your questions very short and your answers very short also.

Senator McGrand, do you want to ask one question?

Senator McGrand: I am going to try and clarify something. This stigma that is attached to welfare probably goes back to the days when people who could not support themselves were placed on parish aid on the taxpayers and they were called, "paupers" and they lost their right to vote, they lost their right to citizenship, they could not serve on juries or participate in community affairs. They had lost their identities as citizens and I think that is the background.

Miss Long: May I say something else? One of the members from the committee asked how the senator became aware of people who are poor and I think this issue was sort of successfully evaded. I would like to ask you again.

Miss Peters: One of the things that really hit us in preparing this brief was we were trying to say really that you could not go around the country to find out the facts about poverty because most of them are written down somewhere. You must have known of the facts that have been presented to you. Was there an idea of going around to get people's attitudes, what exactly was the purpose? Most of the facts we found were already out several years ago.

The Chairman: Well, we all know what the problem is but what we are looking for is answers and so we are coming around, trying to get ideas from whatever sources we can find. We will try to appraise the ideas. We all know what poverty is and where it is and what causes it. We know most of the causes, but what we are looking for is answers and we are looking for the bright young people and bright ideas that we can come across.

From the Floor: Could you stay another five minutes?

The Chairman: A speaker in the audience has asked the committee to remain another five minutes. If you stay a little longer then we can get some answers.

Senator Sparrow: Just in fairness to your committee that prepared the brief and to the committee here we give these other briefs being presented this afternoon from other groups and this is why the committee has requested written briefs. We have studied these briefs and we will take these written briefs back to the full committee plus the additional recommendations or suggestions that may come from you. That is the purpose.

You have asked if we understand that problem the problem of poverty and you say studies have been done, but there has been no study in Canada done on poverty as a whole, as it affects all Canadians. The Economic Council of Canada, where most of these studies are being tossed around, with the relation of the dollar value on poverty, the recommendations from their studies are that in fact a Senate Committee has been established to study all aspects of poverty in Canada and this basically was what prompted this particular study because up to that time there had been no effective study. We have the Farmers' Unions which have done studies and the Labour Unions which have done it and a number of other groups that have done it but they have not covered the full poverty study in Canada as such. The important part, I would hope, at least of this committee, is that we can bring this information together that has been gathered from all sources, not only from Canada but studies from outside of Canada and bring them into a proposal in the policy to endeavour to solve the problem of poverty in Canada.

The Chairman: I am sorry, my friends, our time has run out. We started 15 minutes late and we are still late.

Miss Sally York, Journalism Student, Ryerson Polytechnical Institute: Is it possible for us to speak at the end of the afternoon because I have some really concrete suggestions to make which I think . . .

The Chairman: We will look to the end of the afternoon and we will be glad to stay here and I am sure my colleagues will. We have made arrangements to hear other people who are here and it is a matter of courtesy that we should hear them. We are hearing them 15 minutes late already so I think it is only a matter of common courtesy that we should hear them and after that, if there is more time, and you want to stay, we will be pleased to hear you.

Miss York: Would you kindly request then also that the press stay because I think there is a lack of communication right across Canada and I think this is part of the trouble and you will understand this when I make my recommendations. If you will be kind enough, I quite understand the fact that you would like us to leave now.

The Chairman: Mr. Hanrahan, I want to thank you again very, very much for the splendid brief. This is one of the best that we have seen and we are very sorry that we had so little time to discuss it with you. We would also like to thank you for taking the trouble to prepare such a comprehensive brief and for doing the research that you did and for coming here and presenting it this afternoon. Thank you very much.

We have with us now representatives of the SOS—Volunteer Action for Social Change. The spokesman is Mr. Ken Murdoch, the Executive Secretary. I will ask Mr. Murdoch to introduce his companions who are up here with us and to open the hearing with a brief summary of his brief.

Mr. Ken Murdoch, Executive Secretary, SOS—Volunteer Action for Social Change: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. With me to-day on the stage are Mr. George Ford, who is responsible for preparing the brief largely, and Mr. Alan Livingston, who is the Chairman of our Central Committee.

You have asked that we give a brief summary of our brief. We started off our brief by making some effort towards a definition and we took the approach that poverty is a function of the disbursement range in distribution of both wealth and power in society. Therefore we see it as a relative as well as absolute level of wealth and power that are important in looking at the question. Also, that the disbursement must be considerably narrowed as well as in the base levels of wealth and power are raised.

Poverty, therefore, is not simply a material phenomenon but also is a psychological and sociological phenomenon demanding changes rather than the nature and extent of social services alone and these changes are imperative if we are seriously interested in tackling the poverty question. We speak partly from the SOS experience, a volunteer organization working with various groups across Canada in social issues and we have focused on the distribution of power as the topic of our brief. We see and support the rise and importance of indigenous local citizen action groups. We see this as a move for the redistribution of power which involves participation, control and responsibility.

At the moment, we see decisions are being hidden behind corporation doors. We see decisions hidden behind the doors of the civil services, cabinets, parties and behind municipal bureaucracies. Two ideals we have mentioned in the brief and an attempt at social change are these; first of all self determination, that is those affected by a decision must have control and responsibility for that decision or programme; secondly, a more equal distribution of wealth and power in the society. Out of these we see the following implications for governments; first of all, in the area of resources and primary money of course and made available to indigenous issue and community groups with a minimum of restrictions. Secondly, we see community developments that should be the spearhead and priority of the welfare system and thirdly, we see there should be a move for a great deal of decentralization, that is sharing the decision-making processes. In reference to these we see the following criticism of government. The government fight against inflation withholds resources and aggravates the poverty situation. The impact on the marginal worker, the working poor. The second criticism would be with reference to the C.Y.C.; we do not feel a three month's trial of a volunteer governing body is hardly enough test of self determination. We would see the Minister of Health and Welfare and his national advisory council, which includes some welfare and former welfare recipients, as perhaps a well meaning but indeed a nod of tokenism. The main part of our brief, senators, is focused on the indigenous groups. We see this as a vehicle for change. We believe a permanent and increasing social factor will be these indigenous groups in our society. Therefore we have focused on a problem we think is involved here. The question of recognition and legitimacy is bound to rise and indeed has already arisen. Some will incorporate. We made reference to the neighbourhood government booklet by Milton Kotler showing some groups incorporating themselves so they act as legal entities in order to fund raise and develop programme operations, but the question of recognition and legitimacy still remains especially face to face with governments. We seek recognition and legitimacy as a bargaining representative and administrative unit for a group of people and largely the people who have felt themselves oppressed, exploited and are channelling their anger and frustrations. Therefore, because of this, there is a potential for explosion, violence, violence towards governments and among themselves.

In review of this situation, we see similarities paralleling the labour history. We have made an attempt, senators, to pose a proposal because you are looking for solutions. We think that it needs a lot more thinking, but to look towards this factor as a basis of resolution we might suggest it would be a legal framework and perhaps we could refer to the Labour Relations Act as something that might give an idea of this. Such a legal framework, by its very existence, would provide the following; first of all, recognized legitimacy to the rights of people to order, set out conditions under which government or the civil service department would have to recognize and negotiate for such grounds and provide an apparatus for solving jurisdictional fights or disputes and fourthly, mediate contract disputes and grievances regarding contract obligations. There are some problems we see in reference to this. First of all, defining, "bargaining units" taking into account the geography or main issue like welfare or things like that. We would recommend no arbitrarily defined bargaining unit but question each representation received, working out agreement with those making the representations.

Another problem would be in the jurisdictional disputes and we would recommend mediation rather than arbitration as refusal to recognize either group in the dispute would force the parties involved to settle among themselves.

Finally, the percentage of persons in bargaining units, we don't know what to recommend here, but we do suggest, through discussions directed toward maximizing the organization effort without threatening major rule should be looked at. In other words what we are suggesting in our brief is a legal framework that serves rather than restricts or co-opt indigenous groups.

In brief then, senators, this is the digest of our brief to you. We have further comments that we could add to it and are ready to add to the brief. As well, there may be some comments in reference to the guaranteed annual income which is in the hands of your committee.

The Chairman: Thank you very much, Mr. Murdoch. Your Mr. Ford and Mr. Livingston, are they making representations or asking questions? Do they want to add anything?

Mr. Murdoch: Mr. Ford would probably have a few comments.

Mr. George Ford, Member, SOS—Volunteer Action for Social Change: Yes, there are a few comments we would like to add which are extensions of the brief. The brief itself, which I was primarily the author of, consider as a minimal document. On the other hand, the document is that which the organization of SOS felt most comfortable with so the extensions I am making represent more my own extensions than those of SOS.

I would like to take as a basis for any extensions a couple of points from the brief. We have noted that on the whole citizens have been forced to accept decisions that affect them which come from government and the corporate community. There are the principles of social change which we feel are necessary if any kind of social change is to work and all necessary for eliminating poverty. Self determination and more equal distribution of wealth and power in society. I think the following three points can now be added to those principles. Firstly emphasis is on self-determination. It is not participation alone particularly on a minority basis, rather it is control over and responsibility for the decisions which affect the group in question. A government or private agency invites people to participate. They are assuming they are a structured organization they are inviting the people into. Is it all right or at least repairable? Only if its representation is in question. This is seldom true, however, rather the instruction of the department or agency is very much in question. What manded is change and participation, not just participation without a willingness to change. Participation is meaningless leading to frustration of the poor participants or to their socialization in the middle class values which is the sole relation in their role on that committee and the role as members of the community. Self determination has its implication for all aspects for social order and not just the community.

We have noted in our brief that for the workplace self determination means industrial democracy. Workers will individually and collectively together with management and representatives of the public participate in and have control of and responsibility for the management work environment and social role of the company they are working for. This clearly follows from the discussion in our brief and extended to the workplace for the universities, self determination means university democracy with faculty-student and/or faculty, student and public control of the university in its direction with allocations to the university being publicly decided in the parliamentary process for the political economy of Canada.

The principle of self determination especially in the limit of the concentration of corporate power in the hands of a relatively few people who have no social accountability, must be made. Only in this way can people in Canada participate in the most important economic issues that affect them such as the production of energy, for example, the investment decisions, whether we produce low-cost housing or more colour television sets, whether we have high quality medical services for all or produce another make of automobile. Social considerations must be used in determining how the profits, economic surpluses made by workers are used. Self determination means social determination.

These four elements: local-community control, industrial democracy, university democracy and representative democratic bodies are important. Many of us, certainly myself, come to see a democratic, decentralized socialism. This is the only solution which can deal with the structural nature of the problem whose one effect is poverty.

I would like to make a few comments again to the principles in the documents on the guaranteed annual income. The range must be considerably narrowed. One question is: are people serious in using the guaranteed annual income to really narrow this gap? It must be seen as a method and promoted as a method for substantial redistribution and as such its cost can be high. Many vested interests will be challenged. The cost will only be moderately higher than the total welfare system. Is it just to be a programme so that people will be guaranteed no more than a minimum level of poverty. If a guaranteed annual income is to work, the power must be simultaneously redistributed otherwise it will be removed from the incomes of the poor without organized workers, consumers, tenants, community groups. This will only be avoided if the government institutes comprehensive wage controls. If the government is serious about a guaranteed annual income, it must either implement simultaneously these controls or work towards development of decentralized, community tenants groups and other such indigenous groups.

A further point on the guaranteed annual income is that in effect while we are getting everyone to a subsistence level it will, in effect, provide subsidies to low-wage industries. If we remove the pressure on those industries to raise their wages to a decent level.

I would also like to point out the political effects on the guaranteed annual income now as a hope that the poor will delay their efforts in organizing. In some senses there has been years of delay while we research the guaranteed annual income before we decide to have it and then we will have it for a trial period for years and finally, unless the points we have mentioned so far are followed through, there will be no dissolution of the poor with the guaranteed annual income. Wealth will not seriously be redistributed, not be retained by them because they have no power to set prices, wages and rents.

Finally, the guaranteed annual income is a centralizing force in the administration of welfare which will lead to a powerlessness among the poor and remove the local focus for their organizing, the local welfare office, diffuse local groups and thus diminish the opportunities for development in the key centralized democratic involvement in our society and will lead only to greater despair and possibly to violence.

Those, I think, are the comments I would like to make on extending the brief and I would point out again that while some of those may be shared by people in SOS—Volunteer Action for Social Change, they are not necessarily the views of that organization as a whole.

The Chairman: Can you tell us, Mr. Ford, SOS is a student organization or a public organization, where do you draw your membership from?

Mr. Ford: Perhaps Mr. Livingston would like to answer that.

Mr. Alan Livingston, Chairman, Central Committee, SOS—Volunteer Action for Social Change: It is an independent organization. Every summer and also during the year it gets volunteers and SOS considers itself an agent in bringing people together so they can mobilize their problems and it is sponsored by a number of groups, ecumenical groups, and the Y.M.C.A. and the Y.W.C.A. and independent sponsors and the government pays for travel of the volunteers across Canada during the summer months. The concept of a volunteer as a catalytic unit means research as much as activity. In these cases the question is meant to be what is the root cause of the issues. The volunteers are not meant just to be a stop gap measure but as a supplement to initiate tiers of community action. SOS also provides field workers to initiate discussions before volunteers come to help them. They clarify the direction and role within their community action.

After the summer they may provide regional SOS committees and return volunteers to each area to help with ongoing projects. The idea is not just a summer thing and ends when the volunteers go home but a continuing process.

The Chairman: Thank you very much.

Senator Pearson: In that first page in your brief you mention the distribution of power. What do you mean by "distributing of power"? What is power to start with?

Mr. Ford: Power is the ability to make decisions which affect our lives.

Senator Pearson: Pardon?

Mr. Ford: Power is the ability to make decisions which affect our lives. It has come to mean more than that in our society. The decisions people are making individually, in small units, have come to affect a great number of people outside of their own lives and I think that is the key to the brief. The question is the distribution of power that people should only be able to participate in and everyone should be able to participate in those decisions which affect them which means, for example, the corporation decisions which are presently made by a board of governors, board of directors and by some managers without concern for the public and only on the basis of profit criteria, that structure of decision making is going to have to be changed so the people affected by the decision making, workers and consumers of the goods, are included in the management and decision making of that company.

Senator Pearson: What would you do in the case of an owner of an apartment block? He is collecting rents and he says that the rents must be a certain amount and an individual in apartment number one says "No, my decision is it shall not be that.", what ever happens then? Who's decision is going to be minded?

Mr. Ford: All right, we have it presented as two individuals. The way I conceive it is a collective in that apartment, a collective. It is a collective decision of that apartment building. The way I see it working out is somewhat in parallel to the labour situation that the tenants of that apartment, perhaps other apartment buildings owned by the same landlord, organize themselves into tenants' unions. These unions will negotiate contracts with the landlord or the owner of the apartment so that they will negotiate the questions maintenance, repair, level of rent and services. Once that contract is signed, all parties to the contract, the union representing all the tenants as a labour union represents the workers, will be responsible carrying out the terms of the contract. In other words, if one individual in an apartment refuses to pay the rent depending upon his reason for refusing to pay, if he feels he has a grievance there should be a grievance procedure whereby he would go to a grievance committee set up under terms of the contract and there the dispute would be resolved. If the dispute was resolved in favour of the landlord he would have to pay his rent, he would be legally obliged to pay his rent.

Senator Pearson: What would happen in the case of a landlord not agreeing to the contract and would it sign it?

Mr. Ford: His apartment building would be struck.

Senator Pearson: The apartment building would be struck. Where would the tenants go?

Mr. Ford: Well, the tenants would remain in the apartment building. I am not sure, I have not looked into the Landlord and Tenant Act of Ontario and revisions two weeks ago, but in many American places they have an escrow fund where rents are put during a rent strike. As long as those rents are kept in an escrow fund, which the landlord does not have access to, then those tenants are not—in some states they are not liable for eviction. You work with whatever laws there are in the place and you seek to avoid an issue. If necessary, the local union takes action to protect what you feel are your rights and to come to a collective agreement on a contract.

Senator McGrand: If the building was struck, income, who will pay the taxes?

Mr. Ford: The legal obligation, I think, under present law is the landlord is continually responsible for paying the taxes.

Senator McGrand: Rent or not?

Mr. Ford: That is one of the pressures he faces as a result of the strike. Just as a corporation presently has to continue to pay its taxes whether the workers are on strike or not.

Senator Pearson: When you have a number of the places that have been struck which you probably would have because I think your organization would definitely make a decision that these rents are high, I am not disputing you at all, I agree that r-getting quite out of line but the population is increasing rapidly in the City of Toronto and the need for more and more accommodation. The people who own the building are the people who have the money and power, as you say, but how are you going to get them persuaded to keep on building more and more apartments to accommodate people who do not want to pay or cannot pay? I should say not "don't want to pay" but cannot pay?

Mr. Ford: This is certainly a very real problem. It has been happening, I think one case I know in Washington where a number of landlords and a number of developers have left the field because their apartments have been struck. I think that you have to take the total perspective here and that is that at the present time we have no indication that the private market is providing enough housing in any case.

Senator Pearson: Because the costs are too high at the present time, that is why these builders will not build. They find there is no profit in the thing.

Mr. Ford: Let us turn to the question of why the costs are too high. We will probably get into an argument here as to the causes of inflation. I would argue that one of the substantial reasons why the cost of building is so high is directly related to the earlier question you asked of power. Power in a corporation, as the power of the corporation in society is such that the amount that it can extract for its own purposes, including lavish office buildings, lavish executive residences, is such that the profit rate, I am not only referring to accounting, but the hidden profit rate in such things as luxury office buildings for executives is excessive and that is, in fact, one of the major reasons why the costs are so high. In terms of people not being able to build housing and rent restrictions making a profound problem, I think your answer has to be that the government has to provide that money, not as it is presently doing to provide money to private developers to build low income housing but to provide that money to existing groups, to community groups who are willing to undertake a plan of their own in building their own housing so that the housing is appropriate to the community they are in so it will not disrupt life of the community. At the same time it will provide increased quantities of housing.

Where will the government get the money for that? Again I think I mentioned in my extensions to the brief, that is why I feel the extensions are necessary, that the government must become the agent for making investment decisions. In other words it is going to have to mobilize the investment capital of this country and not just through the private market by expropriating the economic surplus created by corporations in this country and using that for the priorities or to take the profits, for example, of General Motors. Does it want to invest the profits of G.M. in producing more cars or housing.

The Chairman: I don't quite understand. Are you saying the government should take General Motor's profits and decide what should be done with them?

Mr. Ford: That is right.

The Chairman: You think General Motors will say nothing? Do you think they will continue making cars or making anything under those conditions?

Mr. Ford: No, I think that is why the government will have to take them over.

Senator McGrand: You would have general bankruptcy of industry.

Mr. Ford: No, you will have nationalization. Let me explain what that nationalization will mean. It is not a centralized nationalization as is in existence in socialist countries. That nationalization is where the workers are deciding how the company will be run. The experience in Yugoslavia is that it can be done more cheaply by the workers than by management.

The Chairman: Well, could I follow this up? Isn't that exactly what was happening in Czechoslovakia and exactly what brought Czechoslovakia to the brink of ruin and they had to get away from that system?

Mr. Ford: My understanding of what happened in Czechoslovakia was that they were trying to move to that system. In other words, they were trying to move from a centralized nationalization where the government made all the decisions to a decentralized system where there would be more worker control in the factory and decisions in the factory about investment priorities about management, more community control. It was that move to democratic and decentralized national control in Czechoslovakia which led to the invasion. That is the difference I was trying to point out. The difference between a centralized nationalism and decentralized nationalism and that is where they were moving and that is why the Soviet Union, to prevent them doing so, partly because it had a measure of success.

The Chairman: Would you agree that in the production of—well it really doesn't matter where you start, you start with investment capital, you start with labour, that is another factor and management also is a very important factor, becoming more important every day, especially in the technicological age, are you saying that the workers can make management decisions better than management?

Mr. Ford: I am saying the worker should go with the managers and together they can make better decisions because they know what will make them work. Management can only guess what will make them work and what they are willing to work for and to what extent they are willing to work and therefore it is a hit and miss affair when managers alone make those decisions.

Senator McGrand: You would be very much in favour of a situation where the workers, industry and management owned the industry together, co-operatively, where the workers give their time and management gives their administration, that would be it, co-operative ownership?

Mr. Ford: I would call it "co-operative management", "co-operative operation", the ownership.

Senator McGrand: Profit sharing, that is what I have always believed, a profit sharing scheme.

Mr. Ford: What I am talking about?

Senator McGrand: Equal responsibility.

Mr. Ford: Yes, profit—if profit sharing means an equalized distribution of power and decision making in that corporation, yes, but not just profit sharing in terms of division of the profits of that company.

Senator McGrand: Well, of course, profit sharing and sharing of management will have to be part of it. The worker puts up his skills and management puts up the knowhow, is that not it?

Mr. Ford: Yes, the workers' skill and there will have to be a feedback to the managers' administration and knowledge too, so that there should be a free flow of communication both ways then.

The Chairman: Do you have a question, Senator Sparrow?

Senator Sparrow: I was wondering, from your verbal presentation and talking about management decisions being on a broader base that at some point in all this someone has to make the final decision, is that correct?

Mr. Ford: Obviously.

Senator Sparrow: You prepared a brief on behalf of your association and you were either reluctant to or were not permitted to put all your ideas in that brief so you specifically told us that these were your views and that you had not apparently sold those ideas to your group?

Mr. Ford: Right.

Senator Sparrow: Who makes the final decisions? Somebody does so in your relationship in the management-ownership field, owner-worker field, who in fact makes that final decision?

Mr. Ford: That was a collective decision made by the central committee of the organization which includes the volunteer representatives of the denominations on the staff.

Senator McGrand: May I ask a supplementary question?

You have already said that you could not come to a conclusion and that you had not come to a conclusion. Now, if you were a big corporation and you could not come to a conclusion; who makes the decision?

Mr. Murdoch: I think you misread the conclusion. It is in your hands. It is our brief. What we are saying, to comment on this, Mr. Senator, is that decisions were made and what has been said is briefly that the decisions were made by all parties.

Senator McGrand: It takes a long time to get co-operative decisions sometimes.

Mr. Murdoch: We did not take that long to get fifty copies up to you in Ottawa. We made it in the emergencies of the situation and it was done. If the enterprise is worth while, and I think this is the point we are trying to say, that if you are talking about poverty the urgencies of poverty are that much, the poor would like to have a voice. They are damn well not going to sit on their ass. They are going to talk around and get some of those decisions made. As long as we have a meaningful voice in the decision making, that what we are saying, that is what we needed more but it doesn't necessarily stop progress.

Senator Sparrow: You wish to give the power to the people. I don't think we will argue with this. If there is a way of doing it. You have opinions in this brief and the person who wrote the brief in fact brought additional suggestions that he said he could not incorporate into that brief because it may not represent the opinions of the others. This shows a division as you tour and talk to people and we do because we have talked to representative groups of tenants' associations, of mothers on welfare, as an example, so you talk with one group or an individual but say as a group and the group says the emphasis must be placed on education, spend the dollars, find the money for education and another group would come to us and say that all they want is to raise the allowance to $50.00 a month and that will solve their problem raise it by $50.00 a month. Another group will come and say the problem is employment, "find us employment, that is the total answer, make sure everyone employed, give everybody the opportunity to have a job."

But can you tell this or do you, in fact want to mother who is the single parent family with children, do you really believe or does anyone believe that she should be working? I for one don't think she should. I think society should support her. If it is her desire to work, to get out of the home for a change or something, that is a different story but perhaps she should not be forced to work. One group says supply jobs—who makes this final? These are all collective ideas and who makes that final decision? This is our problem.

Mr. Ford: We are back to the question of decentralization or centralization. You are looking for one solution. Maybe all of those solutions are correct in each of those individual cases. The person who thinks the need is for more education, if you believe they know what is best should be given that increase in education. If they find the need of something else they will come back and tell you. The person who believes in the $50.00 more assistance probably needs that $50.00 more assistance and may be able to get along with just that. The person may find he needs something else after that. We must begin where we think the needs are. We do not have to deal with it in a universal way. We can deal with it in a more decentralized way and try to deal with the needs of each of these groups as they see it.

The Chairman: Coming back to your decision making in industry; are we not a little late in coming to that? Has not technology advanced to the point where management in future will not be making decisions? The decisions will be made by computers. What then are we heading for?

Mr. Ford: The extension of a computer making decisions in industry seems to me logical under the basis of—that is computers making decisions and man follows them. Well, I admit that is a possibility. I could hope that we, I think that the suggestion to move towards decentralization, to move towards involvement, to move towards people having a say in their decisions that affect them, is a move in the other direction. We can say that we must use our technology and we must determine how we are going to use it and what we are going to use it for. That does not determine what we are going to do. In other words, a man must control his own technology.

The Chairman: How can one industry that uses the computer, how can an industry that does not use the most modern techniques available compete? Will that company not be pushed out of business altogether?

Mr. Ford: That can be answered, I think, or can be commented on in at least two planes. The first plane I talked about earlier was the necessity of some government involvement in that question. In one of the comments I made I said that our industrial structure is a very irrational one because it is a miniature of the American pattern. For example these figures are three years old. There are seventeen—or were in 1967—seventeen refrigerator manufacturers in Canada manufacturing something like a total of 287,000 refrigerators whereas the minimum scale plant considered by an American manufacturer was half a million. It means we should not have any more than one plant in Canada, according to rational economic thought, which means when you rationalize the economy it is going to be centralized. The only thing that is stopping that is the tariff. If it is going to be centralized anyway because of the economies of scale because of the technological question let us have it centralized with social control rather than in the hands of a few private people. Let us try to decentralize that consciously and politically as much as possible.

The Chairman: I don't think we are disagreeing at all with what you have in mind. What you are trying to accomplish, I think, what we are disagreeing with is whether this is really practical, whether this can really be done because supposing you said to General Motors or Ford in Windsor that your profits, that they were not going to plow the profits back, you are not going to invest and that we are deciding how you are going to do this. What is to stop General Motors saying, "Fine, we will close it then. We do not have to make cars here in Canada."

We are not that big, we are not that important in their scale of production that we can dictate to these people, at least I don't think we can, I don't think any of us disagree with what you are trying to say, the broader base for the decision making, so that it is spread out more to the public need and the public benefit but we do not, in our system, based on freedom, a certain amount of freedom, you cannot have it both ways. You cannot take away freedom with one hand and give it with another and you cannot take away freedom from one without affecting the freedom of everybody.

Mr. Ford: Is your assumption that we now have equal distribution of freedom? Mine would be you could not have equal distribution of freedom without equal distribution of power. That is quite the opposite of what we have now.

Mr. Livingston: This freedom is affecting the poor people, making them poorer.

Mr. Ford: Within our system you are right, within our system we are captives of those corporations because they have that kind of leverage so you are right, the only thing that we can do is change the system. Do you want to work within the system or do you want to change it? I will take you back, they are both because I think you might get back to poverty.

The Chairman: My question was that if you change the system can you compel General Motors to stay and live with the system?

Mr. Ford: If you change the system you will nationalize General Motors. The question of compensation naturally arises, I agree. We don't know the answers to all your questions. What I would do is complain very strongly. If you want to talk about changing the system we are going to have to do some research but there is no money available to research a socialist Canadian economy, however, on the question of assistance, after our definition, we pointed out that because what we are talking about is defining poverty in terms of disbursement of wealth and distribution of power and because that leads to people with vested interests at the high end of the disbursement range, poverty, is part of a function existing in the social order with the vested interests and the change in the structure of society, if the system changes, in effect what I am saying is that they are, rather than social services alone, imperative if we are seriously to solve the question. That is how I think the whole thing relates back to poverty. I know that Al and Ken can talk more about that specifically. Academically, it is interesting here that the point has been raised.

The Chairman: I would like to ask Mr. Murdoch a question based on his earlier statement where he proposed a legal framework and legalization of the right of people to organize and negotiate to mediate and to settle disputes, if I understood him, at large. In that legal framework would you have something to protect the interests of the negotiating parties?

Mr. Murdoch: I see the parties that are involved are, you know, the public but the public which has gathered itself, you know, into units. What we are saying in the brief is that more and more citizens are banding together with their collective concerns. Surely it is a part of the legislators to balance the interests within the framework of the law so that is one check and control. I think what we are suggesting in the legal framework, there is a framework, unfortunately there is not a framework now and whether you know it or not, these citizens groups are developing by leaps and bounds. A study of the inventory of groups assembled with the Canadian Association of Neighbourhood Services registers 200 local citizens' groups, in the major Canadian cities. This is increasing. We will have troubles if you do not provide some sort of framework. We are suggesting a framework. We must recognize that these people do have a say and a way and means within the system. We are not arguing that there has to be a balance, we think that the legislators are part of that balance. We are saying that the people are part of the balance as well.

The Chairman: Now, maybe we could just relate this to the low income groups. How would that apply to the low income groups?

Mr. Murdoch: Well, I think you know there is going to be a multiplicity of the kinds of groups. There would be groups that are going to be organizing around housing situations, tenants. There would be people organizing, as they are organizing now, in terms of quality and the kind and way of distributing welfare itself. We are talking about changing the welfare system. Even within that system there is possibility of organizing so people participate and make it a little more humane, at least. Maybe there are some more people with ideas that would like to refer to that.

Senator Pearson: One statement you made, Mr. Ford, was the idea of a guaranteed annual income would just be another vehicle of power in the hands of one group. Is this not right? The power would be handed to the government or some other body and the system would be just the same thing as it was before? They would be oppressed and under control and gaining nothing in the way of freedom?

Mr. Ford: I don't think I was that severe in my criticism. I think what I am looking at is the potential growth for change, the potential for frustration in the idea of the guaranteed annual income. What I am saying is that one of the attractions is that it is cheap to administer because it is more central, requires less local offices, requires less actual field work contact with people. That is a centralizing sort of thing. You may have to take steps to counter that so you can be responsive to local needs and local differences. Further, I was saying that if indeed you do not use the guaranteed annual income seriously as a means of redistributing, pretty severely the wealth of the country, not just guaranteeing a minimum level of poverty, but trying to eliminate poverty, then that means you are going to have to realize it will be a costly programme. You are going to have to sell it as a costly programme and you cannot hide it as a cheap programme. Unless you are serious about that, unless you do that, all you are doing is setting up hopes and delay which will, in the end, increase frustration. The matter, not inherently being the same, as this is, but essentially it will be increasing frustration.

Senator Pearson: My idea of a guaranteed income is that you would have your guaranteed income at a certain rate according to the number of persons in a family, etcetera, all their conditions, etcetera, whether married or single or one family, one parent family, etcetera. Then coupled with this would be an incentive because if you just get people a straight $10, or $15 or $20 a day, and that is it, you are just throwing your money away because people will just be wasting their lives, no incentive to get any more but if you give them an incentive, say, "now, look, for every $50 a month that you earn, you keep the whole $50 besides your guaranteed income that you get. If you earn $100 a month over and above the guaranteed income you keep two-thirds of this." So there is an incentive for them. This is my idea of a guaranteed income and cannot see any objection to it if it works this way. Mind you, I am just theorizing this is what the government will have in mind. I don't know what our final programme will be.

Mr. Ford: The assumption behind that is that full employment remains a possible, possibly achievable goal and therefore people will be able to, by working, raise themselves above the guaranteed level.

Senator Pearson: I would hope they would be able to raise themselves up and have a comfortable life and be able to raise themselves up and become independent of anybody and work themselves without having to draw on this income. With regard to the income worked out at the two-thirds basis it would eventually vanish for a person above that would not be drawing any.

Mr. Ford: I just relate that back to the senator's earlier remarks about technology. I certainly have not got the answer. He said, "Will the technological evolution make it possible to continue to supply jobs for all who want them."

Senator Pearson: I definitely think so.

Mr. Ford: The second point I want to make on that while I understand it is necessary for the incentive system to some degree I also have some hesitation regarding it solely as all it does is continue in many cases the kind of accumulative self interest ethic rather than a co-operative communal community but I don't have any solution in that respect.

The Chairman: Well, we have reached the end of our time and we have the next witnesses waiting.

I would like to thank you very much, Mr. Murdoch and Mr. Ford and Mr. Livingston, for your brief and for coming before us and answering our questions, thank you.

We have with us now, Mr. Gesta Abols of the student body of the University of Toronto and he has with him two other students, Miss Jean Golden on my left and Mr. Ron Weihs. There is another one, Eileen Ericks.

Mr. Abols, we just received your brief around noon and I think the senators had a copy distributed only a few minutes ago. We have not had any time to study it at all so perhaps, since our time is limited, you might perhaps make a short opening statement and focus on the highlights of the brief and then we will turn over to the questions.

I understand that some students of the Ryerson Polytechnical Institute have stayed behind in the hope they could have a little brief session after this one.

Mr. Gesta Abols, President, Students' Administrative Council of the University of Toronto: Thank you very much, sir. We were invited to make a presentation to this committee in the fall of last year and at that time we sent out an invitation to many of the groups on the campus that deal with, one way or another, poverty to make a submission. We stated that we would not, in fact, speak on their behalf but we would like them to speak independently under the umbrellas of permission we were granted. What has happened since then is that a number of groups involved feel publicity would be harmful to their projects and as such they decided not to participate but there are some people here that are involved in community projects that participated. The other groups that are not directly represented we are going to speak for we're not going to, I think, be able to present their case as well as they could have but I will try and summarize both their viewpoints and some of my viewpoints as to the question of poverty and how we see a possible way of alleviating it.

I may state at this stage we have no answers for it.

The Chairman: Would you identify the other groups? Are they identifiable groups?

Mr. Abols: Well, yes, they are identifiable including organizations such as SHOUT probably being the main one of the lot that were going to participate, the others being legal aid projects which we are developing further. I am going to let VDEP speak for themselves. I think they have got a very good record. They are quite interesting. We do feel though there are ways the problems of poverty, first of all, affect the university. The first one, most obvious one, unfortunately that begins to sound like a rhetorical question, who goes to universities. First we know one must have financial power to have access to information in the university. We also know this information is power itself and therefore it becomes a question of power reinforcing power. It has been suggested, and I think, wisely, so possibly some sort of consideration should be given for some sort of, if you want, information aid programme whereby people in the community, if they need advice from the sociologists, that would be made available not through City Hall, not through Provincial Government but at the University Directory so people can come in and ask questions and get answers.

I do not like to cover the rest of the questions; who does the university serve? It is obvious and I am sure you have heard the arguments at least a hundred times in the many sessions you have had. I would like to talk about some of the specific things though such as birth control. We have started a birth control clinic at the University of Toronto, it is my feeling, at least the feeling of many, many other people that the question of abortion, which is part of birth control, should rest totally within the jurisdiction of the individual at this stage of our historical development. We are not suggesting abortion is a question in which society has neither interest or stake, it clearly does, however I think it is also evident that governmental structures tend to be somewhat slow in responding to the needs of people and especially those people that become poor as a direct consequence of excessive child birth. For the time being, at least, we should try to give them the jurisdiction, it could be problematic in the long run, that could be remedied and speed would not be the same problem as it is now. Of course there are also many unwanted pregnancies on the campus annually. What this means is students have to drop out of university and have to drop their education. Many end up incapable of coming back. Of course this means they have less valuable functions. This causes financial hardship on them and, of course, also is a loss to our society. So we are not in favour of wider birth control dissemination, it is a way of ending poverty and clearly opening up a portion and leaving it entirely to the individual.

I should point out these are not official policies of the council. They are only views some of the groups involved in the problem have and they are also my personal views.

Another question which we have become involved with is the question of community organizing. We have, as a council, given financial support to people that can be considered poor, that have come out to participate politically within their own community. Mrs. Gaudet, a resident of Ward 7 ran successfully as Trustee of the Board of Education and we also supported John Sewell, who I believe spoke to this committee yesterday.

We believe though that it is not enough that we provide money. We do not have much money to give out to people. We feel that the poor can be helped if the government would provide means by which they can organize politically and gain a position of power and from that position gain their needs. To achieve this, and I feel personally, resource centres could be established in poor communities where the government provides the managerial help, organizing political campaigns, provide assistance to run campaigns, give money to run for perfectly serious candidates. Of course, there would be a problem in testing the seriousness and also institute political education programmes to teach the people what the political issues are and define them by means of public speaking and so on.

I would like to talk also, at this stage, about the access to higher education from the poor, something that, of course, is much more directed to the universities. I think it is indisputable that being poor decreases your chances of going to a university. Studies have come out on this and all of them, although they disagree on the degree to which it affects the situation, they agree that it does affect it significantly. We realize at the same time that education is a question of provincial jurisdiction but at the same time it has become clear over the last few years that the federal government has become involved in education and not very indirectly either. It does, for instance, provide money for the Ontario Student Loan Programme. Unfortunately, the federal government in this area makes it a loan that has to be repayable. This directly affects, I think, the poor student. The poor student does not see the value of going into debt to get an education which ultimately would give him a greater return. This can be solved quite simply, I think by the governments first of all removing the debt and giving as an outright grant. Secondly, the government should put pressure on the provinces to go out and advertise their student aid programmes widely in the high schools where the student generally drops out. Furthermore, I think the grants should be considerably increased for poor students. I am in favour of means test to prevent abuse. I think it is important that poor student become totally independent in university. This, of course, would alleviate the anxiety and depression that are, to some extent, a direct result of this association with middleclass people, the embarrassment that he has of being poor which should not be. It exists and it is a problem.

We also believe that if you make this student totally dependent this would, in fact, in the long run, increase his love and concern for the family but not, I think, alienate him from the family unit.

Before I pass the programme on to VDEP, I would simply like to stress again we do not have an answer to the question of poverty. I think it would be simplistic to suggest it is just an economic problem. It is not. It is a psychological problem, not necessarily to be solved psychologically, economics does come into it and the student's chances to get into the university also affects the role of the university and can be remedied. I do not think the solutions are all that difficult and just involve a certain amount of desire to do something about it.

I would like to pass on the VDEP.

Miss Jean Golden: I am the director of the project at the university that we call the Varisty Downtown Education Project, or VDEP.

What we are attempting to do at this point in time is—two years ago in the summer of 1968, the Students' Administrative Council of the University of Toronto set up this project with the desire and aim that you train and expose the university student inner-city life in Toronto with whom we had evolved some sort of a plan or design involving ourselves more with inner-city communities. We hired twenty people that summer and we spent the summer mostly being exposed. My friend Ron Weihs and I are members of that group.

The area is mostly below Bloor, Jarvis to Parliament and in the great Portuguese area we call the Kensington Market area on the other side of Spadina below College Street.

Since that time it has involved full time commitment in two areas in the inner-city. One is the Trafan Court area below Queen Street and the other is the Jarvis-Dundas area or George Street.

So, I will talk about both those projects. Last summer, the beginning of the summer we were approached by a group of six mothers of Trafan Court who were very dissatisfied with education their children were receiving from the local public school. Their children were being put into opportunity classes and were being termed "retarded" yet a couple of them had I.Q.'s, according to school tests, of 120, around that area, still being put in these classes. The children were not learning in the basic schools. They felt this was the fault of the classes they were being put into. We were attempting to deal with the whole problem of poverty and to be able to teach and show that there were so many areas involved, not being able to learn and not being able to read and the schools might be detrimental to this learning.

In this area we learned to cope with specific needs. They approached and asked us to set up a summer programme. There was the idea of setting up a fulltime private school. This year we did do that and sent some of our people down into the area to talk to John Sewell and others to see what they recommended. We are running the school now with ten children from 7 to 17. There are six mothers on the Board of Governors who determine the policy. We work in close association. If they ever decide we are not doing a good job or no longer wish us in the community then we will leave. We feel truly responsible to the needs of these parents and to these children and did not go down with preconceived plans of what we wanted to do down there. Their aim was not only to help the children to learn the basic skills they are going to need to survive in that area but the tools become more involved in their community help. The children become more involved so they understand the problems they are facing and their parents are facing and will perhaps be able to evolve on their own, with their parents, some scheme for themselves.

The second area we are involved in is the Jarvis-Dundas area. This is our community organizing project. Last summer we set up a house on George Street which was open for children from about 9.00 in the morning till 9.00 at night. There was education and recreational programmes and we had a few parents popping into the house but essentially it was geared to children. We made a mistake when we did it because we went into the community without having contacted the parents, without asking them what they wanted us to do. We just plunked ourselves down, and then I think we have learned that if you are going to go into the lower economic area you would have to go to people who live there. You cannot offer them things that may be totally incongruent with what they want. For the past eight months we have had some people living on the street who are residents of the area, Ron, being one of them. There are two residence houses there consisting of students and teachers in the area and residents of the area who work very closely together. In response to what the parents have been asking for we help set up programmes. We gained access to the Duke of York Public School, which many of you know is a progressive experimental school in the City of Toronto. We run programmes out of that three times a week in the evening. We have a house on the street paid for by our organization, VDEP used by the parents and residents in the area. They decide what they want to do with it. We hold meetings every Tuesday night which we called "What's Going On?" where we bring down people like John Sewell, different ministers in the area, other groups that are involved in the inner-city like the Angels. We allow the parents and residents in the area to have talks with people and express their points of view. We have established a residents' committee, some people like ourselves, some parents, some teachers in the area who hope to deal with many of the issues facing that specific area. At times it is a very difficult area to organize. There is no cohesive community that exists there. It is a transient area where there are a lot of men's hostels, prostitution is heavy in that area, houses, communities broken up by vacant lots, by factories, we feel we can be successful in working with these people and organizing these communities. We may be able to be successful in other areas. The whole aim is that these people decide what they themselves want, what is best for them, how they want to solve the problems facing them.

We have set up a tutorial programme for the inner-city children who go to Jarvis Collegiate. It is the only school in the area and is predominantly made up of children in the Rosedale area. These children in this school are essentially very bright children and have to be made to fit there in the first place because the majority are sent to vocational and occupational schools. What happens by the time they hit Grade 10 or 11 is they are failing. What we hope to do is provide for them extra help they need. To do this we have contacted the College of Education on Bloor Street providing their teachers to work with these children on a one-to-one basis to help them in specific subjects but further than this we have made a condition that if these teachers come down in the area they must also be willing to get to know the parents and try to understand how the parents of the children are doing.

In the school we also have a group league for student democracy, a high school radical group involved with us and interested in working with children in this area. They have been involved to the point where they want to look after the clean-up of the programme and other small jobs they can do. So they learn what is happening there.

I should stress that the issue we are working on now is bulldozing in the inner city area that stretches from Jarvis over to Parliament. The two wards 6 and 7. There are developers who are accumulating great pieces of that area. The plan, which is going to go through in perhaps two months is to build high rise apartments at the corner of Sherbourne and Dundas without asking the people in the area whether they want this type of thing to be built. This will be high rise housing and not for children under 12 or 13. It will be expensive housing that people in the area will not be able to use. What is going to happen to the people who are already in that area?

We are concerned with what they want. Last night we had a meeting with John Sewell and the residents in that area. We have two months to try to tell the City what we want in that area, what we want to see done so we have to conclude on what we are doing.

That connection with the university—inner-city we think is vital. The university has connections not only with its own people who are in many disciplines but with places like the local city governments. It is a powerful institution and we hope to be able to bring it closer to the community to understand the problems and expose more and more university students who go out in the world and command these higher positions to the problems in these areas.

We have trained twenty people now and there would be a hundred or two hundred people dropping down who are interested. In the first year it cost us $20,000 and now it costs us $40,000 to run it. Most of it is done on a volunteer basis. The salaries of the teachers are extremely low and most of it will go to the children. The whole idea is we do not want to bring a lot of money down into this area because that is not showing people how to help themselves. We want them to be able to say what they want, what they need because they certainly know better than we do. They should then be able to request from us what kind of help they would like and to see if we can meet that demand.

Mr. Ron Weihs: I would like to say a couple of things.

Gentlemen, I have been involved in VDEP for two years now and for almost all of that time I have lived on George Street, just south of Dundas, just east of Jarvis Street. I would like to say a few things and tell you about a few things that I have noticed while I have been there particularly as they pertain to the way our society relates to some of the people I have come to know in that area.

One of the main difficulties, I think, in poverty is its lack of dignity. This is understandable partly because in our society money does develop dignity.

Dignity, to some extent, differs from money. We measure our dignity by the amount of money we have so what starts out as quite a simple problem, namely poverty being a lack of money, as someone once said becomes quite a complex syndrome and I would like to just talk a little bit about how our society contributes to this.

I want to talk about only the things I know so I will only speak about what people have told me. Now this is somewhat hearsay, but I think I know these people well enough to believe what they say and to know when they are telling me what actually happened. What I am talking about has to do with dignity. I do not want to talk about who these people are, what their names are or to really tell you too much about them. I hope perhaps that you will take, on faith, that these things are like this. Perhaps you have heard a bit about this before. I don't know. If not, perhaps they could just be very convenient fictions. I assure you that they are not.

One of these I want to talk about is something that we in VDEP call the "rent receipt cycle". We know a number of people on welfare, things like that, as a matter of fact some of my friends, I go visit them, and they come and visit me. The way the rent receipt cycle works, I am sure the senators all know about this, but perhaps the audience does not, is that you cannot get a room, you cannot get welfare, excuse me, unless you have a rent receipt. Unfortunately you cannot usually get a rent receipt unless you are on welfare because you cannot pay for the room. Consequently because you can't get the rent receipt you can't get the welfare. I know a couple of people who have been caught in this trap and I have watched it go on for weeks on end. The only way that someone can really get out of this rent receipt cycle is to find a friendly landlord who will give them a room on credit and give them, in advance, the rent receipt so that they can take it to the Welfare Office and get the money and pay for the room. Now, of course, this type of landlord is not very prevalent and what is more sometimes these people get burned and decide not to do that any more. So it is very hard to try to find somebody like that. So many people, I think it is fair to say, many people are not on welfare when they really need to be because they are caught in this trap.

Of course I know about the papers, that you have heard about some of the lack of dignity that comes with dealing with the Welfare office. May I say this I have heard some people say such and such a welfare worker is very good, he is terrific and at the same time another is not, is always treating people very rude, insultingly and what is more, of course, you have heard, I think, because I read it in the papers, that welfare workers barge into people's houses and throw like this. One case I know of, and I really do believe this is true, that one of my friends went into a friend's house and saw a number of beer bottles on the table.

and said, "What are those beer bottles doing?" and the woman said, "I am collecting them and I am going to sell them back to the Liquor Control Board." So my friend said, "Don't do that because what if your welfare worker barges in and sees all those beer bottles? You will be off welfare." The woman said, "No, that will not happen." Of course it did and that's the end of that story.

Of course there are a lot of things that are a problem. On welfare you cannot get a job. I met people and I say, "How are things?" and they say, "Well, I am going off for a couple of days. I have got some work in Hamilton but don't tell anybody because if anybody finds out I am off Welfare." Now, it seems to me that once somebody gets trapped in the Welfare situation there is really no way you can get ahead of the game. There is no way he can ever break out of it and it is kind of unfortunate because I think many of us would like people to find their way back into a more dignified economic situation where somebody is paid for all the work he does, but you really can't do this just off the bat in one afternoon. You are usually looking for a job and it takes quite a while. Sometimes if you have not been working, if it is a while, you have got to get a few little jobs so you can develop some kind of a work record. It seems to me Welfare makes this impossible. Also, people on Welfare have extra expenses sometimes. I need not speak of things like medical expenses, perhaps they don't want to talk about that or maybe they need suddenly new clothes. Perhaps they need new clothes to get a job but perhaps it is Christmas or something like this, to have the kind of system where someone is not permitted to make this kind of extra thing for himself and his family, where he has to sneak away perhaps for enough money to have a bit of a Christmas celebration, I think it is very damaging to people's dignity.

A friend of mine, who lives also very near me, went to the New City Restaurant, which is the only one open at that time of night. Now, it does not have that terrific a reputation but this woman went for a cup of coffee and a couple of policemen came in and one of them was very, very rude to her based on the fact she was in that restaurant. The other one, may I say, remanded the one who was being rude and what is more I know of some very, very good policemen who are working there, who help people out, things like this but this all strips people of their dignity.

Judgments are always being made about people on the basis of living in our area. The other day, in the City Council there were references to our area as a "red-light district" which really offended one of my friends who lives on Dundas Street who happened to be there observing the City Council meeting. I do not think this kind of thing contributes to the kind of a self-image where one can have some self image that will allow him to get out of whatever hole he happens to be in.

I have more here, I am sorry, I am going to make it as brief as I can.

Another thing is this; inspectors are there to protect tenants and I think that is a very important thing, but some people are home owners and sometimes the way these inspectors function in doing their jobs would be to go against what people expect of them. It amounts sometimes to harassment.

There is another woman I know who lives on the street in which speculators are very, very interested and they have been trying to buy her house for some time but she won't sell because, believe it or not, she likes to live in that area and many people do. Many people do think of themselves as living in this area. What happened and I am quite certain, probably there is no connection here, but the inspector came around inspected her house and came up with an estimate amounting to $12,000 which had to be done in two months. Now, it seems to me that if these people are really interested in people improving their homes perhaps a little more realistic assessment, based perhaps on what people could reasonably accomplish, might do more to improve those homes than coming up with something like a $12,000 assessment for a house that is really not worth much more than that.

The Chairman: Mr. Weihs, I do not want to interrupt you. I am not sure whether Mr. Frerichs wants to make some remarks. There is twenty minutes left and it is up to you how you use this time. You can use it all for the presentation or questions. I thought I should let you know the time is passing and I just wondered if, while I have the microphone, if the lady from Ryerson . . .

Miss York: I would only be about five minutes, if you could give it to me when you finish.

The Chairman: We will finish this session at a quarter past 5.00 and then we will have a few minutes left for Ryerson.

Mr. Weihs: If I could just say one or two more words?

In your deliberations I would ask this, perhaps this has to do with disposing of people, with dealing with people. It also has the effect of producing a mental set in those people that makes it impossible for them to deal with themselves and dispose of themselves. I would ask that you think about ways of helping the poor that does not have to do with coming down and doing things for people and administering people but also thinking in terms of how you can get people to administer themselves. And I think the one thing that these people do have a role in is their communities and if they can be encouraged to take a part, an active part, in the planning and development of their communities I think this will go very far to counteracting the negative effects of some of these programmes that dispose of people instead of taking them into account.

Senator Pearson: I would like to ask the young lady about that area where the highrise is being put out. Are those houses there, talking of bulldozing down, capable of being remodelled or renewed or are they too old and have gone past that stage?

Miss Golden: I am not an urban developer. They are about four-storey apartment buildings that exist. Now, I have been inside them, they are housing like any other housing in the area, not bad housing, families living there right now but they have been offered a fair amount of money.

Senator Pearson: That would be the owner of the block?

Miss Golden: Offered a fair amount of money. From what I understand he has sold already for the developer.

Senator Pearson: So the tenants have no control at all on what is going to happen?

Miss Golden: We are going to stop it from going up because there is no place for those people to move right now.

Senator Pearson: Because of the housing shortage?

Miss Golden: Where are they going to go in the central area? If you are going to build something like that you have either got to have certain areas in the building which will be rent controlled and they can move into but it is highly unlikely in that area.

Senator McGrand: How do you intend to try and stop them? How are you going to try and stop them?

Miss Golden: We are right now in the middle of deliberating with people in the area as to how we are going to do it. We are having a meeting on Saturday to try and decide how we are going to go about this within the two months which is a very short period of time. I think that is what we are going to do is make the issue known through the people of the area. They do not know it is going to happen. This information just has not been made available. The second thing is to evolve a plan of what they want. There is no good saying to the City, "We don't want something". We have to decide what we want instead. We have got two months to make it known, to make it a public issue to get people to go down to City Hall and let themselves be seen. We need a large number of people to do that. Frankly, I don't think we are going to be successful, but if we lose this battle perhaps we will win the next one because we will have the organization by then.

Senator Pearson: How many people would be living in those apartments?

Miss Golden: I would guess a couple of hundred.

Senator Pearson: How many?

Miss Golden: Three buildings, four storeys, I would say 300 people but I could be away off. Approximately that.

Senator Pearson: Has the owner been able to collect his rents all the time? Why did he sell?

Miss Golden: He got offered a good amount of money.

Senator Pearson: Why did these people want to develop these areas rather than some other areas?

Miss Golden: I think it all goes back to the question of why do developers speculate in the inner-city? Why? Land is so valuable.

Senator Pearson: You get the property cheaply and decide to build it there?

Miss Golden: Twenty years from now you may be able to build with the area of department stores more expensive high-rises. They have got the market. People move into them. This whole waterfront development will be built with tremendous high-rises there.

Senator McGrand: In your brief you say:

For whom does the University, any university exist? Official propaganda would have us believe that the University exists to create, preserve and pass on knowledge.

Do you believe that the university is to pass on knowledge and that or that it is passing on false knowledge?

Miss Golden: I did not prepare the brief but I answer it, if you like. I do not think it fails to pass knowledge, but it passes on a specific type of knowledge, the perpetuation of the current system. The knowledge is not being passed on to the people of the society who are being exploited, the people who are powerless and we are not passing on the knowledge of how to help those people, how to show those people how to help themselves.

The Chairman: Excuse me, I think Mr. Frerichs wants to add something to this.

Mr. Eilert Frerichs: The university serves or specific interest groups in society; business, government, industry and so on. The disadvantaged people of society as a whole, even people who are not disadvantaged or poor, workers, your ordinary workers.

your factory workers, do not have direct access to what happens in the university, the kind of knowledge which the university has, whether this is technical knowhow, whether this is cultural knowhow, which is equally important.

Senator McGrand: There was, I could never find out how it came about and what happened to it, Rochdale College, here in Toronto I believe it was an eighteen storey building, was it not? I do not know who built it but I understand that it was handed over to the students to run themselves and teach themselves and it folded up. What happened? Why did that happen?

Mr. Abols: I gather that you are somehow trying to tie this into the previous question?

Senator McGrand: Yes, I am.

Mr. Abols: Well, first of all, nobody can deny the university passes on knowledge but again you know the point is . . .

Senator McGrand: I asked you about Rochdale.

Mr. Abols: No, but I am trying to tie the two in, if I may. You know the answer is not only is the university passing on knowledge but what it is doing with the rest of society . . .

Senator McGrand: That question has been answered to his satisfaction. I want to know about Rochdale.

Mr. Abols: As far as Rochdale is concerned, it was a project initiated essentially by students of the University of Toronto who arranged for the financing of it. What happened to it? It was badly managed.

Senator McGrand: Who managed it?

Mr. Abols: The students managed it, or the past students, not necessarily students, the past students (it had conceived of the idea and then graduated and then managed it.

Senator McGrand: Where did they find the money?

Mr. Abols: It was given to them by private companies and by Central Housing and Mortgage.

Senator McGrand: The money came from people, is that right?

Mr. Abols: From the public and the private sectors of the community.

Senator McGrand: The big business men and so on, people who had the wealth to give it, is that right?

Mr. Abols: No, it came from both, both the public and private.

Senator McGrand: $18 million?

Mr. Abols: I am not sure of the exact cost of Rochdale, I am not sure.

Mr. Frerichs: I think it was only in the neighbourhood of $4 million.

Mr. Abols: I have heard $4 million to $5 million.

Senator McGrand: Would you say that a university does not serve the public in general, it only serves the business community and so on but does not serve the common people? Here was Rochdale, a $4 million institution provided for the students, given to the students to run in the interests of the students and in the interests of the poorer people in general and the thing collapsed, why?

Mr. Abols: A couple of things. I would like to say I don't think it was designed in the interests of the poor people. It was designed in the interests of experiment in education. It was quite obviously not really to aid the poor people. I have said such experiments do not aid poor people, but it was an experiment in a type of education.

Senator McGrand: Which the students taught themselves, they didn't listen to this false philosophy that the universities were passing down for generations, was that not the idea? That was your word yourself, was it not?

Mr. Abols: Yes, but to say to teach yourself is not to say you are going to go out and do something for the community or make things available to the community. That is another concept.

Senator McGrand: I want to know why this university, with such a noble idea behind it, why did it fail?

Mr. Abols: I do not think the noble idea of experiment in education failed. It has been a good experiment. It was interesting. Everybody was watching it. Rochdale was never set up to help the poor community. We are suggesting that the university should start helping the people that generally do not have the financial power to acquire education.

Mr. Frerichs: Could I attempt at least an answer?

I have been a member of Rochdale College myself. Not at the moment but last year. Rochdale was designed primarily as an educational experiment. What happened was that Rochdale, I think the basic idea behind it is still valid, Rochdale was set up as a co-operative community. Unfortunately the planners made the mistake, I think, of forgetting that it is extremely difficult to have any kind of community life in that kind of building, the way the building was designed. That was one problem. The other problem was that in the middleclass of bourgeois society from which most of the members of Rochdale College came and still do come co-operative living is not one of the things that people learn. That is the students who lived at Rochdale just do not know how to live co-operatively. It is as simple as that. We don't learn it. Our society is not collective. It is always geared to the wishes of the individual and the freedom of the individual. Suddenly you throw a lot of people into a place and say, "You order your own lives." You are bound to run into immense difficulties. People throughout the whole educational system never ever learned to order their own lives. Young people are taught and told organization always by someone older than they are. They just do not learn how to organize and run their own lives.

When you multiply that by 800 you can imagine the problems that you are going to run into. That is the second thing.

The third thing is this; Rochdale has in fact performed a very important function in our society as a gathering place and a very warm and very important community where all sorts of young people from all over Canada and a lot of them from the United States have found an environment where they can express themselves in whichever way they like. Sometimes this expression can be very destructive.

Senator McGrand: Is it still functioning?

Mr. Frerichs: Yes.

Senator McGrand: How many students, how much is occupied?

Mr. Frerichs: I think it is in the neighbourhood of 75%, at least 75% which is quite good, but when you get a whole lot of young people who have rejected the values of their own society, including the value of money, they just do not have the money to pay their rent and then the building, the institution is going to run into financial problems quickly. This is one of the things that has happened. I do not deny that it is a very important function that Rochdale has had of providing a community where people can be themselves and where young people could find acceptance and still do.

The Chairman: I would like to ask one question. Now you three people have taken a very special interest in what we call the "poor", the problem of poverty, the low income groups. University students are idealists and that is natural for young people. Tell me why is it that students generally have not adopted poverty as a cause? You mentioned several causes in your brief but poverty is not one of them. Is there any special reason for that?

Mr. Abols: I can only give you my personal opinion. I think there are more idealists among young students than there are among say the other eight groups of the society. I would not go so far as to suggest that all students are idealistic. I think we have to keep in mind that we have learned how to respond to fads. We have learned how to respond to many things politically; it is impossible for people to pursue more than one or two major projects at any one time. It just so happens at this stage of political interest poverty is not one of the "politically in" things. What you do have is you have a base of serious, dedicated people looking at the problem. Hopefully, in the process, these people will be able to get other people interested in the problem so they can get political support and some changes can be brought about and I think that is about all I could say. It is a very general question and a very difficult one to answer.

The Chairman: Does anyone else want to add to that?

Mr. Frerichs: I do not think poverty can be considered a cause. Poverty is a disease in our society. Most students do not feel poverty directly just as the whole of Canadian society. It has to be, I don't know, educated or changed or what have you so that the whole of society is prepared to do creative things with respect toward poverty. So does the university student. The university, unfortunately, I think, only reflects the minds of the general population.

The Chairman: Well, you have said poverty is a disease and not a cause but cancer is a disease; tuberculosis is a disease, but people have adopted the elimination of cancer as the cause, why not adopt the elimination of poverty as a cause?

Mr. Abols: May I just add, I think too that we have to keep in mind that unless somehow or other people feel affected by a problem it is very difficult to motivate them politically to become interested in it. We do live in a very affluent society and we are very glad of that. It means many of us are very comfortable but at the same time having that affluence, having that materialism, we can isolate ourselves from those things we find unpleasant. If we do not like a television programme we can switch channels. If we do not like something on the radio, we can go out to other wavelengths. Just look at the change in cars, everybody has a Mustang. It is essentially a two-seater car. Twenty years ago people had family cars. People had to live together. Materialism isolates. Another thing, I think is that people do not feel they are essentially needy. People don't realize, generally, I think, that there are other people within the community that do need this and until you can get that message across, until you can feel that it does affect them, that they are all part of their society, their environment, that they are all people, it is hard to make something like poverty which is generally well hidden from the student as well as it is difficult to make it really a worthwhile cause. It is nice if you can tie it in with something like civil rights, and they did in the States and then it was politicised, but you know the problem is still there to a large extent.

The Chairman: Are you saying it is not politically glamorous enough?

Mr. Abols: Yes, that is right. It is not politically glamorous enough.

Mr. Weihs: May I say a word to that question, Senator? I think that the reason it has not become such a cause is because I think people are primarily concerned with what affects them. I think a much more cogent question, perhaps, is why is poverty not a cause of the poor who are directly affected by it? As to the university situation, I think that concern for poverty is a very healthy state. I think it would be very unhealthy if it were a cause. The last thing people here I live want is a bunch of idealistic, perhaps university students all rushing down suddenly. The thing has become a cause. But I think that real concern and real deep commitment for people who seem to have been left behind by our society is owing at the university and that this is a very healthy group. What you are finding is that more and more people are interested enough to really go into the problem, not to go to a rally about poverty, you know, but to find out really what is going on there.

The Chairman: Earlier this afternoon at 2.00 we had a brief from the social service course of the Ryerson Polytechnical Institute and one of the students is still down there. Perhaps she may want to speak to this but I am going to read you just a few words from their brief, right in the introduction, and this is a group of social service workers who were preparing a brief on poverty and they say this:

All students were asked if they wished to participate. A few were not interested, some were very cynical feeling that nothing would be achieved by another report. Approximately 70 students initially decided to participate with varying degrees of cynicism, hope and concern.

Wouldn't you say that would be typical of Toronto University too?

Mr. Weihs: I imagine on a large scale when we advertise for people for our project we found that we had many more applicants than we had need for. So I would say again there is probably a small group, very interested and the rest, I suppose, like the rest of society are not that interested.

Mr. Frerichs: I think that a lot of students at the university would certainly feel that the Special Senate Committee on Poverty, "What on earth is that all about? What power does the Canadian government, which this committee presumably represents, what power or will or moral conviction does the Canadian government have to grapple seriously with the problem of poverty?"

Jesus said the poor will always be with us, but I don't know whether he is right in that. Certainly our society, in governments, has acted as if the poor were always going to be with us and that nothing is going to change. I would suggest to you very strongly, Senator, the only way that we can eliminate poverty is by drastically altering the social structure. I am sure you have heard a lot about that and I don't have to go into this kind of thing.

The Chairman: Now I am going to ask this little girl from Ryerson who has been waiting all the evening to say a few words. If she would be good enough to come to the microphone and identify herself and make her statement.

Miss York: I am Sally York, Journalism Student. I will be 44 in April.

I left school during the war. I became a nurse and contracted tuberculosis in 1952. I went into hospital for two years and had another year of work. When I came out of the hospital I found it very difficult to get . . .

The Chairman: Excuse me, we cannot hear very well. There is another microphone if you could come up to it.

Miss York: Do you wish me to start over again?

I will be 44 in April and I have known difficulties for two times in my life. The first time was when I came out of hospital after being in hospital for two years with tuberculosis as a result of nursing the last year of the war and I spent a year convalescing. When I went to try and get a job no one would even interview me because I had had tuberculosis. I eventually got a job in a hospital but I had a broken engagement or series, I would say, because I could not have any children. So I went to the Netherlands and I got a very good job there with Philips at the world head office where I did work in developing countries.

My family lived over here in Toronto and I thought, as I was getting older, I would like to come to Canada and be near my family, the only family I had. My family was living here in Toronto. I came here to Canada after being told in the Netherlands that I would have a very good job due to my work experience in the Netherlands but because I was over 40 I experienced difficulty in getting employment, but eventually David Crombie, who is the director of Students' Affairs here at Ryerson and the Registrar, who knew me, said, "Sally, you will have to go back to school and get your post-secondary education." I came back here and I started in Social Services and unfortunately two of my clients got murdered in Cabbage Town. I got very depressed and so I transferred to Journalism. I state these things so you will have some idea of how I am concerned with poverty and the difficulties.

I faced difficulty when I graduated from Ryerson on a Provincial loan. I hope to God I am going to be able to pay off the loan from the Ontario government. I state this because you have made a remark that worries me considerably. I hope I am going to be able to get a job to pay off. That is just preliminary. I will go through these points very quickly.

There are some very constructive things which are really follow-up especially to Jean's and Ron's remarks which I have listened to with great interest.

First of all regarding employment-unemployment. It would seem to me that one of the things that helps to bring people down into the poverty group, and this is going to get much worse, we have now figures of 6.1 unemployment rate is that people, usually the people on the lower income groups who have not managed to save any money, they have to wait at least three weeks before they get their money and then go to the finance houses if they have not got a credit rating and they are paying compound interest. I wonder if there will be some way of preventing people from going on Welfare by having some agency which would give them temporary loans at low interest rates. This is one thing.

My second point is that transport has become so expensive now that people who are on Welfare, the officers and I know this from experience myself, that they are usually left with about $1.50 a day. Now, it costs 25¢ for each car fare which means that you do not have enough left just going around looking for jobs let alone food in the one day and I would like to suggest both to the Provincial and the City Welfare that they find some means of helping them out with car fare to look for jobs. It is no use saying, "Why don't you walk?". You lose important time. The offices are only open at certain times of the day. That is one thing. The other thing which I really want to get is that it worries me very much, having read with great interest all the hearings right across Canada that there seem to be walls building up between all the different sectors of society and I am wondering if Peter Newman of the Star who seems to be organizing excellent Star forums and maybe John Bassett of the C.F.T.O., could televise it and bring all the different sectors of society and get together instead of having a competitive society and have a co-operative society where everybody is going to co-operate to try and solve some of these problems we are talking about just now such as both Jean and Ron about developers in that part of the city. I happen to be doing a research project as a journalism student and I would like to point out to the committee that there has been urban renewal down there and they have taken houses, renovated them and before that the rents were around about $150 a month and several families lived in them or people roomed in those houses and when they have been renovated they have gone up to $275 to $300 a month which means that the people have nowhere to go. When I asked other people what has happened to these other people they are tripling-up and doubling up and this seems to me to give great cause for concern. In other words there is no comprehensive planning. What happens, where do these people go? So Jean's and Ron's question is extremely valid that we do really have to find out where do these people go because they acquire debts and acquire such debts that they have no alternative, they get their wages garnishees which means then that they cannot get a job so that they are getting into a more and more vicious circle. There is another thing, if there is something wrong, if a man or a woman has more money they can pay but if another man goes to prison which again lessens his job opportunities, he cannot pay.

I am also very concerned about the kids, young people, who are getting criminal records for drugs. They again cannot get a job and they are creating more permanent welfare cases. The other thing is that I would like people to consider when they did the housing we seemed to be thinking of shelter for people in the range of $7,500, but Professor Albert Rose of the School of Social Work says that two-thirds of the people in Canada earn under $7,500 and of that group 40% earned under $5,000 and yet we are talking about low-income housing. One of our teachers at Ryerson did a mathematical calculation and the yearly mortgage rate of interest and everything amounts to $3,500 which is a fair amount. If you take that from $7,500, when you have paid out all your medical taxes and everything, what have you got to live on? In other words, we have got to find some way of everybody coming together. Let us stop bitching about the past and think about the future and if people can get gatherings together where people are not going to be expressing their hate, we have got to stop expressing our hate. Now, what we have got to do is to start doing, making constructive, comprehensive plans for the future so we do not destroy society.

For instance I read in the paper the other day that Halifax is developing at a very fast rate and that a man went down looking for housing, I cannot remember the exact rent, forgive me for not remembering, it was approximately $90 to $100 a month and it is now $175 a month. This is the sort of thing we must prevent. These are the sorts of things that cause poverty because people are exploiting the supply and demand factor in the economy. I know you have to find capital keep evolving a healthy economy, but in the more affluent sectors of our society do not get together they are not going to have a healthy economy. So even their own interests appeal to them.

lish interests of the affluent society, they have ally got to think what we are going to do.

Most of the construction going up in the City at the esent moment is in the luxury housing class. I know e developers say that it is not profitable to build w-cost housing, but I think there are lots of solutely first-class brains in business, probably the est brains in the country, and in the universities. I ink it is time that we did not turn them off. We rned them on and we asked them to come together d say, "What can we do at the present moment?"

The media is writing very good descriptions of what erty is. What we have got to do now is, and I think p newspapers, radio and televisions are doing very od research work, if they can go and do projects of iting with these people and find out the solutions, ecause I am sure that the solutions are there but we ve got to find them quick.

The Chairman: I am sorry to interrupt you, we are gting near the end of the time and if you could wind ip in one minute. We must cut it off at 5.30 sharp.

Miss York: Yes. I think those are the main things. e other thing is the question that the poor people be to wait for such a long time on tax rebates. If smething could be done about that. I think too that e transport would be a very great thing. I would like tsee the cost benefit factor and study made as to the qstion of transport and transportation takes an ul lot of the poor people's income. I think a great d) could be done to make the less affluent sectors of o society more mobile.

he other thing that I would like to see is that not t every dollar a person on Welfare earns that they ny only get $1 free. I would like to see a more firable ratio because most of the people going on V fare are in debt. I would like to see an incentive so tly could recover their dignity and be given a chance toay off their debts.

on put it beautifully, talking about the man aking off to Hamilton to get a job. I have known of cus of this myself right down here in Ward 6 and Wd 7 where they have wanted to work so they could p off their debts that they acquired before they ever wit on Welfare.

ow, if we could give them some incentive to pay of their debts and not penalize them. These are most nortant things.

The Chairman: Thank you very much. I am sorry th we have to break off this very interesting meeting bi we have to get back to the hotel and get smething to eat and then we have to leave again at 7.1 to go to another meeting tonight. So we really do n have very much time. I want to thank you Mr. Als and your friends very much for your kindness in coming here and making your presentation to us today. Thank you very much.

The Committee adjourned.

EVENING SESSION

Toronto, Wednesday, March 11, 1970.

The Special Senate Committee on Poverty, (Sub-committee "B"), met this day at 8.00 p.m. at O'Connor Drive Public School.

Senator Sparrow (Chairman) in the Chair.

Mr. Ralph Hughes, President, O'Connor Drive Development Community Association: I would like to take this opportunity to thank everybody for coming here and to the senators for coming to listen to us. I hope it will be quite interesting.

I would also like to congratulate the new president of the association, Mrs. Jones and all the new executive members who got in.

I am now going to introduce Senator Sparrow, the chairman.

The Chairman: Thank you very much. To be somewhat informal perhaps we will not stand. I would like to introduce to you the Honourable Senator Pearson of the Senate Committee on my right, and Senator Pearson is a senator from the Province of Saskatchewan. On my left is the Honourable Senator Chester Carter from Newfoundland. We are very pleased to be here with you at your meeting tonight. I understand that the membership of your association has a brief to present. Mrs. Le Mesurier tells me that no extra copies have been made so I understand that she will read the brief.

If I may establish ground rules, after consultation with your president and members of your committee, I feel sure we want questions and discussion from the floor as well pertaining to the presentation in the brief, and any other areas that you may wish to discuss, as far as poverty is concerned; the problems of poverty, suggestions of how it could be solved and recommendations to this committee.

This is a subcommittee of the total Senate Committee that is having hearings in Toronto this week. There is another part of our committee meeting in another section of Toronto tonight and we have been meeting on Tuesday, yesterday and today and tomorrow. We are open to and welcome any recommendations or suggestions you have.

Could we now have the presentation of the brief?

Mrs. Lynn Le Mesurier: I would like, with your permission, to address you as concerned and knowledgeable Canadian citizens rather than as our senators. Do I have your permission?

The Chairman: Right.

Mrs. Le Mesurier: In trying to put this brief together I found that really I was not sure of what this committee was after so we finally decided that if we asked some questions that we have been asking among ourselves that maybe it would help the committee to better understand our problem. I would also like, at this time, to ask if we could have written answers back in at least six months, if you or your staff cannot or are not able to come up with some answers we would appreciate a letter or note to that effect. We would also like to receive the report on your findings throughout Canada on the particular subjects that we will be talking on to-night.

We feel that one of the biggest concerns in this area is the interpretation of the Family Benefit Act and the Welfare Act.

Our first question is, why are not welfare recipients or people on assistance such as Mother's or Father's Allowance, Compensation, Disability Pensions or our senior citizens given a handbook that they can refer to, something that would inform them of their rights as people on assistance rather than depending entirely on the interpretation of the individual case worker.

What are some of the reasons that recipients of assistance can go to the appeal board and does the board ever let the person making the appeal know the decision of the board?

Why does not a woman on Mother's Allowance have a prescription card? Why is she only allowed $20 a month for prescriptions? Why is it that she cannot accumulate, for instance, if she does not use all of the prescription allowance in this month then why can't it be added to next month's allowance?

Why, when a woman applies for Welfare or Mother's Allowance, is she told that she has to take her husband to Court or she is not eligible for assistance? Is this a law or is this a bureaucratic resolution?

Is it a law that a woman, applying for assistance, has to show her bank book to her worker? Why, when women are on welfare are they not allowed to make any money at all without it being deducted from their cheque? Why is it that a woman on Mother's Allowance is only able to make so much money per month rather than so much per year? Why are not all forms of assistance under one administration? Why is the minimum wage so low that it would be better for a man to go on welfare or leave his wife so that she could go on welfare than try to support his family on such a wage?

Why does a man or a woman have to be in a workforce for three consecutive years before he or she is eligible for upgrading or skilled training with pay. The only exceptions being that he or she has one or more dependent upon him and that he has not any more than 26 weeks or 3 months of work in the said years.

Why is it that a person on assistance pays more rent to live in government housing than a person that is getting the same amount of money but is not on government assistance? It was stated in Saturday Globe and Mail that there will possibly be a $3 million profit on OHSIP in the 1970-71 year. If this figure is right then why are the people only getting 90% coverage?

When the hearings are going on in the House and when the changes are taking place will there be any of the people who are directly concerned involved in the decision that takes place?

You have heard our questions, most of which have asked about governmental law or resolutions. These we feel, are some of the reasons we have poverty. Our government, who enforces, and people who make these laws, are at fault. These people are, every adult citizen in this country that exercises his right to vote, as much to blame as the person who does not vote. We are the Canadian people. We have made our own poverty. Now is the time to face that fact and do something about it. We have supported it and now we must change it.

Thank you.

The Chairman: Thank you very much. I wonder any of the senators, at the moment, have a few questions they would like to begin asking in regard to the brief?

Senator Carter: I copied down, very briefly, your or 11 questions. Most of the questions you ask illustrate our problem as well as yours because it happens that out of the 11 or 12 questions you ask 9 or 10 of them are under the Provincial government. That is because the British North America Act gives the sole jurisdiction to the provinces in matters of welfare and the federal government cannot do anything for welfare without the provinces' consent. Some of these welfare measures that the federal government is mixed up in have come about through agreement. The Provincial government could very well tell the federal government "hands off" and the only way the federal government can get into the field is by working out some sort of agreement with the provinces.

What we have found is that these agreements with the provinces are not the same. The agreement with one province varies and you go from one province to another. That makes it very difficult for us to come grips with all these social welfare measures.

When you say "Why not in a handbook," there is no reason. There is no reason why it should not be in a handbook, but there would have to be two handbooks or three because the municipal government is in it and they would have to put theirs separately and the provincial government is into it and the federal government comes in and there would either have to be a joint one drawn up but that joint one would be different for each province because the agreements are different.

Although the federal government spends money and works out the measures the administration of the welfare measures is left in the hands of the provinces. For example, we, several years ago, '65-'63, we thought we had come up with something. I was in the House of Commons then, I was an elected member, and we developed what was called The Canada Assistance Plan, which we thought was pretty modern, was going to take care of most of the problems and the great thing about this Canada Assistance Plan was it was to be based on need and not on a means test. The one thing about what they call Social Old Age Assistance and Social Security, Old Age Assistance was based upon a means test. You either had to sign a certificate that you did not have much money or you had to tell exactly what you had or else somebody had to come and snoop around and verify what you said. In the Canada Assistance Plan was supposed to do away with this snooping and it was to be based entirely on need and even though you were getting the Old Age Pension and the Old Age Pension was not enough because you had drug bills or something else that it just couldn't cover, this Canada Assistance Plan is designed so that you could go and get something extra under the Canada Assistance Plan and the federal government would pay half of it, but what we found is we have gone around is that these measures are all administered by the provinces and so when it comes to the provinces define what is meant by "need" and they have all got a different definition and that complicates the situation.

I don't know if I made it plain. I do not want to be too long. I am trying to give it to you in capsule form and as briefly as I can. I could take half an hour.

In my experience, when I first came to Ottawa, was the welfare pensions were paid by the provinces, $20 a month. I think that was the amount. Then the federal government raised them up, I remember, to $40, but they got the agreement of the provinces and we had to get another agreement. Eventually the federal government said "we will pay, we will take over completely when a person reaches 70." But, that had to be a special agreement because the British North America Act would not permit it otherwise and eventually they did this. That opened up the way for old age assistance below 70, 65 and 70. Now, we have the Canada Assistance Plan where a blind person, disabled, even able bodied can get relief, the federal government will pay up to 50%. It pays all of the Old Age Security and anything for old age assistance, all of the able bodied relief up to 50% but it is the province who decides who is going to get it and under what conditions they get it.

Mrs. Le Mesurier: But this still has not answered why there is not a handbook.

Senator Carter: There is no reason. The only reason is that they have not got together and agreed on one.

Senator Pearson: One of the reasons is that they all come under different acts; all these different welfare agreements all come under different acts and a different group controls them. It is not all from one body that controls them even in the provincial government so you have a very great number of bodies working on different items and that is why we have not got together to get your booklet. You would have to see a whole lot of people and it seems to be a problem that you should get your M.L.A. to take up in parliament here and see if they cannot get a booklet made.

The Chairman: May I just add that first of all you made a request that answers be given to these questions to you and you suggest as well if not to-night by mail and I think that we can endeavour to answer these individual questions for you to-night. Any particular one you would like apart from that we will certainly see you get proper answers in detail on all these questions that you ask outlining who is responsible for them and your people will know who is responsible. One of the main purposes for this investigation as such is just because of these complaints you have given us that the people do not really know the areas of jurisdiction. They do not know who is responsible for what. They do not know why a person on welfare is only allowed to earn a limited amount of money and why the drug bill must be spent in the month in which it is given, it cannot accumulate for a larger drug bill over the period of a year. These are problems I might add that are faced by Canadians, if not in every province, I am sure in every province, but if not almost all provinces in Canada. The same questions are asked and this is a problem and a very legitimate problem to bring to this committee because this is the purpose of this committee that the Senate of Canada and the Parliament and the Government as well are concerned about these problems that there is not the co-ordination we need between the three levels of government. The federal government having brought in a number of years ago as Senator Carter mentioned, the federal government said to the provinces, "You set up the social welfare system or the social service system and we will match, dollar for dollar, what you spend on it." Or in other words, "We will pay half." And they have done it without really any control over how that money has been spent. It is a matter now of how to devise a better system of social services on the total co-ordinating basis. So these questions, I think, are very relevant in the overall study because it shows us the problems that individuals are having with them.

Mrs. Le Mesurier: Couldn't there be some form of law or something stating that the provinces must do certain things?

The Chairman: Yes, there probably could be and as such there isn't. That is right, there probably could be.

Mrs. Le Mesurier: Well, there should be some continuity between provinces. We are all one country.

The Chairman: Right.

Senator Carter: You asked, just now you said something about an appeal board, there is an appeal board for the Canada Assistance Plan. I don't know how many people know about it but it is part of the Act that requires an appeal board to be set up. Whether the provincial government has done it or not, I don't know. If the provincial government has not done it the federal government cannot force them.

Mrs. Le Mesurier: Why?

The Chairman: Under existing legislation.

Senator Carter: Well, because . . .

The Chairman: As I say, under existing legislation.

Senator Carter: Under the British North America Act, under our constitution.

The Chairman: Mrs. Lemesurier is saying if the federal government pays 50% certainly they could put some restrictions on it. If you are going to get this 50% you must handle it in this method. I think that is the question she is asking and I am sure that can be done.

Senator Pearson: You asked a question there of the minimum wage. This is a very debateable point. Right now in Ontario they are talking about it. Again this is a provincial affair. The minimum wage, each province works out their own scheme of minimum wages, this comes under the budget problem of the provinces, of each province. They have to allow for this in their taxation. They cannot just jump in and say, "Tomorrow we will start with $2 or $2.50 an hour." They have to work this thing out in a budget scheme that they are going to submit to the public so that it takes time to do this sort of thing. I don't know why it should be so low, all these things are started at a low figure. It is like the old age security which was started at $20 as Senator Carter said and it gradually has build up to now $79, I think, at the present time. All these items start at a low figure. The governments think they can raise just so much at a time and so they put that figure in but eventually it gets up to a point where they feel this is necessary. Now, the cost of living has gone up tremendously in the last few years, the last couple of years particularly, consequently the minimum wage is too low. Everybody recognizes it is too low and being considered very seriously by most of the provincial governments at the present time.

Mrs. Le Mesurier: Why isn't it, when the cost of living goes up a man either gets a cost of living bonus or the minimum wage is increased?

Senator Pearson: Again it is a question of budgeting again. You cannot just get money off a tree, you know. In the government they have to work the things out, budgets, they work those budgets pretty closely and they like to get their budget down as low as possible and this is the problem.

Senator Carter: It doesn't follow that if you raise the minimum wage you automatically cure poverty. It does not follow because if you raise the minimum wage and the industry will say, "If I employ ten people now, I am going to now employ nine." So one person is out of a job.

Mrs. Le Mesurier: But what happens, you know when everybody is down so low that it befits them more to go on welfare, then the government is really in a fix, isn't it?

Senator Carter: Well, Ontario is, the Ontario Welfare is far ahead of the minimum wage, as you know. They pay more on a welfare basis than on a minimum wage. That is up to the province itself. It is the province's own business. The federal government cannot come in and say, "You have got to do this or that". They are masters in their own house on matters like this.

Mrs. Le Mesurier: So how do we, as people, you know, change the provincial law?

Senator Carter: Well . . .

Mrs. Le Mesurier: Through the federal government?

Senator Carter: No, through your provincial member.

Mrs. Le Mesurier: The backbenchers that are heard very often?

Senator Carter: He depends on you to get elected.

Mrs. Le Mesurier: That is what I said.

Senator Pearson: You put these questions to your local member that is where you might get some action then.

Mrs. Le Mesurier: Our local member has an awful hard time getting heard. Who listens to him? It is the federal government?

Senator Pearson: No, the provincial government.

Mrs. Le Mesurier: The provincial government. Okay, and where does the provincial government go? They have to then go to the federal government.

Senator Carter: No, they can make the laws themselves. It is a provincial law, you see, and provincial laws are made by the people you elect to the provincial government. All the federal government does is pass out the money.

The Chairman: To a degree that is right, Senator Carter, but there are exceptions to this that the federal government when they bring out a policy that it must be a policy for all Canadians in all provinces. The provinces have laws besides so that some provinces' welfare system may be better than other welfare systems. Some provinces have a higher minimum wage than other provinces because this comes under it. But under the federal scheme, just as an example, under the federal government the Family Allowances are a federal responsibility because, by agreement, they, with the provinces, the provinces permitted the federal government to have the power to pay the Old Age pensions. It is the same way that it is paid to all Canadians and all on the same basis. There are no national differences. The supplement to the Old Age pension is the same thing. It is true that it is a federal responsibility.

The federal government is now in those fields, in the last few years of paying direct payments and direct assistance to all Canadians. There is no reason why that programme cannot be extended further, you know, by agreement with the provinces on new programmes or extension of existing programmes. So it is a matter to try and determine a national policy of necessary assistance to the Canadian people similar to the 50 per cent rebate to the provinces for the money they spend on other programmes that may be effective for all of the people of Canada. I appreciate this that we can certainly get all those answers and the breakdowns for you and I am sure we are in a position to, as well, make recommendations to the provinces that they have been the complaints that have come to us. We can certainly pass this on so they are not lost if you give them to us.

any questions from the floor then? Yes?

r. Frank McGowan: You are talking of the federal-provincial and municipal welfare and family assistance, the 50 per cent paid under stipulation from the federal government and stipulations in between the provinces causes most of the grief, if I am not mistaken.

Senator Carter: You see, the way it works, the federal government works out an agreement with the provinces and . . .

Mr. McGowan: Excuse me, sir, they don't work out agreement they tell the provinces.

Senator Carter: No, no, the federal government, in matters of welfare, cannot tell the provinces anything.

Mr. McGowan: In matters of welfare, for family assistance, the stipulation between the provinces comes from the federal government. It holds back part of the payment of welfare or family allowances.

The Chairman: That is not correct. The responsibility for family allowances rests solely with the federal government and on family allowances cheques are paid by the federal government. They come direct. There is no connection between that and the social welfare department of the Province of Ontario and any other. This is true in some provinces when the social welfare department as such, is determining the income of people they might very well determine that that $20 from the family allowance as part of the income you know, or other sources, so in that way it can be connected but only by the provisions of the provincial government social welfare policies. Would that explain it?

Mr. McGowan: Still there is the stipulation between the two provinces, whether it is a stipulation or not, one of the problems in welfare, in the family assistance, I would like to go back again, the appeal boards are set up in Toronto but the appeal boards are set up by people who are ex-officials of the welfare system. I think this a little hard to understand. It is an unbiased report? There is never any appeal that is out and out . . .

Senator Carter: I think we are talking about two different things. Senator Sparrow talked about family allowances and you are talking about family benefits.

The Chairman: He was connecting the two.

Mr. McGowan: Can I go back to the stipulation on family allowance? Is there a stipulation that if a family runs through their money prior to the next cheque are they supplemented? Is there a supplementary? Are they allowed to get more money without going to churches and such?

Senator Carter: Are you talking about family allowance?

Mr. McGowan: Federal family allowance.

The Chairman: Standard amount per child per month?

Mr. McGowan: Is it per child? That is funny, I know a woman who has ten children and is given so much money. If she feeds ten children on this amount of money it works out to about 75 cents apiece. I could not feed my dog for that.

The Chairman: That is under the welfare allowance or family assistance plan. They call it the Family Assistance Plan here. But that has got nothing to do with the Family Allowance. The family allowance cheque comes regardless of what the other income of the family is. So that is a separate thing. Now each provincial department of welfare breaks down the food allowance and the clothing allowance for each member of the family and it may be too low. I am not suggesting it is not.

Mr. McGowan: It is too low, I know it is. I still don't understand it.

Senator Carter: I cannot blame you. There are so many of them it is hard to keep them sorted out.

Mr. McGowan: Under legislative law it is political change. The people have to change. Can they not force legislation through the federal government?

Senator Carter: With respect to the Old Age Pensions and with respect to Family Allowances the federal government got the authority, years ago, to enter that field and in other words with respect to Old Age Pensions and Family Allowances the provinces said to the federal government, "You take over that field". So that agreement still holds good and the federal government can alter Family Allowances any time. They can alter Old Age Pensions, put them up any time they want. There are only two types of benefits the federal government can pay on their own. When you get down below that, when you come to what they call the Old Age Assistance, blind persons, allowances, disability allowances, even able bodied relief, the Canada Assistance all these are different acts as Senator Pearson said and payments can be made in a different way. When it comes to these, the federal government, as I said, works out agreements for each one separately and under those agreements generally, says, "You go ahead and administer it".

Mr. McGowan: With stipulations.

Senator Carter: Well, the stipulation is, "We will pay 50 per cent. We will reimburse you 50 per cent of what you pay out."

Mr. McGowan: I think this is not exactly what the full meaning is.

Mr. Carter: Now, apart from that, I am talking about these measures, but apart from that, you have provincial benefits as well; the Mother's Allowance is purely provincial. The federal government does not come into that. The Family Benefits Act is purely provincial. The municipal government may have supplements to that. The federal government does not come into that, but the federal government does generally, I think, pay 50 per cent.

Mr. McGowan: That is right, 50 per cent, it is this 50 per cent with the stipulations.

The Chairman: Yes, you are right, before they made the agreement they could have made the stipulations different.

Mr. McGowan: Excuse me, they not "could have" they do.

The Chairman: They did and they cannot change till there is a new agreement drawn. They cannot make a change from day to day, right, it has to be a new agreement.

Mr. McGowan: I think that under the circumstances maybe this should be a flexible law.

The Chairman: Maybe you are right. Maybe that is very good recommendation in fact.

Mr. Ed. Thompson: Regarding Old Age Pension when I became available for that, it was $75.

Senator Pearson: Old Age Security?

Mr. Thompson: All right, the government set formula of 2 per cent as their basis of increase paid on it.

Senator Pearson: It is supposed to cover the cost of living.

Mr. Thompson: Yes. Now in each year that 2 per cent was given or allowed on the pension, the cost of living went up a good deal more than 2 per cent. Now my questions are why do they stay to the 2 per cent when they know very well the cost of living has gone up a good deal more plus the fact that the 2 per cent based on $75, right back to the original figure. Those are the two questions. Why do they not increase it say on the $75 and then 2 per cent on the $76.50 so it can escalate a little bit, but they don't, they stay at 2 per cent of $75, next year 2 per cent of $75 again, and outside of this year, out of the goodness, probably on their hearts it is $1.58, maybe that takes up the slack. I don't know, but that is what it is now. How did they arrive at that 2 per cent formula? That is what is kind of bugging me in my mind. How did they arrive at 2 per cent. Was it the available money they had? Because if it is the available money they have for the one year and they go into a deficit budget and put up the following year again by increasing taxes along the line somewhere to take care of the money they paid extra for it, those are my two questions.

The Chairman: First of all your suggestion of 2 per cent on the $75 is a good observation. Why they did it at the time, I don't know. I am not, nor any of us here, in a position to speak for the government that did it at the time. Right, you will agree with that, but one of their thinking was that 2 per cent was a long term average of the cost of living increase, on the long term average. Unfortunately, of course, in the interval, the rates have gone much higher than the long term average of 2 per cent because it has gone as high as 4.6 per cent. So you are right on the formula. A person is certainly wrong if the inflation is going up higher than 2 per cent and I think that my colleagues would agree with me that certainly the government is reviewing this situation, you know, all the time so they might very well make a change in it. I know there are many recommendations going to them to make a change to coincide with the actual increase in the cost of living.

Mr. Thompson: Now, the cost of living, supposing it goes down? I can recall when I was working, why the cost of living was added on to our pay cheques. If the cost went up the pay cheque went up and if it went down then it went down. Well, couldn't the government run the same kind of a situation on that?

The Chairman: Yes, I agree with you.

Senator Pearson: We won't reduce it if the cost of living goes down because this is in the Act at the present time. All these things are done through parliament and the House and Senate, etcetera, it is all in the Act that it has to be brought in, they cannot change that from day to day, it has to go on till a new Act is brought in.

The Chairman: He is recommending the Act be changed.

Mr. Thompson: Yes, that is right.

Senator Carter: I think there is another reason too. You spoke about this 2 per cent that didn't change. One of the reasons why is that Senator Sparrow is perfectly right, the 2 per cent was the average over a period.

Mr. Thompson: The basic figure.

Senator Carter: But in addition to that they brought in the guaranteed annual income, you see.

Mr. Thompson: Oh, yes.

Senator Carter: So it wouldn't make much difference. You are only robbing Peter to pay Paul because if you are eligible for the guaranteed annual income, if you didn't get the 2 per cent extra or your 4 per cent on your $75 well you picked it up on the guaranteed.

Mr. Thompson: On the supplement, I see.

Mrs. Joan Dobson: How come, when you are on Welfare or Mother's Allowance you go into a store to get credit and you can't get it?

The Chairman: On Welfare and you go to a store and want credit and you cannot get it?

Mrs. Dobson: You want credit and you can't get it.

Senator Carter: Well, that may be so here but it is not that way everywhere. I know in my province they do get credit.

Mrs. Dobson: Not here.

Senator Carter: You see, that is another case where it is different from one province to another.

The Chairman: Would this be an individual store you are referring to or would that be a general provision?

Mrs. Dobson: In the store.

Senator Carter: It is up to the store-keeper, you see.

Mrs. Dobson: As soon as you say you are on Mother's Allowance or Welfare they don't want anything to do with you.

Senator Carter: You cannot pass a law to tell the storekeeper he has to give credit. It is up to him.

Mrs. Dobson: I know.

Senator Carter: One store-keeper may not give credit and another one might.

Mrs. Dobson: People on Mother's Allowance and Welfare pay their bills better than the average working man yet they cannot get credit.

Senator Carter: That is the individual judgment of the person who has the store.

Yes?

Mr. Bill Busby: I am one of these persons too busy to prepare a brief but I was wondering, I notice in the papers you were asking for some suggestions or solutions and I had a few and wondered if I might get time later in the evening to present some of my ideas on the problem of poverty and problems some of these people have?

The Chairman: Right, would you suggest how long, at the moment, how long are you taking, five minutes?

Mr. Busby: If you gave me a chance to start I could go all night. Perhaps, at the end of the evening you could stop me when you like.

The Chairman: I would like to give an opportunity to other people. I will be sure to call on you. There is a lady at the back, I believe, who wanted to say something.

Mrs. Marg. Tugwell: Can you tell me where you have arrived at the name Old Age Security, because they have no security on $79 a month, even with the supplement.

Senator Pearson: The original name has just hung on to it instead of changing it. They just kept the same name.

Mrs. Tugwell: What security have we got to look forward to under this Act?

The Chairman: I would think that is true and particularly in certain areas of Canada. You know it is not a very high rate. In other areas in Canada it is probably effective, perhaps rents are low, this type of thing. Remember that Senator Carter mentioned they did start out at $20 and have certainly been making these increases from time to time and I think all of us would hope that they would gradually keep going up even apart from the 2 per cent we were referring to, right.

Mrs. Tugwell: I am sure Senator Carter would not want to live on $79 a month even in Newfoundland.

The Chairman: Well, the people that need it just don't live on $79 a month.

Mrs. Tugwell: They still don't have enough to exist on.

The Chairman: Right.

Mrs. Tugwell: They are barely existing, some of them are not eating.

The Chairman: Right.

Senator Pearson: Out in my province of Saskatchewan we have one or two widows, I know, in this little town I live in and they are getting along and they pay their taxes. The only trouble is they cannot get sewer and water into their homes. They have to get somebody to bring water to them.

Mrs. Tugwell: You mean under the C. C. F. government?

Senator Pearson: Not now, it is a Liberal government.

Mr. McGowan: I would like to go back on the Appeal Boards, if I might, setup for Welfare. If I might just take the opportunity to refer to the paper:

I have two children and have been on Welfare since last September. I had my own apartment and it was cold so when I had a chance to move into a house with a good friend I did. He separated from his wife and has one child and they rent two rooms upstairs and pay half the cost of the food... he pays utilities and gas besides. He works nights and sleeps days. I look after his son but the Welfare is up in arms. I was here just a moment and they wrote to tell me was cut off. They figure my friend should support his kids. We are just good friends. Besides if he gets married where does it leave me? I need your advice because this is very important to me. Name withheld.

Why am I reading this? I think it is very important to this committee. This is the advice. I will read and after I will tell you who wrote it.

It is also important to the taxpayers who pick up the bills. Your good friend could well afford to pay all of the bills if he wanted to. That is where the friendship broke up. Now you get a government cheque for yourself and two children.

The gentleman that wrote that advice is with the Toronto Telegram and is a member of the Appeal Board of the Welfare. I think this is disgraceful and I, as a taxpayer, hang my head in shame. I allow the man to do this, why? I say the Welfare Board if it is unbiased should never be allowed to have the people on it. The same man puts this out, Action Line in the Telegram. I believe he is the Chairman of the Welfare Appeal Board and I would question his right to be on it.

Senator Pearson: Can I say about the OHSIP, which is only 90%. We have it 85% in Saskatchewan on the medical bills.

Mrs. Dobson: It was stated in the paper the other night that there was $35 million profit or something that was to be made this year on OHSIP. Then when you know, are we only covered 90%. Why are we not covered wholly?

Senator Carter: I am not sure I can give you the full answer on that but one of the reasons is that the doctors, like everybody else have had debts you know, they have bills that they don't collect and now here is something with no risk, the government says that under normal circumstances the doctor would not collect 100% of his fees. The best a doctor would do would be to collect 90% and if we did not have a government scheme he would lose 10% of his bills because he would not be able to collect them. Why should he collect them now. So the government says, "We will pay 90% of what the hospital bill is so that if you lose 10% you know you are not losing any more than you ever lost and this is guaranteed income for you."

They expected the doctors to accept that as a reasonable argument and say. "We always lost 10% of our bills. We never collected that and so we will not collect it now." But now some doctors, probably, I think, did not agree to this. So they send out the extra bill for the other 10%.

Mrs. Dobson: So would they be—if the province or the federal government boosted it to 100% at the rates they are now charging, could they in turn boost their rates and make it only 90% again? Am I making sense?

Senator Carter: I don't think I can answer that one.

The Chairman: I don't know what the medical care in the province is as such to get down to some details but the medical profession has a schedule of fees for individual calls or operations or whatever the case may be so that the government says, "We will pay 90% of those fees" and if the doctor raises his fees the next day I am sure they have some provision in there where they negotiate raising of those fees with the government before they raise them. Senator Pearson mentioned the government of Saskatchewan paid 85% of the scheduled fees and there was 15% left on those. I could say at the moment, Senator Pearson can correct me if I am wrong, I do not think I would be out if I said at least 90 or 95% of the doctors don't ever collect the balance. They don't send bills because, as Senator Carter said, this was a normal bill to them previously anyway so now they are getting as much money as they did before so they are not billing extra. I understand there is the odd specialist in doing billing the additional amount but very few.

Mrs. Dobson: I know that most of the people I talk to are paying 55¢ when they go into their doctor's office. My mother is, right now she has a doctor and he will not send it to the OHSIP. She has to pay him then in the office and then she has to put it in to OHSIP.

The Chairman: Just so I don't misinform you; in the Province of Saskatchewan, apart from this there is what they call a "deterrent fee". Each time you go to the doctor you pay $1.50 per call. Outside the schedule of fees I am referring to there is a deterrent fee that is collected then and there. That is correct, that deterrent fee and the hospital fee is $2.50 per day as a deterrent.

Yes?

Mr. McGowan: Talking about doctors, going back to Family Allowance, Mother's Allowance, I am not too sure, but I believe that Mother's Allowance they will not pay a specialist unless recommended by the family doctor and then there is quite a fight there to have those expenses paid. This is why I question it. If a man commits a bank robbery and he is sentenced to ten years in prison he is given three square meals a day, guaranteed medical, he is guaranteed clothing and yet the man's wife, his children have done nothing but have been married to this man. They are not allowed medical, proper food, proper housing and then society turns around and calls them everything. I read some article, I had better not get into that, I was wondering who was being punished here really. I wonder if this committee when you put down your recommendations, are you going to go to the people again with your recommendations? "We are recommending this for you?" And are you going to allow them to see these recommendations to see if they are good for them? I certainly know you men are interested. I appreciate this but on your recommendations, after these hearings, are you going to present them to the people?

The Chairman: Yes, that is correct, because a final report will come out that will be available to all the people and there will be the recommendations that will go to the people and then to the government. These are the recommendations that must be put in for changes in legislation and certainly there would be opportunities for people to question any of those recommendations.

Mr. McGowan: Excuse me, Senator Sparrow, you really made a mistake there when you said "government". I believe "democratic" in the dictionary means "supreme power of the government of the people". Maybe part of the problem is that people who have the supreme power—if these recommendations are good for people it is the people who should have the power to put them, not the government.

The Chairman: You might very well be right. Under our system of government they select representatives to act on their behalf. Whether that is right or wrong, I am not sure. The system may be wrong but I would not want to make this statement that I agree it is.

Mr. McGowan: What I wonder; are you going to have a hearing with the recommendations and invite people and inform them of the recommendations and say, "Are these good or are they bad?"

The Chairman: That is really the purpose of these hearings. Even before the recommendations come it is to get the feeling of the people on poverty as such, on problems as such in the various areas, so when we find that you have a problem here and that same problem exists, you know, in Manitoba, in Newfoundland, in British Columbia and so on, this becomes then a very definite, cross-Canada problem. It is not just a small problem that someone, who is being a little radical, is bringing forward. That is a problem of the people. So certainly the recommendations will only be coming out because of the representations that are made because if everyone was happy there would be no recommendations. It is that simple. I agree with you.

Senator Carter: I am not sure we are understanding his question. Are you asking that the Senate Committee will consult the people about the recommendations for approval before we pass them on, is that what you are asking?

Mr. McGowan: Yes.

Senator Carter: I don't see how we can.

The Chairman: But certainly when the report comes out the report must go to the government and before it goes into legislation the findings will be made public as all hearings are, that is exactly what he is asking.

Mr. McGowan: I am asking after this hearing I imagine the experts will look at the conclusions of your evidence and the recommendations will be made. Now, I am not knocking the experts, but in some cases, quite a few cases, they have proven to be quite wrong on the recommendations made by these committees to the government. Will people, the same people you asked in your committees to give you briefs on poverty, will they be invited to hear what the recommendations are or will these recommendations be put to the government who will say, "Here people, this is good for you, don't question it."

I am afraid I am a little cynical. I apologize for it but this seems to be the thing today.

The Chairman: There are sometimes when a government will bring in a change of policy or a change of law, particularly this is true in taxation as such or budgets, without, you know, any prior notice to the people. This happens. The White Paper that you hear so much about now on taxation is an effort to let the people know, to bring this information to the people before it is made law and to try and get wide discussion on it and get the feeling of the people before it is put in. So this gives the people the opportunity then to at least go to their member in parliament or their elected representative on any level and in turn make their thoughts known before the becomes law. So I would certainly hope, and both senators with me can agree. These recommendations on aging, the study on aging got wide publicity resulted in certain legislation and other studies that have been done, quite numerous ones, the same thing is true. It does get reasonably wide publicity from feedback from the people. Would you not agree with that?

Senator Carter: I think what he is driving at is something a little different. We cannot, as I understand your question, I don't see how it is practical to do what you are suggesting. You see we are here tonight and you people recommend certain things. We would go to another place tomorrow night and the will recommend something different, completely different. They don't want what you want, they want something different. All right, we can go around month after month like this and get all sorts of recommendations, some conflicting. We had two briefs the other morning and one was for a guaranteed annual income, they were solid for that. Another group came in totally against it. What they wanted was more family allowances. Now you have got contradictory positions and what we have to do is gather them all up, go through them and we sort out the ones we think have the most support and make the most sense and then we will incorporate that in a report and the report will be made public, so you will know what is in the report. It will be a public report. Then it goes to the government and the government may act on the recommendations, they may not. They may say "Well, these are good. We can do this." On another one they may say, "It costs too much money, we have got to put those off for a few years." But they will pick out some and do it. But before they do that you will hear about it. It will be in an election platform. It will be in the forecasting of legislation. So that if you are thinking the government is going to do is right then you get after your federal member and make your views known. That is how democratic works.

Mr. McGowan: You mean it should work.

Senator Carter: That is the way it should work, yes.

The Chairman: Right, any other questions?

Mrs. J. Tremblett: Two things; one is I know you are going to tell me it is a provincial responsibility, I want an answer and that is, if you are going to get answers back to us I understand, is this so?

The Chairman: Yes.

Mrs. Tremblett: Why is it, according to the Family Benefits Act, you get $300.00 maximum per month with four children and $10.00 per month for each child that you have over four. Now, I can see that this would be a deterrent in having more children but certainly if you have this number of children when you begin to receive the benefits why should the last two be penalized? Surely we love the last two as much as the others and you have to take money from the first four in order to feed the last four. Obviously 10.00 a month goes no place for the last two. Find that out for me.

The Chairman: Yes.

Mrs. Tremblett: Another thing is the lady mentioned that you can't get credit while on Mother's Allowance and Welfare. Our association in Rexdale asked the same question of several businesses in the area and were told, sure they may be able to trust most of these people but should anyone go into default it is bad publicity for them to have to repossess things from someone on welfare or Mother's Allowance. They have taken the poor people's stove. They can do it a little more gently with other people and it does not get the bad publicity for the store. This may be a partial answer to the question.

The Chairman: Thank you.

Mrs. Linda Kelly: A person on Mother's Allowance allowed to make $60.00 a month. If she receives a cheque from her husband for $20.00 there is deducted $0.00.

The Chairman: Will you repeat that, and come a little closer to that microphone, please?

Mrs. Kelly: A person on Mother's Allowance is allowed to make $60.00 a month and yet if she receives a cheque from her husband for $20.00, it is deducted by them but it is deducted by $30.00. $0.00 is taken away instead of $20.00.

The Chairman: I will try and find that answer for you too. It does not sound quite right.

Mrs. Kelly: But it happened.

From the Floor: I was on Mother's Allowance and receiving $240.00 a month and I got a cheque from my husband for $20.00 which my Mother's Allowance worker saw and she deducted $30.00, $10.00 each month, then my husband comes back and I go on Welfare and I jumped from $230.00 a month to $202.00 a month. I would like to know why. Is he worth $70.00 or something? I am not inclined to ask so but I am just asking. No answer?

The Chairman: Well, I don't know your husband. We will try and find that out for you. Yes, thank you.

Mrs. Betty Price: Can you tell me how a man with a family that is receiving family allowances, when the man is working it is considered a gratuity, it is a gift but if you are on Mother's Allowance or Welfare or something it is classified as part of your income, can you explain this to me?

The Chairman: Ask that question again, will you?

Mrs. Price: If you are a family and your husband is out working your family allowance cheque you get each month is considered a gratuity from the government. If you are on Mother's Allowance or Welfare it is considered part of your income, why?

Senator Carter: You mean the family allowance?

Mrs. Price: The federal government send us family allowance each month and if my husband is out working it is considered a gratuity, a gift from the government to me. If I am on Mother's Allowance or Welfare I have to classify that as part of my income. Why?

The Chairman: Well, that is a good one because I know it happens not only in this province, other provinces as well and that is on a needs basis. Senator Carter referred to that that they set up a schedule and, none of us are going to suggest they are high enough schedules or they are too high. We are not prepared to suggest that but on the needs basis they say a family of 1, 2, 3 or 5 people require so many dollars to live. This is the need—so many dollars. So if the figure that they require to live is $300.00 you are getting now and they classify as income the $20.00 family allowance then they reduce that, the total needs are reduced by the $20.00. I am not suggesting it is right.

Mrs. Price: Couldn't the federal government do something about this? This is one of the fields they are in. This is a gift from them. If you are on Mother's Allowance couldn't the federal government do something to the province so this is not classified as part of your income?

The Chairman: It maybe could be done, there is no provision there at the moment but it is a good suggestion and I think that that is a suggestion that is well worth taking.

Mrs. Price: I have eight children and that extra money coming in each month would be quite a bit.

Senator Carter: It will have to be part of an agreement between the province and the federal government to do that.

The Chairman: We certainly could make this recommendation for change, yes.

From the floor: The question that I would like to ask the committee is what good are these recommendations going to do if the province says, "no".

Senator Pearson: You will have to vote them out of business then.

From the floor: We just might do that.

The Chairman: I think that is a good question excepting there are political pressures such from groups such as this to let governments know that their needs are. For example, under the medical care programme you know you have in Ontario the federal government brought in this as a national policy of health, medical care and some of the provinces went into it right away and others didn't go into it until two years later. I believe there are still some provinces that have not gone into it yet. One or two have not gone into it as yet, but the provision was there that the federal government would go along if the provinces did. Now, the people in those provinces are forcing their governments in fact to bring in. Ontario didn't have it a year ago about a year ago it came in and now it is a good programme, an excellent programme, certainly there has been criticism in many of the provinces of the premiums paid, you know, as much for that. You pay only 90% or this type of thing, but it is still a better programme than they had two years ago so I am sure that these programmes get better as they go along.

From the floor: I would like to recommend that the provinces set up committees on poverty.

The Chairman: Set up committees on poverty? Okay. We will take that as a recommendation. I hope when we are through it may not be necessary for each province to have its own committee.

From the floor: I think it should.

Mrs. Joyce Villa: I would like to ask as to why they don't have any sort of system that covers prescriptions and dental care as well as having a system that covers the doctors because many times you have children or persons sick in a family so they pay for the doctor's visit but half the time you do not have enough money to buy the prescription. Also, many people have to let their children go without dental care because they cannot afford it. What is the use of paying for a doctor to come when you have got a prescription in your hand but you cannot fill it because you have not got the money to pay for it. It is a good observation.

John Burke, Community Development Officer for Family Service: There are obviously many good questions or comments you get from everybody where you go, the same ones in one form or another but one of the real problems was probably articulated by True Davidson, Mayor of East York, who she classified people who are poor as basically lazy and really not with it and recalled, with nostalgia her own poverty as a young girl. This was quite different because in her day a lot of people were poor. It was not poverty in the sense it is now. I am often aware of how we are talking with the poor, if it were, and ignoring the real problems of the real areas of concern related to poverty and these are the tax easements and so on of the corporations, the monies that individual provinces will put into new business and new corporations either without interest or simply as forgivable loans on the theory that these are good for the future of the nation. One could argue, I think, that investment in people is also good for the future of the nation. However, we have real problems with such things as Workmen's Compensation Board and I am not aware of whether this is federal or provincial. The real question is the charter of that board, and I know something of its methodology and the effect of the way the board carries out its work on people who apply for compensation, that something should be done to investigate what the Workmen's Compensation Board does. Certainly here in the Province of Ontario.

Secondly, the control of unions, that unions are in a position where they have bargaining powers with government and with industry and yet have let behind the people they originally set out to unionize, the people on the bottom. Somehow or other we have to stimulate a new kind of union, not merely to segregate the poor into one more power block, but integrate part of our society or demand existing unions that they begin to be concerned with that whole base area of our social, economic society. I think inasmuch as the unions do have powerful positions of favour and so on in the areas of politics and economics that this could and should be demanded of them.

The third point is that C.M.H.C., with great fanfare last year set out to stimulate new housing. It was pointed out that the rates of interest that C.M.H.C. was prepared to give out money removed from the lower economic classes any possibility of taking advantage of C.M.H.C. funds. It actually moved some of the middle class, I think, from that area. Government should examine the policy that is being carried out with C.M.H.C.

Finally, a great deal of our trouble, in terms of housing for people with low and even moderate income, medium income, in the urban areas in which most of us live in now stems from land prices and not housing at all, wherein, as you well know, speculators and so on take advantage. The ordinary persons, like you or I make what we consider an honest profit on our land. We bought it ten years ago and now we can sell it for twice or three times the price, however, perhaps we should be looking into the examples of England and other countries where the government has set up land banks and owns land and prevents speculation which, while it may enrich a few, works hardship on a great many others.

Thank you.

The Chairman: Thank you for your suggestions.

Senator Pearson: In regard to land banks, I think this is largely a question for the municipality itself. In Saskatchewan, the capital city of Regina, the mayor himself went over this thing and they have set up quite a land bank there for the people who want to build houses around the suburban part of Regina and I think this is a matter for the municipality to take hold of and to do this very thing.

Senator Carter: I don't see why C.M.H.C. could not do something like that too though.

The Chairman: C.M.H.C. have a programme, they finance 90% of any land that a municipality wishes to buy up around the built-up areas in any community. That is a two or three year old programme but they apply to the 90% of the money for that purpose if the municipality wishes to do it. That is an agreement with all provinces in Canada, I might add.

Was there another question?

Senator Carter: I would like to make a comment on the point raised by the last speaker that one of the bad things, in my opinion, just giving my own opinion, is that we have been using housing as a regulator of the economy. When the economy slows down, and you get unemployment which rises up to an undesirable level, one of the quickest ways of mediating that is to use the construction industry and so you put on a splurge and make money available for housing and that, of course, stimulates the economy because you build a house and sell furniture, electric appliances, it permeates the whole economy and then we pour a lot of money into housing just because the economy is slowing down. After a few years we find the economy going a little too fast and we then do the reverse. We turn off the tap to slow the economy down again and I think that may be a good idea, you know, from the standpoint of regulating but it is bad, it has had bad results on the effect of housing because housing is a permanent need. It does not go up and down in bursts with the fluctuations in the economy. So what we have got to do is try to find some other means of regulating the economy except by using the construction industry to do it.

The Chairman: Thank you, senator, yes.

From the Floor: In paragraph 5 of your introduction is says:

During its existence the Committee will be hearing publically from citizens' groups representing the poor, business, unions, the professions, governments and private agencies in the social welfare field.

Well, I think that business, unions and professions said it perfectly well. I belonged to a union for a good many years and was on the executive of the union and I know that they are much better off today than they were when I was working for them, but that doesn't apply to what I want to speak about. The point is this, controls, how many of you gentlemen and ladies is in favour of government controls of prices, wages, everything else? We had it during the war.

Senator Carter: Do you want a comment on that?

From the Floor: I do.

Senator Carter: Well, in time of war you can do things that you cannot do in time of peace.

From the Floor: I understand that.

Senator Carter: People will accept rules and controls in time of war they would never accept in time of peace.

From the Floor: I quite agree with you, but do you think that bringing out these, having these committees, as you gentlemen and ladies are, and bringing in submissions to the government what should be done, do you think . . .

The Chairman: You may be aware that the government has a voluntary prices and wages and profits committee working and the government of the day has stated that they may have to bring in controls if the voluntary controls—

From the Floor: Mr. Trudeau said that, I read that but the question is when and where will this happen? How long will we have to wait. It is action that the poor want now. If they are getting $10.00 a week more than the prices of everything would go up that much.

The Chairman: Yes, we have heard that complaint before, yes.

From the Floor: So I think that these commissions is only a lot of talk. I am not blaming you people but that is all they are. We want something definite and we are not getting it.

The Chairman: Thank you very much.

From the Floor: I was speaking to Mrs. Le Mesurier about this rent thing and Mother's Allowance. They have set a rate of $90.00 a month for people on Mother's Allowance and it just keeps on going up and why is it we have to pay more than the average working man that lives in Ontario Housing? The man down the hall makes $65.00 a week, I won't mention any names, he paid $41.00 a month for his rent and now I get $225.00 a month and my family allowance included and I pay $90.00 a month for rent. There is a woman here, she has eight children, she gets $320.00 a month and she pays $110.00 for her rent and also her hydro on top of that and I would like to know why we have to pay more.

Senator Carter: Is this in subsidy?

From the floor: Right here in Ontario Housing.

Senator Carter: Ontario Housing?

From the floor: Apparently it is supposed to be a set rate with all the government officials here in Ontario that we have to pay all the same amount yet some pay $90.00, $100.00, $105.00 and $110.00. It is supposed to be a set amount. This is what I cannot understand. Some are on Welfare and Mother's Allowance and disabled fathers. Why do we have to pay more than the average working man that is living in here.

The Chairman: In your situation, do you not get full rent that you pay, if you pay $90.00 do you get the $90.00 credit on that amount?

From the floor: I get $225.00 a month and out of that I have to pay my rent.

The Chairman: Is the allowance based on the rent?

From the floor: What I cannot understand is why do we have to pay more than the average working man in the Ontario Housing Corporation?

The Chairman: I don't know the answer and I will certainly try to obtain that for you.

Mrs. Lemesurier: I have that question right here.

Mrs. Villa: I would like to ask this committee here what makes them think the Senate Committee has been doing more for us than any other committees or any other groups? They come and tell the poor people they can take all their recommendations back or take them and as a group sit around and figure out plans yourself as to which recommendations should be put before the people of Ottawa. They will sit back, after having a full stomach, sit around a table and decide what the old cliché says, "haves and have-nots". It is the same old system, everything will be decided as to what the poor people can live on. In other words they will tell us that no matter "how we live in our position as senators and such" this is how you should live and, as some social workers come and tell the people, "you can't manage because you can't budget your money," I would like to know how you can budget, make up a budget and keep to it when the first place you don't have enough money to make a budget. Thank you.

Mrs. Tugwell: To answer the lady's question, I have inquired into this because I have, in my development, an awful lot of Mother's Allowance people. The rent goes from $72.00 to $105.00 but to get apart from the working man, this is nothing to do with O.H.C., the paying so much higher than O.H.C. The Mother's Allowance has a set rate that they have to pay, minimum of $90.00 but I am not fighting because they are only paying $72.00 where if you are O.H.C. and working you pay up to and including 33.1/3%.

The Chairman: Of your salary?

Mrs. Tugwell: Of your gross because I pay $229. in O. H. C. that is how it works.

The Chairman: Yes, is this your first time up, sir?

Mr. McGowan: No, I can clarify a bit on the public housing. I studied a little bit of it and the Welfare pays 30% of the rent but it is not on a monthly basis. They have to break it down over a period of a year and then take it on this basis. You pay the highest percent. That is why the rents are much higher. It is a foolish thing to agree.

One question I would like to get back to, Welfare believe the Welfare assistance, you can make $12.00 per child or 120 hours you can work extra, but the question I would like to know is this legislative law is this the agency itself who sets up the rules? Does anybody know?

The Chairman: Well, first of all, can I get the question correctly, whether it is social assistance the welfare act or whatever they call it in the province, that is set up to establish the principle doing something and then the regulations come out to make that Act operative. So any change in rates or rates are done by regulation by the Lieutenant Governor-in-Council. That is in fact what it is or Cabinet of the provincial government, so each of these are by regulation of the government in power and of course they are available, those regulations are available to anyone if they ask for them. So it is a matter if you are asking questions, it should not be a matter of the individual administering it making a decision.

Mr. McGowan: It is in the Act, I am not sure what it states, but I believe you are allowed to make $12.00 a child or you can work 120 hours, but the question is asking is this in the Act or is it set down by the individual worker?

The Chairman: It would, of necessity, be by regulation under the Act by the government in power.

Mr. McGowan: I wonder if this is so, would it not be easier to allow social workers, I don't say she knows the situation, she understands the problems, sees the problem, let her set the amount and I believe there are some workers who would be more lenient.

The Chairman: A number of social workers have made this suggestion as well that they would like a little latitude in the method in which the give allowance out to people and they may have, in fact, in some areas, some particular latitude, but I understand not very much. Would that be right?

Senator Carter: I think so. I would like to ask the question now; have you people ever had a meeting like this? A session like this with your provincial member and with your alderman?

From the Floor: No.

The Chairman: Have you ever tried to get a meeting like this with them?

From the Floor: How would you get it started?

Senator Carter: Don't you think it would be a good idea to get a hold first of your provincial member and then get two of them to bring along their welfare officials because they are the people who are administering this Act. You see, every province, I know what is in the Act in my own province, I don't know what is in the Act in Ontario because the Ontario Act is different. Every province has a different Act. They are not all the same. But these people, who are administering it, these are the people who could answer every single one of these questions. So I hope you will follow this and take courage and try to organize another meeting like this and get all these fellows here.

From the Floor: About the part of Mother's Allowance and Widow's Allowance or such, they say you can make so much money a month, like one woman said $30.00 a month, okay, the mother wants to try and slip out so she goes and takes a part time job, so she makes $30.00, maybe 10 or 15 hours a week she can work but then after 3 or 4 months or 5 months she has experience at whatever job she is at and she cannot go for a raise like other persons would because if she gets after a raise she is going to have to cut her hours again. She is not going to be any further ahead. She is not going to be independent.

The Chairman: No, no incentive to actually work.

Mrs. Audrey Lacroix: There is no point, you are not further ahead. If it is the mother on Mother's Allowance she is alone without a husband, say she doesn't know when one of her children is going to take sick and she is going to have to quit her job. She works and makes a little more money than she is allowed to make and she is cut off that much money so then if one of the children does take sick then she is back and trying to fight to get back to where she was in the first place. So I think this is why a lot of mothers don't want to go to work because it makes sort of a hardship between everything, you know. So maybe something could be worked out this way.

The Chairman: Thank you very much.

Senator Carter: This is one of these things that comes to our attention over and over again, that there should be some sort of an incentive with welfare payments so that if a person is working and earning a few dollars they should not be penalized for it.

Mrs. Lacroix: What is $60.00? I mean any mother that goes out and makes $60.00, she can barely buy two kids a coat for the winter.

The Chairman: Do you have a question back there?

From the Floor: One question I would like to ask on Manpower. When you are three years on the job before you can get up-grading in your schooling. Is there anyway you can answer this?

The Chairman: This is a federal responsibility in particular and this suggestion has come to us before on this aspect and we are certainly taking a recommendation in this regard back with us on the time element as far as that is allowed. Yes.

Mrs. Lacroix: Going back to this working for Mother's Allowance, what is the reason for having to have a statement signed by your employer for the amount of hours that you work and how much you make? Is there anything that goes in behind this?

The Chairman: I suppose to prove how much money you made so you do not make an over-amount, I suppose.

From the Floor: Can you tell me, a mother has not worked and wants some up-grading to get herself a better job, how does she go about this if she has to work three years?

The Chairman: There are two things; one you have to be out of school for a period of time and you have had to have been unemployed for a period of time so in that particular case it would not be a factor.

From the Floor: Yes, I went down to Manpower and tried to get into that and they told me that I could not get into it because I had not worked in the last three years.

The Chairman: Well, that is absolutely in conflict to what we were discussing here saying that you had to be out of work for three years and the other regulation says that if you have had to work within three years but that is the regulations and we can certainly get those for you too, if you are not clear on them.

From the Floor: Would you also find out why a woman on Mother's Allowance, if she has a baby, why she has to wait three months for, before the baby gets included on Mother's Allowance and she cannot have any welfare assistance, she just has to go on what she has? The first three months are the worst when you have a new baby. That is when you have to buy everything but it seems like being penalized from getting pregnant in the first place when you have to wait three months.

The Chairman: I was not aware of that provision but we will find that out.

From the Floor: It has to go in front of the Board of Administrators in the Mother's Allowance, Family Benefits Act, and if the baby is accepted then he is included on your cheque. If he is not accepted then he is not included. If he is accepted then that is fine, you have to wait three months. I had a baby in September and never got the cheque till December the 29th.

Mrs. Tremblett: Again this is a matter of your worker, what your worker states and what your worker recommends. We were meeting in Warden Woods a week ago and the Family Benefit Act people on Mother's Allowance. There is provision for pregnancy allowance. We were surprised to know about it. It would be wise to get a copy of this Act. I believe it cost 35¢ from the Queen's Printer. It has the pregnancy allowance in there. I don't see why they should run into this problem.

The Chairman: Could I ask your committee's president to write to the Government of Ontario, Department of Social Welfare and ask them for a copy of the Act so you would in fact have it yourselves. Would you do that? Good. You would have that rather rapidly.

From the Floor: I would ask two questions about rent and the three month's waiting period. I would like an explanation why it is so, why that is there?

The Chairman: You are saying?

From the Floor: Mr. McGowan said 33.1/3 of the wages of the working man. For us it doesn't work like that. I want to know why. I think the three month's period is there, why do we have to wait? If we have a baby why do we have to prove it to them?

The Chairman: You are suggesting the provision is wrong, that is what you are suggesting?

From the Floor: And the rent too.

The Chairman: We are going to have to cut it rather shortly. Could I ask over here?

Mr. Patrick Green: President Metro Federation Citizens' Association: Mr. Chairman, I would like answer your colleague's questions regarding the meetings held with possibly provincial members and aldermen. As a former resident here and formerly involved with the Association, we endeavoured to have quite a number of communications with both people with a certain amount of success at one time. We have actually seen the provincial member, to my knowledge since he was last running for re-election. He happens to be the Minister in charge of public housing and there may possibly have some bearing on the fact. With regard to the alderman situation, the young lady sitting with you actually ran for the position of alderman for this board in the last election. I think the community is a little modest in not speaking up for themselves.

Mr. McGowan: I feel that the whole meeting has a lot of things in the questions that we asked. We asked these questions this way, we want to know the rights of a person on welfare. It seems the questions are being answered by you individuals and I certainly am not knocking it but everybody has stated the Act. There is only one lawyer in Canada who is an expert and he is coming to my home next week to tell us how simple the Act is but your own lawyers cannot interpret the Act.

We are asking you to find out how to interpret the Act. Tell us the rights of these people. Do they have to pay this rent? Does the social worker have the right to take away welfare because a woman has a boyfriend? This is what I would hope the committee would go into to tell us. Our rights.

The Chairman: Thank you very much.

From the Floor: Why does it not include braces anything for crippled children? They refused to pay for the brace. Five times I have to tell the Easter Seal Society to lay down my whole life on a piece of paper and even get a brace. I am on Mother's Allowance and there is no way, she just shakes her head when I tell the worker. The kid will never walk. The wheelchair has to take from the Easter Seal and give details of my life. Why do I have to give my life story to get a wheelchair? Now, I give it for a wheelchair and a brace. She is 18 and it is not funny. She is in Grade 8 school and she passes but this is it, you have to put your life history for a wheelchair or a brace and have to do it three times last week. One was just put a screw on the wheelchair. I cannot pay for it. Half my cheque goes to rent and I am not covered for medicine. I have to pay for it. Then I bring my life and I pay. She goes to the hospital and the Welfare cut off. They say she does not need it but she needs a few things. All she wants is to get $15.00 a month.

he will never walk but she has got to beg for it, the wheelchair, really.

The Chairman: Thank you very much.

From the Floor: I cannot pay for it. I have to put down my life history for a wheelchair. A brace. Who is going to pay for that besides the East Seal?

The Chairman: Well, that should come under the medical department we were referring to.

From the Floor: It is the way you have got to beg for it.

The Chairman: Right.

Senator Carter: I would like to reply to the question of the friend up here in front; he says he had hoped that we could get the Act and tell you what your rights are. That is not simple. If you had the Act you would realize that it gives the department and the officials power to make regulations. They can change these regulations from time to time and unless you know the regulations that have been made under the Act you still don't know what your rights are.

The Chairman: Maybe if they asked for the Act they could ask for the regulations. They must supply the regulations for them.

Senator Carter: I know you have got to get the regulations.

Mr. McGowan: Excuse me, the Welfare Act is unchangeable. As it is read or written or whatever you want to say, nobody can understand it. When the Supreme Court of Appeal of Canada cannot even decipher what it means then there is something fundamentally wrong. These people on welfare have a right. I feel it is this committee's duty as interested individuals. You would not be here, if you were not interested in the rights of people. The problem is the rights of people are denied the people. If it takes twenty years they still should have their rights.

The Chairman: Yes, madam?

Mrs. Tremblett: I was also given to understand there is extra money, I believe, something like $5.00 per month given to people for wheelchairs. When I inquired from my worker she said, "You have no sympathy", I said, "I don't want it. I want your help. I need it because I have extra expenses compounded by the fact I have a family". She said she would inquire about it. She phoned me back about three or four weeks later and said, "You are already getting what is coming to you and your children. I cannot do anything more for you." She then told me that this included what I am getting.

Figuring it out I am still not getting the right amount under the Act. Where do I go from here? I am getting exactly what I should be getting according to her for myself and children. The Public Health Department tells me I am also entitled to this for myself, transportation, et cetera, and she maintains that I am getting it. Nobody talks any more about it.

The Chairman: Well, I think that is where the Appeal Board then would come into play. If you are familiar with that, I would certainly appeal that. The Department of Health told you you were entitled to it. I would appeal the decision of the worker.

I wonder if we could have Mr. Busby come forward now. When I said before that we only have four or five minutes I was right. Would you come up and give us your recommendations?

Mr. Busby: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I think poverty boils down to the common denominator; lack of money versus education, health and welfare and so on. I think one of the big problems is the freedom or control of the individual. How much freedom these people want. They are running their own lives and how much control they are willing to accept. That has to come, I think, through education. Where is the responsibility imposed? Responsibility for some people and opportunity for others.

You hear many women here today talking about support for themselves and their children but what responsibility has been placed on the fathers of those children? I think we must have stricter laws to make the fathers of these children responsible for their support.

Going back to the education again, maybe before these people become fathers and mothers they should have had a test in order to get a marriage licence in the first place in order to allow them to have children.

Mr. McGowan: What do you think you are talking about, cattle? I don't think you even have a right to be in this room.

Mr. Busby: Well, I think I have been one of the taxpayers.

Mr. McGowan: Well, hang your head in shame.

The Chairman: I would think that perhaps whether we agree or not I think we should just listen to these views. I don't think we necessarily have to agree.

Mr. Busby: I have lived in much poorer conditions than probably anyone in this room so I know what I am talking about. I have dealt with many people in this group and I point to right now in education on your credit buying and your home management and money and so on. I have dealt with many of the people in this area and many of them on welfare and I have not seen, cannot remember seeing a woman yet who has not had at least two packages of cigarettes in her purse in case she run out of one. She is on welfare.

Now this is part of education. There is something lacking in the education when people do not know how to manage their own affairs and I want to suggest that either you have freedom to manage your own affairs, if you do you must accept the responsibility that goes with it through education and you must be given the opportunity for education.

To start off again on education I would like to suggest that we have many young people in the community who are not getting the education they need even though the facilities are there because of the conditions in the home. Now, some of these children would like to leave their home and have an opportunity so the first thing that I would like to suggest is that we establish cadet schools for these children. About the ages of 14 to 18 children cannot get along in the home and should not have to get into trouble and become juvenile delinquents. They should have the opportunity to leave home and get an education. That is the only way you are going to solve this welfare problem because the welfare problems are from these people who have continually been brought up on welfare themselves and it continues on and on and these children must be given the opportunity to get out of this cycle, this welfare cycle, and this is not necessarily for children who's parents are on welfare, this is for children who just don't get along with their parents and don't get along at home. I would suggest not only does it apply to boys but also to girls. It would be just the same as some children who go off to boarding schools if their families can afford it. They should be allowed to go to a cadet school where they have freedom. They don't have to be juvenile delinquents and sent to reformatory but they are free to come home, visit their friends, just as if they were in boarding school.

Now the same thing goes through in education in the home management. I was on the Board of Education in Scarborough. I would suggest that what is called, "home economics" and so on is a course that should be compulsory for both boys and girl students in school so the girls grow up and know the responsibilities of running a home as a parent whether they actually ever get married or become parents or not. That is one of their responsibilities of looking after themselves and the same thing goes for the men.

These men here, who should know how to run a home, look after a home and provide for a family and have responsibilities, how can they do that they have not been given that chance in a home.

The other point is that the government has, of course, in the last few years the Canada Pension Plan which has been a very good thing and a godsend to many people in this community who have lost their father or one of the members of the family who was a provider and sometimes it is the mother and the survivorship benefits have been a big help when people have not been able to provide for themselves.

Again in the education of credit buying, as the lady was asking, why they cannot get credit I think it is pretty obvious why they cannot get credit. In the smaller communities out in Saskatchewan and Manitoba during depression years many people did not get credit because they were known in the community. You cannot expect a person to give you credit when you are not known in this area, when they just refuse to pay, that is an impossibility, but if they have a steady income on welfare which should be adequate then there should be no need for credit.

In fact I have dealt with incomes from $2,000.00 to $20,000.00 a year and there are very few people no matter what their income is, who have enough and that is also one of the problems in budgeting. There is never enough money no matter what the income is.

From the Floor: Would you mind telling me how it is adequate when you have 8¢ per person to live on? Would you mind telling me? For example, I have got $2.00 and change and that has got to last me ten days. How is that adequate?

Mr. Busby: I just don't know what is adequate.

From the Floor: If you don't know, what are you talking about?

From the Floor: I would say if the learned gentleman is from Scarborough he had better stay back there.

The Chairman: Your five minutes is up. If you could just sum up very quickly now and I am almost frightened that we will get into a great discussion of this, however, if you would just sum up.

Mr. Busby: Again the whole thing is a question of responsibility and opportunity. Providing the opportunity in the first place for these people with incentives to get off welfare, if possible. Now, some people cannot get off welfare. I recognize that through debt, disability and disease and so on and therefore there should be adequate provision for those people who are in this position through no fault of their own but there are people who can help themselves, who should be given incentives. This is men brought up by these people and as an example about ten years ago on Mother's Allowance through the death of a husband if he had provided something for his family that was taken into consideration and his family got some benefit from it in addition to the Mother's Allowance. They could put that money with the Public Trustee and get additional income. That incentive has been taken away about ten years ago by the government because now if a man leaves his family something they have to spend that money before they can get on Mother's Allowance. Now that is a very unfair situation to the person who wants to accept responsibility and help his family and these are the types of things which cannot be done by government. The government is wasting all kinds of money in the overdevelopment of areas and so on which could be done for example . . .

The Chairman: Perhaps we may not need examples. I think we must, in fairness to everyone . . .

From the Floor: I would like to ask the gentleman with the big mouth from Scarborough, I would like to know what his name is for future reference.

Mr. Busby: My name is Bill Busby, I am a lawyer.

From the Floor: I can see why . . .

The Chairman: I think I am going to have to cut this off, I am afraid.

Mr. Busby: That is also a problem, the people do not want to accept responsibility, to help themselves.

The Chairman: Right.

Mr. Busby: You cannot help people who do not want to help themselves. That is the discouraging aspect of government in a democracy.

The Chairman: Might I just sum up, you really first—all right, the last question?

Mr. Green: A one sentence answer, Mr. Chairman. Let me night the other half of your committee received a brief and I would just like to quote one sentence from it. I think it is a perfect answer;

One of the major problems faced by Canada's low income people is the complete lack of knowledge and understanding displayed by the general, more affluent public.

The Chairman: May I on behalf of our committee . . .

Mr. Dennis Timbrell: Alderman, ward 10, Borough of North York: May I make some brief comments?

I think I am one of the people, maybe, that get involved in this sort of thing. My name is Dennis Timbrell, Alderman, Ward 10, North York.

The Chairman: Welcome.

Mr. Timbrell: One particular aspect of the last speaker's remarks, particularly the question of education and home and so on I think really what we have to recognize is the fact that the family, more than anything else, has to be the basis for all success in our society, in the school, in business or whatever, and the very idea, you take children away from the home at the age of 14 or whatever, put them in a cadet school, remove them from the family atmosphere, however sacrosanct or devilish it is hardly worth commenting on as an aim. So my comment is on politicians since I am one and on the law. Too often, in the case of laws regarding welfare, regarding the social agencies, regarding the social laws of the state, the laws are made for the law makers. The laws are made for the civil servants not for the people. I would suggest that what has to be done first of all is a change in attitude of the three levels of government; federal, provincial and municipal, that governments start to come back down to the people that local members of parliament, members of council, members of the legislature of Ontario start to consult people more often, let the people know what they are doing, ask them what is wrong, get their suggestions.

Now, the idea that people who are on welfare don't want to help themselves is ludicrous, absolutely ludicrous. Several people have mentioned that given the opportunity they can do something. This is true and it is a question of the government sitting down, in realistic fashion saying, "All right, what can we do to give them the opportunities? How can we change the Manpower and Immigration Departments so we can get out to where the people are and find out what they are doing? Find out what they need? What they are capable of doing? What they need to be trained for?"

It is a question of Mr. Yaremko and his department coming down to the people. A question of changing the attitude of case workers.

I had a case last week of a lady in my ward who is going to be thrown out of her apartment this week. "Where do I go? My husband is on an airforce pension, in his middle 50's. He had a stroke. He is in a wheelchair. I phoned O.H.C. a month ago nothing."

Now, okay I can phone O.H.C. who say they have 1600 calls a day and I can say, "This is Alderman Timbrell calling, I want so and so". The average person phones, "I am sorry the line is busy, call back."

Now this is wrong. Damn it, all these people pay taxes. The system has got to be for these people. There has got to be provision made for government to get out of their Bay Street offices and get out where the people are.

The Chairman: Thank you.

May I say, on behalf of our committee, that we are very pleased to be here and I would like to thank each and everyone of you for coming and taking such an active part in this meeting tonight.

I am certain that we have learned a great deal about the problems that exist and it appears to me that the greatest problem, of course, is the frustration of not knowing the laws as they exist and the problems, if you have a problem of where you can get that problem resolved. I think, apart from the individual suggestions and recommendations which were very good the broad problem of lack of information would appear to be a very very serious problem and we do appreciate you bringing this to our attention.

Thank you very much.

Mr. Hughes: I would like to thank the senators for coming here to listen to us and I hope we did get something through to them. Thank you very much.

The committee adjourned.

APPENDIX "A"

STATEMENT BY ALDERMAN
ANTHONY O'DONOHUE
ON MINIMUM WAGE AND POVERTY

The minimum wage as it now stands at $1.30 per hour is probably the greatest contributor to the rampant poverty in our society. This, of course, puts many strains on the family life. Even by doubling the minimum wage it would still be below the poverty line, in my opinion. For a man and wife with 2 children in this economic climate it is impossible to make do with these wages, therefore, a reasonable level for a minimum wage should be about $2.50 per hour for a 40 hour week.

Therefore, the first step that we should take should be to increase the minimum wage to at least $2.50 per hour to give those people at the bottom of the ladder a fair chance in life.

Another great problem in Metropolitan Toronto is the great number of unskilled immigrants who have come to Toronto their home. These people work long, hard hours at low wages and have little opportunity to attend school—every family has to have 'bread on the table'. These immigrants become poor by constantly increasing cost of living and very often the family suffers many hardships. These people never seem to be pulled off the poverty line but by sheer determination they work on. Some make it, some do not. For those who do not it is a burden on the children who may suffer through neglect, health and lack of parental care—not to mention the benefits of an adequate education.

A concerted effort must be made to help these people and it can only be done by special emphasis to become familiar with the skills and the language of this country. Without the proper command of the language poverty becomes almost inevitable to the unskilled workers.

March 2, 1970.

SUBMISSION OF ALDERMAN HORACE BROWN
TO THE
SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON POVERTY

Poverty is too often equated with dollars and cents. Poverty takes many guises. It assumes a number of forms. The Webster's New World Dictionary defines it as follows:

"poverty—n., 1. the condition or quality of being poor; indigence; need. 2. deficiency in necessary properties or desirable qualities, or in a specific quality, etc; inferiority; inadequacy. 3. unproductiveness, as of soil. 4. smallness in amount; scarcity; paucity; dearth; scantiness."

It derives from the Latin word "paupertatem", hence our word "pauper".

Yet no matter how you define it, poverty is a fact of life that will not go away by wishing. It is generally accepted today as applying to those unfortunate in our society who do not have the wherewithal to subsist normally, nor the means by which they may rise through their own efforts to achieve sufficient in food, shelter, clothing, medical care, recreation, entertainment and the social amenities others accept as their due in a supposedly affluent society.

The Victorians used to feel quite righteously that "the poor we have always with us".

In the latter one-third of the Twentieth Century, when man can walk upon the moon, when medical science has extended the life span, when there is greater concern for the paths of progress being trodden, that dictum is just not good enough.

It is a shame of our so-called civilization that two-thirds of the world goes to bed hungry. It is a shame that in this land we love, a land blessed above many with untold material and mental wealth, the problem of poverty among a too-large proportion of our people should continue to haunt.

Within the preamble of the City's brief, I would like to discuss certain aspects of poverty as I see them, some of which I disagreeably and unforgettably experienced personally during the Great Depression of the Thirties, and others that I have seen within my roles as alderman, writer, newspaper and radio reporter, and official of various social agencies. While there has regrettably not been time to do what I like to do with briefs, namely, document, I trust that the comments I have to make may be of at least some slight service to this eminently worth-while and necessary Committee. My points are not made in any order of priority, but they tend to arrange themselves into the categories defined by the City's presentation.

PUTTING A FLOOR OVER POVERTY

It is necessary to bury poverty, without honor and unsung.

This can be accomplished by banishing Poverty to the cellar and letting it unregretfully die of disuse.

There are a number of ways that this can be accomplished, but only two have appeal to me:

1. The Guaranteed Annual Wage.
2. The Negative Income Tax.

Of the two, the former seems preferable. The G.A.W. implies placing a floor over poverty, so that each and every person in our society will be at least above the subsistence level. Its principle has been accepted by government, even if no action has as yet resulted.

While there is much in favor of the Negative Income Tax, it implies that the recipient will have to await a bureaucratic pleasure, which, in the hands of some officials, can become both a burden and a horror.

With the Guaranteed Annual Wage, we all become our brother's keepers. And that is as it should be.

THE BORDERLINE OF POVERTY

The families that chiefly arouse my sympathies are those existing on marginal incomes. They are making an attempt to live proudly, as their teachings and inclinations lead them. The family income is sometimes below that which it could receive on welfare. The family skills are low-rated on the employment market.

Far too often, someone will telephone me with a problem that boils down to actually not having enough money to get along in this inflationary world. When I suggest that I am not personally equipped to evaluate the case and would like to arrange professional counselling from a social worker in the Department of Welfare, there is an immediate negative reaction.

"We don't want anything to do with welfare, Mr. Alderman", is the caller's dignified response to the suggestion. "We'd rather starve than go on welfare."

The pitiful fact is that many of these good citizens must end up on welfare. Scraping by, with not enough food, inadequate medical and dental care, poor housing, threadbare clothing, they come to the time when the bills of such neglect are presented for payment. Because they have been forced to neglect their health, because they have no resources either from without or within, the collapse, both physically and morally, is all the more devastating. They become the perpetual charges of the State that has passed them by on the other side of the road when they held out their hands, not for alms but for a lifeline up to their feet and a help along the road.

These are the forgotten ones. How long will they stand for us forgetting?

THE TOTALLY-BOUND TO POVERTY

In my former capacities as Chairman of the City Committee on Welfare and later of that of the Municipality of Metropolitan Toronto, I have been appalled by the cold statistics that have revealed year by year the increasing creation of a class of citizens doomed to a lifetime within that area of poverty known as "Welfare". For there are two things in which I believe, and which I propounded constantly as Chairman: "Welfare is a right and not a privilege" and "Welfare is a level of subsistence and only that".

The welfare statistics of our municipality are divided into two classes: "Employable" and "Unemployable". The Municipality of Metropolitan Toronto, in January, 1970, the "Employables", i.e. those who can still work if work can be found, totalled 14,537. But, for the same period, there were 22,022 "Unemployables". This is a figure from a rising tide of unemployment and of seasonal occupations, so the "Employables" can show a downward trend. On the other hand, over the years the number of "Unemployables" has been mounting with ghastly steadiness.

Who are the "Unemployables"? They are the chronically ill. They are the ones who have been broken by a lifetime of living substandardly. They are those whom life has passed by. They are the ones who are and must continue to be a charge upon the State. We have created them with our technology and our advanced medical science that has given them a longer life span.

The damnable part of it is this:

The "Employables" tend to become "Unemployables". The marginal families spoken of earlier being forced on to welfare often find themselves a statistic in the "Unemployable" column, because of their years of forced self-neglect.

For every family that pulls out of the morass of poverty as represented by welfare, there are dozens who make the grade only briefly or who slide all the way into unemployment.

There must, I feel, be a recognition of the existence of the "Unemployable", and a firm foundation for revivifying him. If those with physical mental handicaps can become gainfully employed when they are without the welfare circle, why not those who are caught in the "Unemployable" trap? Who will provide the incentive?

It is an imperative, if we are to win the war against Poverty.

THE POVERTY OF INTELLECT

Most of us today are under-educated. If we had to start all over again in the labor market, we might be in sorry plight.

How much truer this is of the family man in his fifties, who finds himself redundant. His Grade 8 or lower education makes him an employment outcast. His laboring job has been replaced by automation.

There are two courses he can take: he can give in and vegetate, or he can fight his way up the education ladder.

Let's be honest: how many of us could go back to school at a relatively advanced age, with our thinking rigidly channelled, faced by a bewildering array of foreign terms (even though they be in the English language)? It takes a special kind of courage.

Yet I have been heartened to meet men and women who have done it under Canada Manpower retraining. I remember one man in his fifties, with five children, who had been for years on welfare. He decided he would be an upholsterer. An upholsterer he became. But the one who made me feel ashamed to voice any small self-complaint was the single woman in her forties who took retraining as a bookkeeper. When she graduated proudly, her career was further advanced than when she had entered the course. But she got a job. Such is the courage of the human spirit, which, given the chance, will triumph over almost any adversity.

After an excellent start, it seems to me we have at back on the all-important incentive to those who want to raise themselves up by their bootstraps. As a governor of the George Brown College of Applied Science and Technology, I am overwhelmed by the variety of the courses being supplied and the vision of humanity with which they are being taught. But somehow (and I know this is not entirely true) we seem to be preaching to the converted. Somewhere we need to go back a bit along the road and pick up those who have fallen and bring them back into the self-respect without which a human being cannot function. We must say to those on welfare that we believe in them, and that we are willing to pay them to go back to school and not subtract that pay from their welfare allowances. Perhaps we need some missionaries of education to go into the field and gather up the flock of those who hunger and thirst for an improvement of the intellect that most of us are capable of sustaining.

Rather than the futility of spending money to keep someone at the expense of the public purse, I could spend that same money and more to create a productive, taxpaying citizen.

Is it such a revolutionary thought?

THE POVERTY OF THE CITY-DWELLER

As one who lived for years in rural areas, I know that rural Poverty exists to a terrifying degree. More times than enough it is exacerbated by unthinking, unfeeling rural authorities with a "parish woodpile" mentality.

But the plight of those stricken by Poverty in our cities is greater than that of their country cousins. In the rural areas, you can till your own little plot of land, wear whatever clothing is available, exist in shelter that would bring the city building inspector hotfoot. It is not right, it is not just, but at least a little diligence can provide fresh meat and vegetables for the winter. There is also more neighborliness in the country, a disposition to share what little there is, or, if there is more, to present it quietly and thoughtfully without embarrassment on either side. (In saying this, I am laying aside regretfully the infamous conditions I have seen firsthand that exist among much of our Indian population.)

The city dweller in Poverty must face the unnaturally high rents gouged by slum landlords, the skyrocketing prices of essential foods, the out-of-sight costs of clothing, transportation, and other prime needs. He is in a vicious trap, where the teeth bite deeper day by day.

While the rural areas should receive all necessary attention of this Committee, I bespeak a special mercy for the city dweller caught in Poverty.

THE POVERTY OF ILL-HEALTH

In one respect, the person subsisting on welfare is fortunate; medical, drug, dental and hospital costs are absorbed by the State. For others, Medicare provides a partial answer to the largest amounts of money required by sudden illness.

But ill-health can still create Poverty. A robust man, earning good money as a skilled worker or in middle and lower management levels, finds himself bedridden. It could never happen to him, but it did.

His benefits gradually run out. Mortgage payments cannot be met. Creditors hound him. His family looks at him beseechingly.

To a man who has always made his own way, who has looked forward to a productive future and an easy retirement, this can be the nethermost hell. A producer, he becomes a burden. A taxpayer, he becomes a charge of the taxpayer. His whole life has come to a stop.

Or, a successful citizen, he may have fallen prey to the illness of alcoholism. A large part of society has not yet accepted alcoholism as a disease, and he and his are stigmatized.

A creeping illness may gradually paralyze him. His body wastes away, and his mind is in constant torture for what-might-have-been.

Such a man (or woman) needs our every sympathy and consideration. He may be taken care of very well by the State, but his family suffers and he suffers because of this.

Not every man can rise from adversity and make adversity his own, as did the late great Eddie Baker of the C.N.I.B.

But there should be no Poverty for him or his because of ill-health.

THE POVERTY OF LONELINESS AND ISOLATION

The other day I had a call from an elderly man. When he and his wife were being evicted, I had been able to help them, through the good offices of that remarkable man, John Anderson, Metro's Commissioner of Welfare, obtain an O.H.C. apartment.

In a quavering voice, he told me that he had to pay $85 a month for his apartment, and, as he only received $86 from the government, he had but one dollar a month left from his cheque.

Some gentle probing elicited the fact that his wife had just become eligible for old age assistance, and was receiving her $111 a month. Naturally, her husband's cheque had been cut accordingly.

Well, it did not take the wisdom of Solomon to figure out that what the wife got she believed was hers, and the old man felt he was depending on the charity of his wife. Once again John Anderson came to the rescue. He discovered that the husband was entitled to a $14 a month supplement.

I believe they are a happy couple again.

But old people such as that can never be truly happy, isolated as they are by us from the world they have known. Families have grown indifferent, or have burdens to bear of their own that are too great to allow further sharing.

One of my duties as an alderman, I believe, is to sit at my telephone patiently listening to the trials and tribulations of some senior citizen. They may seem small to me, but they are enormous to him or to her, and there must be an ear into which to pour them.

There are many excellent homes for the aged, where light and laughter rule. There are thousands of good senior citizen apartments, where dignity can be maintained although loneliness may be a constant companion. But in this great and affluent city of Toronto there are far, far too many of our elderly who live in one room with a gas-plate and a cold-water tap and a not-too-clean bathroom down the hall or on the next floor. There is never really enough to eat or to wear or to entertain, and life exists from one pension cheque to another.

These are persons who have each, in one way or another, made a contribution to the world.

Should they be allowed to linger in isolation?

Would we like to be lonely?

There is more, so much more, that could be said. I wanted to talk about the Poverty of extravagance and the crimes of the credit system; the social worker who unfortunately becomes case-hardened (but then so many are dedicated above and beyond the call of duty); the meanness of the minimum wage and how it is exploited by employers. But you Committee knows these things and more.

I hope what I have said carries some tiny seed of the thought that the poor should not be always with us, and that we are our brother's keepers.

SUBMISSION OF ALDERMAN KARL JAFFARY TO THE

Minimum Income, Income Maintenance and Welfare Payment Levels

I would like to discuss very briefly the reasons why I believe our present income maintenance programs to be out of step with the times. To make the point which I wish to make, I believe we must first look at the low-wage earner. There was a time when society generally accepted that labor was no more than a commodity to be bought and sold in the marketplace and the levels of wages were fixed accordingly. I believe that time to have passed. The philosophy embodied in many collective agreements and theoretically embodied in the minimum wage legislation is that if a man does anything useful for the society he ought to be able to live at some decent standard of living. That is something which almost everyone seems to agree. No matter how menial the job, if it is something which society wants done (and society in this case is translated into an employer), the wage level should be such that the man who is doing the job and his family can live properly. The rest of society presumably absorbs any redistribution of wealth required by the outlook by having the employer charge a high price for his goods and services. It is on this level, the level of a wage earner doing menial work, which we must consider the minimum wage legislation. I am of the opinion that a family cannot subsist on the wages earned by a minimum wage earner and on that basis I believe that the minimum wage ought to be raised.

Unemployment Insurance and Workmen's Compensation

We come next to the wage earner who is unable to work because of some personal disability or because of some economic disability in the society. These are the people who receive Unemployment Insurance Benefits and Workmen's Compensation. I think most people like to think of these schemes as being insurance schemes and as being adequate insurance. In my opinion they are not adequate and are therefore less than insurance. The lowest wage earners in our society are the ones who contribute to unemployment insurance and in that sense their contributions can be looked upon as a tax on the worker. The benefits paid to these same people are frequently inadequate. The benefits received by a family with four children, the father of whom is receiving Unemployment Insurance Benefits are less than the benefits paid under General Welfare Assistance. That scale of benefits is simply inadequate if one wishes to think of Unemployment Insurance as something which a man is forced to purchase in order to provide for himself during a period of unemployment brought about through no fault of his own. I believe we ought to insure against unemployment; that we ought to provide adequate benefits from the insurance which we provide; and that we ought to do this as a social responsibility of the community as a whole rather than the responsibility of individuals. That being so, I believe that all of those earning income ought to contribute to the insurance scheme and all ought to have a right to draw from it. The scheme ought to provide minimum benefits sufficient to support a decent standard of living.

The theory of Workmen's Compensation seems to me to be somewhat different. The principle there is compensation without regard to the fault or possible fault of employee or employer. When an employee is injured in an industrial accident, he has to be compensated. It must be noted that the legislation giving the employee this right to compensation proved from him the right to sue his employer for damages when his employer was negligent.

Now that theory only works when there is full compensation. In fact there is inadequate compensation. The maximum compensable income is considerably lower than income earned by many working men. The maximum benefits obtainable even for full disability are only a portion of maximum compensable income. The result is that an employee may be injured through his employer's negligence and be forced to accept a level of compensation that is far less than he might recover if he had the right to sue his employer for negligence. The scheme simply does not work. A skilled, industrious workman can easily earn $200.00 a week. He can then suffer an accident which disables him and be reduced to about $100.00 a week even on full compensation. If he has been living up to his income, as most people do, he finds himself in an intolerable situation. The level of benefits under the Workmen's Compensation must be raised.

Welfare

I have now dealt with the person generally considered to be the backbone of our society, the man who works hard, and with the person about whom great concern is generally expressed, the man who has been working hard and wants to work hard, but is unable to do so through no fault of his own. When we go to the Welfare recipient, we generally bring into play an entirely different set of attitudes. Large elements in our society seem to believe that we are giving charity when we give welfare; that we are paying people not to work.

I think we must look at the Welfare recipient in a different light. If we ask why this person is not earning a lot of money or why she is not married to someone who is earning a lot of money or why this person's father does not earn a lot of money, we are generally drawn to the conclusion that whatever the reason, it is not the fault of the recipient. The recipient is generally an unfortunate person who finds himself or herself in an intolerable situation. In each of the examples above, we decided that whatever else we did, we would provide a level of support that would permit a decent standard of living. We really made that decision because it was not the fault of the menial worker that the job he happened to be doing was one that did not command a high market income. We made the same decision in the case of the recipient of Unemployment Insurance Benefits or Workmen's Compensation on the grounds that it was not the recipient's fault that he was not contributing more fully to the economy. Well, is it any more the fault of the Welfare recipient that he is a Welfare recipient?

When a man leaves his wife or if he turns to drink and becomes unemployable, maybe it is the fault of a wife who nags him or maybe the man is congenitally unstable or maybe the problems of living very close to the poverty line at a very low wage are simply so frustrating that the man cops out of society completely. I suppose I am really saying that there is no point in trying to pin the fault on anyone. We really don't care whether we can assess a moral fault within a puritan concept and if we wanted to try to assess such fault, we might well say that the fault was in the organization of our society as a whole. In any event, I think most people would agree that that really does not matter. What we have to do is to provide a decent standard of living. We have to provide that decent standard for low wage earners and for those who are disabled and for those who are now Welfare recipients.

It may be that some kind of guaranteed annual income could solve many of these problems. From the reading that I have done in the field of guaranteed annual income I am not at all sure that it can, but I am quite open to being persuaded. I think the problems of providing incentives for people to work will remain with us and I am not competent to deal with the various technical devices which might be used to provide these incentives. The point which I wish to make very strongly is that we delude ourselves into thinking that we are looking after citizens of this society. We have not. One cannot live on minimum wage levels, at least not with a family. One cannot live on Unemployment Insurance Benefits. One cannot live on Workmen's Compensation and, in my opinion, one cannot live with any degree of dignity on Welfare. One cannot live adequately on Old Age Pensions. The outstanding fact is that those of us who comprise the middle class and the affluent are able to fool ourselves into thinking that we have adequately provided for these groups of people. We have not. Our social responsibilities are such that we must face the costs of making these programs adequate long before we get to a guaranteed annual income of any sort. I think we have to increase the benefits under existing schemes so that they are sufficient for people to live on.

Poverty and the City

The brief suggests that the poor are those who can order their lives less significantly than others because they lack the necessary decision-making powers. If one is to overcome poverty, then decision-making ability must be given to those who lack it. A similar argument applies to Cities. If Cities, like the poor, are to significantly control themselves, then it is necessary that they have the requisite power. Those on welfare can be considered poor because their income is limited, and is derived from a source much beyond their control. No matter what they do, if they are unable to work, they cannot get enough money to make the types of decisions we associate with good and responsible human behaviour. Similarly, if the City is to control itself, and meet its problems, it is necessary that it has the financial and decision-making power to in fact deal with its problems.

Unfortunately, the City is now the creature of the Province, and its tax base is limited. Like the poor person who pays much of his money to an absentee landlord, the City pays most of the taxes it raises to other levels of government. Certainly, the City has some of this money returned to it, but under the conditions imposed by other levels of government, much as the poor person has some of the money paid by him in the form of realty and sales tax back to him in the form of welfare payments, etc. In theory, then, if the City is going to meet its own needs, and the needs of its poor, it is going to need the power and the money to do it.

In practice, it appears that the other levels of government are controlled, by and large, by rural constituencies which know little of the problems of the City. The fact that in Ontario the Minister of Municipal Affairs comes from a small town (Chatham) is indicative of the situation. Thus, it will be difficult in practice for a more senior level of government to really begin meeting the needs of the City if in fact it is more responsible to a rural environment. (And conversely, it would seem foolish for a City such as Toronto to try and meet the needs of a rural community such as Orangeville).

In terms of the poor in Cities, then, it is necessary that the Cities have the money and the power to do what it knows needs to be done. Decision-making ability, as well as taxing capabilities must be parcelled out more in relation to real need so that cities, like the poor, can come to grips with the real problem confronting them.

Housing

Two problems emerge when one considers the poor in relation to their housing. Firstly, there is a problem with quantity of accommodation: there is just not enough housing. The Patterson Report on Housing Needs in Metro Toronto, commissioned by the Metropolitan Planning Board in 1969, states that in the low income group some 99,000 families, and some 88,000 non-family individuals were living in shelter classified as inadequate, too costly, or both.

There is an outrageous need for housing, particularly for those who cannot afford 'market' rent. And, of course, the poor, with the least resources are those who know this problem most intimately.

The second problem concerns quality. Just as housing is not adequate. Housing which does not allow people to control their own lives will not help us solve the problem of poverty. Thus, we must consider the quality of housing as well as the quantity of housing if we wish to get at the root of the problem.

In the past, housing decisions were decentralized and were made by many individuals who went about meeting their own housing and neighbourhood needs. The land and material was available for most people to make sure that they attained almost exactly what they wanted. Today, the individual has almost no control over his environment, and this indicates that he has lost the power to order his life as he sees fit.

Several trends are noticeable:

A. Public housing (as an example of an attempt to help the poor in their housing needs) does not give a person any right to have any control over his accommodation and environment. (1) The resident in almost every case is a tenant, and therefore without any real rights over the place where he lives. (He cannot make alterations to suit his needs, for instance.) (2) Units are poorly constructed and in many cases completely unsuited to needs. (Families have been forced to live in apartments which were never designed for children.) (3) The concept of neighbourhood, where people live with some degree of willingness, co-operation and enjoyment is completely lacking: through lack of choice, tenants move to available units in spite of drawbacks surrounding location, friends, facilities, etc. To a large extent, public housing is full of displaced persons who have exercised no choice in terms of the unit lived in, the location of the unit, or the amount paid for accommodation.

B. Government always emphasizes size, and almost all residential accommodation built, whether public or private is part of a giant complex. Municipal regulations discourage small but reasonable groups of building, and instead encourage massive developments. (Witness present bonusing provisions). Construction is seen in terms of landscaping, setbacks, etc. which have little to do with humane uses of space. For instance, there are no incentives to build in-fill housing which would be economical to individuals and healthy for the preservations of communities. In short, governments encourage projects which fail to allow people to control the types of buildings which are built by encouraging large private corporations to build massive projects, rather than allowing a range of individuals to satisfy their own needs.

C. There is an unavailability of capital for anyone save for the very large corporation (though at the present time even these large corporations are having some problems in getting money). If people are going to control their own lives, they are going to have to have the necessary capital to construct places they want to live in.

Suggested Actions

It is obvious that the private market cannot meet the housing needs of society, and particularly the poor, in terms of quantity or quality. Public funds must therefore be expended assuring that all people in this society are properly housed and the housing is such that it is controlled both in terms of development and management by the people who are affected by it.

Accordingly:

1) Housing money must be considered a priority, ranking ahead of other expenditures which do not relate directly to the other basic needs of clothing and food. This should apply to all levels of government.

2) Tenants must be given more rights to control their environment. Further, people must be encouraged to be owners rather than tenants in all types of building, so that the actual person affected, namely the person who lives in the unit, can in fact make the decisions necessary without having to wait on the grace of someone else.

3) Capital must be made available to individuals, and groups of indigenous individuals (as in the form of neighbourhood groups) so they can build the types of structures they want to build. That is the only way that they can exercise control over their own lives. If capital is available only to large developers, then large developers will be the ones who make the decisions about how and where people live.

Further, money must be made available to ensure that people can in fact repair their dwelling units, thus ensuring that the environment they want can be reasonably attainable.

All levels of government must direct themselves to these points.

4) There must be a complete overhaul of municipal regulations concerning building so ordinary people will be able to build, in their terms, in places healthy to their communities. Or, in other words, the rehabilitation of existing neighbourhoods must be encouraged by allowing people to build in-fill, rather than wait for a developer to demolish everything and begin anew to create an environment acceptable to him. Perhaps the poor have more experience than most other people in this regard, since it is the poor neighbourhood which is subject to massive private redevelopment and urban renewal.

The Mental Outlook of the Poor

As stated above, the poor cannot order their own lives. And one of the most frightening aspects of poverty is that the poor feel poor. They have been considered as not worthy of decision-making ability, and that consideration is soon interpreted by the poor as a feeling of lack of self-worth. The poor feel that they are of no value and their lives lack meaning.

In order to combat poverty then, it is not just enough to try and redress the imbalance in terms of financial capability. It is also necessary to give the poor the chance to feel as though their lives are important. And in fact if this is to be accomplished, it must go beyond the appearance of worth, it must be worth itself. In essence, the poor must be given more power to influence their lives.

In order to provide for this redistribution of power, it will be necessary to provide the poor with the resources available to the rest of the community. They must be provided with people who are there to serve them, whether it be in the form of bureaucrats who work for the poor, or in the form of people who are around who can provide the types of skills normally attached to a large corporation. For instance, most professional people have a raft of persons who can help them express their opinions: typists, researchers, etc. Such persons are not available to the poor and accordingly, the poor have much more difficulty in expressing their needs than other members of the society. Such persons will have to be provided for the poor.

In allowing the poor access to these resources, there is the chance that perhaps the poor will begin to influence more the working of various public and private bodies. This will mean that they will begin to be drawn into the decision making process and in that way begin to participate in the society in a more productive way.

Suggested Actions

Governments at all levels should assure that money exists so that the poor can have the resources generally available to most other persons in the society so that the poor can in fact begin to influence the process of society. This might mean, at the municipal level—just making available typists, copy-machines, etc. At the provincial level—it probably means making money available so that groups of poor persons can have persons at their disposal who can do the types of things that poor persons want done.

SUMMARY—MAIN CONCLUSIONS AND RECOMMENDATIONS

The Family Service Association of Metropolitan Toronto concludes, from its many years of direct involvement with the people of Metropolitan Toronto, that the working poor must be a major focus in the fight against poverty.

The Family Service Association therefore recommends that:

- I. Substantial increase be made in Family and Youth Allowances.
- II. Government insurance plans be extended to protect more adequately working families from common hazards which may impoverish them.
- III. Pending the implementation of a more fundamental incomes policy, families who are already poor should not be subject to direct taxation.
- IV. Federal and Provincial Governments make every effort to increase our stock of public housing.
- V. Personal bankruptcy be made available to the working poor.
- VI. Family planning clinics become a regular and recognized part of public health program.

SUBMISSION TO THE
SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON POVERTYBY
FAMILY SERVICE ASSOCIATION OF METROPOLITAN TORONTO

INTRODUCTION

1. The Family Service Association of Metropolitan Toronto is a non-profit family service agency, established in 1914, whose purpose is to strengthen family life and to prevent family breakdown. It is the largest family service agency in Canada.

2. The Association operates under Provincial Charter and has a Board of Directors composed of 30 men and women. Its social work staff consists of 50 persons—the majority of whom have their Master of Social Work degree. Service to families and communities is provided through seven district offices strategically located within Metropolitan Toronto, and in three public housing developments.

3. In 1968 the agency's counselling services were used by 8044 families. Many of these families were poor or in marginal circumstances. About 52% of known family incomes were under $4800.¹ a year, about 17% were under $2400. In a quarter of the cases our work is focused solely on environmental or situation conditions, most of which involved inadequate income. Beyond this, many poor families use our service not because they are poor, but because they have relationship problems common to the general population. We become aware incidentally of their economic tensions and crises, and have the particular advantage of seeing them in the overall perspective of a counselling relationship. We have also the added perspective gained from doing the same counselling job with families who are not poor.

4. As well, we have gained experience from programs specifically directed to the poor. At present this includes a large summer camp program and participation in multi-service units in Housing Projects. It should also be recalled that for a decade or so, ending only recently, our services included a substantial income supplementation program which has left a considerable legacy of experience in intensive involvement with the economic problems of the poor. The subject of enquiry of the Senate Committee on Poverty is, therefore, of deep and immediate concern to this agency.

5. We submit this Brief in the understanding that the Senate Committee will have learned the meaning of poverty in our society in terms of its correlation with most of our mental, physical and social ills, and of its corrosive effects on individual and family strengths and the opportunities of children. We trust that our failure to dramatize the effects of poverty in our submission will be understood in the light of this faith in the Committee. Indeed, no document of any length could express the frequency and extent of our concerns for the human waste and agony, resulting from poverty, that we see in our work.

Emphasis

6. The emphasis on this Brief is on the "working poor" in Metropolitan Toronto. We have chosen this focus because we know many working families who are poor and we believe their position may be the least adequately represented in the mass of material received by the Senate Committee.

7. We realize that the Committee is receiving many significant views on the nature and definition of poverty, and on its causes and remedies. From the scope of our work with the poor, we are aware of the aspects of poverty leading to many of these views, and we respect their validity. Much that has already been presented merits our wholehearted support, and we refer, in particular, to the analysis of poverty and the suggestions as to its remedies presented in the report of the Canadian Welfare Council.

Basic Premise

8. The basic premise of this report is that the working poor must be a focal point for an approach to the reduction of poverty.

9. The 5th Annual Report of the Economic Council of Canada indicates that the working poor comprise two-thirds of the poor in Canada. The report identifies this group as those families "whose poverty problems are associated, not with the absence of earnings, but with an insufficiency of earnings."

10. In our experience, the working poor not only include the larger part of those in poverty but are a reservoir from which other commonly identified groups of poor are replenished. We are not merely thinking of the disorganized poor. The deserted mother on welfare, or the sole support working mother and her children, generally speaking, represent the remains of a working poor family that has survived for some years and broke up in the impoverished child-rearing phase. The aged poor were very frequently the working poor, too long impoverished in the child-rearing phase to acquire the home or assets that might supplement their social security beyond the poverty level. Children leaving school before completing a useful level of education are en masse the children of the working or welfare poor. Much family breakdown and individual handicap, which are the more personal causes of poverty, could be prevented through improvement in the position of the working poor.

11. In addition, we observe that the existence of many working poor prevents the improvement of welfare benefits for families. Welfare benefits are unlikely to be raised much above the living standards of the working poor.

Definition of Poverty

12. For the purpose of this Brief, we suggest that a working family is poor if it is paying more than 60% of its gross income for shelter, food and clothing. This is the more adequate of the two levels, based on 60% and 70%, considered by the Economic Council of Canada. The Council's formula does not take into account differences in direct taxation between working and non-working poor. The more commonly used 70% produces a "poverty line" that is inadequate for the working group on which this Brief is focused.

The Working Poor

13. The working poor are most commonly the families of working men who have too many children to be provided for by their wages, and many or too young children for the wife to work. They are not simply low wage earners. Usually their wages alone do not account for poverty. For a sim-person or a childless married couple who are employed to be poor, even if they receive only our inadequate minimum wage, is as difficult as for an ordinary working man not to be poor if he has several young children. Families of men with very high wages are not likely to be poor regardless of size, and families of men on the lowest wages, or irregularly employed, will probably be poor if there is only one child. However, in the case of the mass of working men earning something near the median wage, the number and ages of children will usually determine which side of any poverty line the family is on. Poverty in the working poor is the result of having children, and for working class families who have several children it is a normal phase in the life cycle of the family.

4. In accepting that most poverty is the result of the presence of children in the family, we have had to accept that the incidence of poverty will be highest among children. That a period of poverty in childhood as become the birthright of a large proportion of our working class citizens. We have observed that the families of most working men on average wages or less will face a period of poverty if there are several children. Two-thirds of our people grow up in families with three or more children,² so that most

We have been unable to find any authoritative answer to the question: "How many of our citizens grow up in families with three or more children?" We present in support of our estimate the following information gleaned from simple analysis of Dominion Bureau of Statistics Publications:

Analysis of the 1961 Census table "Women ever married, 15 years or over, by age of women and number of children ever born" shows that 69% of the children that had been born to urban Ontario married women in the 45 to 49 age group, were born to women who had had three or more children. The proportion was 73% for all Ontario and 61% for the Metropolitan Toronto area. D.B.S., Population Sample, Bulletin 4.1-7, 1966, Table G 1. (Toronto table is unpublished.)

Also in 1961, 54% of the "children still at home" in urban Ontario centers of over 100,000 were living in families which still had three or more children at home. The proportion was 60% for all Ontario and 7% for Canada. D.B.S. Households and Families, Bulletin 2.1-5, 1962, Table 49.

In 1966, in Metropolitan Toronto, 55% of "children in families" were in the 23% of all families still including three or more children. D.B.S. Population Bulletin C-20, 1968. (Analysis producing this result required application of an average for the number of children per family to a group combining families with one and two children. This was derived from statistics in Bulletin 2.1-5.)

In 1967, in Ontario, 36% of all children born in the year were a third or later child in order of birth. The proportion was 40% for Canada. Of the remaining children born in Ontario in 1967, first or second children, 63% were born to women 25 years of age or younger, among whom the prospects of further children are high. D.B.S., Vital Statistics, 1967, Table B 11.

children growing up in families with low to average incomes will be exposed to poverty.

Poverty

15. Much poverty is a function of our wage system. Family income is determined by the economic value of the production of the members. Generally speaking, families are poor either (a) because, for various reasons, they have no productive members, or, (b) because the economic returns for the production of working members is insufficient for the families' needs.

16. We observe that families are rarely poor because their values and aspirations are significantly different from those of other citizens, or for lack of effort, ingenuity, self sacrifice or hard work. If these strengths seem to be lacking among the poor, it is usually because they have been eroded by poverty, or because it is hard for those not poor to understand how such strengths are manifested under the stress of poverty.

17. (a) Families who have no productive members live in the institutionalized poverty of the welfare system. Improvements in welfare rates, coverage and benefits, far more than services, are required to improve their position. We have many clients on government benefits, and while we are aware that the Senate Committee will have been more than adequately informed as to their conditions, we are too poignantly aware of needed improvements to omit reference to some of the most apparent.

Adequate welfare and social security rates are needed, calculated to provide a substantial percentage of benefits for other needs beyond minimum adequate food, clothing and shelter, and all government benefits, once adequate, should be adjusted annually to changes in the cost of living. There is need for increased rehabilitation services and family support services such as day care; these would enable more of this group to work, although in many cases they would only be shifted to the ranks of the working poor. There is need for substantial increase in the number and training of welfare staff. Inasmuch as the "needs test" and related investigations are to continue, such staffing is required to minimize the damage to self esteem and independence inherent in a situation in which vulnerable people are forced into humiliating procedures. Such improved staffing is also needed to provide or co-ordinate services related to the central maintenance program.

Under the Ontario Family Benefits Act, 1967, it should be made mandatory for municipalities to provide certain benefits, such as "Special Assistance" which are now permissive. Under the general Welfare Assistance Act, a detailed interpretation of "in need" is required in the Act or Regulations. This is necessary so that persons applying for general welfare assistance may not be required to use up the last cent of their liquid assets, and forced to face living on their meticulously restricted allowance without even a small contingency fund.

(b) With respect to families whose working members do not earn enough to meet family needs, we find that most commonly there are not immediate means by which income can be significantly increased. Circumstances that limit the range of the father's earnings are so complex as to be practically unmodifiable. They involve for example, his educational level, innate intelligence, work experience, health, and such general things as wage rates, union membership and locality. Government retraining programs are of some help to persons left conspicuously untrained by our secondary school system, or who are for other reasons grossly underemployed, but, in our experience, are of no help to most working poor fathers. For example, many are impoverished more by family size than unusually low earnings, and cannot expect to earn significantly more after retraining.

Additional income of any appreciable amount is more likely to come through having other members of the family work than in any increase in the father's wages. However, employment of the wife is not only a matter of her work skills and the availability of suitable jobs, but of circumstances in family size and cycle that may take years to evolve. Families with a number of young children have little chance to increase income in this way. Wives with very superior work skills and ability are sometimes able to do double duty at home and at work, and may even earn enough for a substantial margin over deductions and costs of day care. Most are not able to do this, and, if they have a number of small children, the cost of adequate services to replace them in the physical aspects alone of their child care role is often more than they could earn.

Unfortunately, earnings in addition to wages from father's primary job offers the only hope of relief for many working poor families. Such additional earnings keep many working class families on the right side of the poverty line, and contribute to the position of many families in the middle income group. But among the working poor fathers are forced into moonlighting, and mothers out to work in situations when it is destructive to health, marital relations and the mental, emotional and social health of children. Children themselves start work before they have completed any really useful secondary education. In such families, this generation's solutions to poverty stand high in the list of the next generation's causes.

18. We recognize that a proportion of the poor are sufficiently disorganized emotionally and culturally to be said to be contributing to their own impoverishment. As well, within this group there are some who fit the stereotype of the hard core, generationally transmitted culture of poverty. However, we believe that this stereotype is considerably over-emphasized and that many of the disorganized poor, if they are a product of poverty, are made so by the ravages of poverty and not simply born into a culture that predisposes them to it. Public education and modern communication media have penetrated into the depths of any culture of poverty we may have had, and there are few parents today who do not at least aspire beyond poverty for their children. We see the ranks of the disorganized poor continually replenished by members of ordinary families who have broken under the stresses of our society. We recognize the great importance of special outreach and rehabilitative programs, but see them as remedial to the casualties of our social system, rather than directed to the causes of poverty.

19. While poverty remains the common punishment for most human breakdown or handicap leading to the inability to produce or to manage income efficiently, it is inevitable that the impoverished group will include many disorganized people who require special treatment. It is unthinkable, however, that the existence of such people should be considered a "cause" of poverty.

Our system of income distribution is the cause of persons so affected being poor. Poverty is one of the causes of such conditions, and the most severe aggravant to them and the most serious block to their treatment. Unfortunately, we are many generations away from knowing how to reduce many of the stresses in our society, or even understanding their effects sufficiently to offer specific and effective treatment to most disturbed persons. This generation is, however, certain of the epidemiological relationship between poverty and most kinds of breakdown, and fairly sure of its direct causal relationship in many cases. It has the means to eliminate the worst of poverty now, and can't afford to wait until it has the assurance that no one is going to dissipate his productive capacity or his income.

Survey

20. To illustrate some of our observations, we reviewed the economic circumstances of families seen in January, 1970 who had three or more dependent children, and where the father's wages were between $80.00 and $130.00 a week, or between $2.00 and $3.25 an hour. The families completed detailed questionnaires, which were reviewed with them by their caseworkers.

21. This particular group was chosen as representing the families of ordinary workers having average to low average wages. The survey is intended to show the degree to which these families are poor. At the same time, inasmuch as these families are seen to be poor, we hope that their conditions will give some perspective on the lot of the many working poor families whose incomes are much lower.

22. The Commissioner of Welfare for Toronto, Mr. Anderson, has estimated that there may be about 10,500 families (of four or more) in Toronto who would require supplementation to bring their incomes up to the amount they would receive on public Welfare.³ The poorest families in the group surveyed have incomes considerably above welfare rates.

23. The 16 cases in the survey do not represent a "scientific" sample of families in this group on our caseloads. Some caseworkers were not able to participate in the survey. Families were not included if their caseworker judged they were too troubled to be asked to participate, or if they were unwilling, or if they were unable to provide documentation of earnings and pay deductions. However, we believe that the cases were selected as objectively as possible and fairly represent our experience. Unfortunately, we know of little to suggest that the financial conditions of the families surveyed may not be typical of conditions among all families in Toronto meeting the same criteria.

24. The principal results of the survey are presented in table form as an appendix. The following is a summary:

(a) The fathers' wages alone were insufficient to provide for their families. The costs of shelter, food, and clothing amounted to considerably more than 60% of the fathers' gross wages for normal work hours in every case, and were 75% or more in 13 cases.

(b) In terms of Total Family Income, the costs of shelter, food, and clothing amounted to more than 60% of income in 14 cases. The addition of compulsory wage deductions brought the proportion of income required for basic costs to a minimum of 78% in all but one case. The addition of essential transportation cost at T.T.C. rates, telephone, and the interest cost of consumer credit brought the percentage up to a minimum of 86% with only one exception. The balance of income remaining was over $12.00 a person in only one case, and ranged from $6.00 to a minus quantity in ten cases.

(c) Fifteen families were using Consumer Credit. In 11 cases the expected monthly payments (less interest cost) amounted to more than the balance of income mentioned above. Usually it was a great deal more.

(d) Fifteen of the families paid between 9% and 22% of total income in compulsory wage deductions. The average was 16%.

25. The following is a summary of additional information from the survey that is not covered in the Table:

(a) The fathers were dependable working men. Thirteen had been with the same employer for the past three years or more, for an average of eight years.

(b) The families had virtually no assets beyond equities in homes and cars, and these were very limited. Only three of seven families buying homes had equity over $1,000.00. One of eight families with cars had equity of $600.00. The rest were much less, and the cash value of the cars probably averaged $350.00. Only one family had other assets, and $1,100.00 property.

(c) At the time of the survey, the income of the families as a group, averaged about the same as any other time of the year. Individual incomes fluctuated according to the availability of overtime, second jobs for fathers, and whether the wife was able to work and for how long. Reports on income conditions for the preceding 12 months indicated that five families were somewhat better off in January, and six were somewhat worse off.

(d) Families were asked to evaluate the effect of money pressures on various aspects of family life. The caseworkers concurred with the families' judgments in all but one case and were usually in the position to give a reliable opinion.

(a) Eleven families reported that money pressures were seriously restricting the developmental activities of children.

(b) Fourteen families reported that money pressures had seriously delayed or prevented the use of medical or dental services or drugs in the past year.

(c) Thirteen families reported that money pressures were contributing seriously to problems among family members.

Recommendations

26. In making recommendations, we hope to contribute to the Senate Committee's understanding of poverty only inasmuch as we are "telling it like it is" in our experience. We do not know the precise extent our recommendations are practicable, nor whether there are better means to the same ends. We do know that the ends are essential to any major reduction of poverty.

27. With respect to the working poor we need adequate economic measures to compensate for the fact that income from earnings relates to the market value of the job, and not to family needs. We are strongly in support of improvements in minimum wages, and a Guaranteed Annual Income Plan as final solutions to this problem. However, immediate action is necessary.

28. We recognize that precipitous increases in the minimum wage may force extensive economic adjustments. Also, we recognize that the highest possible minimum wage in the near future will not be sufficient to keep larger families out of poverty and that some additional source of income will be necessary for many. Everyone on every job can scarcely be paid enough to maintain adequately a family of five, when the average wage (with normal deductions) is already inadequate.

29. We are committed to the principle that everyone should be guaranteed at least an adequate annual income without the personalized investigations and stringent "needs" tests that are common to our public assistance programs. We are pleased with the general interest in the Guaranteed Annual Income Plan. We are dismayed, however, that the acceptance of such a plan as the panacea for poverty in advance of any acceptable model for implementation tends to preclude here and now improvements. We are concerned that the idea has been so readily endorsed by some groups who have demonstrated no great understanding of poverty or intention to relieve it. An essential feature of such a plan must be the provision of an adequate minimum standard of living, including coverage of the actual cost of raising children. We are concerned that obvious steps to realize this now, under existing programs, have not been taken. In terms of present performance, a new plan seems to offer only the hope of uninvestigated Guaranteed Annual Poverty.

30. Listed in order of priority we recommend that:

I. Substantial increase be made in Family and Youth Allowances.

We observe that most of the working poor are poor because they have children, and we believe that Family Allowances in amounts representing a substantial proportion of the cost of raising children are necessary so that children do not impoverish their families merely by their existence. We favour the use of the existing universal program with modifications in the income tax program to recover benefits from families who do not need them.⁴ We believe that recovery should not aim to stop benefits just above the "poverty line" but that some help with the cost of children might be extended into the middle income group.

We suggest that this use of Family and Youth Allowances could provide for most of Canada's working families the essential features of a Guaranteed Annual Income Plan, and is a natural forerunner to such a plan.

We suggest also that substantial Family Allowances could largely eliminate current problems in Municipal Welfare Administration resulting from the disparity between wages and welfare rates for larger families. Existing welfare rates are already higher for these families than going wages for many jobs. Welfare rates for larger families tend to be kept down to minimize this disparity. Very needy working families living on less than a welfare level of income are refused supplementary assistance on the grounds that welfare is not intended to supplement wages, and if they do get on welfare through unemployment or illness, find the prospect of reduced income a distinctly negative work incentive. However, if a substantial proportion of the income of larger families were already derived from Family and Youth Allowances, additional welfare provision for them would rarely have to be higher than the wage, and the disparity would be eliminated. Moreover, there would be little need for the wasteful pattern of supplementing unemployment insurance with welfare benefits, and much less need for extensive readjustments of the various compulsory insurance programs that currently impose a direct tax upon the working poor.

II. Government insurance plans be extended to protect more adequately working families from common hazards which may impoverish them. Specifically:

The extension of medical insurance to include the cost of drugs and dental care.

The extension of hospital insurance to include nursing home care.

The improvement of unemployment insurance to provide benefits that will cover essential living costs, and due adjustments in rates according to family size.

III. Pending the implementation of a more fundamental incomes policy, families who are already poor should not be subject to direct taxation.

Virtually all working poor are subject to some form of direct taxation, in addition to their share of indirect taxes. This is totally inconsistent with any intent to alleviate poverty. We are thinking not only of income tax, but of the other compulsory wage deductions, including "insurances" and pension plans, and even union dues, which taken together usually amount to the bulk of pay deductions, from the working poor. Exemption from income tax alone provides only a partial answer, and means must be found to make premium or other adjustments in the light of family size in all Federal and Provincial programs.

IV. Federal and Provincial Governments make every effort to increase our stock of public housing.

It is difficult to make a recommendation with respect to the complex problem of housing, although we find that it contributes vastly to impoverishment and hardship. We realize that to a considerable extent the "housing problem" is simply one aspect of poverty. Poor persons cannot afford to pay a fair going rate for the housing they need. To the extent this is so, the housing problem will be reduced as poverty is reduced.

In Toronto, however, and to some extent in other urban centers, a complex of circumstances has greatly inflated the price of land, and other circumstances prevent the building of the most economical family dwellings. The price of housing is being forced out of the range of many persons who would ordinarily not be considered poor. It seems that only government has the power to cut through the circumstances that prevent the building of efficient housing, and the acquisition of land for it. At the same time, unfortunate though it may be, additional money to the poor is more readily available through subsidizing housing costs than through more direct means. We are, therefore, forced to recommend the rapid expansion of public housing although we see the need for many changes in it.

V. Personal bankruptcy be made available to the working poor.

Consumer Credit is an integral part of our way of life. Our culture teaches its use as an ethic. Almost anyone with a wage can use it, and most persons who have children and are not very well off are using it to the point that interest charges are virtually a universal tax on the working poor. Entrapment in hopeless debt is a hazard as common and indiscriminate as any for which protection might be provided through a government "insurance" program. A suitable form of bankruptcy, at limited cost, is a necessary step toward providing protection from this hazard, and should have preventive value as well, as an incentive to more careful lending.

VI. Family planning clinics become a regular and recognized part of public health program.

Although family planning has been given legal sanction, general acceptance has been slow; few clinics have been developed and are not well known. Family planning services should be developed to give all couples freedom of choice in the number and spacing of their children.

I THE DEVELOPMENT OF LEGAL EQUALITY

Equality under the law is the basic precept of our legal system. But the principle has been so often repeated that it has grown to become an obscured platitude. Too frequently it is accepted as a statement of fact known by all rather than the critical-distant objective that it in truth is. It is often ignored that legal equality does not exist or develop in a vacuum but evolves a concomitant result of economic, social, and cultural fulfilment: a goal to which, according to the constitutional white paper¹, we are apparently committed.

"The government of Canada would expect to see certain objectives of Confederation stated in a preamble to the Constitution. These objectives should include the following:

- 3. To promote national economic, social and cultural development and the general welfare and Equality of Opportunity for all Canadians, whatever region they may live, including the opportunity for gainful work for just conditions of employment, for an adequate standard of living, for Security, for Education, and for rest and leisure."^{2,3}

Once these objectives are constitutionally enshrined an interesting result accrues. Because the provision of equality of opportunity assumes the status of a public Duty, it then exists as a Right of the underprivileged (given that rights are the jural corollaries of duties⁴). Equality before the law in terms of the provision of legal representation and counsel in all areas of law as a matter of right, and regardless of economic status, would be a considerable advancement over the charitable keynote attached to current legal aid schemes in many Canadian provinces.

It is however, patently obvious that the mere creation of a public right is no guarantee of it being exercised; particularly as respects the use of legal remedies requiring some legal knowledge and initiation on the part of indigents. It is necessary to bring the law to the poor, for, as the Economic Council of Canada noted in its Fifth Annual Review, part of the definition of poverty includes educational and economic alienation from the society's levers of change.

⁵ Fifth Annual Review, The Challenge of Growth and Change, September, 1968, Queen's Printer, Ottawa

"The problem of poverty in developed industrial societies is increasingly viewed not as a sheer lack of essentials to sustain life, but as an insufficient access to certain goods, services, and conditions of life which are available to everyone else and have come to be accepted as basic to a decent minimum standard of living.

Poverty, thus defined, is not quite the same thing as low income... much more serious and more widespread is the kind of low-income situation that carries with it a sense of entrapment and hopelessness. Even the best statistics can only hint at this. They cannot capture the sour atmosphere or poor health and bad housing—the accumulated defeat, alienation and despair which often so tragically are inherited by the next and succeeding generations."^{6,7}

The economically deprived will continue to have less legal security than other more fortunate citizens until concerted effort is launched to make the remedies afforded by the law physically and financially within reach. Experiences in Ontario⁸ the United Kingdom,⁹ and the United States¹⁰ with various legal assistance programmes amply illustrate the proposition that legal access cannot be given to the poor by the mere lowering of financial qualifications. Educational and national deficiencies must be partially overcome as a precondition to meaningful achievement.

"The shackles that bind to poverty are ignorance of rights, disregard of personal value as a human being, a sense of being abandoned, a conviction of despair as an object manipulated by a system. Lawyers committed to the finest traditions of the bar can speak for the inarticulate, can challenge the systems that generate the cycle of poverty, can arouse the persons of power and affluence."¹¹

II THE POOR, LEGAL ASSISTANCE, AND THE LAW: SOME UNSOLVED PROBLEMS

Ontario's legal aid system is both generous and advanced: a fact given international recognition.¹² But it is inefficient to the extent that its effectiveness wholly depends upon the initiative of applicants. While the statistical precis of the numbers aided is impressive, the utilization of the scheme represents what is probably the "tip of the iceberg". The remaining five-sixths of the actual legal needs of the impoverished in Ontario are submerged and remain unsatisfied.

Law and Poverty 1965,¹³ a working paper prepared for the National Conference on Law and Poverty¹⁴ and co-sponsored by the U.S. Attorney General¹⁵ and the Director of the Office of Economic Opportunity¹⁶ enumerated¹⁷ four factors which deter the full effectiveness of legal aid assistance of the poor. These can be summarized as below, and each no doubt applies as respects the Ontario scheme:

(1) FAILURE OF THE INDIGENT TO CHARACTERIZE A PROBLEM AS LEGAL IN CONTEXT—the study took notice of a prevalence of a "home-made store of superstitious and legal half-truths, usually weighted against his own interests",¹⁸ a generally low comprehension of statutory innovations for his benefit in such areas as consumer protection and urban housing codes, and a general reticence to explore his rights when on the receiving end of a poor bargain¹⁹ or legal action.

(2) LOW VISIBILITY OF EXISTING LEGAL AID SERVICE—the study noted a U.S. survey which indicated that the preponderate number of indigents were unaware of legal aid, and that fewer still aware of how to obtain it. This difficulty probably does not exist to the same degree in Ontario where legal aid has received much public acclaim, but no doubt exists in other provinces. However even in Ontario there may be significant deficiencies in respect to community knowledge of when legal aid is available and when it is not.

(3) REMOTENESS OF THE LAWYER AND HIS SERVICES—the impoverished will "court exploitation to bypass exposure to all unfamiliar milieu or a social snub",²⁰ and for this reason proximate neighbourhood connections are mandatory in order to significantly translate the problems later-tly within a depressed area into legalistic solutions. The working poor is apt to be less able to leave his employment during normal working hours and will therefore require off-hour access to legal services.

(4) FEAR OF REPRISAL—in a number of instances the poor may be reluctant to initiate legal actions against those parties causing them the most harm. Landlords are frequently the classic illustration for they are able to respond retributively²¹ when confronted by a tenant attempting to legally assert his rights. Creditors and welfare administrators are other examples.

Thus, for the reasons above, legal aid must first convince the indigent that it can offer a viable alternative to enduring the many legally surmountable hardships attending impoverishment. The poor have been so long without the normal legal protections accorded financially solvent citizens that an active effort is required to demonstrate that legal remedies do exist and are available to them.

A summary of the general areas of public interest that can be directly served by the legal system was given by the Report of a Sub-Committee of the Society of Labour Lawyers of Great Britain.²² It enumerated five general subdivisions:

- (1) representation in criminal proceedings commencing at the point of arrest or summons,
- (2) family law
- (3) other civil legal proceedings including such areas as landlord and tenant relations, personal injury and damage actions in tort, consumer protection and workman's rights,
- (4) distribution of welfare state benefits
- (5) property law including such areas as investment and taxation questions, and income and property conveyancing and distribution.

In each category there is evidence of an inability of past legal aid plans to serve the needs of the impoverished. On the contrary there are indications of intrinsic biases remaining within the administration of the system of law that operate to the detriment of the poor in each general area.

(1) Criminal Law and the Poor

Concerning criminal law, the *Report of the Joint Committee on Legal Aid*²³ of Ontario drew attention to two outstanding disadvantages confronting a prospective criminal defendant who required legal aid.

These were the disposal of bail applications and the extensive use of arrest (ie: as opposed to summons procedure) respectively. The Committee was particularly critical of apparently superficial criterion being employed to determine the question of whether or not to grant bail, and secondly, the type of bail²⁴ granted. It was noted that there is some informal suggestion the "... The man of small or no means is always at a disadvantage"²⁵ and that a more rational criteria to employ might be the 'roots of the community test'²⁶ as opposed to the current over-reliance upon the posting of financial security. The automatic demand for financial security as the surety of release imposes three unnecessary costs upon the system of criminal justice. Firstly, unnecessary confinement can jeopardize an accused's employment status and thereby make him incapable of providing for his dependants, (who may have to resort to welfare assistance as a direct consequence). Secondly, the system must absorb the diseconomies of having to incarcerate an unnecessarily large number of defendants awaiting trial. Thirdly, unnecessary confinement may subvert the entire process of determining guilt or innocence. The Joint Committee outlined this problem as follows:

"There is also the danger that an accused person who is required to find bail on terms that he cannot possibly comply with will be tempted to plead guilty, since the only alternative is to return to custody to await trial. Magistrates, social workers, lawyers, custodial officials, and others stated that the typical reaction of an accused person who has thus been required to remain in custody... is to "get it over with" as soon as possible and return to work and his family."

²⁴There are several possible types of bail: for example cash bail, property bail, bail upon the accused's own recognizance with sureties, and personal recognizance without sureties.

²⁵p. 80 supra note 23

²⁶p. 81 ibid, see also Report of the Canadian Committee on Corrections, p. 99 and passim expressed the view that pre-trial detention was justifiable only where necessary in the public interest to ensure the appearance of the accused at his trial, to protect the public pending the trial of the accused and later, that a defendant perhaps should be denied bail: (A) if previously convicted of an indictable offence while on bail, charged with an indictable offence (within a reasonable time of present application) (B) if previously convicted of absconding (within a reasonable time or present application), if accused has been charged with the commission of an indictable offence while on bail charged with another indictable offence provided the charge appears to be of substance.

²⁷p. 82 ibid.

²²*supra* note 9

²³Province of Ontario, Report of the Joint Committee on Legal Aid, March, 1965.

Thus the indigent accused is not only at an initial disadvantage regarding pre-trial release, but may also, as a result of the discomforts of unnecessary confinement, be deterred from exercising his right to contest his case. The consequence, where this is the case, can only be for the accused to adopt a somewhat cynical view of an apparently discriminatory law.

An expanded employment of summons procedure as proposed to arrest is a potential device through which a problem of bail vis-à-vis the poor could be mitigated. The decision however between either procedure, by and large, is the police officer's prerogative. His duty to ensure the appearance of the accused at trial makes the increased use of the summons an unlikely solution to the bail problem. Further, experience could seem to imply that the police often make use of arrest detention, coupled with the inability of the defendant to obtain instant legal aid at every centre of confinement as a means of extracting statements against his interest contrary to the Judges' Rules,²⁸ and the intent of s. 2 (c) (1) of the Canadian Bill of Rights.²⁹ Commenting on Ontario's Legal Aid, Professor G.E. Parker expressed the view that:

"Even if the Ontario police would resent the presence of counsel at the interrogation stage, there seems little reason for not providing some assistance in arranging bail in the police station—particularly during the night when no duty counsel is provided."³⁰

The Report of The Canadian Committee on Corrections in this regard noted that:

"... The right of a person under arrest to consult counsel without delay, recognized by the bill of rights as a fundamental right, should be spelled out more fully in a section of the criminal code dealing with the rights of an accused upon arrest."³¹

The above factors however should not cast a poor reflection on the very significant advances made by the Ontario legal aid scheme with respect to indigent criminal defendants. For the year ending March 31, 1968 for example, 18,502 certificates of eligibility for criminal legal aid had been issued, and an additional 52,668 accused had been assisted by Duty Counsel in Ontario.³²

²⁸The Judges' Rules require a police officer to administer a caution to the accused when charged, but he is not obliged to say anything in answer to the charge, but in the event of his doing so his statement may be reduced to writing and given in evidence.

(2) & (3) Family and Civil Law and the Poor

There are more serious reservations about the effectiveness of many legal aid programmes as concerns civil law matters. The backlog of experience in the United Kingdom, for example, has tempted some to assert that the only prevalent civil legal aid problems of the poor are in the area of matrimonial proceedings. In effect they argue that otherwise the poor are confronted by inherently non-legal psychological, social, and economic problems beyond the scope of the law. The conclusion is a naïve one (despite such records as 80:20 ratios of matrimonial applications to other proceedings),³³ for it takes no account of the fact that this is one area where the legal ramifications are easy to characterize and further, the law has a near monopoly on available solutions. Thus, in order to settle his marital difficulties the indigent is forced to employ the law despite his possible distrust of it.

In consumer or landlord and tenant disputes he is not under this compulsion to resort to the law, and may not press those legal rights available to him even when aware of them.

This Committee has already heard testimony³⁴ recounting the plight of low income consumers. Of perhaps particular note was the comment:

"The general cast of mind of many low income consumers... leaves them vulnerable to misleading advertising, high pressure salesmanship and fraud. Failure to compute per unit prices can easily result in paying unnecessarily high prices. Impatience with printed matter or an inability to read printed instructions on packages or drugs or household chemicals (bleaches, detergents, cleaning compounds) may result in personal injury or damage to clothes or furniture. Inadequate incomes, frequently implying a lack of ready cash, means an inability to economize by buying in larger quantities or by taking advantage of special offers and bargain prices."³⁵

The area of consumer protection classically illustrates the argument that one-half of the battle to give a degree of legal equality are measures to acquaint the indigents of their legal rights and remedies available. In this context the suggestion of the Consumer and Corporate Affairs Brief that provincial and municipal welfare agencies, labour unions, and other community-minded organizations offer consumer educational programmes has a great deal of positive merit in the sense of aiding the poor to make use of new statutory protections as they arise, as well as the implied warran-tees of reasonable fitness and merchantable quality imported by the common law.

Landlord and tenant relations are another classic area where the poor have misapprehensions about the law, and often are incredibly exploited as a consequence. Illegal eviction, assault, illegal distraint of possessions, and deliberate annoyance are all too frequent occurrences, which contravene the spirit of the few protections that are to be found in the provincial Landlord and Tenants Acts. To permit these rights to be signed away by a tenant is a shameful adherence to a wholly unrealistic concept of bargaining. Clearly the poor do not have equality of bargaining power over leasehold terms. In a majority of cases the lease isn't apt to be read with any true sense of appreciation of its implications. An even more flagrant abuse of tenant rights is to be found in the purported licensee agreements which are aimed at a total undermining of those few rights which are appurtenant to a tenancy for term. An example of such an agreement has been included in the appendix for your examination.

Unlike the other areas of law considered infra and supra, the more that a tenant is aware of the state of the law, the less will be his willingness to employ the law. The landlord in most cases will be able to enforce a retaliatory eviction far faster than will a tenant be able to enforce a right. So soon as a hint of legal action is given, the landlord is in the position of making the tenant into a trespasser by way of serving a notice to quit effective prior to the legal action taking place. This is hardly equitable in the eyes of the poor, and not conducive towards great respect of the law which, in this area, seems to countenance only the best interests of the landlord.

(4) Welfare Administration and the Poor

The administration of welfare is another area where the poor may suffer as a result of ignorance of the law. Even in instances when this is not so, a recipient may be reluctant to press for his full rights out of fear of retaliatory disentanglements. It would appear that welfare officials can exert a considerable amount of pressure upon recipients as a result of having wide discretion over the question of granting assistance. An example are the examination procedures employed by the various departments to ensure that an applicant is in fact not obtaining support. One of the more controversial methods are midnight inspection raids of the premises of female recipients to ensure that "the man in the house rule" has not been violated. A second illustration are reports³⁶ of welfare authorities refusing to continue granting welfare to a deserted woman who will not swear an information against the spouse and bring an action in support.

(5) Consultative and Preventative Law and the Poor

As regards questions of property, the general use of a lawyer's talent to settle questions of disposal, real transfers, taxation questions, and so on, are a luxury exclusive of indigents. Once more the reasons for this are threefold: The inability of the indigent to characterize such problems as legal in character, their alienation from legal services, and the cost of such services. The situation is quite unlike the case of middle and upper income levels. Here the lawyer's function is more akin to a general family counsel. His services are sought in relation to a whole series of problems confronting family members. In the majority of instances litigation is not contemplated. In fact the lawyer's expertise is often evoked as a preventative measure against future court disputes. The indigent citizen, on the other hand, rarely comes into contact with the law except after the fact of being charged, or after his wages have been garnisheed, or after the bailiff has repossessed his property. In large measure Most Legal Aid Schemes are Remedial or Litigation Oriented and Do Not Afford the Preventative-Advisory services that are Readily Available to the High Income Levels.

III THE GENERATION OF JURISDICTION: THE COMMUNITY LEGAL CENTRE

The litigation-bias of current legal aid assistance is not a fault of itself. The numbers³⁷ who have made use of this service indicate a need that is obvious. But it is respectfully contended that the mere fact that a scheme such as Ontario's can be shown to have a statistical success is no proof of its ability to have satisfied the legal needs of provincial indigents. For the reasons outlined in the above section, it is submitted that legal aid for litigants is no more than one necessary component of a comprehensive scheme that is required in order to bring the full benefits of the law to the impoverished. Recommendations for innovations for an improved scheme would be basically sixfold:

- (1) the establishment of community legal aid centres
- (2) an active stance with respect to probing and attempting to solve the legal needs of the poor
- (3) a broader range of service offerings,
- (4) integration with existing community aid efforts,
- (5) evening service
- (6) eventual adoption of statutory provisions defining a broader range of duty with respect to serving legal problems of the poor.

Each of these suggested improvements are described in greater detail infra.

³⁷ supra note 32.

1) Community Legal Aid Centres

The advantages of establishing community service outlets, in light of the preceding discussion, is as follows: Firstly, with legal assistance close at hand there is often a formidable transportation barrier facing indigents requiring legal aid is eliminated. Secondly, the time the lawyer will be less remote a figure, with his services becoming identifiable with local interests, and his expertise will seem that much more accessible. Thirdly, the community office will give first hand information-feedback as to the needs of the poor and the success of the legal assistance. From the point of view of the profession and the legal system as a whole, vis à vis the question of group alienation from the law, the benefits of this result are potentially enormous. Fourthly, a community legal centre brings a higher visibility to legal assistance and hopefully will stimulate a greater utilization of its potential.

2) Active Posture of Legal Assistance

Because ignorance of legal rights and remedies often pervades depressed areas, it is suggested that an expanded scheme must assume a more aggressive character in at least two respects. In the First case, efforts should be made to educate and counsel on a preventative basis as to legal rights even where there are no overtly identifiable legal problems. The mediums for such an educational campaign should not be in anyway limited. They should cover the entire gambit from mass communication to community seminars or briefings. Printed material such as has been included in the attached appendix with respect to tenant rights is perhaps a worthwhile technique. The creation of "Help wanted" columns such as appears in the Toronto Daily Star, and its equivalents in newspapers across Canada demonstrate the demand for such information (and, in addition, perhaps suggest that existing legal assistance is not comprehensive enough). Secondly, extensive advertising space and time should be devoted to informing indigents of the locale of available service in the various areas.

3) A Broad Range of Service Offerings

Widespread dissemination of information as to the availability of legal assistance in the community must be complemented by a growth over time of community confidence in the service. It is felt that this can only be achieved by granting it the ability to deal with a diversity of needs (viz: the five categories of legal interest discussed on p. 6 supra). Also, such centres should be staffed ideally with the most highly qualified practitioners from the profession and can be persuaded to undertake the tasks. They should not be manned exclusively or preponderately by students nor junior members of the bar. The former are concerned principally with educational benefits they can extract and not maximizing the number of landlord and tenant disputes litigated or settled each year.³⁸ Further, exclusive use of students and junior practitioners may give an appearance of a 'second best charity service', and, it is suggested, Appearance may work a very real impact upon the success of localized assistance centres.

4) & 5) Increased Office Hours and Service Coordination with other Community Organizations

The fifth recommendation works hand in glove with creating greater local confidence as well as heightening local information about the new service. This concerns the integration of service functions between various welfare-oriented organizations servicing a locality in common. Some attempt should be made to ensure that each is aware of the other and that their functions are complementary. In many cases information exchanges, cross-referrals, and programming of complementary office hours, if not offices, and staff, will give a macrosystem benefit vis à vis community welfare operations as a whole.

6) Statutory Expansion of the Duties of a Legal Aid Programme

The sixth recommendation, that broader legal aid exist as a matter of right, is consistent with the position that a needless aura of charity will serve only to delete the worth and general efficiency of community programmes. If the society is to profess legal equality to be the fundamental premise of the Nation's laws, then steps should be taken to create broad legal assistance as a right appurtenant to citizenship, and not conditional upon financial status. Otherwise the law is indeed the "Sham" Health Minister Munro suggested³⁹

"I suggest that the law in Canada, for many of today's lawyers, has become a sham—as well as a shame to those outside the profession. I contend that instead of practicing law to defend the weaker members of one society from exploitation, instead of conceiving of the law as a bulwark against the rule of the jungle, many of us are using law to enable the rich to get richer, and the corrupt to become more powerful."⁴⁰

It is suggested that community-oriented legal assistance centres, legislatively empowered to actively represent the Nation's poor are the only apparent means of "Democratizing Justice" for it would seem to be the sole means by which the jurisdiction of law can be expanded so as to embrace the interests of the economically less fortunate.

³⁸Out of the total of 443 cases referred to the Osgoode Hall Law School Student Defender Programme, over the period September 4, 1968, to February 21, 1969, Landlord and Tenant cases accounted for a total of 31.5%.

IV PUBLIC OR PRIVATE CONTROL?

Broad legal assistance schemes entailing spatial decentralization of the sort envisaged by this brief has given rise to a certain amount of criticism: particularly from within the profession itself. Such a strong and often critical reaction is understandable in the sense that decentralism imports diseconomies upon professional control. It is often argued this will cause potential damage to the legal system. For example are inevitable difficulties over the controls of professional conduct, many of which are to the benefit of the public en masse.

On the other hand, some⁴¹ see the reduced internal professional control to be a step towards eliminating a frequent criticism of the law: namely that It is Ruled by an Antiquated Guild System too Introspective with Respect to its Own Form, Prestige, Salary Scale, and Power, and too Unresponsive Towards the Consumers' Needs in the Real World. Thus it is suggested⁴² that some intervening public pre-emption of the monopoly of control asserted by the various provincial law societies is merely the price "... of reenfranchising individuals with respect to the internal management of community affairs⁴³." Such an argument assumes, because of the unrepresentative nature of the profession, the Courts are unlikely to give broader community access to the protections of law: in particular to the underprivileged. At least one Canadian⁴⁴ commentator would appear to share this view:

"... the highest court in the land, the supreme court of Canada, has refused to emulate the United States Supreme Court by applying the so-called Canadian Bill of Rights to problems of the right to counsel so that the deprived accused would be acquitted automatically when due process was denied..."

Canadians have always tended to solve their problems other than by the direct approach to the courts in reliance on a constitutional document. Instead the country has looked to its civil service and the omnipresent Royal Commission or Departmental Committee⁴⁵."

Legislative enactment however does not stand as the uncontradicted solution towards making the legal system (and lawyers in particular) more sympathetic to the public interests⁴⁶. This follows for perhaps three reasons. In the First case are Constitutional problems with respect to a standardized Nation-wide legal aid scheme to cover civil as well as criminal matters⁴⁷. The Second objection was most succinctly cited in the U.K. Society of Labour Lawyers Subcommittee Report.

"It is axiomatic that the rule of law can only be maintained by a judiciary which is independent of both the legislative and the executive. An independent judiciary in turn Presupposes Independent Solicitors Being Officers of the Court and not of the Executive. The Individual's Right to Independent Legal Advice is Therefore Fundamental to Freedom."^{48, 49}

In practical effect the argument suggests that a public scheme of legal assistance, unless given guaranteed independence (such as is ensured by the Law Society's administration of legal aid in Ontario) is untenable due to the priority of a system of "checks and balances" afforded by an independent legal system. The above-named U.K. report held to this position that this problem was surmountable. Recent U.S. experience with regard to state cancellations of the Office of Economic Opportunity's Legal Service Projects in retaliation for actions taken on behalf of citizens seeking welfare under the State programmes⁵⁰ would suggest that the problem is a serious one (not that professional representative capacity on behalf of indigent causes may well be inhibited via government action).

A Third, and final objection against resort to a publically-sponsored scheme of defenders is that, in at least the case of the Ontario Law Society's design control, and operation of the province's legal aid scheme, there is no a priori reason to assume that the Law Societies are not well capable of incorporating a more advanced community-oriented legal assistance scheme such as this brief has attempted to describe.

The only outstanding issue is whether there exists the impetus within the profession to effect such dramatic changes that this paper suggests are necessary in order to meet the needs of the economically deprived. It may prove necessary for example to alter professional ethics so as to accommodate the more active role required of lawyers in depressed areas. has been argued that the Canons of Ethics of the profession currently constrain behavior precipitous litigation even when in reference to gratuitous service. At issue in Ontario's case is the Law Society's Rules which in part, reads as follows:

Section 1 (4) "It is a crime against the State, therefore, highly non-professional in a lawyer, to stir up strife or litigation by seeking out defects in titles, claims for personal injury or other causes of action for the purpose of securing or endeavouring to secure a retainer to prosecute a claim therefore: or to pay or regard directly or indirectly any person, for the purpose of procuring him to be retained in his professional capacity."⁵¹

The precise meaning of Ruling One, section 1, sub-section (4) is somewhat obscure in that it appears to be directed against those who would stimulate causes of action for the primary purpose of remuneration, and at the same time can be construed to prevent the stirring up of strife where the lawyer may have no pecuniary interest. It is further an issue whether "the stirring up of strife" embraces the sort of educational programmes recommended in this brief and is therefore pre-emptory. It has been suggested that Ruling 18 provides a complete answer to this question.

Ruling 18 Touting Advertising and Attracting Business Unfairly

Notwithstanding anything contained in Ruling 1, no member of the Society or firm of members shall engage in any activity for the purpose of touting or advertising his practice or otherwise attracting clients unfairly.⁵²

Further at issue is Ruling One, Section Three, sub-section (3) which provides:

(3) "Whenever the controversy will admit of fair adjustment the client should be advised to 'avoid or to end the litigation'."⁵³

Does this prevent, for example, advising an indigent client to pursue his cause, in face of offers of settlement, when it appears to have value as a test case? In instances this would seem to necessitate a potential sacrificing of many in the interests of one, and undermining the objective of efficient legal assistance of the poor class. Further, would advice given by a lawyer to press the claim or cause of action in face of settlement offers be contrary to the prohibition against stirring up litigation in Ruling One, Section 1, sub-section (4) as well as Section 3, sub-section (3)?

There is also the question of the professional interests of lawyers who have established practices in poor areas. It has been argued⁵⁴ that they would find specialized legal assistance centers objectionable.⁵⁵ It can, on the contrary, be argued that legal centres in their area would not only do such firms no harm, but be of financial advantage to them in several respects. Firstly, they would ease the pressure of the considerable number of charity cases that such firms assume and allow them to devote their energies to more lucrative tasks. Secondly, to the extent that such a community programme would heighten indigent awareness of his legal rights it might catalyze more business on behalf of clients than previously. Thirdly, the community offices would presumably not take on the causes of clients capable of paying for the service, who could still patronize local firms.

In summary, it is suggested that, apart from some problems regarding existing rulings of the various law societies, there would seem to be no serious professional objection, prima facie, to the concept of regionally located community legal aid centres. In fact there would seem to be very real advantages to the profession in terms of its declared obligations to the state:

"(the lawyer) owes a duty to the State, to maintain its integrity and its law and not to aid counsel, or assist any man to act in any way contrary to those laws."⁵⁶

As suggested at the onset of this paper one of the functions of the state is the furtherance⁵⁷ of the objective of equal treatment under our system of law; an object which would be well served by the scheme above described.

RECOMMENDATIONS

Community-oriented legal aid programmes would give rise to a number of problems. First, and foremost, active regional assistance centres would be expensive; much more expensive than even the most ambitious of current provincial legal aid efforts. Secondly, the new scheme would be labour-intensive and would no doubt over-tax the profession's labour supplies. Thus it is recommended that:

- (1) The federal government prepare a feasibility study of a 'legal care' system similar in theme to medicare under the Canada Assistance Plan
- (2) the various provincial law societies consider the means by which the professional labour supplies can be augmented
- (3) a joint federal-all province study be made of probable legal needs of indigent areas under an all-service providing legal aid scheme.

Insofar as the second recommendation is concerned two possibilities worth consideration are the possible creation of a system of lay advocates and a greater use of law students. In either case their role should be supportive. In the particular case of law students, their involvement can afford a very valuable clinical training experience of benefit to both themselves and the legal profession as a whole (ie: by way of improving the quality of legal education generally). However it is suggested that it would be an error to leave community-oriented legal aid to the initiative of law students alone. In the first place, owing to the severely constrained labour supply and curricular interests of this quarter of the profession, their involvement can be little more than 'tokenism'. In the second place, to do the needs of the poor justice the resources and skill of the profession as a whole are required.

As regards the third recommendation, it is suggested that the actual legal demands of Canada's poor to date remain empirically unknown. Even the most sophisticated of research designs will give little more than a very probabilistic estimate when applied to an actual survey. But for two reasons it is suggested that such an effort is necessary. In the first case, as a practical political consideration, it is probably necessary to offer some quantitative evidence that existing legal aid measures are only scratching the surface of the legal needs of the poor, in order to build support for such a drastic revision of the character of the legal profession. Secondly it is necessary to have some working estimate of demand in order to properly design and structure the expanded scheme and fulfill the projected skill requirements of such a scheme.

As a final note it is suggested that a view of recent U.S. experience vis à vis urban disturbances, as well as perhaps the recent events in the city of Montreal, imply a demand for expeditious effort at the earliest opportunity. The law affords a means of translating many of the problems facing urban indigents into politically-acceptable solutions via our courts. Where the recourse to law is available it does much to decapitate the frustration which leads to inevitable violence which may not be so politically acceptable.

All of which is respectfully submitted,

Ian Alexander McDougall (Director: Community and Legal Aid Services Programme)

FROM: Special Senate Committee on Poverty.

FROM: National Council of Jewish Women of Canada, Toronto Section,
4700 Bathurst Street,
Willowdale, Ontario.

On behalf of the Toronto Section, National Council of Jewish Women of Canada, it is my pleasure to express the appreciation of the organization for the encouragement received, to bring to the attention of the Special Senate Committee on Poverty the concern of this organization for the poor, who due to their circumstances, have special needs within the Community.

PREAMBLE

The National Council of Jewish Women of Canada, founded in 1893, with a membership of 5,500 women, organized in 13 sections across Canada is dedicated in the spirit of their faith, to furthering human welfare locally, nationally, and internationally through affiliation with the International Council of Jewish Women. Through an integrated program of education, service and social action, it provides essential services and stimulates and educates the individual and community towards their responsibility for participation through personal commitment.

National Council of Jewish Women of Canada, Toronto, has for the past six years been involved in service programs in the Lawrence Heights Community. These programs are educational as well as social and are for the benefit of children (pre-school to school age), teen agers and adults.

ABOUT THE LAWRENCE HEIGHTS COMMUNITY

Lawrence Heights—a low income housing development, was created in 1957 in the Township of North York, in Metropolitan Toronto. This community, constructed at the crossroads of Lawrence Avenue and the Spadina Expressway, should be considered as a segregated geographic unit. Access to the surrounding middle-class, single family dwelling community is limited by physical barriers—A major thoroughfare to the south, institutional buildings to the north, and to the east and west, a fence is the separating line. The Spadina Expressway divides the project into two fairly equal areas.

Ontario Housing Corporation administers the renting. Rent is set at approximately one third of the family's monthly income. Only families of low income are admitted, and priority goes to those with greatest need.

Population of the development is approximately 5,000 persons, 3,000 of whom are school age and pre-school age children. Almost 30% of the families are one-parent, mother-led and 20% to 40% of the families receive social welfare financial assistance. Average income is $70.00 a week.

1. "The family problems found here are no different than can be found throughout the city but are more highly concentrated due to geographic segregation and population density. For some families their major struggle is that of survival because of their low income and the resulting burdens of debt and other accumulative family problems. A large number of families come from the inner city slum areas. Although their housing problem was solved, new problems were created, resulting from the loss of such things as familiar neighbourhoods, second-hand stores, easy access to hospital clinics and the corner pubs. Some complaints which come from the community itself were, and still are, "children are allowed to run wild," "parents do not care about their children" or "families on welfare spend their money on drink."

Residents of the neighbouring area and trades people visiting the community often see a negative image of the project and refer to the community as "The Jungle," "the camp," "poverty village." Such stigma makes the residents feel inferior and adds to the depressing hopeless feelings that are common attributes to alienation.

From the very inception of Lawrence Heights, a concerted effort was made under the leadership of the Social Planning Council of North York, to integrate all the health, welfare and recreation facilities of North York to provide the essential services for the residents and particularly the children.

The National Council of Jewish Women of Canada, Toronto Section, established a junior kindergarten program at Council House (4700 Bathurst St.) to help prepare these youngsters for the regular school program. We are taking the liberty of enclosing the brief on this pre-school program, which was drawn up in October 1965, and presented to the committee on Aims and Objectives, Curriculum Division, Ontario Department of Education. (Enclosure #1)

The pre-school program still continues at Council House, but no longer with the children of the Lawrence Heights Community. At the end of the third year, the North York Board of Education, recognized the need and established a junior kindergarten at the Flemington Road School. At the present time there are 20 Jr. Kindergartens in North York and approximately the same number in Toronto. May we just add in passing that we were heartened to read in, "Living and Learning"—report of the Provincial Committee on Aims and Objectives of Education in the Schools of Ontario recommended solutions 111 and 112 which read as follows:—

111. Permit School boards to establish pre-school programs in accordance with the need of their jurisdiction.

112. Require that all high density housing projects, pre-school and playground accommodation be provided by developers, the cost of such accommodation to be borne by them.

ABOUT THE FLEMINGTON ROAD COMMUNITY SCHOOL.

The Flemington Road Community School which houses most of the children in Lawrence Heights, was the first Community School in North York. It is sponsored by the North York Board of Education and the Department of Recreation.

Under the direction of the Social Service Consultant, the School has endeavoured to extend itself as a partner in Community development in the belief that the School and the resources it represents cannot be separated from the community.

The Community School concept is interpreted to include three main integrated functions:—

- * A. The Community centered Curriculum.
- * B. The Community centre Function.
- * C. The Community Service Function.
- * For further information on development and structure refer to enclosure #2.

National Council of Jewish Women has played an important role in assisting in the establishing of a day care centre in the Lawrence Heights Community.

From the beginning, the problem of day care has been demonstrated as having the highest priority. The problem of 270 single parent families is a particularly difficult one for children and parents in time of illness, family emergencies, essential visits to clinics, doctors, etc. It is too much to expect that neighbours with small children of their own will be able to shoulder this responsibility, although many do help out whenever possible. As we reported in a sociological study on Lawrence Heights—when a parent is ill, it is usually the spouse or the children who do the home-making—this would explain significant amount of absenteeism from school, almost one quarter of them would keep their children home from school for this reason.

In the beginning, the service concentrated on the need of one-parent families where parent sharing is required. (e.g. alcoholic parent, emotionally or physically ill mother.)

Planning for the Day Care Centre started early in the Spring of 1968. A planning committee was formed of representatives of all interested groups and agencies—e.g. Lawrence Heights Family and Child Service, North York Parks and Recreation, Social Service Consultant, Supervisor Child Care (Metro Supervisor Day Nurseries (Provincial), National Council of Jewish Women, District Nurse, Yorkdale Vocational School, Mennonite Brethren Church.

Many months (and many meetings) later, the Lawrence Heights Day Care Centre was licenced as a six month Pilot Project, and opened its doors early in February, 1969.

As well as assisting in the planning of the Day Care Centre, National Council of Jewish Women, also were committed at the onset to assist in the staffing of the project with volunteers. It was our hope at this time that our volunteers would help in the training of community volunteers to eventually take over this service.

An evaluation of the Pilot Project at the end of June, 1969, confirmed the validity of the service and the planning committee recommended that the Day Care Centre apply for relicensing in the fall. The service has now been on-going for five months, with the maximum number of children in attendance almost every day.

ABOUT THE SERVICE

The Day Care Centre operates from 8:45 a.m. through 4:15 p.m., Monday through Friday. Mothers must fill out an application form in advance explaining their need for the service (priority is given to the most needy) children age 2-5 yrs., will be accepted for day care after examination by District Nurse. A maximum of 10 children per day are accepted. Fifty cents per day (or part of day) is the fee. A hot lunch is available to all children.

There is a qualified nursery school teacher (resident volunteer) in attendance at all times and she is assisted by part-time volunteers (all of whom have had previous orientation and training in this area).

The cost of operation is of course minimal, with no rent and no salaries; the main expenses are for equipment, telephone, substitute teacher, supplies hot lunch is supplied to us at a cost of 45¢ per child.

The project is financed at present by a generous grant from a private service organization.

As we had anticipated, community volunteers have gradually replaced the volunteers from our organization and derive satisfaction and pride in helping to operate their own Day Care Centre.

In summation, National Council of Jewish Women involved in Service in many areas in the Lawrence Heights Community:—

1. In the establishing and operating of a Junior Kindergarten and Mothers' program.
2. In the Community School as Student Aids and as resource personnel for many of the interest groups.
3. In the planning and operation of the Lawrence Heights Day Care Centre.

Based on our study, research and experience, the National Council of Jewish Women of Canada, Toronto section respectfully recommends that:—

1. (a) The Federal Government expand its program for day care centres.
- (b) The Federal Government subsidize voluntary non-profit pre-school programs.

- (c) Priority be given to the establishment of therapeutic day care centres in needy areas.
2. (a) The use of volunteers be encouraged especially those volunteers indigenous to the community.
- (b) Facilities and resources within the community be explored and utilized.
3. Recognizing that the Senate Committee on Poverty has been Federally initiated and aware that Education is under Provincial jurisdiction:—

(a) The Federal Government encourage Provincial Departments of Education to institute pre-school programs for disadvantaged children within the school system.

(b) Community schools be an integral part of all communities, but particularly in areas of great need.

APPENDIX "E"

BRIEF TO THE SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON POVERTY

Walter Pitman, M.P.P.

POVERTY

I think it is relevant to suggest that in the 60's, Canada was obsessed with the problem of economic growth. I am convinced that the 1970's will be a decade in which we concern ourselves with more just distribution of our wealth.

We realize now that in spite of our rising standard of living we have not seriously disturbed the social structure—those who dwelt in poverty in 1960—they and their children are still in poverty in the 1970's. We know that these people will be in poverty in 1980 unless we break the "poverty syndrome". We have successfully demolished the myth that a rising Gross National Product will somehow "dribble down" and improve the lot of those at the bottom of the economic level.

The other myth which I think has been dispelled is that education, interpreted in the narrow sense as almost as synonymous with schooling, will solve the problem. The 1960's has seen a massive expansion of educational opportunity. But in spite of greater availability of schooling, we find that those in poverty often have the least success in the early grades, and thus become the drop-outs who soon become the young unemployed. The school, its rules and regulations, its textbooks and materials, its teachers and their attitudes are simply inappropriate for producing a learning situation for a poor child. It is quite obvious that equal access to educational facilities is not equal opportunity. Even if the poor child is retained by the school system, his success, particularly in academic subjects, is often limited. He finds himself relegated to vocational courses which may well prepare him for work skills which will soon be obsolete.

We have put our faith in education as a means of solving society's problems. The race between "education or annihilation" is a false one. We can have education and annihilation, education and unemployment, education and poverty. We cannot expect the school to solve social problems—but it can provide a co-ordinating agency for this purpose.

Poverty can only be defeated if the lines between formal educational activity and the social efforts of the community are removed. Obviously a "Head Start", or "Bootstrap" program involving a nurse, school experience, combined with special activities in the early grades of elementary school would be an advantage. But such narrowly educational thrust will not succeed until we knit the school into the efforts of the total community. The school has been viewed in isolation—interaction with community is rare and sporadic. As a result principals and teachers who have had little experience in understanding the poverty subculture, spend little time reaching out to parents, particularly those of the poor.

The school is regarded by poor parents not as a hope for the children, but a threat to the home. Parents of low income homes are the least likely to understand what is going on in the school, the nature of the course materials, and the changes in curriculum. The parents are the most reluctant to visit the school and speak to the teachers and principal, because for them the school is a place of humiliation and failure. The school has exacerbated the generation gap between parents and children, but in degree the low income parents are the worst off.

It has been the nature of the school system that much effort is put into educational programs—but little effort is put into engaging the parents in such program. Perhaps it is more than merely holding meetings or seminars, or workshops, but will demand participation. A program of providing mothers of low-income families with suitable training in order that they can carry out low skill activities in school classrooms, cafeterias, play-rooms, libraries, might be an effective way of knitting home and school together in the interest of the student. A small addition to the family finances for such service would be appropriate.

Before such programs could be successful and effective, teacher education courses would have to stress some understanding of and sensitivity to the problems facing those in poverty. One might hope that, in the Province of Ontario, where responsibility for teacher education is placed in the university, that the result might be that teacher candidates might have the opportunity to take courses in economics, psychpsychology and sociology, with a special emphasis on the educational and social needs of low-income families.

The lack of services for emotionally disturbed children and those with learning disabilities in schools across Canada are more serious for the children of the poor for the simple reason that other compensations which are available to the well-to-do are non-existent for the low-income family.

One of the reasons making assistance to the poor less successful has been the considerable lack of co-ordination between the various agencies which come into contact with poor people for one reason or another. I am sure the Committee has heard harrowing tales of low-income families being passed from Family Counselling to Children's Aid, to Salvation Army to various authorities—each dealing only with one of the many problems facing the family, and each failing because of the multi-problem nature of the family's situation. The role of the school is often even more neglected than either the government or charitable agency. Too often the problems of the child who is poor are comprehended only in the most unsophisticated fashion.

The creation of the community school which is a centre for the parents and other adults, not only to engage in sports and recreation, but in the arts, theatre, and adult education in the evenings and on week-ends, is particularly important. It must be as well a place where tenant groups or any assembly of people who wish to initiate community action can gather. The school will thus become aligned with the problems of the community—and particularly those of the economically deprived. The children and parents of low-income families come to see the school as "their school", not the local outpost of the Establishment.

And surely the school and the social agency can co-ordinate their work more effectively. It means more than providing school psychologists and social workers, it means providing support not to a student from a poor family — but to the family as a unit. Many communities have co-ordinated their charitable agencies along with the municipal and provincial welfare services into a "problem family" approach. The school might provide the focus for identifying, isolating and assessing the family — as well as a place where recreation, therapy and a spectrum of services could be made available. An office for "co-ordinated services" could be accommodated in the school itself. The statement that "The rich have money, and the poor have children" is not devoid of insight. The school has jurisdiction over a limited geographical area. The poor who do not have children will soon be identified and brought into any comprehensive program. The school building is perhaps the single edifice which represents the public interest in every community — it can become the vital force in our society. In an age where de-centralization of services for the purpose of providing more flexible, community-initiated and participatory emphasis is increasing, the school is unique and unparalleled both as an edifice and as an institution.

I am suggesting that the school as a narrow educational institution can do little to alleviate poverty in Canada. If the school becomes associated with the supportive activities of the total community, if it can change its program to accommodate the needs of low-income children and their parents, I think great strides can be made.

As the Committee will have realized, most of the recommendations contained in this brief involve provincial jurisdiction. However, the Federal Government has already shown its interest in education in its evident sense to include Manpower Training, support for university students, and a plethora of educational purposes. A national effort to end poverty will demand more than a new national welfare policy or a national guaranteed income. It will demand an infusion of national resources into the educational systems of each province to combat an evil which, if allowed to continue, will undermine not only our economic but our moral strength as well.

It is likely that the second major development of the 1970's will be that of fashioning our environment and ending the source of pollution. We have seen recent efforts to cut through constitutional niceties in this area. Education is enshrined in the B.N.A. Act as a provincial responsibility. However, unemployment and manpower re-training has probed the relevance of such single jurisdictional responsibility. The success with which we explore the flexibility of our constitution in the struggle to give a better life to those who today dwell in poverty will determine the quality of our national life.

APPENDIX "F"

BRIEF TO THE SENATE COMMITTEE ON POVERTY
BY THE ST. CHRISTOPHER HOUSE

March, 1970

St. Christopher House is a neighbourhood centre that has been located in this building for over 50 years. Traditionally, St. Christopher House has reached out to help those in need of health, welfare, recreational and educational services through innovative programs such as clinics, camps, English classes, Music and Nursery schools, to mention only a few.

St. Christopher House draws its members from a broader geographical area than the two Urban Renewal areas that have been designated the Alexandra Park Urban Renewal Area and the Kensington Urban Renewal Areas.

The distance which members travel to receive services varies directly with the age of the members. This means that most children come from these two Urban Renewal areas, but teens and adults tend to come from a broader district.

Before the renewal took place, Alexandra Park was previously comprised of owner occupied housing, owned by middle-aged Ukrainian, Polish and other European families. Many of these homes included older European men as roomers and boarders. There were also small clusters of newly arrived Portuguese families. The tenants of that time made up about a quarter of the residents and were mainly second and third generation Canadians. That housing has now been replaced with over 500 units most of which is administered by the Ontario Housing Corporation. About 300 units are for Senior Citizens. While most of the family units are suitable for large family groupings, there are very few Portuguese or other immigrants who apply for occupancy in these new dwellings. There is probably a higher proportion of single parent families than existed previously. Furthermore, there has been a similar change in the ethnic origins of the older adults most of whom now reside in the Senior Citizen building.

The Kensington Area has a great variety of ethnic groups occupying the housing. There are remnants of the Ukrainian, Jewish and Italian groups that once occupied this area. The primary group that now resides are from the Azore Islands of Portugal. There are also signs of an increasing number of Chinese moving across from the east side of Spadina Avenue.

In both areas there has always been a noticeable number of Negro families. While the proportion has not changed noticeably for many years, the number of immigrants from the West Indies has increased within the last few years.

We wish to point out that in the past ten years, St. Christopher House has made a great effort, through Community development programs to encourage the neighbours to speak on their own behalf about their own problems. After all, some of them have been here almost as long as the agency and certainly longer than the Staff and Board members of the Agency.

Our agency brief, then, will focus upon the problem of poverty that have been brought by some of the neighbours to the Staff of St. Christopher House. It is important to note that these problems do not necessarily express the concerns of the total or even the majority of the residents of this area as we do not pretend to have had direct contact with all the residents living in our area.

We shall present our remarks under the following headings of a) immigrants, b) families, c) youth and d) the aged.

a) Immigrants

Of the 30 full-time staff in St. Christopher House, more than half have immigrated to Canada in their adult years. They have come from Britain, Egypt, Germany, Goa, Guyana, Jamaica, the Netherlands, Portugal, South Africa, The Ukraine, and the United States; presently two others are married to immigrants from Italy and Mexico. The remarks made herein, therefore, not only reflect upon the experiences of the people of our neighbourhood, but also upon those of our staff and their many immigrant friends.

The problems outlined below are encountered at any income level, but they are more upsetting to the immigrant in the low income area because he has more likely come to the country with fewer financial and language resources and often has a family to support immediately.

One of the greatest needs for immigrants is the improvement of information services of Canadian Government in their land of origin. For too often, the immigrant is given a marvellous "sales pitch" on the wealth and opportunities in Canada without being informed of the accompanying problems that he will encounter.

The representatives of the various ethnic organization, who have experienced the effects of the inadequate information services, should be asked to help prepare information for pamphlets that should be given out through the Federal Immigration Department in their country of origin.

The Immigrant is not sufficiently informed of the relative high cost of living that accompanies higher wages. Nor is it clearly stated that his educational and employment standards will likely be down-graded; that employers will require that he have "Canadian experience" before he starts working at his trade. These requirements mean that he has to take employment at some lesser level until he has been able to complete the "up-grading" which can be anything ranging from English classes to a Master's degree in engineering. While most immigrants are able to maintain themselves and their families at a level of income with which they are satisfied, there are cases of hardship due to employment layoffs and illness.

In such cases, the financial resources that are available to immigrants who encounter hardships are from government sources. However, for a variety of complex reasons, the immigrant is reluctant to seek help from these Government offices. Furthermore, the interpreting services available in most public agencies are disgracefully inadequate. As a result, the local Churches, social agencies and to a great extent private businesses are turned to for advice and support. The fact that the first two receive little Government support in relation to their total expenses places a great burden upon them and limits considerably the amount of assistance they in turn may give. Moreover, the increased demands by immigrants causes some resentment from the non-immigrants who see a disproportionate amount of time being spent with them.

The case of Mr. "X" (see Appendix 'A') illustrates the type of unnecessary difficulties encountered by the immigrant (or for that matter the non-immigrant) because of inadequate information and co-ordination of government services.

RECOMMENDATIONS:

1. that the Department of Immigration take steps to improve the information services at their offices in foreign countries to ensure that prospective immigrants are informed of the difficulties they will encounter as well as the wealth they may anticipate in Canada; that the Department gather the appropriate information from existing organizations that represent immigrants.

2. that the Federal Government takes steps to co-ordinate related Government social and educational services at least at the municipal and perhaps at the community level; the recommendations of the Winnipeg Social Service Audit regarding public "Community Health and Welfare Centres" have some merits;
3. that the various Governments increase tuition and living grants to immigrants to allow them to "survive" while they complete up-grading skills and training to enable them to obtain employment in the area of their competence;
4. that all levels of government improve their interpreting and translation services immediately using the many trained and competent immigrants now employed at much lower levels; that consideration be given to providing funds to churches and social agencies who now provide these services.

b) Families

The housing for large families in this area is basically good. The relocating of families into the public housing units was handled very well by the various governmental authorities. There are numerous problems in the regulations by the Ontario Housing Authority which may be discussed by the tenants themselves. One difficulty which we would like to raise is the restrictions on family earnings which limit the incentives of families who wish to increase their incomes to meet rising costs.

Let us take the experience of the family in public housing for instance, which is having difficulty living on father's income which is climbing slowly in comparison with the cost of living index. Perhaps mother is able to take a part-time job to supplement her husband's salary. Immediately the federal government takes a bit off for income tax, the provincial government takes its bit for extra rent and the municipality may get some for the costs of day care for one or two of the children. Neighbouring public housing mothers are not convenient for day care because if they accept payments, they too will have their rents raised. The amount that remains as disposable income turns out to be only a small proportion of the wages. The emotional pressure this places upon the family adds another element to the problem.

Compare this case with the family on higher income in a private apartment who takes the same steps towards increasing earnings. Increased income may be comparable, rent remains stable and baby-sitting might be found through a relative or neighbour that lives close by.

Certain aspects of this problem also apply when older teenagers who live in public housing unit get a job. We have known of situations where these young people have moved out of the home because it is cheaper for them to provide their own room and board than to pay it to their parents. Thus government regulations create family breakdown.

The statement that the "poor pay more" is a fact. The lack of surplus of fund prevent families from availing themselves of such "money-saving" equipment as sewing machines and freezers. Furthermore, the purchase of second hand electrical appliances and sub-standard clothing increases costs because repairs and replacement are more frequent than for expensive equipment.

The need for day care services for non-working mothers as well as for working mothers is necessary in areas of large families and dense population. Again, to compare with families of higher incomes there are no opportunities such as Settlement House programmes for mothers to get away from their families at regular interval. Such outlets of relief from the pressures of child rearing in our increasingly complex society are essential.

In some cases of larger families the eldest child is given the responsibility of looking after the younger family members while both parents work. This type of circumstance can put these elder youngster under great strain and add to family breakdown. Again, we have encountered experiences where the elder children have left school or home early in order to be relieved of such pressures.

RECOMMENDATIONS:

5. that the regulations of government authorities relating to working mothers and teens be co-ordinated and revised in such a way that those who wish to work can perceive an advantage in so doing;
6. that day care programs for non-working mothers and working mothers be set up in densely populated areas of low income families to relieve some of the increasing tensions of family; such centres might well be partially staffed by students from nursery education and child care courses.

c) Youth

When the public housing units for large families were constructed in Alexandra Park there were plans for the extension of the existing elementary school. Most of the new residents have now been living in the units for two years and some even for three years. Yet the extension to the building has not yet been started. The delay in such a development has placed a great deal of stress on the classrooms and the children in that school which now has over 1500 pupils enrolled.

The special needs of immigrant children who need to learn English at an early age and the children on low incomes where books and educational toys are a luxury should be foremost in the priorities of educational programs. Instead, there is only room for a few junior kindergarten class in the local elementary schools because of the shortage of space. This is another example of the lack of co-ordinated planning between the various governmental departments.

With the imposition of a "needs test" upon the parents of the St. Christopher House in order to comply with the requirements of the Canada Assistance Plan, it appeared that the Nursery School of St. Christopher House would also be seriously stifled. However, the solidarity between the staff and the nursery parents was instrumental in putting the nursery school back on a solid financial basis. We are still embarrassed to force the parents to submit to this very extensive test of their financial need as it interferes seriously with the establishment of warm, neighbourly relationships that has been a key to our service to the community.

There are also special needs related to education that our older children have in this community. Due to the fact that neither the parents nor the teens themselves are aware of the trend of future employment opportunities, there is a special need for guidance counselling and upgrading programs for these youngsters. The number of school guidance counsellors is very seriously lacking for our youngsters. There are certain cases where youngsters with at least an average ability have not even developed appropriate reading skills, let alone having learned a marketable trade. Such youngsters have little hope of being gainfully employed in our society.

The youthful immigrant, who is streamed into the technical trades and vocational courses where there is limited opportunity for switching up into academic courses as his language and other cultural skills develop, often drops out through frustration. The types of courses that have been developed in other countries which allow youngsters to undertake this upgrading without serious sacrifices on their part should be adopted in Canada.

Furthermore, in school the development of studies should take into consideration the differences in cultures and interests in different ethnic areas. It would seem more appropriate for example, for our students to study "the development of Italian leadership in Toronto union" rather than "the rise and fall of the Roman Empire".

The worship of affluence is reflected in the anti-social experiences of some youths with whom St. Christopher House has considerable contact. The essence of this experience is the effect of the constant pressure imposed upon our young "have-nots" to have more of what everyone else has. Every day our youngsters are deluged with mass media advertising which say:

"To succeed – you must dress sharp; wear the latest styles"

"To be a man – you must drive the fastest car"

"To live – you must experience the latest at the newest night spot"

"You must – because everyone else does – don't wait till you have the money... get it now!"

Nothing was ever mentioned in the advertisements about the penalty for car theft being 10 days or $30.00 and that a conviction for this offence would prevent you from being bonded for life. Perhaps they ignored this because it was really intended "for the affluent only". Most affluent youth could test out a car legally, or if they did choose to "joy ride" they might never come to court and would most certainly pay the fine rather than spend 10 days in jail.

Even those youngsters who do achieve post-high school education sometimes have to continue to fight an up-hill battle to keep their heads above water – not academically, but financially. Take the case of the student on a government assistance income whose living allowance was terminated after reaching the 21st birthday. The only solution was to take a $600/ year loan. Granted this is interest free for the first 6 months after graduation. However, can anyone imagine what a burden this loan will be after two years of under graduate studies and then another two or three years graduate work? Furthermore, what will be the student's standard of living during that period of study, especially in comparison with students who are enjoying life at university because both "dad" and the government are paying the bills. It would seem more appropriate to extend the government living allowance in such cases at least until graduation.

COMMENDATIONS:

that there be a better co-ordination of government plans in instances where the expansion of family housing units necessitates an equivalent expansion of local school buildings; such co-ordination should get particular attention in areas where "special needs" have been designated as such by existing legislation (in this case the "Inner City Schools");

8. that attention be given immediately to the improvement of guidance counselling and up-grading programs in areas of "special need";
9. that regulations governing public assistance and government grants to students of low incomes be examined and improved to ensure that all students who have the ability to undertake courses in higher education not only be enabled but, in fact be encouraged to do so;
10. that the system whereby students are assessed and placed in secondary school technical courses from which they have limited opportunity to switch to academic course be studied thoroughly; it would seem that revisions are needed both at grade 8 termination stage and at various stages of the secondary school levels.

d) The Aged

The circumstances of some of the aged from the point of view of income, housing, recreation, and emotional stability put them in the position of being the most needful in our community.

There are many pensioners living alone in single rooms on their inadequate 111.00 per month (See appendix 'B') with no cooking facilities other than a hot plate, no access to refrigerators or television sets and no close relative living nearby.

The anxieties raised by the uncertainty of not knowing how they will live from day to day, having limited social contacts and perhaps having to live on the third floor of a rooming house because rents are cheaper up there, lead to severe physical and mental breakdown.

There are two publicly owned buildings in the community. One high rise apartment in Alexandra Park and another hostel that originally housed war veterans exclusively. When the old people who lived in the rooming houses in Alexandra Park were relocated they were to get priority in the new high-rise apartment building. However, it seems there was a misunderstanding between the various governmental authorities on the assignment of apartments on this priority basis and the elderly then were not as fortunate as the families had been. Similarly, a few years ago when the hostel was taken over by metro from the Red Cross, several of the old soldiers that we knew moved out because the rent had been raised beyond their means.

What happens to old people who become ill for short periods of time, not to mention the person who suffers chronic illness which is even worse? There is no room for them in the hospitals or the nursing homes. There are no close relatives to drop in on them to assist with food and other care. The home-maker services are lacking for emergency cases. In a few cases there is some aid from a fellow roomer or thoughtful land lady, but even they may be limited by their age or by the numbers of roomers living under similar circumstances in their buildings. More often their lack of care through minor illnesses leads to a chronic state of illness.

St. Christopher House has attempted to assist these people through a "Meals-on-Wheels" program for immobile clients and a small weekly drop-in-centre for mobile people. We have tried to get on-going government financing for the meals program, but so far have not found any existing legislation for which this qualifies. Although most of our "meal" clients have been referred to us by hospitals or Public Health Nurses we have been informed that in Provincial Home Care Programs "meals" are not considered as "treatment" in the same way "physical therapy" and other services are.

RECOMMENDATIONS:

11. that the Old Age Assistance benefits be increased more frequently and to more realistic levels which are going to allow those living entirely on these benefits; to have an adequate standard of living;
12. that the governmental housing, health and welfare services to the aged be expanded as rapidly as possible in large urban areas as these are the most needful persons in this community;
13. that the governments undertake funding of experimental and operative "meals" projects for the aged and handicapped that are now being developed by various churches and social agencies;

NEW BUILDING FOR ST. CHRISTOPHER HOUSE

For the past five years, St. Christopher House has endeavoured to replace our decaying old buildings with a more suitable new structure. The most ideal relocation was obviously one block away on the corner of Bathurst and Dundas Streets, in the Alexandra Park Urban Renewal Area. From the point of view of the Social Planning Council and all the elected representatives in our area, the need for a new building and the suggested re-location site were strongly endorsed. Originally, our Board of Directors was encouraged by this response and anticipated that government funds could be obtained to construct a building which could house a complex of social services, including a public library, a day care treatment centre, and other public offices such as health and welfare services, in addition to our own agency.

Since that time we have approached the City of Toronto who endorsed "in principle" the construction of the building as a recreation centre in 1966. Both the Board and the City were hopeful that the speed in the Legislature by Donald S. MacDonald on February 16, 1966 and the reply from Hon. J. Nicholson (Minister of Labour) might have indicated a change in legislation. However, by 1967, City funds were becoming more limited and our hopes that the Federal government would change its regulations to allow for payments through C.M.H.C. for recreation centres in Public Housing areas remained unfulfilled.

The City officials then indicated that if we were successful in obtaining some funds from other levels of government we would have a greater chance of obtaining municipal funds. We then had a meeting with two provincial ministers who indicated that building funds for those aspects of our program which served senior citizens could be financed by the Province, but municipal agreement would first have to be obtained.

This time we went back to the Municipality of Metropolitan Toronto. They too, seemed interested in our cause but after some deliberation decided that "when the major portion of the financing of the building has been arranged" they would be pleased to reconsider the request for assistance. This was in January 1969.

Such an experience of being passed off by one level of government to another and back again without sound commitment for major funds has been extremely discouraging, particularly when everyone has agreed that the need is great and the project a valuable one to the whole community.

RECOMMENDATION:

We would hope that the need for co-ordination of services by the various levels of government, which have indicated in several instances within this bill might also be considered in cases where "community centres" are urgently required in densely populated urban areas. A better system of providing funds for all levels of government should be devised for community centres in a way similar to the system for funding construction of housing.

APPENDIX 'A'

Let us tell the story of one "superior human being" that sought our help last year. Mr. "X" had come to Canada to seek a higher standard of living, better health and happiness for his whole family. For several years he lived alone in this country, learning English and the welder's trade, after which he accumulated funds to bring his family to join him. Less than six months after his family arrived he was laid off and received only $38.00 a week unemployment insurance.

and finally they were evicted from their rooming house. The Ontario Housing Corporation found them a apartment in a west end suburb. However, this new home was far from other families who spoke their native language. Mr. "X" called St. Christopher House for financial help because the Manpower Officer did not have supplementary assistance. When questioned the reason why the officer didn't inform Mr. "X" of the availability of municipal welfare assistance for such cases he replied that he was not authorized to do so because "that is another level of government." It is too bad, the officer related, that the Provincial training centres had trained too many welders. There are hundreds out looking for jobs at the time.

Four weeks later Mr. "X" had found his own job by hitch-hiking out west. When we enquired whether or not the federal government would pay for his family's passage to join him, we were informed by Manpower that there were jobs available in the region for welders (for example in the extreme east-end-suburb) and therefore they could not pay for the trip. By this time Mr. "X" had worked himself into a debt of hundreds of dollars. Fortunately, "his people" are overly generous with their friends and acquaintances, and thus are able to maintain hope and pride in their ethnic community. Isn't it a pity they come to be put to such hardship to survive. In spite of the fact that Mr. "X" has hung low in the presence of his countrymen, he deserves to hold it high in the presence of the more established generations of Canadians.

APPENDIX 'B'

Cent 'F' is an elderly man who has a very active mind but is crippled with arthritic and circulatory problems. Without home delivered meals, he would not be able to eat, because he cannot get out and has no one to look after him. In one month he was forced to move four times, partially because an occasional disagreeable tendency he has, but mainly because of landlords who wanted more money or had been renting rooms until relatives arrived from overseas. This agency subsidizes the man for meal payment because his pension is insufficient to cover his expenses. Rent for his room in downtown Toronto is $15.00 per week, and as well he must pay a debt for his wife's funeral, and pay for his taxis to and from the hospital since there is little other way he can move. As well he has personal needs, such as clothing, tobacco, stationery, and some medication although the latter is mostly paid for by welfare. His finances are therefore insufficient as shown below:

Basic monthly Income	79.00
Guaranteed Income supplement*	32.00
Total monthly income	$ 111.00
Expenditures: Rent	60.00
Debts	20.00
Taxis	12.00
Other	5.00
Food	10.50	plus four for week-ends
	$ 107.50

If this man were charged the cost of the meals, he would have a negative income.

* Most pensioners receive this supplementary allowance but consider it to be a "welfare handout" rather than a right of income.

 This expense could have been paid for through services provided by the Dept of Public Health. However, as in many similar cases of the immobile aged, information on such extended services is not readily available.

THE ITALIAN IMMIGRANT

The Italian Immigrant is a proud and resourceful individual. He and his family have prospered and added to the economic and cultural life of our community such that today there are approximately 500,000 persons of Italian origin living in Ontario with more than 300,000 residing in Metro Toronto.

Poverty in the stereotyped sense does not exist to any degree in the Italian community. However, the needs of the immigrant are the same as others of the community with the exception that he has problems related to his transition from one environment to another and from one life style to another.

The present restrictions on immigrants as to waiting time to qualify for benefits of up to a year and more are prohibitive and the forms of investigation by social workers of the homes, finances, and even moral life of the applicant are degrading and an insult to the dignity of the individual.

In the case of the Italian immigrant any suggestion that he apply for welfare is disgusting and a blow to every ideal he upholds. This prehistoric and Victorian approach to the material and spiritual needs of the individual must be discarded and replaced with a single positive program to raise the standard of living of residents and to provide the fulfillment of the promise which drew so many immigrants to Canada—that of land of opportunity, freedom, and protection of the rights of the individual in a society which endeavors to improve the lives of us all.

RECOMMENDATIONS

We respectfully suggest and recommend the following:

1. An evaluation and then co-ordination of the services being provided by government and private voluntary agencies to the public in the social welfare areas such that special local information assistance centres be established on a functional basis wherein an applicant may at one time receive all assistance required.
2. A program be started to encourage the spirit of legislation as well as the regulations on the part of staff of government agencies when dealing with the public with the policy of providing sufficient bilingual staff persons who can communicate in the language of the applicant. Forms that are in use should be printed in the language of the applicant as well as in English or French as the case may be.
3. A review be made of existing social legislation and programs of the various levels of government with a view to consolidating those services which provide for the financial welfare of the recipient together with a new program to assist the applicants to attain a minimum level of financial stability such that the individual may be encouraged to strive for an increased standard of living. We suggest a formula be devised, on a regional basis, whereby personal income can be encouraged and minimum incomes vary depending on individual circumstances, ability, opportunity and regional area conditions.
4. All receipts by an individual of all his source of annual income should be subject to income tax with the arrangement that an adequate provision for allowable deductions be made such that proper regional levels of income equal to the so-called poverty line be exempt from payment of income tax.

. Various incentive and training and retraining programs and allowances should be increased and expanded such that a national effort be made to reduce the numbers of unemployables who are so because of lack of skills, education, language, etc.

. Special considerations be given to those applicants who because of need may be able to receive supplemental income for as long as is necessary.

. A special task force be set up on a regional and local base to encourage those in the low income areas to improve their capacity to earn a higher income and to more actively encourage government and industry to locate and expand in those areas capable of maintaining such activity or to provide the necessary means to make possible the migration of workers and their families to those areas where employment is available.

. A complete scrapping of all the existing various assistance programs, including Unemployment Insurance, Workmen's Compensation, Welfare, most pensions, Allowances, baby bonuses, etc., etc. To be replaced by one federal agency with the power to set and establish the degrees of need on a regional and local level as a general standard where each resident of Canada regardless of origin would have the right to receive those funds necessary to sustain a dignity of the human spirit and without the present demeaning, degrading methods and attitudes that are presently in vogue.

HISTORY

THE ITALIAN IMMIGRANT AID SOCIETY

The Italian Immigrant Aid Society is a non-profit organization working exclusively towards fitting Italian Immigrants into Canadian Life.

The Italian Immigrant Aid Society was formed in 1951 for the purpose of assisting immigrants who were coming from Italy to Toronto in the early post war years. In those early days thousands were helped to find relatives, jobs, a place to stay, and in general received financial, and other help in becoming a resident and a member of this community. Many problems have been encountered by new arrivals to Canada; difficulties with the language, customs, job classifications, etc. As the work of the Society continued to expand in those early years, the members of the Italian Community decided that a more permanent organization would be required to properly look after the new arrivals.

In 1956 an application was signed to obtain a charter from the Province of Ontario incorporating the society as a Charitable Organization. A Charter was granted on January 31, 1956.

The Society prospered because of the unselfish work of many volunteers, both men and women, who devoted many thousands of hours to the work of the Society. Because of the lack of sufficient financing the society has not been able to do all the work that needs to be done. Contributions received from private individuals and businesses have supported the Society. All services of the Society are performed without any charge or fee.

The Society in the early years of its existence was led by very capable presidents and directors. The presidents of the Society were J.D. Carrier, 1953-56; Cav. J. Grittani Sr., 1956-58; L. Palermo, 1958-59; J. Mizzone, 1959-60; D. DeMonte, 1960-61; J. Paul, 1961-62; V.E. Bagnato, 1962-63 and Albert J. Vangelisti, C.A. from 1963 to 1969. Mr. D. Francescuti, is now President.

The Society is very proud of the fact that so many ladies in the Italian Community contributed significantly to assisting those requiring consideration and understanding. The Ladies Auxiliary of the Italian Immigrant Aid Society was formed in 1953, as an independent committee with a President and Executive. Leadership was provided by: Mrs. L. Bernard; Mrs. A. Teolis; Mrs. R.J. Grossi; Mrs. G. DeSpiri and Mrs. A. DiRocco each of whom served a two year term as President of the Ladies Auxiliary from 1953 to 1965.

The Society was re-organized in 1965 and a new super-board of directors was chosen to supervise the affairs of the society. The ladies of the Society were given greater representation of the Board of Directors and a new committee "The Women's Service Co-ordinating Committee" was set up to more fully utilize the talents of the ladies of the Society.

However, no matter how willing the members of the Society are to contribute their time and energies a proper office and location were required and permanent staff was required.

The Society offices are now located at 1174 St. Clair Ave., West at Dufferin Street, Toronto. The Society employs a full time paid administrator, Mrs. Arturo Scotti, who has been invaluable to the Society. All other members of the Society, including the President, Directors, Committee members, do not receive any payment for their services.

TO enter into any arrangements with any authorities, municipal, local or otherwise, that may seem conducive to the Corporations' objects, or any of them, and to obtain from any such authority any rights, privileges and concessions which the Corporation may think it desirable to obtain, and to carry out, exercise and comply with any such arrangements, rights, privileges and concessions.
8. TO provide whatever other services that may be requested

THE HEAD OFFICE of the Society is to be located in the City of Toronto and the work of the Society is to be carried on without the purpose of gain for its members and any profits or other accretions to the Corporation shall be used in promoting its programs:

The directors of the Society have realized the changes taking place in the Community and where possible changed the type of services to meet the current needs of the Italian Community. Other work in the areas of education, worker re-training etc. have been initiated and developed by other organizations with the funds to do so. These latter programs have been promoted in co-operation with the Province of Ontario.

As a member of the Social Planning Council of the Municipality of Metropolitan Toronto and the close co-operation with other agencies, the Society has access to information, professional assistance, and other services available to the Community. The respect earned with these agencies over a long period of time has made it possible for the Society to be of service to the Italian Immigrant who feels the need to confide his problems to an Italian speaking, Italian orientated social worker. We are pleased to have been able to assist 10's of thousands to adjust to life in this new country which in 1967, celebrated its 100th birthday as a nation—the brightest star of the growing nation

f the world—a land of opportunity, promise and wards, in return for honest, sincere and oftentimes ourageous efforts to succeed in this new land.

The needs of the present day community have ranged from a basically alms-giving type of assistance o a service type, counselling type, service in which the eds other than basic necessities, are becoming of reater importance. The social needs of our very large alian Community are in many respects similar to the cial needs of the entire Metropolitan Community.
he problems which concern the society in which we ve invariably affect the Italian Community.

It is principally because of this change and the ranges in policy of other agencies that the society nsidered and adopted the following:

POLICY OF THE SOCIETY

In addition to the purposes and aims as outlined in ur Charter the policy outlined and approved by the oard of Directors is as follows:

1. To maintain an information and referral service.
2. To maintain and expand our interpreting services.
3. To maintain an active volunteer recruitment id training program.
4. To maintain a translation and documentation rvice.

Introduction

In October 1969 it was suggested that we as student Social Service Workers submit a brief to the Senate Committee on Poverty. As future Social Service workers it is naturally assumed that we will be especially concerned with "The Poor" and the problems of poverty.

All students were asked if they wished to participate; a few were not interested, some were very cynical feeling that nothing would be achieved by another report. Approximately 70 students initially decided to participate with varying degrees of cynicism, hope, and concern. One popular topic presented was a "Brief on Briefs" just to see what action had been taken on the recommendations of previous reports.

As welfare recipients seem to delineate a specific area of poverty we eventually chose the topic "The Lack of In of Welfare Recipients" (see Statement of Intent Appendix I). This topic itself emerged out of the frustration we as students feel when we study and work with Welfare Legislation and practice in Canada.

With few exceptions we have not, ourselves, experienced poverty. That is, the type of poverty we are concerned with, the type from which there seems to be no escape. As students we may suffer temporary economic difficulties but we have hope in the future for economic security, and the opportunity to choose, in other words power to control our own future.

We are students. We study the development of people as individual persons, we come to realize the fact that socio-economic deprivation has on people, especially when it is combined with discrimination against them, because they are poor in such a land of opportunity. We study the history of the industrial revolution and the development of poverty amid comparative affluence in a capitalistic society. We learn that attitudes towards the poor, from the 10th Century, have always been punitive, that those who could not work were always made to feel ashamed. That "cannot work" was usually interpreted as "will not work" even when proved otherwise. The most frightened statement that came out of that early period, was made as a result of another "Senate Committee on Poverty" in Belgium in 1526 "even those who have dissipated their fortunes must be relieved... they must not die of hunger, but they must feel its pains". Most of our poor have not had fortunes to dissipate, but often feel the "pains". Have things really progressed in the 20th Century?

The initial intent of the committee which was formed to present this brief, was to attempt to find out what, if any, features of our present welfare system were locking recipients in to that system. We hoped in this way to try to find keys to open up those locks, and find a way of making welfare recipients self-supporting, at a humane and dignified level of existence.

The enormity of the problem of poverty overwhelmed us, and we found ourselves picking at areas of concern for further and deeper investigation, which have all been thoroughly investigated many, many times before. The areas selected were Assets and Income, Housing, Education, Attitudes of welfare recipients, attitudes of others towards welfare recipients, supportive services and vocational training, re-training and up-grading.

It soon became quite clear that we were rehashing old and well documented matters, finding out what was well known before we started. Since the problems of poverty have been studied for hundreds of years, this should have come as no surprise. We realized however, that discussion of problems, presentation of briefs, and years of study, have done nothing to alleviate the problems of poverty. This Special Senate Committee has been presented with facts and feelings on poverty, many of which have been presented repeatedly over the years.

We found that we were unable to offer any new facts. A feeling of futility permeated our meetings, futility which is the daily lot of the deprived poor, and we felt that it was like to just throw in the towel and let things go along as they are. We were refused assistance in contacting welfare recipients from two public agencies, and from one social action group for various reasons. Most interesting was the refusal from the social action group which is comprised of poor people in the Toronto area. Their feelings were that we could not represent them because we did not understand their problems. This conception which the poor have of the lack of understanding by the non-poor, is a further indication of the feelings of futility which are constantly with them.

You gentlemen have been made aware of some of the causes of poverty, the frustrations, humiliations, and killing of motivation through constant struggle for survival. Those facts which have not been presented to you can be found in the documentation of previous committees and studies.

The poor are obviously tired of being researched. Had they been removed from poverty as a result of previous research, this attitude of "Leave us alone" would not exist. Constant research and enquiries which have not alleviated the problem, only increase the feelings of futility, and widen the gap between the poor and those seeking to help them. The poor must be given positive proof of the desire and the ability of others to help before they can be expected to have faith in a system of improvement. This means that their total circumstances must be actually improved, not merely discussed.

A Income

The economic factor cannot be ignored. We cannot counsel people as to the best ways and best means to use their money if their income does not allow them freedom from worry to concentrate on other matters, or to carry out proposals for improvement of their situation. Poverty is essentially economic, and if we intend to eliminate poverty, we must be prepared to ensure that the poverty stricken have sufficient finances to improve their living conditions. Certainly this will not be possible without great expenditure, but if we are not prepared to pay, then we cannot say that we are prepared to help.

With this economic factor in mind, the following suggestions are put forth for your consideration:

(1) There should be a built in increase in Welfare and other Social Assistance Allowances, to coincide with increases in the cost of living.

(2) Increase in minimum wage—Government subsidies could be given to the small businesses which show that they would be unable to operate profitably by paying an increased minimum wage. These subsidies would bear the cost of the wage increase only.

(3) Enforcement of equal pay for women doing the same job as men, since many poor families are headed by women.

(4) Work incentive for the able-bodied in the form of retention of earnings over and above welfare, to the poverty level of income (as defined by the Economic Council of Canada) rather than the reduction of welfare allowance by the amount earned, which is now practiced.

As a result of questionnaires completed by welfare recipients for this brief, if was ascertained that all of those who were physically able to work, would in fact work to supplement their welfare allowance if they were permitted to do so.

We must accept that there are large numbers of people who will never be able to improve their economic situations through employment. The physically disabled, mentally retarded, aged, and unmotivated. These people are at the mercy of society in a capitalist, profit and production-oriented society. To date they have received little mercy. Let us accept the fact that they can not provide for themselves, and let us then provide for them in a meaningful way rather than maintaining them at an impoverished level. If they are not provided for, the poverty cycle can not be broken, and their children will in future years swell the ranks of the poor.

B Housing

The Housing Sub-Committee furnished their impressions for your perusal. The acute shortage of housing is a very important factor in the overcrowding of poverty ghettos. This shortage permits ridiculous increases in rental or purchase costs, which are despairing even to the wealthy. One quarter of a family's income is a desirable maximum to be spent on accommodation. How many of the poor can find accommodation at that cost? Countless sums of money have been spent in housing reports, studies and surveys. Countless briefs have been submitted from private groups in Toronto alone. No one can claim to be ignorant of the housing situation. There is no further need for investigation. The cost of further investigations should be put towards action. In our research it is obvious that Government Rent Control is a necessity. The increasing cost of housing makes it the largest cost factor in everyone's budget, unless you are speaking of those fortunate enough to own their own homes. If something is not done other than further investigation, the escalation of poverty must continue at an even faster rate. Production of further statistics will serve no useful purpose. The municipal libraries have innumerable briefs and reports which are lying dormant. The time has come for positive action rather than a half-hearted attempt at the reshuffling of statistical reports.

C Education

Although it is generally accepted that education is a necessity for eventual self-support; the financial difficulties of the poor repeatedly create a barrier to obtaining high levels of education, even in our best education system. Poor parents see a much greater need for additional income from children's earnings than to have their children complete a high school education. Children in turn, are intent on buying for their own earnings those things which their parents have been unable to provide. Provision of the necessities would enable the child to remain in school.

D Attitudes

Our research into attitudes of others toward welfare recipients is attached hereto — Appendix II.

Summarizing the results of this research, it is clear that the middle class in general have little knowledge of the problems of the poor. They are, as a whole, mainly unconcerned about the poor, other than their feeling that the poor are a burden on society.

E Retraining

Only 10% of the welfare recipients interviewed have taken any retraining or upgrading. There were several reasons cited for this, e.g. physically or medically unemployable, lack of education, dependent children, "given the run around", "haven't got around to it".

It is our feeling that industry should be required to assist in the retraining process. This could be effected by legislation requiring all large businesses to hire percentage of handicapped people, and also requiring that they have facilities for retraining people with handicaps. Retraining is only a useful weapon against poverty if after retraining the individual is able to earn enough to support himself. Retraining therefore must be coupled with the previous recommendation that earnings be supplemented to the poverty level by welfare, or the minimum wage be increased to a more realistic level.

Supportive Services

Our research into the area of supportive services showed that counselling was considered helpful by half of those interviewed, whereas only 14% of those interviewed actually received regular counselling when needed. It is considered by our group that training of welfare recipients in social service work would be advantageous both in providing employment for them, and from the point of view of their own experiences in this problem area. They would not only have the expertise from their own situations, but there would be more probability of the poor accepting these people, as one of their own who has made it.

It must be pointed out that our survey was small in size. The number of welfare recipients interviewed was twenty-one. Reluctance of agencies to offer assistance in enabling us to meet recipients was partly to blame for this, but also involved was our own feeling that sufficient research is not the answer to the problem of poverty. A copy of the questionnaire which was circulated, is attached hereto —Appendage 1.

Tabulated below are statistics of what we feel are the most relevant and useful questions put to the recipients.

Conclusion

Canada, a land of opportunity, freedom and equality. Is it? If a person has the hope and the will and the skill, yes, Canada is a land of challenge and opportunity. If a person is disabled, poor or disadvantaged—No.

This poverty amid affluence seems to be an inevitable consequence of a capitalist society. Opportunity to achieve status, money and power is based on competition, and achievement becomes easier the closer you start to the "top" and the closer you get to the "top". The "top" becomes farther and farther away from the bottom requiring more education and more skill. Those at the bottom have little money, little hope and for practical purposes—no power. Those locked into poverty are using up their energy merely for survival. What hope is there to achieve?

You will find this feeling repeated over and over again in our brief because different students feeling the same way have written various parts of it. We ourselves have come to feel powerless in the face of the question of poverty, and our part in it as future social service workers. Does it always take a Revolution to change our attitudes and practices towards the poor? In our modern industrial society capable of producing abundance there are many socio-economic casualties. On democratic principles, these casualties of a system we deliberately sustain, must be provided for adequately. They have as much right as any other Canadian "to live like human beings" (a comment of one of our clients).

As student Social Service Workers we realize "truth" that a person has self respect only if he feels that he is treated with respect and dignity. Welfare recipients are not given the feeling of self respect in our Society. A responsible citizen does not develop out of a vacuum. A person has to be given security, hope and some opportunity for choice and decision before he develops a feeling of responsibility. We feel that Canada does not give her poor or their children this socio-economic base to become self respecting responsible citizens.

Gentlemen, we are not economists. We realize that we have recommended economic measures without providing a source of funds. We know that to provide money for the casualties at the bottom of our socio-economic system, it must come from the middle and the top. We know that there will be resistance from the very people who have the power to take political action. However, our philosophy is that human beings are of ultimate value and that Canadians we must be prepared to pay the price if they really wish to "liberate" the poor.

The age of cybernation has two promises. One, is the development of an increasing class of unemployed discriminated against because they do not work, a maintained at subsistence level by inadequate welfare measures. They will be unable to participate in the economy as producers or consumers. The other promise is the right of every citizen to live abundantly. Which promise will Canadians, including ourselves choose as their goal?

SOS-VOLUNTEER ACTION

BRIEF TO
THE SENATE COMMITTEE ON POVERTY

DEFINITION AND INTRODUCTION

Poverty is a function of the dispersion range in the distribution of both wealth and power in our society. Because it is a function of the dispersion range in the distribution of wealth and power, it is the relative, as well as the absolute, levels of wealth and power which are important. The dispersion must be (considerably) broadened as well as, or while, the base levels of wealth and power are raised. Also, the fact that poverty involves the distribution of both wealth and power means that it is not a material phenomena alone, but also a psychological and sociological phenomena as well. This means that some of the attributes of poverty, particularly feelings of alienation, powerlessness and cynicism are found among the middle class. Indeed, it often appears that these attributes are a majority characteristic of our society. In short, poverty is part of, and a function of, the existing social order. Changes in the structures of society, rather than in the nature and extent of social services alone, are imperative if we are to seriously attempt to solve the 'poverty question'.

This is the view of poverty and of our society to which four years in the field of community action projects have brought us. In this brief we will focus our attention primarily on the question of the distribution of power, both because it is too often neglected and because we believe it is the key to any solution of the poverty question, indeed, to all social change. More specifically, we wish to discuss the rise, importance, implications, and future of indigenous groups. While this presentation will be mostly theoretical, it is grounded in, and grows out of our experience.

II THE CHANGING NATURE OF COMMUNITY GROUPS

During the last four years, there has been a change in the nature of community and social action groups. In 1966 and 1967, such groups and the projects they initiated, tended to be centred around church-related, often ecumenical, groups or specific agencies and institutions serving 'the poor and dispossessed'. These were also the years of the Student Union for Peace Action organizing projects and the initiation of the Company of Young Canadians. By 1968, a new type of group was clearly becoming a force. This was the adhoc group composed of professionals, concerned middle-class citizens, agency people, clergy and students. Such groups focused on a specific issue, or a specific community or a specific issue in a specific community. Despite affiliations and overlapping membership in some cases, they sought to remain independent of existing institutions and were often critical of them. Their orientation was to work directly with those they sought to serve. The Company struggled with the concept of community development; and the example of the anti-war, civil rights, and ghetto organizing in the United States was strong. Now another kind of group—the indigenous group—is becoming everywhere obvious. These groups are composed of the people whom previous projects were often meant to serve, but who were seldom fully involved in the formation, planning and implementation of the projects. They were more often acted on, or for, than acting. But today they are forming their own groups—whether an indigenous issue group centred on a specific issue such as welfare rights, or an indigenous community group centred on a specific geographic territory. Some of those people who previously formed the ad-hoc groups have begun to see their role as supportive and advisory to these indigenous groups because they have recognized that the direction and decision-making power of a project must be with those affected by it, i.e. the indigenous people. In short, this is a first, minimal attempt to redistribute power to those who have little or none.

III THE NEED FOR, AND VALUE OF, INDIGENOUS GROUPS

Let us now turn to an examination of the need for, and value of, such indigenous groups. In many ways, they are the direct outgrowth of the frustration and failure of service programs, agencies, and the state welfare apparatus to even sufficiently ameliorate—let alone eliminate—the problem of poverty. It is clear to us that short-term service projects are at best a stop-gap, 'band-aid' type of measure, and at worst an aid in creating and/or reinforcing the cynicism and alienation of those who 'benefit' from the project. To those on the receiving end, a service has been provided for a period, and then it is gone: they are responsible neither for its arrival nor its departure; and they can hardly do otherwise than doubt the sincerity of those who say they want to help, raise expectations and then leave. Nor are long-term service programs fully adequate or even desirable, for they subtly perpetuate a superior-inferior relationship by making benevolence rather than justice their basis. Further, the provision of benevolent assistance often makes it possible for the social order which creates the injustice to remain intact. Thus, we have clearly seen that social change is not achieved through social service alone.

In addition, such service programs in perpetuating a superior-inferior relationship create and/or reinforce the feeling among those 'served' that they can no appreciably affect the conditions of their own lives through their own actions. They must wait for others to act on their behalf. So again, there develops helplessness, powerlessness, alienation and cynicism moderated of course, by benevolence. Even participation in the running and staffing of a program is insufficient, for their vehicle of participation, i.e. the program, is still dependent on others. Only when people initiate projects to meet their own needs, can they take over control and responsibility for existing projects, can those projects provide a sense of dignity and self-worth to those whose needs are being met. This sense of dignity and self-worth is crucial; it is as important, if not more so, than the meeting of material needs per se. Thus, the principle of indigenous control and responsibility (not just participation) must be incorporated into all social and welfare programs—private and public. In this way power over the programs which affect their material well-being is made possible for the poor.

IV THE DISTRIBUTION OF POWER IN OUR SOCIETY

To see that even this is a minimal redistribution of power, and to understand the great dispersion range of the distribution of power which necessitates severe structural change in our society, we must take a broader look at the decision-making process. Our rhetoric and theory tell us that perhaps the greatest number of decisions are made through the mechanism of the free market, in which all can participate on equal terms. But as any economic student can tell you, participation is only on equal terms if there is an equal distribution of wealth and resources. Moreover, the availability of information on which the market operates is not perfect—in fact, far from it; nor does the market consider social costs and benefits—i.e. external 'dis-economics and economics' of its decisions. And, most crucial of all, the market is increasingly free—and more dominated by large monopolies and oligopolies, all too frequently foreign controlled. In effect, information and decision-making affecting all—at some point, one particular group; at another point, some other group—have been moved behind closed doors into the corporate board rooms. Through corporate wealth and power, these decisions are implemented. The public—those affected by these decisions—have not even participation, let alone control and responsibility.

Similarly, governmental decisions at all levels are often formulated without public participation. Decisions at the provincial and federal level emerge from behind the closed doors of the civil service, the cabinet and the party caucus, into the open forum of Parliament where the outcome of verbal debate is inevitable. At times, particularly at the municipal level, decisions are 'mystified', as when they huffled between committees; or when partial items, financial, or implementation decisions, are divorced from, and dealt with differently than, decisions on the principle at issue. In addition, various civil service departments are sometimes less than helpful in providing (public) information to citizen's groups either because of bureaucratic inertia or perceived vested interests in the proposed program(s). Briefly, decision-making—governmental, community, and corporate—has been separated from those it affects; it has become concentrated, yet obscured.

Our situation, then, verges on desperate. It is not simply poverty programs and welfare decisions which are divorced from those affected; rather it is all major decisions. A man is left with only the freedom to just within narrow limits to the environment created for him by a few others, and if he suffers material privation as well, he has even that freedom restricted.

TWO FUNDAMENTAL IDEALS OF SOCIAL CHANGE AND THEIR IMPLICATIONS

Thus, we believe the following two ideals to be fundamental in any attempt at social change, including any effort to eliminate poverty:

1. Self-determination: those affected by a decision or program must have control and responsibility for that decision or program.
2. A more equal distribution of wealth and power in our society: the dispersions must be considerably narrowed.

The implications of these ideals for government are clear. Resources—primarily money—must be made available to indigenous issue and community groups with minimum restrictions. Community development must be made the spearhead of the social welfare system; it should be noted here that community development is the antithesis of quantification, and its objectives are its outcome (coming from the people) not its beginning. Finally, all government programs, but especially social and welfare programs, must be decentralized so that those affected can assume control and responsibility as they gain experience in the art of decision-making themselves.

In respect to these implications, we see the federal government's 'fight' against inflation as an excuse to withhold resources, while at the same time further aggravating the poverty situation since general measures to fight inflation always fall on the marginal worker—the working poor. The trusteeship of the Company of Young Canadians, without anywhere near an adequate trial of its volunteer governing body, we see as a direct negation of self-determination, and in part as a blow against community development. Nor do we find the new National Advisory Council to the Minister of Health and Welfare, which includes some welfare and former welfare recipients, as much more than (well-meaning?) tokenism. We have thus far seen no indication that the government is committed to the two fundamental ideals we believe necessary for the solution to the poverty problem.

VI THE FUTURE OF INDIGENOUS GROUPS: A POTENTIAL FOR VIOLENCE

Let us return now to the indigenous groups which we have seen as a vehicle of social change. We have noted their rise and examined their value. We believe that they are a permanent and increasingly important factor in our society. Thus, we shall close out this brief with some speculation into the future on some of the problems which we see arising, as well as a tentative proposal for their solution.

As indigenous groups grow in number and in strength, developing programs of their own to meet the needs of their members and making demands on governments, questions of recognition and legitimacy are bound to arise. Some of the groups may seek legal incorporation—becoming community corporations* or welfare rights corporations, etc.—as a partial attempt to achieve recognition and legitimization. With legal status, these groups can better undertake major fund-raising and program operations, and make binding contracts, all of which might be preliminary to negotiations with governments for control and responsibility over certain programs or their administration in certain communities. Nonetheless, even if such legal incorporation becomes the established pattern, the questions of recognition and legitimization will, on the whole, remain—for it is not recognition and legitimization as an equal corporate entity before the law (though legal powers are necessary to it) but recognition and legitimization by and for governments as a bargaining, representative and administrative unit for a group of people, which these indigenous groups seek. When we realize that the membership of some of these indigenous groups will be those segments of the populace who are marginal to our society, who feel themselves oppressed and exploited, and who through their organizations seek to channel their anger and frustration in what may to them seem like a desperation effort for change, then we can see the potential for explosion if even recognition and legitimacy are not forthcoming from the government, let alone a positive response to their demands. There is little doubt that many indigenous groups are militant, and that others will become so. It is not at all difficult to envisage civil strife and disorder, involving injury and/or death to persons and damage to property if the questions of recognition and legitimacy are not dealt with.

*See Milton Kotler, Neighbourhood Government: The Logical Foundation of Political Life. Bobbs-Merrill, New York, 1969

Let's take an example. Suppose we have an indigenous community group, incorporated as a community corporation. The membership of this group are all from a 'slum' area. Many are on welfare. They have begun a few programs, mostly recreational and social, which have strengthened their membership and unity but, of course, solved none of their basic problems. They demand from the municipal government not changes in the operation and administration of the city's welfare program, but control and responsibility for the administration of city welfare in their community. The city considers this a challenge to its power (which it is), and refuses to discuss the demand. In effect, the city refuses to recognize or give any legitimacy to this community corporation. The group organizes militant mass-actions to force recognition and negotiations on the demands—an occupation of the local welfare office plus mass informational picketing around the office, including their own 'self-defense' forces, and appeals to unions and the public for demonstrations of support. The city calls the police . . . Anything from scuffles, to a Chicago-like police riot, to a Sir George Williams 'rampage', to armed battle, would be possible.

Thus, the seriousness of the questions of recognition and legitimacy, we hope, is evident. But to further emphasize the point, it should also be noted that there is every possibility of inter-group tension and conflict when two or more indigenous groups attempt to operate in the same or overlapping areas without any defined methodology or mediation for solving the difficulties. Moreover, even without inter-group tension and conflict, this situation poses a dilemma for governments: with which group will they negotiate demands, to which group will they allocate program or poverty funds . . . and how to decide?

In all of this, we see parallels with the development of the labour movement. Community corporations are the equivalent of the first unions fighting for recognition, legitimacy, and a 'better-deal' contract from management, and legal status and rights under law. Civil service departments and governments take the place of management. Self-interest of civil servants, and bureaucratic inertia prevent recognition and negotiations, as did management self-interest. The possibilities for conflict parallel the actual conflict in labour history; and the inter-group difficulties also have their equivalents in union disputes over jurisdiction and raids.

VII A PROPOSAL

We also see the basis for a resolution of this entire situation in another labour parallel—the Labour Relations Act*. Such a legal framework applied to the community or other indigenous groups would by its very existence recognize and give legitimacy to the right of people to organize. It would set out conditions under which a government or civil service department would have to recognize and negotiate with such groups. And it would provide an apparatus for solving jurisdictional type of disputes. In addition it would mediate contract disputes and grievance regarding contract obligations.

Involved in such a proposal and in the work of the Labour Relations Board's equivalent are several extremely difficult questions. Perhaps, foremost among these is the defining or appropriate 'bargaining units' within which organizing and recognition occur. For community groups, this means defining the geographic boundaries of the community: in effect, it is delineating the best geographic areas for indigenous neighbourhood or local government. This is a task of which the success of community groups will depend for they absolutely require a true community of interests if they are to function successfully. The definition of areas will necessitate consideration of great many factors then; the history of the city and its regions, its social, political and physical structure, and the pattern of social interactions in the city. These are factors we know too little about, particularly about their interactions. Thus, we would suggest that the Labour Relations Board's equivalent not arbitrarily define 'bargaining units', but rather question each representation it receives, working out an agreement with those making representations and mediating any disputes which arise between groups.

As for indigenous issue groups (such as welfare rights groups), definitional problems will be less difficult although the question of whether to grant recognition to sub-bargaining units may be troublesome. For example, it is easy to define the constituency of a welfare rights group, i.e. all those who receive welfare from the same source; but should you recognize two groups of welfare recipients who receive welfare from the same source but who are in different geographic areas or otherwise perceive their interest differently? Again a co-operation and mediation approach would seem most advisable.

Such an approach also seems suited to ironing out jurisdictional disputes between indigenous community and issue groups. Mediation, rather than arbitration recognition dispute matters seems most advisable; the refusal to recognize either group would force the parties involved to settle themselves.

On the matter of the percentage of persons in a bargaining unit who must have joined the group prior to a 'certification' vote being conducted, and the percentage support for the group required in that vote we have no real suggestions. We feel a thorough discussion of this question is necessary, but would suggest that the goal of such a discussion should be minimize the organizing effort without threatening majority rule in any unit.

It is our hope that if such a framework for organizing community and issue groups were provided before serious conflicts arise, organizing might thereby be spurred and such conflict resolved. Our proposal is a preliminary and very sketchy one. We recognize that it needs much study and discussion, and foremost it needs the response and further, fuller formulation by existing indigenous groups. It is them, as well as society at large, the proposal is meant to serve. They are the persons primarily affected by this proposal. Thus, they must have a strong say in its future. Moreover, we feel such participation, on a veto or majority basis, by such persons is imperative to ensure that any legal framework serves, rather than restricts or coopts, indigenous groups.

We thank you for the opportunity of presenting this brief. The distribution of power is a part of poverty; people are organizing to change it; they must be facilitated. All Power to the People!

APPENDIX

BACKGROUND ON SOS-VOLUNTEER

ACTION FOR SOCIAL CHANGE

SOS is a "people-resource" to community groups trying to effect change. It services community groups in the following ways:

- It provides a fieldworker to initiate discussions with groups to help them clarify direction and role in beginning community action;

- It sends teams of volunteers to a community to assist in the group's task, whether it be doing research or organizing and implementing a program;

- It may provide regional SOS committees or retained volunteers to help with an ongoing project after the summer.

SOS has chosen the voluntary approach to social action. It wants to be a vehicle whereby youth can put to use its energy and idealism in creative ways. It wants to give the young experiences in community work, to contribute to their education and to deepen and mature their social concern. It wants to provide a short-term resource to community groups concerned about a problem and needing an input of outside assistance to achieve their goals.

What was originally planned as an ecumenical Canadian Youth Assembly for Centennial Year, 1967, has become today's SOS.

The assembly idea came from a number of Christian groups and denominations, but was soon drastically altered to embrace community action when it was realized a youth assembly to celebrate Centennial Year was simply not enough. A nation-wide program of projects was fielded in summer 1968 and in summer 1969. The SOS of today is moving towards year-round engagement with issues, a natural growth from its original concept and name—"Summer of Service".

SOS organization consists of headquarters staff, a central committee, its sub-committees and regional committees. The Central Committee, composed of representatives of sponsoring groups and elected volunteers, oversees and co-ordinates all activities. It serves as the major go-between for the volunteer on the one hand and the sponsor on the other. Its sub-committees cover specific concerns such as publicity, selection and financing. Regional committees are becoming more and more significant in SOS' policy planning, recruitment of volunteers and project development.

SOS national staff is as follows: Executive Secretary, Ken Murdoch; an assistant, Vivien Kitchen; and a national fieldworker, Harvey Stevens. For the 1969 summer, fieldworkers were Harvey Stevens, and Edie Penner.

Brief Submitted to:
 The Special Senate Committee on Poverty,
 by
 Mr. Gesta Abols,
 President, Students' Administrative Council, of the University of Toronto.

March 11, 1970

The University of Toronto is Canada's largest English-speaking university. Almost 30,000 people live and work there each day. The university is situated on well over 100 acres of land in the heart of downtown Toronto.

This fact raises at once the basic problems to which we wish to address ourselves this afternoon: it is the old town and gown controversy, the relationship of the University to the physical and social environment in which it is located. It is a problem which is as old as the universities themselves, but for a variety of reasons this problem presents itself with new force today. Put very simply, the question is this: For whom does the University, any university exist? Official propaganda would have us believe that the University exists to create, preserve and pass on knowledge. But knowledge is not something which exists in vacuo; knowledge exists in particular cultural and social contexts and is created, preserved and handed on in these. Today, this context is one of privilege on the one hand and bondage on the other; wealth and poverty; power and powerlessness. These contrasts, of which a Committee such as yours is such a clear example, do exist, and, as your Committee must know, they cannot be wished away or white washed.

Students themselves are caught in the midst of this conflict; most frequently this is expressed in students' seeking power over their own lives and experiences in terms of what they want to learn and how they want to learn it. What has happened in universities across the world in recent years is only a foretaste of what will happen in societies as whole unless the conflicts we spoke of above are resolved and very quickly. The French Revolution of May 1968 is a clear warning; you will remember that even though it was sparked by students, it was the French worker who really carried it out.

But back to the University of Toronto. The University is in effect a small island of relative affluence surrounded by a sea of poverty in the City of Toronto. One of the critical needs in down-town Toronto is good, inexpensive housing. Yet the University, in order to satisfy its unsatiable hunger for more buildings, has in the past and proposes to do so again in the future tore down whole blocks of housing, with total and callous disregard for the lives of the people who are dislocated. We find it curious and disconcerting, to say the least, that in an official University publication, the University of Toronto News, February 1970, a photograph of the new 40 million dollar graduate Research Library which is under construction at this moment should bear the caption "All that concrete can't be wrong." But is it right? How will that library serve the community which has already destroyed? What is so sacro-sanct about the University and its works? One would not complain if the University were in effect an institution, which is open to use by the whole community. But it is not. Its buildings and facilities are not wholly closed to all except members of the university community. The university makes available its resources in a direct way to only a relatively small elite group in our society; business, industry, government, and the even smaller elite of students and professors. It is only after graduation that students of our universities begin to play some sort of service role in our society, and then usually only in a professional capacity on a fee-for-service basis.

There is another very important factor which should be mentioned here. The University trains people to become experts in their various fields; expert lawyers, teachers, social workers, doctors, politicians, even computer programmers, urban planners and bridge builders. What we are saying will apply by and large fields: it is usually the expert who determines the need in an institution or community and thus decides what need should be met. To call this process paternalistic and imperialistic is putting it mildly. Really, if ever, are the people consulted whose needs are to be met as to what their needs, and desires and hopes and dreams are in fact. The medical profession is a perfect case in point: trained in our universities, the doctors go out and decide what the health needs of the community are. Then they act in their own fashion: at great costs, they closet themselves in expensive buildings in their offices and wait for the people to come. Should the process not rather be reversed? Should the doctors not establish themselves in the community where the people are and work there to prevent illness? And why should they define illness in strictly medical and biological terms? A not unemployment or poor housing the general imperialistic values of our society, the competitive spirit which is at the very heart of the educational system and therefore of the whole society just as much an illness? Yet does the medical faculty as a whole work on these problems? No, of course not. Instead they perform heart transplants and other extravagancies. This attitude is characteristic of the University as a whole. Students and professors who are these questions are described as radicals; and because they have been classified with this label, one attempts to shelve them. But of course this does not work any more. For students—some students, at least, are acutely aware of the contradictions and conflicts in our society. But this is largely because they themselves are subject to these contradictions: women are still second class citizens; the incredible sums of money which have poured into higher education in particular in the last decade or so have had no appreciable effect in resolving any of the contradictions we have mentioned; it has, however, made it possible for a few more students from the lower classes to realize the general dream for a "good education". The only effect this has, of course, is to increase the alienation between parents and their children and thus to heighten the contradictions and conflicts in society as a whole.

Where does the University fit into this picture? There are essentially two views of the role of a modern university in society. The first of these sees the University primarily as a academic institution rather than a social one. According to this view, the University is relatively detached from society by means of the principle of academic freedom and pursues its essentially academic interests with a spirit of serene detachment. The University has discharged its responsibilities when it teaches students, and when professors are engaged in the single-minded pursuit of the disciplines. "The University's relations with society are strictly at arms length; it sets or helps to set the conditions under which members of the outside community enter its halls for instruction, considers them under its jurisdiction as long as they stay, sends them forth to take whatever posts in society they as graduates decide to take, and is content to influence society through the individuals it helps to form."¹

Yet an increasing number of students and faculty find the above description of the relationships of University and society highly unsatisfactory and inadequate. They see the University as in fact not being detached from society, but rather as an integral part of what in the United States is often called "Military-Industrial Complex". The University does not do its work in an intellectual or social vacuum. The University has very particular social, economic and political functions. As John Porter has pointed out in "The Vertical Mosaic" (Toronto, 1965), there are great inequalities among those attending the universities according to the occupational background of the family. The university is both an elite and a class institution: it trains the children of the social and economic elite to continue performing precisely that role.

To quote again from the Report of the Commission on University Government: "Outside, a large corporate university like ours plays a big role in the provincial and national political economy. We are not autonomous... The close connection between economic growth and the education industry has been made clear in recent studies of the Economic Council of Canada... The university's social role is also reflected in the research and consultatory work carried on by its professors. Here, the pull of the market is strongest;... Consultatory work is done for those elements in society that can afford to pay for it: government and corporation. Toronto's poor, the Indians of Northern Ontario, the unorganized, those who are not wealthy, cannot and do not take advantage of the academic's expertise".²

These two views of the university's place in society are probably irreconcilable. The time has come, perhaps, for having two kinds of universities: the critical, socially involved universities the so-called radicals want and the traditional, detached university of the dreams of most academics. This, of course, is a political decision; the question is whether the government is strong enough morally to have the kind of critical institution many of us are looking for.

In some ways, the critical university has already come into being without much publicity and fanfare. We are not referring to an institution like Rochdale College, even though it is a very radical educational experience. We are talking about some of the projects of the Students' Administrative Council at the University sponsors and supports financially. These projects and programs all indicate a direct involvement of university students and some faculty members in the Toronto community. The projects this year have ranged from the Stop Spadina-Save our City Coordinating Committee, a group dedicated to fighting the Spadina Expressway which threatens to cut our city in half, to the participation in the election campaign of a radical Toronto alderman, to a Birth Control Information Center which is open to the whole community, to Frontier College.³

All of these projects seek to involve students and staff from the University directly in the life of the community. It should be noted, that most of them are located in downtown Toronto and seek to serve disadvantaged people in these areas in very specific ways. Most of them are experimental and many of them are ad hoc; they can nevertheless be seen as a model of the kind of relationship which should obtain between a university and the community in which it lives. In addition, many students and faculty serve as volunteers and advisers in a wide variety of community groups and centers. Others do quite specific research at the request of communities as part of their academic work. At this point, an inter-disciplinary programme in urban studies is being developed which will consist mainly of supervised field work with existing community groups or social agencies. The relationship of the University to the city is thus beginning to change.

It may be objected that students and faculty in our universities have always been engaged in social service projects of various kinds. This is, of course, perfectly true. But never before has this been done because students have radically questioned existing social and educational institutions, or have wanted to develop alternate models. This, we would suggest, is a trend which will continue and which bodes well for the future.

³Appended is a list of some of these projects with a brief description.

APPENDIX

The following is a brief description of some of projects which the Students' Administrative Council at the University of Toronto either supports or sponsors.

- 1) The Varsity Downtown Education Project was started by the Students' Administrative Council in the summer of 1968. The project originally attempted to provide an enriched educational experience for underprivileged children in downtown Toronto for the summer. It is now operating all year and is staffed by a number of student volunteers.
- 2) Daycare Center: This project was begun last year by the Women's Liberation Movement at the University of Toronto. It is a day care center for infants which is intended to free mothers for other work. It is run on a co-operative basis.
- 3) Frontier College: This is a nation-wide organization which seeks to bring university students to remote areas of our country during the summer. The students work in places such as logging camps and seek to set up educational programmes among their fellow workers. This is rather important and quite an effective programme since workers in these remote areas often have little formal education or even much knowledge of the English language.
- 4) S.H.O.U.T.: This is a community based health organization which seeks to provide community health care in one of the poorest areas of the city. It involves both students and staff from the university as well as health workers from some of the city's hospitals.
- 5) Pollution Probe was started about a year ago in order to investigate and report on the causes and effects of various kinds of pollution in our environment. The programme initially involved students and staff from the University of Toronto; now a wide segment of the population of Toronto participate in it.

THE SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON POVERTY EVIDENCE

Toronto, Thursday, March 12, 1970

The Special Senate Committee on Poverty met this day at 9.30 a.m. at The St. Lawrence Hall, Toronto.

Senator David A. Croll (Chairman) in the Chair.

The Chairman: I will call the meeting to order. Our first presentation is to be made by Mr. John Neveu, Chairman of the Welfare and Workmen's Compensation Committee of the Just Society. He will introduce his delegation.

Mr. John Neveu, Chairman, Welfare and Workmen's Compensation Committee, Just Society: Mr. Chairman, if I may make a comment before we start into the brief, I would like to pay my respects to the senators whom we have here today, Conservatives and Liberals who have been appointed. They are not an elected body and they do not even have to respect the Canadian flag or the Ensign in this hall, and we are speaking about Canadian poverty. I am rather ashamed myself, coming in here in the Province of Ontario, to find they do not have the Canadian flag or any identity as Canadians.

I would like to introduce Allen Baldwin.

The Chairman: We had that matter of the flag raised yesterday, and we were told that this hall is decorated with the flags of the period.

Mr. Neveu: The period is of the Ensign, and that is not even flying. I am an eighth generation Canadian, and that is why I fought it up.

Allan Baldwin is my assistant on my Compensation Committee, and I am sure you are all aware who he is. Bill McGeoghan is another assistant of mine on workmen's compensation. I also have some compensation recipients in the audience.

I would like to start out by saying that my purpose in coming here before your committee this morning is to present to you a picture of what happens to people in our society when for one reason or other they are knocked out of conforming and silent citizens. The picture that I will present is based on a random selection of personal cases that have come to my attention since I have been collecting information on people who have been dissatisfied with the treatment they have received from the Workmen's Compensation Board.

I hope that my remarks will assist the senators in their quest to understand not only the actual conditions of poverty in our country but also how poverty is created, and that these remarks will further illustrate from the point of view of people who are up against the system what an individual has to put up with when he attempts to obtain his rightful assistance from institutions and agencies in our society.

As I mentioned, my remarks will be directed primarily about the operations of the Workmen's Compensation Board in Ontario. Let me state at the outset that I realize that this Board comes under the jurisdiction of the provincial government, but I feel certain that this will not prevent the senators from hearing me out for the broader implications of what I see happening are relevant to all areas of government action.

It is also worth noting by way of introduction that it would not alarm me if the senators are surprised that I should take issue with the Workmen's Compensation Board. I realize that the Workmen's Compensation Board has a reputation around the world for the efficiency and extent of coverage that it provides. It seems to me however, that such a reputation has been built on the opinions of politicians and Workmen's Compensation Board administrators and certainly not by consulting those workers in Ontario who have had the misfortune of doing business with the Board.

The first and major point that must be emphasized is that the workmen's compensation rather than alleviating and assisting the injured workman, actually acts as a creator of poverty. Numerous are the examples of men, once productive and responsible citizens in the community who, through an accident in the workplace, are reduced to a situation of poverty and many are forced to go on public welfare to eke out an existence.

In this respect there is the question of the amount of pensions. Although it must be stressed that adjusting the amount of pensions will in no way solve the major problems of the workmen's compensation it is nevertheless a point which cannot be ignored. We think it is unfair that a ceiling of 75 per cent of $7,000 has been placed on the amount of compensation. Why should a worker who has been able to earn in excess of $7,000 a year, and who has contributed to the finances of the country on that basis, be deprived of remuneration once he has had an accident?

The situation is even worse if a worker is fatally injured. In assessing pensions for widows at $125 a month with an additional $50 allowance for each child, the Board has condemned the family of a worker killed on the job to a life of poverty. The only alternative for a widow in such a position is to find employment herself in order to maintain her family—and with the low wages paid to women this is not an easy task—or to re-marry in which case the Board need no longer provide her with a pension.

Apart from the size of fixed pensions, the Workmen's Compensation Board acts as a creator of poverty in the manner in which it assesses payments. Here many gross inequalities have come to my attention. I refer specifically to the case in Appendix A which I won't go into now.

In a similar vein, it is also interesting to take note of the decision handed down regarding Mr. Giuseppe Zuccaro (Appendix B), who while convalescing on doctor's orders was informed by the Board that his temporary compensation would be cut in half, presumably because of the fact that Mr. Zuccaro was recovering. In other words, the Board is penalizing a patient because he responds to treatment. This man in order to survive, has been forced to go on public welfare.

Much suffering is caused by the delay which injured workmen face in receiving payments. This is especially true when a man has been cut off his full compensation and has been allocated a pension for partial disability. In many cases, the man is unable to find new employment yet the Board expects him to live on a pension which is often less than 10 per cent of his previous earnings. Even if the worker decides to appeal the Board's decision he is forced to go on welfare in order to live.

The length of the appeals process subjects the workman to even further hardship. The policy that the Board follows is to provide nothing until the disability has been established and the responsibility lies with the worker to do this. In other words, the workman is judged guilty until he can prove his innocence. We feel that the workman requires more protection and that he should be entitled to his full compensation until his disability pension has been established to his satisfaction, or until the appeal process has been completed.

What is most important about all these points is that the injured workman has little or no say in these decisions and when he is informed of them no reasons are given. It is this type of a silent wall of bureaucracy that faces not only the injured workman but all the poor of Canada in their relations with government and government agencies.

This leads one to take a closer look at the attitude of the Workmen's Compensation Board. Although "general outlook" is a vague subject and certainly difficult to define, nevertheless let me point out that once you come up against the Board you realize in short order that it is also very, very real.

The most concrete example of this attitude is the administration of the Workmen's Compensation Board Hospital itself. Protests have already been made and have received coverage in the media against the manner in which men and women are treated at the hospital. No longer are they considered responsible adult human beings but instead they are subjected to a semi-military type existence in which they must sign in and sign out and bring notes and in which a crude form of "behave or we will deduct one half day compensation" coercion exists.

This attitude however leads to a more serious criticism of the attitude of the Board for it points to a generally accepted notion that every claimant before the Board is, if not a fraud, then at least a very real potential fraud. Men who have worked a lifetime to earn a living and provide for their families and have generously paid their way through society suddenly become suspect once they have been injured. This aspect of the entire problem cannot be overlooked for it is often the case that this situation is more difficult to bear than the actual physical injury and when one applies it to the wider operation of poverty it has even more importance. The generally punitive attitude of welfare workers and administrators and even of society at large towards the victims of an industrialized economy is unjustifiable.

It is not difficult to see that this is precisely an employer's attitude and we wish to point out that the Board accepts in its operations the point of view and values of the employer. In other words, a man's value lies in his ability to participate as a productive member of industrial society; once he loses that ability when he is no longer of value and is in effect a burden. Although it may be distasteful for you Senators to come to grips with this fact, I assure you, that it is not until you do so that you will begin to understand poverty in our society.

It is also quite evident to me that the Board is very sensitive about having its position questioned. As you know, I have been attempting to organize for the past six months those injured workers who are not satisfied with the decisions of the Board. The response has not raised my opinion about the quality of job that the Board is doing. In this brief time, I have come in contact with over 700 workers and I have begun to document almost 200 specific cases of injustice. What happens when people attempt to organize and fight their rights? The answer is all too obvious. Only last week, I was ordered off the grounds of the Workmen's Compensation Board Hospital while visiting friends.

I should think that the senators of our country should be very concerned at the lack of freedom to dissent and appeal that exists, as in this case, especially because it is the powerless poor who are complaining.

I cannot read the whole brief, but I will go to another section on manpower. I feel Manpower also subsidizes industry.

We realize that given the nature of our judicial system it would be too expensive and too lengthy a process for an individual worker to appeal through the courts. However, we do feel that the situation could be made more just if the appeal procedure was taken out of the hands of the Board and given to an independent authority. We also feel that working men should be included in the composition of such an authority.

I am sure the question in your minds right now is "what about the trade unions?" It is true that many unions have employees who work full time on compensation cases and for the most part we have no quarrel with their actions. However, it is also quite obvious that the trade unions are quite comfortable with the way in which the Workmen's Compensation Board operates and are unwilling to use their economic and political strength to alter the situation. It is one of those areas in which the position of the employers, the trade union leadership and the government are particularly in harmony. On the whole, the trade unions have been unsympathetic to our appeals. One unfortunate explanation for this stems from the fact that the worker who is permanently disabled is no longer a union member and therefore he is no longer contributing dues. There seems to be a direct relation between the amount of assistance one receives and the amount of power one has; the trade unions respond to this principle the same as every other institution in our society. This of course only magnifies the problem for those who are without access to power.

Another important issue which needs to be raised is the whole question of rehabilitation. At present, the Workmen's Compensation Board limits its scope of action to physical rehabilitation—i.e. it will attempt to heal the injury and assist the patient to recover the use of his limbs etc.—but it does not include retraining a worker who has received a permanent disability to find gainful employment in some other occupation. To receive this assistance he is turned over to another government agency—mainly that of Manpower. We think this is unfair.

It should be the responsibility of the employer to ensure that an employee injured in his employ is rehabilitated. As in the case of a workmen's compensation pensioner who is forced to go on public welfare, this is another example of a matter that should be financed by the employer instead of being shifted onto the shoulder of the general taxpayer. We have noticed that the Workmen's Compensation Board has a habit of protecting the funds of the employer at the expense not only of the claimant but also of the public.

But the problem of rehabilitation goes further than this. What becomes painfully obvious when one considers the problem—but what continually escapes the Board—is the hardship faced by those who suffer a permanent, partial disability. It does not take much of an imagination to realize that a steeplejack who is 10 per cent disabled in one leg, is 100 per cent disabled as a steeplejack. We feel that this is the responsibility of the employer to find employment for the partially disabled worker. As the situation exists now, the employer can wash his hands of responsibility merely by stating that "it is economically unsound" to rehire such an employee. But it is equally evident that no one else will hire a disabled man either. Once again it is clear that the Workmen's Compensation Board is actually creating poverty. We feel that a fair solution to this problem is to follow the principle that a man should receive his full compensation until he has been rehabilitated to his earning power at the time of his accident. The responsibility to see that this is done lies with the employer through the Workmen's Compensation Board—not with other governmental agencies.

A further point which must be discussed is the role that the medical profession plays in this process. Too often it has been realized by patients that their own doctor is unwilling to stand up to the Board to defend his diagnosis. In other cases, it is obvious that the Board has intervened rather dramatically to discontinue or prevent treatment that has been prescribed. I will not go into this. I want to get into manpower.

This is how poverty is created; this is where crime begins.

It would be completely erroneous to leave the impression that problems such as the Workmen's Compensation Board can be solved by making a few adjustments in the amount of pensions or in the administrative procedures of the Board. Our criticisms cannot end at these points but must include a criticism of the very structure of the Board. The motivation behind many varied forms of protest in Canada today—from tenant's rights to pollution committees, from welfare recipients to adversaries of expressways—come from the realization that people have no control over decisions that vitally affect their lives and the process by which such decisions are made. Nowhere is this more true than with the Workmen's Compensation Board.

Therefore, we recommend that the only meaningful solution to this situation is that the people who are affected by the Workmen's Compensation Board most directly—i.e. the injured workman—have a considerable and effective voice in the operation of the Board. To do any less would be to evade the issue.

In order that the members of this committee might have an opportunity to question our position and proposals as well as to get a more detailed picture of the operations of the Workmen's Compensation Board, a number of injured workmen will be present along with myself, to answer questions and to give a first-hand account of our situation.

I have specific recommendations written here. The recommendations are:

That workers, and especially injured workers, have a significant say in the decision-making process of the Workmen's Compensation Board;

That the principle be established that an injured workman receive 100 per cent compensation until he is rehabilitated to his earning power that he had at the time of the accident; and that the responsibility for rehabilitating an injured workman and for securing employment for a workman with partial disability, rests with the employer through the workman's compensation;

That the workman be entitled to know reasons for the decisions of the Workmen's Compensation Board; this right to be protected requiring the Compensation Board to open its files upon the petition of the workers.

Also we are making proposals that the Workmen's Compensation Board be responsible for the full rehabilitation of that person and not Manpower, because Manpower does not rehabilitate the man to be competitive, a finished product. It denies the worker the right of rehabilitating him to be competitive in the field.

What happens, for instance, in many cases is that you finish one course and when you go to seek employment in that course the employer says you are not qualified. If you want any specific trades, I can give them to you. Welding is a course that takes more than nine weeks—ten weeks to learn; and our labour boards do not recognize our federal subsidized schools' certificates.

Another thing is that if you take an academic course you cannot go beyond Grade 12. If we are going to rehabilitate Canadians, we must put them back into a competitive field, we must take a realistic view of this, rather than spending millions and millions of dollars just alleviating the unemployment by putting them in schools temporarily, and when they finish their courses they are back on welfare. I think the government have been the biggest creators of poverty, bigger than anyone else.

I would like Al Baldwin to add a few words, because he has done a lot of work in it.

Mr. Allen Baldwin: I cannot add much to what John has already said, outside of the fact that I myself have had a lot of dealings with the Workmen's Compensation Board since 1964.

I have lost my home, my farm. My wife is out to work and so forth. I am still in a body cast. I feel that I am really scared. That is one of the reasons I went into the Legislature building that day and got carried out; it was to emphasize how serious this thing is. If the Ontario Government has no way of looking after its injured workers, then I think it is up to the federal government to take a stand and do something about it. That is all I have to add.

The Chairman: I have known Al Baldwin all my life, and that is the fewest words you ever uttered at any one time.

Mr. Neveu: Would you like to say something, Bill?

Mr. William McGeoghan: My name is William McGeoghan. I have been on compensation for the last ten months; I have been in the Downsview Hospital for the Workmen's Compensation Board for three months. I do not think the way they operate the hospital and the doctors and the whole organization, what they are doing a very good job. You cannot speak to the doctor; you cannot speak to the head of the hospital, no matter what our trouble is. No-one will listen to you. They will tell you, when you speak, to shut up or to hear what they have to say and will not listen to what you have to say. That is what I have found myself.

I was sent home a week and a half ago. I was told by my doctor, the rehabilitation officer there, that I was going to get an easier job with my company, and they would make up the difference in the wages. When I came to my company, they told me that they had never said such a thing; they had no light work, they could not give me light work. The only thing they could suggest was to go to Manpower and get retraining.

I went to Manpower and Manpower told me they could do nothing until the Workmen's Compensation Board does something about its first. I have been waiting now for three weeks and they have never said anything to me since. They have cut my money down from $80 a week to $40 a week. I have four

Mr. Baldwin: I would like to add one more thing. I think there could be some kind of liaison between the federal government, Manpower and different agencies, because when a man is hurt and he goes to Manpower he gets the same run-around as this gentleman just explained. We cannot do anything with Manpower until the Workmen's Compensation Board settles. This is strictly a run-around. Meantime people are starving to death.

John and I have taken many a family and going to bring them down to the Board or even Manpower and say "Will you make up your mind? In the meantime you are going to have this family to live with". Then they go and do something, but how about the person who is not that aggressive?

The Chairman: Senator Carter, you were going to ask a question.

Senator Carter: I was going to ask a question of Mr. Neveu who has had the documents in a lot of cases. You have an appeal board. Have you done any research as to what the results of the appeals have been? How many appeals have been successful, 50 per cent, 30 per cent?

Mr. Neveu: In our cases, the ones I have handled, I would say a hundred out of a hundred we gained not full compensation but we made some gains in the appeals that we have processed.

In many instances it is lack of communication, lack of interest of the rehabilitation officer to go out and see these people; because in Northern Ontario you have many uneducated people who are French-Canadian—and there are Anglo-Saxons, too, that are not well educated. They get their children to write letters to the Board, fill up their forms, and you get one child interpreting it one way and another interpreting it in another way. This confuses the Board. You should not have this confusion, but I think that the doctor's report should explain it well enough that you are entitled to it. While you are going through all the process of appeals, which is a prolonged thing that lasts three or four up to eighteen months, you are on welfare. When I say "Welfare", it is paid by the workers who are working and the taxpayers of the municipality, and they are subsidizing industry while they are doing this. The federal government is also subsidizing through the tax payments that you receive from us, returning them back to the province. For instance, in disabled pensions, disability pensions, the man, like myself, tomorrow morning can make application to the province and I get a disability pension. I do not want a disability pension. I do not even want the $36 a month that they are giving. I want rehabilitation that will put me back wholly independent with dignity in my community. I lost my home, I lost the furniture. Allen lost his farm. There are many people, there are men sitting out there who were subjected to cruelty, even malicious treatment by a doctor. I have pictures here. There is the person sitting right there. He has lost his home. Who knows what this man is going to get for a pension? He has worked nineteen years for a firm. He can no longer go back, and if you look at this man he has been cut off and injustices have been done to him. To prove that he has no feeling in his lower part of his body, they have exposed with him with a needle. We have got the pictures. These things are very vital. The appeal systems...

The Chairman: The question is how many?

Mr. Neveu: ...are not very favourable.

The Chairman: But you said a hundred...

Mr. Neveu: In our cases as individual cases, yes, it has been favourable.

Senator Carter: You went off on a long spiel there, when the simple question I asked was what percentage of appeals were successful? Were 50 per cent successful?

Mr. Neveu: Ninety per cent of our appeals have been successful.

Senator Carter: Ninety per cent of your appeals?

Mr. Neveu: Yes.

Senator Carter: Does that not indicate to the Board, when 90 per cent of the appeals are successful, that there must be something wrong with their initial decision?

Mr. Baldwin: Sure does.

Mr. Neveu: It does, but they are not willing to concede this. You see, when I fight a case with the Board, I bring an appeal, bring the documentation up, they say: "You have not won anything. This man has been entitled to this. It is an error." There was a seventeen-year-old error where a man lost five fingers, went back to the firm and is entitled to a pension—seventeen years ago. Now he has got laid off, because the company phased out the operation and laid him off. So he came to my meeting and he said, "They told me I was entitled to something and I never got it in 1952" I approached the Board. They said he is entitled to a pension. I said, "And you knew that seventeen years ago." How long must you be subjected to welfare because of these human errors?

Senator Carter: I would like to ask two more questions, and I would like the answers to be fairly short because the other senators want to ask questions, too. When a person gets workmen's compensation and it is not enough for his needs, does that person have difficulty getting a supplement from the Canada Assistance Plan or some other?

Mr. Neveu: He immediately goes to welfare, there is no problem getting it from welfare. You must sign forms that if you do get any money from the Board it is returned back to the welfare agency.

Senator Carter: If he gets money from the Board he pays it back?

The Chairman: Additional money to what he has declared. If they should raise it from 20 per cent to 30 per cent, he must declare it.

Senator Carter: Yes.

Mr. Neveu: Say you go on compensation tomorrow and you receive compensation; then you are cut off. Then you come on to welfare, but you must sign a form that states that any money paid from the day you take it until the appeal comes through, you must pay this back.

Senator Carter: When a person gets compensation and he has to go to welfare to supplement this compensation because the compensation is too low, do you think the fact that the federal government shares half of that cost of welfare tends to keep the initial payments down, keep the workmen's scale low?

Mr. Neveu: Yes, I would say it does.

Mr. Baldwin: I would say so.

Mr. Neveu: Yes, very much so. You find in many instances. Like, I am on partial pension I get $36 a month subsidized by welfare. I get $264 welfare. I have a family of five children. That is seven of us. We get $274 plus $36, is $290 a month.

Senator Carter: I have had a lot of experience with veterans' pensions, and some of your complaints are very similar. We get the same complaints on some disability rates and assessments, and that is fairly common. On the other hand, the percentage of successful appeals is fairly low because the initial decisions of the Pension Board are usually pretty good.

Have you made any comparison with the rates paid and the method of assessment as compared with veterans that you know, the veterans' pension?

Mr. Baldwin: I think it should be, sir.

Senator Carter: Pardon? I am talking about a person with a similar injury, and an old veteran who has got 50 per cent disability because his arm has gone or his fingers are gone, compared with a person who is injured in industry with the same type of injury: does he get anything comparable to the same disability rate?

Mr. Neveu: Yes, I will say yes, for the simple reason—I don't know if you senators are aware that many of the people sitting on the Compensation Board come from D.V.A. branch and have been through the veterans' pensions and, having done such a good job with those people, they are going to do such a good job on us. We are working for production and this is what has happened.

Senator Carter: I do not quite follow.

Mr. Neveu: You did not get that? I will give it to you real nice and straight, that I would say 65 per cent of the management of the Workmen's Compensation Board have worked for the government on veterans' pensions, and they have done such a good job with the veterans of Canada that they are now working on the workers of Canada to deprive us of our rights to fair compensation.

Senator Pearson: I just want to ask a question of Mr. Neveu. Having worked all my life as an independent man and not working for anybody else, this Workmen's Compensation Board is a new thing to me. I know of it, but have never had any direct contact with it.

The first question I would like to ask is: who supplies the funds for this workmen's compensation?

Mr. Neveu: The employer does, but in turn the consumer pays for it.

Senator Pearson: The employer does.

Mr. Neveu: Initially.

The Chairman: On his payroll.

Mr. Neveu: On his payroll.

Senator Pearson: It is a deduction from your wages, is it?

Mr. Neveu: No—yes, that is right, deduction from our payroll per hundred. I believe it is 14 cents or $14 per hundred payroll.

Senator Pearson: So that builds up to insurance.

Mr. Neveu: Yes, it is insurance.

Mr. Baldwin: It is an insurance company.

Mr. Neveu: It was initiated to be protection for employees. Initially in 1895 it was established. 1950 it came into power. They wanted it and they got it. It was initially protection for the employees, but rather than getting into protection for employees it is now gone back and it is protection of employers. That is what they should call it—employers' protection act, not employees' protection act.

Senator Pearson: Another question. Due to the inflation that we have today, do you get an increase in your compensation as compared with, say, two years ago?

Mr. Neveu: They gave us a token increase I think about a year ago. The increase was so little that nobody noticed it.

The Chairman: What percentage?

Mr. Baldwin: They raised it from $6,000 to $7,000. When you are hurt you get 75 per cent wages up to $7,000. Like, I make $15 to $16 thousand and still don't reach it.

The Chairman: You say 75 per cent of that. Has that been due to the increased cost of living or inflation; has the percentage been raised?

Mr. Baldwin: No, I would say no, because the protest and screaming and hollering from the recipients when they raised it to $7,000 from $6,000 and you get 75 per cent, I do not think was due to inflation. We were not talking about inflation.

Mr. Neveu: We do not know the exact figure, what the increase of percentage was, but it was minimal. It certainly does not come up with the cost of living today.

Senator Fergusson: I would like to ask Mr. Neveu a question. On page 2 he refers to the situation when a worker is fatally injured, and he stated the amount that is allowed, which I presume is right. I am not familiar with the Ontario Workmen's Compensation Act. All I want to ask is: what compensation do you suggest should be allowed to the widow and children in the case of a worker who is fatally injured, or have you any suggestion?

Mr. Neveu: The thing is that when a workman is killed on the job his family is burdened with the funeral expenses. They allow $400, and you are well aware that $400 today barely buys the plot, let alone the funeral service, the coffin and everything else that goes with it. The rest is a burden on the family of about another $400 or $500, which the family has to pay. I think the responsibility should be of the Compensation Board. It is inadequate.

Another thing, it is $50 per child per month, plus $125 for the mother.

The Chairman: That is the allowance?

Mr. Neveu: That is the allowances.

Senator Fergusson: That is what I was enquiring about.

Mr. Neveu: That allowance alone is a much better allowance than you get on comparable family benefits in Ontario.

Senator Fergusson: It is better.

Mr. Neveu: Oh, yes. You figure, if you have got five children that is $250 plus $125, which is $375 a month.

Senator Fergusson: I gathered from your statement here that you did not think it was enough.

Mr. Neveu: Well, I do not think anything is enough today with the rise of costs.

Senator Fergusson: Have you any suggestion of how much it should be?

Mr. Neveu: I think the mother who takes over the burden when her husband dies, I think it should be raised to at least $200, and then bring it up to the cost of living level, so that the family is as close as possible to when the husband was alive with his earning power, the standard of living that they were comfortable when he was living.

Senator Fergusson: And it should escalate with the rise in the cost of living.

Mr. Neveu: Certainly, it is only fair.

The Chairman: Is there a lump sum paid?

Mr. Neveu: From the Board?

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Neveu: No, this is a pension.

The Chairman: There is no lump sum at all at any time?

Mr. Neveu: There is a lump sum at one time. If she marries, then she would be entitled to two years of what she was getting in a lump sum, that is all.

The Chairman: Not on death?

Mr. Neveu: No.

Senator Inman: If the widow remarries, do the children lose their allowances?

Mr. Neveu: No, not until they reach the age of eighteen years and they do not change their name; they are protected that way.

The Chairman: Do we understand you clearly to say that these allowances that you are talking about have not been changed within recent years, say three years? The cost of living has gone up in the past three years about 12 per cent. In the course of that time there has been no raise at all or an insignificant raise?

Mr. Neveu: No significant raise. Minimal changes have been made, they raised it from $6,000 to $7,000 maximum.

The Chairman: That does not change the percentage rate; it does not help the people who are on $6,000.

Mr. Neveu: No, because the largest portion of your working people never reach $7,000.

The Chairman: What you are saying, it has not changed.

Mr. Neveu: It has not changed.

The Chairman: One more question. Does the Workmen's Compensation Board buy services from the Manpower people, do you know?

Mr. Neveu: Yes, they do buy certain programs.

The Chairman: Programs from Manpower?

Mr. Neveu: Right, which they have to give a means test, aptitude test to certify before they will spend any money on you.

The Chairman: Before the Compensation Board will spend any money?

Mr. Neveu: Yes.

The Chairman: But there is access to rehabilitation if they want it?

Mr. Neveu: No, not rehabilitation in the sense of what rehabilitation might be.

The Chairman: Let me get the question. Rehabilitation for the person is available if the Compensation Board buys it for them; Manpower will do the rehabilitation for the individual if the Compensation Board will say?

Mr. Baldwin: No.

The Chairman: I asked you the question to begin with whether Manpower services were being bought by the Compensation Board and you say "yes".

Mr. Neveu: Yes, they are.

Mr. Baldwin: To a point. It all depends. This is the bureaucracy we are trying to explain to you. By the time Manpower sends you back to the Compensation Board, and if your education is nil and he wants to be a bulldozer operator or something like that, they do not have this kind of stuff. If he wants to be a crane operator or go in an office or learn a machine, he can't do this.

Mr. Neveu: And your government does not train a man as a bulldozer operator or crane operator. You do not have this because it requires—I have worked since I was fourteen years old. I have a complete journeyman's in structural steel work, lay-out work, and everything. Manpower cannot give a man this training. I can also operate a bulldozer.

The Chairman: That is pretty specialized training.

Mr. Neveu: It is construction.

The Chairman: It is construction, but very specialized. You are a crane operator. They cannot give that sort of training to anybody.

Mr. Baldwin: No, takes two years; you have to be apprenticed two years and they won't pay for it.

The Chairman: It is very specialized work. How long did it take you to learn?

Mr. Baldwin: Two years. That is the rule before you get your ticket, you apprentice two years.

The Chairman: Then you can immediately go to work?

Mr. Baldwin: Yes.

Mr. Neveu: Provided you have money to pay your initiation into the union. Here is another thing. My union is $300 to get in, and it is not on the instalment plan. It is not "work now and pay later" but it is "pay now or do not work".

Mr. Baldwin: I think we are losing track of one thing that I would like to ask the senator.

The Chairman: Go ahead.

Mr. Baldwin: A man is working, and he owns his home and he is paying his mortgage, paying his bills. All of a sudden he is hurt on the job, and then as soon as he is hurt on the job—like me, I have a two-foot scar down my back in three operations. As soon as I take my shirt off, no employer wants me. Am I entitled to live as I have been living, or should I just become a nothing overnight because I was hurt on the job? This I would like somebody to answer, please, for me.

The Chairman: You are entitled to a decent living.

Mr. Baldwin: Do I have to go on welfare? Welfare will not pay for my home.

The Chairman: There is a responsibility on the Compensation Board, which was established for the purpose of putting you in such a position that until such time as you are able to return to the work you were doing, you continue to be maintained at the standard that you are accustomed to. That was the theory of the Compensation Board.

Mr. Baldwin: It is not working that way.

Mr. Neveu: At one time this was the finest plan in North America and the world, you could say, because they were selling it all over the world and many provinces, such as New Brunswick, have a liability clause, but they have other loopholes. They have adapted certain sections of our Compensation Act. A Commissioner came from Vancouver here to look at our tribunal system, and he said he would never endorse the tribunal system in B.C. as long as he had breath in his body; grabbed the airplane and went home. That is Commissioner Stiles.

The Chairman: Workmen's Compensation was a real flower at the beginning of the century when introduced by Meredith. It was the first of its kind. The trouble is it has not been maintained and adequately brought up to date, as you point out. That happens to a lot of plans.

Mr. Neveu: Manpower is the same thing.

Senator Fergusson: Mr. Chairman, there is one thing I would like to say while we are discussing this. I certainly do not know anything about the people who administer the Workmen's Compensation Act in Ontario. I come from New Brunswick, and I think it would be very inappropriate for me to comment on how they administer it. Besides, we are not having their side of the question at all. I have great sympathy with the people who have had difficulties themselves.

On page 4 you make the statement:

It is this type of a silent wall of bureaucracy that faces not only the injured workman but all the poor of Canada in their relationships with government and government agencies

I take exception to that, and I think I have a right to do that because of my own personal experience. For a number of years I administered a federal department in the province of New Brunswick, I was head of that department, and I can tell you that the poor people got just as much attention, in many cases more attention, from our department as people who tried to push us around because they were more important. We had some of them too and they got very little attention.

I can tell you particularly of one case that I discovered, which I thought had been decided wrongly. At great personal inconvenience I investigated it. I even gave up one of my holiday terms to be sure to get at the basis of it. Finally I got a decision favouring the poor person who had applied, and they got a large settlement.

The people I worked with were very interested. I might say that nobody even said "thank you" to me for doing it. I know from my personal experience that this generalization about all civil servants is just not true. There are many dedicated civil servants.

Mr. Neveu: There are many dedicated civil servants. We are not saying it is the civil servants. It is the legislative acts that they are bound by.

The Chairman: You are not saying anything good about us either. Go ahead.

Mr. Neveu: I was saying about Manpower. I worked for twenty-three years and I contributed all my life into Manpower, which was unemployment insurance when I started at the age of fourteen. At sixteen I was working in a shipyard on corvettes. I paid into this. I never went to Manpower. I collected once for two weeks, unemployment insurance in my lifetime.

I had an unfortunate accident, which is a minor accident; I fell 65 feet. I split my eye and my chin and I went back to work two weeks later. Here is a very minor accident which comes into a permanent disability. I never asked for a pension. All I ask is to be rehabilitated into something else in which I can make $125, though I used to make $400 a week previously. All I want is something to make myself independent. I asked them for $3,000 to maintain my family while I was rehabilitating myself and keep their pension and they rejected me. They said the program I was going to undertake was too expensive. That is kind of degrading for me. Manpower certainly does not retain anybody to be competitive in the field. I have been told by the general manager of Manpower that it would cost too much money to retrain people to be competitive.

The Chairman: Have you any further questions?

Senator Carter: I was going to ask one last question. You say here that the unions are not very much interested in your complaints; at least, they do not seem to be interested in fighting your battles. Is there any reason for that?

Mr. Neveu: Unions are fighting battles every day, they are fighting them like we are in individual cases. They have full compensation committees; but they are not the power and the tool that could make these changes. These are immediate changes that they could do this Act if they used this power. They have not been willing to do this. Unions are very comfortable collecting $10 a month, but when it comes right down to the grass roots who decides these policies? It is not the workers, the grass roots who decide policies and what action should be taken against this Act, change it. They have made many briefs, mine, you, and submitted them to the Minister of Labour and they have just been ignored.

Senator Carter: You cite one case here where a person got injured, and when they imputed his compensation they took into consideration his leave so that his average for the three or four weeks went down because they included weeks when he was not working. Surely that is the cause of the wording in the Act, that instead of "Working weeks" somebody said "Weeks". Surely the unions, I would think, would say: "Here is something that is a technicality that obviously should be changed". Why are not the unions fighting this? They meet with the government once at least a year. Surely they could point out this simple change that needs to be made. Why is it not being done?

Mr. Neveu: I do not know. They are not using their power. To me, when you are making this, and I have been looking at this and this is what I have been saying, that this is merely a technicality. They said: "Well, would you be willing to contribute to this?" I said that if it meant full compensation, I would put $2 a week in it, which would be $50 a month, sure I would be willing to, because I knew when I am hurt I would be drawing so much full compensation until I am rehabilitated. They said that again you are running the risk of being like a welfare recipient: he would not want to go back to work because he is drawing too much money. Tell me that is a lie; that is middle-class thinking.

Senator Carter: That is not the question.

Mr. Neveu: It is a technicality.

The Chairman: No, the question was why the unions had not engrossed themselves in this: to assist you, if what you say is an obvious injustice. That is the question. You can either answer it or you do not know.

Mr. Neveu: They have been very silent; they have been doing this but it is very silent. The brief says, they have made concessions to the government; "We will leave you alone and you leave us alone". We are satisfied that is the way things are going.

The Chairman: Thank you. I have the people from Hamilton and I have Mrs. Polgar here. Thank you for coming up. The Manpower aspect of it has come before us on many occasions, and we intend to pay particular attention to the point you make.

Mr. Neveu: The point has been made before but we have not been to grips with it seriously.

The Chairman: No, the point has been made by other people.

Mr. Neveu: May I ask one question?

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Neveu: After you have travelled all through Canada and you have spent a great deal of money, what do you believe you will accomplish that you do not already know of the needs of the people?

The Chairman: All I can tell you is that we are spending less money than anybody would anticipate, because whether we are here or whether we are in Ottawa our salaries go on. You must realize we hope to be a very effective committee. We hope to make recommendations that will appeal to the Canadian people and appeal to the Government of Canada in bringing in legislation that will alleviate and to a great extent eradicate poverty. We are quite confident.

Mr. Neveu: Thank you very much.

The Chairman: Is Mrs. Polgar here?

Mrs. Doris Power: My name is Doris Power and I am representing the Just Society.

The Chairman: Mrs. Polgar arranged to be here. Come right up.

Mrs. Power: We have a statement to make to the senators and to the public here today.

We have a new fashion in the land of Canada: we have discovered the poor. Our thought, research and action are more and more focused on the poor and on poverty. We talk about them, study them, describe them, get angry at them, and we even send around Senate Committees to search for answers, and the answers seem so hard to come by. Our hard-working public servants travel laboriously from city to city and from village to village. They set up shop in schoolhouses or halls like this still quaint with the regal flavour of an empire in demise, and they look for answers to the problems. They listen to poor people, social workers, club women, do-gooders, and do-badders. They listen and the answers seem to escape them.

What a strange malady this thing called poverty! Yet all the people who participate in this ritual, they come and they read briefs—some of them are not so brief; they decry inequity or attack the poor or suggest education or rehabilitation or sterilization or isolation, and the senators listen and nod their heads and ask questions, and somehow there are no answers. Just suggestions—like the guaranteed annual income or more money for older people or a better education. The senators tell us to appreciate the great effort they are making in our interests; be sure that they have our best interests at heart.

Let us stop kidding each other; let us not play games with each other, and let us end this ritual; end the string of briefs and questions. We of the Just Society movement decry this cynical game. We know there are large corporations raping our land, polluting our air and laying off thousands of workers in one fell swoop when their profits dipped somewhat.

We ask: what is the answer to this thing called poverty, how can we find it? We know there are thousands and thousands of people at the mercy of land developers and unscrupulous slum landlords, who are prey, just as the chicken is prey to the hawk or the rabbit is prey to the mountain lion. And we keep on asking: Why is there poverty? Why is housing so bad?

We know that there is a vast amount of wealth in the hands of a few; we know that 45 per cent of the income is grabbed by less than 5 or 10 per cent of the population in this country, and we cannot understand why there is not enough to go around. We know that the immense wealth and the natural resources are in the hands of private individuals, many of them in a foreign land, while our own people starve—and we cannot understand why there is not enough to go around.

We demand that this farce stop. We demand that if this committee wishes to study anything, it should study wealth, not poverty. We demand that the committee study the nature of oppression in this country, not the oppressed.

There are answers to poverty. You refuse to ask the right questions, and until you do you will not get the right answers, only more deceit.

This view of your function is shared by the members of the Just Society movement. Your committee has no sanction in our eyes and no value until it starts to ask the right questions; until it brings the owners of the mining companies and the automobile companies and the growing list of American subsidiaries here ask them how they contribute to poverty in Canada.

It is for this reason that the Just Society movement has submitted no formal brief to this committee. We record our protest in these words.

It needs to be pointed out, however, that we are a democratic organization. It is for this reason that you heard from one of our members concerning one small facet of this life—inequity and oppression that we face. He and his committee members made the decision to present their brief. They are nonetheless in accord with our overall feeling.

I might add that we are people committed to action. We want change. Reform is not acceptable to us, and we will not legitimize this type of social bullshit!

The Chairman: Will the Hamilton group come forward. Our next presentation is to be made by the Social Planning and Research Council of Hamilton and District. On my immediate right is Reuel S. Amdur, planning associate. Next to him is Mr. Patrick T. Hunt who is a senior partner and executive of the national public accounting firm of MacGillivray and Company. Next to him is Dr. Frank E. Jones, Chairman of the Research Advisory Committee of the Social Planning and Research Council of Hamilton and District, professor of sociology at McMaster University. Mr. Hunt will begin to discuss the brief.

Mr. Patrick T. Hunt, F.C.A. (Chairman, Poverty Committee and Treasurer of the Social Planning and Research Council of Hamilton and District): Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and honourable senators. I would like also to indicate that there are other members of our delegation here in the audience, notably Mr. Donald Cannon, president of the Social Planning and Research Council of Hamilton and District; Mr. E. Pennington, Executive director of the Council; Mr. Robert Arnold, research associate. There are other members of the policy committee in the audience.

Mr. Chairman and honourable senators, on behalf of the Social Planning and Research Council of Hamilton and District, I thank you for this opportunity to appear before you. We hope the brief will make a significant contribution towards achieving your objectives in finding and elucidating the problems of poverty in Canada.

Before addressing myself to the contents of my submission, I propose to devote a minute or two to explain the structure of the organization in regard to the brief.

First I refer to page iii of our brief. Here is the list of the Board of Directors of the Social Planning and Research Council of Hamilton and District. These people are elected or appointed by the citizens of the Hamilton district by virtue of their involvement in specific social services, or because they are concerned generally with the scope and quality of social services in the Hamilton district.

An executive Committee is elected annually which carries out the policies of the board, utilizing professional staff employed by the Council.

The basic objectives of the Council are indicated on page 61. In brief they are research, coordination of existing services and planning social welfare services in Hamilton and district.

This Board resolved to make a submission, at the invitation of the Senate Committee, and assigned to it the highest priority.

I now refer to the previous page (ii) wherein are listed the members of the Committee on Poverty. Most of these people are involved in poverty—all of them are involved in poverty in some way or another. There are no members of the committee who have been stricken by the disease. The only person who has not been involved to any great extent is myself, the chairman, and I assumed a neutral role as chairman of the committee since my experience of poverty has not exceeded that of the average citizen.

In considering the approach to our work, we were confronted with two major constraints, that of available time and available staff. We were forced to decide between the broad all inclusive approach to this extensive and very complex problem of poverty, or concentration on specific aspects. We chose the latter. Why? Because we felt that the broader approach would produce superficial and inconclusive results, while the in-depth study of the specific aspects of poverty would produce more reliable results.

I refer you to the table of contents in our brief at page iv, wherein the selected areas of study are indicated. First of all, chapter 1 was "A Working Definition of Poverty". It was necessary for us to define poverty for our purposes so that we could come to grips with the problem. Chapter 2 deals with some general characteristics of poverty in Hamilton.

Chapter 3 is selected approaches to improving living standards of the poor in Hamilton and district, dealing specifically with public assisted housing. Chapter 4 deals with the role of social planning councils in dealing with poverty.

Unfortunately, Mr. Chairman, the timing of your visit to Toronto is somewhat premature for us. A significant and vital part of our brief is missing. It concerns a survey of some two hundred low income families. While the information from the survey is in and is in the process of collation with the use of the computer, we are a week or two from completing the study and drawing conclusions.

From the advance information that we have received relative to the hearings of the Senate Committee, we understand that you are most anxious to receive first-hand knowledge from people who are poor. We sincerely hope that you will find it possible for us to meet you again to present this very important supplement to our brief.

At page 1 of our brief in the introduction, we have defined the region about which we are talking. It is Hamilton and district, comprising the Hamilton Metropolitan area of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, simply consisting of the City of Hamilton, Wentworth County and the Town of Burlington. It also indicates the importance of a study of the poverty problems in this area and an overall study of the problems of poverty in Canada. It is an area of a high level of economic activity; and it is evidence that such a high level of activity, important as it is, is not by itself the total solution to the problems of poverty.

The poverty existing in Hamilton is the poverty of a modern industrial city, the kind of poverty we can expect in other areas that are in the process of beginning to industrialize.

We then feel, Mr. Chairman and senators, that this is a most important area for us to discuss in the overall context of poverty, because it will give indications of future poverty in other areas of Canada.

Our recommendations, contained on pages (v) to (vii) of the brief are as follows:

The recommendations contained in this brief focus primarily on means which will improve conditions for those in poverty. We urge that governments at all levels explore through research and trial projects the means for eliminating poverty in Canada. All Canadians in need should receive the kind of help necessary to bring them beyond the poverty level through an uncomplicated mechanism that does not infringe on the dignity of the recipient.

SOCIAL WELFARE

1. Public assistance grants should not be below the poverty line, and there should be work incentives beyond the poverty line. At least until such time as grants are raised to the poverty line, additional money for public assistance is probably best spent in increasing the size of grants rather than in improving casework services. In no case should receipt of public assistance be dependent upon willingness to accept casework help.

2. The Province of Ontario should cease looking at social welfare as a program for community casualties only. It should adopt legislation making possible programs such as information services and other services for the entire community.

3. The Province of Ontario should pass legislation making it possible for the Province to take advantage of the Canada Assistance Plan in supplementing the income of those fully employed in jobs paying less than public assistance. It should also increase the amount that single parents receiving assistance and wishing to work may keep.

4. Public assistance programs at all levels should involve citizen committees and advisory boards on which representatives of recipients are included, and these programs should aim at increasing public appreciation for and understanding of public assistance through providing "community leaders" with opportunities to learn more about public assistance, through use of a program including going on home visits, with the consent of the clients.

5. All public assistance in Ontario should be provided through a single Provincial Department of Social and Family Services or through regional agencies with all operating functions, operating under regulations set down by a Provincial Department. There should be an adequate number of branch offices for accessibility, and public assistance workers throughout the area should be assigned caseloads in accordance with the degree and type of their training and experience. Scholarship help and leaves of absence should be available for public welfare staff wishing educational advancement and capable of utilizing it.

6. Various practices which tend to degrade recipients, such as taking licenses away, paying rent directly to landlords, holding interviews under unfavorable conditions, and asking recipients to be available for home visits over extended periods of time, should be eliminated whenever they occur. Control of client expenditure of money is appropriate only when the client is incapable of handling his money.

7. There should be programs to provide basic adult education for rehabilitation persons who are not able to read or write at a minimally adequate level or who lack basic arithmetic skills.

8. There is need for more Canadian research in and by public assistance agencies.

HOUSING

9. The Federal Government should gather data about housing on a regular basis in central cities, metropolitan areas and provinces. The data should provide information about vacancy rates and quality of dwelling units, from a sample of dwelling units, occupied and vacant, rental and otherwise.

10. The Federal Government should cease using housing as an economic regulator.

11. Appropriate levels of government should provide much more public housing and should take measures to increase the quantity of housing. Quantity of housing can be increased through more non-profit and cooperative construction and renovation made possible by low interest and non-interest long-term loans, loan guarantees, and grants. Stringent measures to counteract the inflation in land costs can be expected to increase quantity of housing even further.

12. Locally, a single department should be responsible for receipt of complaints related to quality of housing.

13. Quality of housing should be upgraded, using such approaches as tax holidays for improvement of substandard dwelling units and municipal trusteeship of substandard units.

THE ROLE OF SOCIAL PLANNING COUNCILS

14. As most programs require some degree of adaptation to local conditions, the Government should be aware of the social planning councils as a major resource in making these adaptations. The Government should take steps to make it possible for social planning councils to obtain Federal funds to carry out demonstration projects and to provide a continuing source for the kind of research information which they are in a unique position to supply.

15. Other social planning councils and voluntary agencies generally should become involved in assisting the organization of low-income citizen groups and in involving them more fully in existing organizations.

Dealing with a working definition of poverty, may I refer you to page 9 of our submission, wherein we have developed poverty lines for Hamilton in 1969 by family size. For example, we have established $2,200 as being the poverty line for a single person; $4,800 for a four-person family; $7,700 for an eight-person family—after adjustments for family allowances and income tax.

Our report says to you, Mr. Chairman and honourable senators, that we are able to conclude from our studies with a reasonable degree of certainty that, compared with Canada and with Ontario, Metro Hamilton is more fortunate in that its percentage of families in poverty is lower, its income levels are higher, its income distribution is more compact, indicating a lesser proclivity to poverty. The percentage of families in poverty has declined between 1961 and 1969 from 19 per cent to 13 per cent of families, or in absolute numbers from 19 thousand to between 15 and 17 thousand. The tendency to poverty increases rapidly with family size to over 50 per cent for families of eight, notwithstanding which three-quarters of the families in poverty consist of five persons or less. The preponderance of families in poverty about two in three include a wage earner.

Poor families tend to live in specified areas of the Hamilton district, and the correlation is demonstrated between the extent of poverty and the degree of juvenile delinquency in these areas.

Mr. Chairman, I would refer you to page 21 of our brief, wherein we have indicated some policy implications emanating from some of the comments in our brief. The first one is relative to retired couples. Close to 20 per cent of the poor families in Metropolitan Hamilton appear to be retired couples. The implication is that since one cannot expect retired couples to obtain employment, poverty in this group must be primarily dealt with through income support programs. We were very gratified to see in the press yesterday that there is some suggestion that the guaranteed annual income supplement for aged persons might be increased. The increase suggested in the report would bring the retired couple up to the poverty lines we suggest within $200. We would hope that the $500 allowance which is available for income tax purposes to people over 70 would become available to people of 65 to 70, which is not the case at the moment.

The second policy implication is on page 23. The percentage of poverty increases rapidly with family size, rising to over 50 per cent in eight or more person families. The implication here is a need for very careful consideration of more adequate birth control programs, bearing in mind that they must be acceptable to those they are attempting to serve.

The third implication is an important one, relative to the geographical distribution of the poor. It is often said that in our kind of society the poor are invisible. This partially reflects their concentration in areas where middle and upper income people are relatively few. In terms of policy, what this is liable to mean is that the people who exercise a dominant influence will have little contact with poverty and, accordingly, will fail to see it as an important issue. This raises the question of how to develop an awareness of poverty among middle class groups.

Mr. Chairman, we also discovered, without searching too hard, that a stigma is attached to poverty. The rest of society regards the poor with a strong element of suspicion. We are sure that the matter of public attitudes towards the poor has been presented in other briefs to you. It bears repeating, however, since the condition is obvious to the most casual observer. It is a major obstacle in developing plans and programs to deal with poverty effectively, since governments tend to react to public opinion.

We also found that housing is in short supply in Hamilton district and with the high cost of land rents are commensurately high, and inadequate sub-par housing is claiming premium rents in consequence.

I will now speak to our recommendations on pages (v), (vi) and (vii), which are directed to all levels of government. The implication contained there is that on-going research sponsored and carried on by the government should be directed to establishing new forms of public assistance. It was outside the scope of our possibility, having the restrictions of time and also of data, to make an in-depth study of other forms of public assistance. In any event, Mr. Chairman, we feel that this is the government's role. They have the information, they know the priorities within the other problems in the country. They know the extent of the economy and the ability of the economy to meet any proposed plan. We are most anxious to indicate that an on-going system of research should be conducted to find better ways of meeting public assistance.

It was not the primary purpose of our Council in authorizing the preparation of this brief, to plead the cause of the poor. It was a research project designed within the constrictions of the available time and the available data, to determine the fact. The facts determined within these constrictions indicate, however, that positive planning is urgently needed to alleviate the plight of the poor; for while the structure and characteristics of poverty in Hamilton and district compare favourably with Canada and Ontario, the fact remains that the number of poor families in Hamilton and district who are struggling below the poverty lines is estimated to be somewhere between 15 thousand and 16 thousand. Notwithstanding the economic affluence of our region, we are only able to portray a gruesome picture of poverty within it, and we can assume that the picture which depicts the conditions in the rest of Canada is even more gruesome.

When the results of our survey of low income families are collated and we have drawn our conclusions, we expect to throw more light on the specific problems of the poor.

On behalf of the Council, I reiterate our hope that you will permit us to communicate to you the findings of the survey. For our part, we would be prepared to meet with you in Ottawa if need be.

In closing, Mr. Chairman and honourable senators, I can do no better than repeat the sentiments of our Council as expressed in the last paragraph of our introduction on page 2. It is our fervent hope that the interest of the Special Senate Committee and the efforts of those who have made submissions to you, will have impact beyond research and reports into areas of new policy and its implementation. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: I cannot help but comment that there is a group of very young people in the audience who have had an exceptional opportunity to hear one of the very best briefs, presented in an excellent manner. This is a real treat that you have had this morning, and I want to call your attention to it, Senator Pearson.

Senator Pearson: Referring to housing in your recommendations, I wonder if it is possible for you to answer this question. How many vacant units are there in Hamilton, and are these units privately owned or are some of them public housing?

Mr. Hunt: Senator Pearson, I will refer this question to Mr. Amdur, who was instrumental in preparing the report relative to housing.

Mr. Reuel S. Amdur (Planning Associate, The Social Planning and Research Council of Hamilton and District): One of the problems that we face in doing this study is that there is no place in which there is detailed information about the extent of the vacancy rate.

On page 49, in the discussion of the summary of the housing situation, we have a vacancy rate for Hamilton in May 1968 in single detached houses, for rent or sale, of 1.3 per cent; in apartments where there are six or more units, the vacancy rate for rentals was 1.3 per cent in 1969.

One of the concerns that we came to in this report is that the reporting of vacancies and of housing conditions is really inadequate and that there was a need for improvement here.

With regard to public housing, Hamilton is blessed with a fairly good situation as far as the number of units of public housing is concerned, compared to other areas of Canada, but in absolute terms I do not think that the situation could be described as good.

If you look at table VIII on page 46, you will see the number of units administered by the Hamilton Housing Authority, which totalled 1,693. This is for family housing, and the waiting list is almost as large as the number of units, with planned construction for 1970 being 387 units.

On the preceding page there is a discussion of senior citizen units. There were 803 units in 1969, with an additional 594 scheduled for struction. The waiting list as of October 1st, 1969, was 1,237 for bachelor apartments and 306 couples.

Senator Pearson: I do not suppose you can answer this other point. What are the conditions of the vacant units? Are they habitable or getting down to the point where they are going to be destroyed?

Mr. Amdur: There are two comments on this. We have to have some more detailed information on this from the survey. The other comment I would make is that from the information we have, the housing available for the poor families is frequently not very good. Again, we suffer from the problem of a lack of standard, regular gathering of data on this subject; but one person on our poverty committee who had at one point worked for the Hamilton Public Welfare Department, indicated that some place between a third and a fourth of the houses that she went into suffered serious deficiencies. Some place in the brief, though I do not have the page number at my fingertips, one of the city aldermen, Alderman Scanlon, reported that he could think, without any difficulty, of a thousand units of low income housing—not public housing but low income housing—which, if he were to turn them into the Hamilton and Wentworth Health Unit, would have to be evacuated, but he does not do so because there are not other units in which to place these families.

Senator Pearson: It would seem to me, then, that there is a definite and great need for a proper survey of all housing as it comes on the market for sale and for rent, so that you will know just exactly where you stood in the city.

Mr. Amdur: I would think that beyond that there is a need for a periodic census of housing, according to quality and according to status, whether it is vacant or occupied.

Senator Pearson: So that the City or the welfare organization who takes charge of this housing would be able to spot right away whether there is a house or vacant unit to be built and its condition?

Mr. Amdur: I think we are talking about two different things. I am talking about gathering information on the condition generally. You are talking about the problems faced by the individual person in finding a decent place, and dealing with the problems of individual enforcement, and I think certainly there is a reason for that. I think what I am suggesting is perhaps easier.

Senator Pearson: Thank you very much.

Senator Carter: Mr. Chairman, recommendation number 3 is:

the Province of Ontario should pass legislation making it possible for the province to take advantage of the Canada Assistance Plan in supplementing the incomes of those fully employed in jobs paying less than public assistance.

Is there any special reason for saying that legislation is required? My understanding of it is that legislation is not required. I would like to ask Mr. Hunt or any of his associates whether they are aware that some poor provinces are already doing this?

The Chairman: Senator Carter, they take your word for it. They are not lawyers. He thought that the municipalities would require legislation by the Ontario Legislature, but I have just wised him up, and he knows now. Your question was: why is it not in effect in Ontario when it is in effect in many other provinces?

Senator Carter: Yes.

The Chairman: The answer is it could be, I think, that is all.

Mr. Hunt: I think you have answered the question, Mr. Chairman. Probably we are mistaken on that. The fact of the matter is the province is not operating under that particular legislation, and the moneys which could be available to meet a need are not there.

Senator Carter: On page 9 you have a table of poverty lines for families of various sizes. That table, if I understand your brief correctly, was compiled by taking the food budget of the provincial or municipal department as 70 per cent and then expanding it up to 100 per cent. Is that how that table was compiled?

Mr. Hunt: Dr. Jones can answer this question more specifically, senator, but I think I can answer that one, that three elements of cost between food, clothing and housing, were determined from various sources, and you are right that the Hamilton Public Welfare Department is the information relative to food and clothing; then 10/7ths of that figure was calculated to extend the figures; then certain other adjustments for family allowance and income tax were calculated. Dr. Jones, would you care to enlarge upon that?

Dr. Frank E. Jones (Chairman of the Research Advisory Committee of the Social Planning and Research Council of Hamilton and District): I think the only thing I can add is that we did do exactly what Mr. Hunt said: we took the judgment of the Welfare Department in reaching a decision. When the Economic Council of Canada devised its poverty lines for the country, they used a survey that had been done by the Bureau of Statistics for 1957, I think it was. We wanted to have more up-to-date costs.

In trying to define poverty levels in money terms, since this is arbitrary, we took a position similar to that of the Economic Council and said that if the minimal amount of money that people have to spend for housing and food and clothing equals 70 per cent of their income, they are in poverty. Then we took the amount of money that the Welfare Department suggested in terms of their standard allowances and they might very well be an under-estimate.

Senator Carter: That is my next question. To what extent did you examine these food and clothing allowances and compare them with the actual prices that prevail in Hamilton?

Dr. Jones: I do not think we did that, but what we are doing now is that we are carrying out a survey of approximately 200 families, and at least 60 per cent of those are below the hard poverty lines as we have defined them. We are asking them detailed questions about expenditures of various sorts, so that we will have a better basis for assessing these poverty lines than we now have. At this point we thought the best judgment was to ask the Welfare Department's recommendations.

Senator Fergusson: Mr. Chairman, I just have a short question. I am sorry, I have to leave, but I would like to have the opportunity to raise it. I would like to say to the Committee that from my friend in Hamilton I learned that your Committee on poverty was devoting a great deal of time and effort to preparing a brief for our Committee. I certainly think, from the brief you have presented, that the time is well spent, and that it is going to be most useful to us. I have read the section on housing, and I know it is going to be extremely useful, because the information you have given us is very good. There is one thing I would like you to elaborate on, however, and that is recommendation 12 under "Housing":

Locally, a single department should be responsible for receipt of complaints relative to quality of housing

Would you elaborate on that a little?

Mr. Hunt: Yes, I will ask Mr. Amdur to reply to that.

Mr. Amdur: Currently there are several places that enforce legislation or by-laws regarding housing. For example, the fire department is concerned with fire hazards, the health department is concerned with some kinds of considerations; the building department is concerned with others. These are within the City of Hamilton.

In Wentworth County, again, the Hamilton Wentworth Health Unit might be involved. Each municipality has its own building department with its own regulations. Burlington has a different operation because they are currently in Halton County, so they are affected by another county as well as local jurisdictions. The whole thing can be exceedingly confusing, especially to a person who may not be particularly knowledgeable about where to go with problems.

Senator Fergusson: This is a wider field than I had taken from your recommendation. I thought you meant that instead of having supervisors in certain places to whom you could make complaints, there would be one central place.

Mr. Amdur: No, I think the important thing is that there be one place to put a complaint into. If you feel that your place is unsafe because of the stairs, I would think you might call the same place as you would call if you were afraid your boiler was going to blow up.

Senator Carter: In your first recommendation on page (v) you say:

Public assistance grants should not be below the poverty line, and there should be work incentives beyond the poverty line

The more I think about this, the more I am beginning to agree with it, but how would you prefer these incentives to be calculated? Would you prefer that the incentive be a percentage of earnings, on a percentage basis or on a flat rate basis? Have you given any thought to that?

Mr. Hunt: No, we have not given any thought in Committee. Each of us, I daresay, as our own independent thoughts. I would like to say, relative to the question of incentives, one member of our Committee who is in poverty has all the incentive in the world to do part time work, but in actual fact to do so would mean she would be worse off than she is under the present program.

So we are committed to that principle, and my own personal thoughts are that perhaps a certain amount of money that an individual might be able to keep in part time situations in a local or provincial welfare programs, could be on a sliding scale. As to the form of that scale and the extent of it, I have no idea, but just my first reaction to it is that there could be something of that sort.

Senator Carter: Are you saying that the incentive should diminish as the earnings increase?

Mr. Hunt: That is my original reaction to the senator.

Senator Carter: Just one last question, Mr. Chairman. You mention a single department, eventually, to handle all different forms of public assistance.

The Chairman: Do you mind just for one moment, Chester, because Mr. Hunt is a pretty distinguished accountant. How do you see it? Never mind either of your associates. Do you see the problem that Senator Carter has raised, the question of the approach on the basis of universality or as against selectivity.

Mr. Hunt: Mr. Chairman, how do I see it? As I say, we have not investigated this at all. I just felt that we did not have the resources to go into this kind of thing. I know this is an extremely complex problem. I know there is much material written on it, and that there is information in the United States relative to the types of public assistance that one can go into. I have seen reports written by our own Tax Foundation here in Canada.

It seems to me that the choice is between guaranteed annual income, negative income tax and tax credits. I feel personally that one has to be extremely careful about going into a guaranteed annual income program. It is implied in our brief that some different programs must be developed.

Certainly, as I indicated earlier, the government is really the only organization that can study this and the great implications it has for our country, simply because the economy of our country is the key. There are other countries in the world that are poor, and where the people are poor, simply because the economy is not able to support them. So I say again that it is the government that must carry out on-going research into this problem all the time.

However, I feel that because of the complex nature of poverty, one can go into things like alcoholism, mental health, physical health—all causes of poverty; and it seems to me that there has to be some kind of a direct approach into the cause so that one deals with poverty on a case type of method, something like what we have now. I cannot think that an overall program of guaranteed annual income would necessarily solve our problem, let alone the effects it might have on our economy. I can still see that we would have major problems in all these specific areas of poverty.

However, Mr. Chairman, I do not want to commit myself, the Committee or the Social Planning and Research Council of Hamilton, because we have made a statement; we say it is a question for the government to carry out on-going research to see what it can do. First of all, it has to decide the priority. Does it want to do away with public assistance; does it want to do away with it or diminish it? Having decided that, it has to decide how it is going to do it and the impact it has in relation to the economy and other priorities it might have.

Dr. Jones: May I make just a brief comment, not as an expert because I am not an expert on guaranteed income or income maintenance plans; but it seems to me that if the thing we are talking about is material and not spiritual poverty, then the answer is that we must have more equal distribution of income. It is obvious. This is the problem.

I think there are two ways in which you can do this primarily. One is that you can upgrade the skills of people so that they have greater resources and earn more—and this is what specialized education plans and the like can do in training. You can improve the productivity of the country generally by technological means. However, I think you have also to face that you have to redistribute income.

From what we know of recent studies in the United States and Great Britain, at least, it is that the existing welfare systems have not accomplished it. On the whole, the British study by Titmuss and a man by the name of Kolko who has written a book in the United States, indicate that over the considerable period of time that welfare plans have been in existence the redistribution of income has been very slight. In fact Kolko states that his research shows that the really poor area is really worse off, and some of the shifting around seems to be in the lower groups, a little higher group at the expense of lower groups, rather than the upper levels. At the very high levels there has been shift around.

The Chairman: Doctor, what is the Canadian experience?

Dr. Jones: I am not an economist and an economist might contradict me, but in my brief looking around at studies of distribution of income in Canada and the effect of welfare problems, I have not found any research on it. I do not know that we have looked at this in Canada. This is one of our needs.

The Chairman: Our research indicates that there has been no real re-distribution since 1952.

Dr. Jones: That is fairly recent. Titmuss, I think, did this from about 1900 or so, and Kolko's is a long period.

Mr. Amdur: One thing that has struck me, I did a lot of thinking over the particular recommendation that all Canadians in need should receive the kind of help necessary to bring them beyond the poverty level through an uncomplicated mechanism that does not infringe on the dignity of the recipient.

As someone recently from the United States, the thing that struck me about the Canadian social welfare system is the existence of the family allowance. It seems to me that by realizing a combination of the family allowance and the income tax system, one could produce a very simple form of guaranteed income. If on the 20th of each month we had a family and individual allowance of a size sufficient to meet the poverty level, one would in one fell swoop abolish poverty.

Senator Cook: I have been very interested, Mr. Chairman, in the discussion between Mr. Hunt and Dr. Jones. Following along their first recommendation, many briefs have also suggested either a guaranteed annual income or a substantial increase in family allowances and a substantial increase in old age security. Now, just assume for the moment that in the immediate future public funds are not available for all these three recommendations. Have you any suggestion as to which should have priority? You need not try to answer it now but perhaps you would address yourself to that when you come back to us in Ottawa.

The Chairman: Do you mind, Senator Cook just adding in there when you speak of the guaranteed income, asking them also about negative income tax, just to include that?

Mr. Hunt: Mr. Chairman, may I just interrupt to ask if you would let me have a written question.

The Chairman: You will have a copy. There are any senators who would like to ask questions for later reply, I would appreciate your indicating.

Senator Inman: I have one of those. Do you consider it would be advantageous to people needing help if some public assistance programs were consolidated into one unit? This was suggested, and I wonder what you think about it.

The Chairman: Do you want him to consider that or answer it now?

Senator Inman: Whatever they feel like doing.

The Chairman: They have it in the recommendations, he says, Where No. 5, it is in there. They are agreeing with the kind of evidence we have had before us about consolidating.

Senator Inman: Thank you very much.

Senator McGrand: This question could be answered at a future date, but I would like some consideration now. My question deals with the problem of finding housing for people who have been displaced by new building in their neighbourhood. What is your opinion on the policy of tearing down fairly old but adequately maintained buildings—two, three or four storeys, which are sound buildings, and erecting high-rise apartment buildings? I realize that this gives an increase of land value and an increase of taxes to the City, and is good for the developer, but as a rule does it serve the public need. This is a big question.

The Chairman: Could we leave the big ones, Doctor, for another day? We will deal with the little ones today.

Senator McGrand: I know, but I want further consideration.

The Chairman: Let me just explain what I have in mind. I have a list of senators here who want to ask questions, and we could be here all afternoon. I have a lady from Hamilton with some views on this who cannot come back on another occasion, and we would like to hear from her. I have the former senior controller of the City, Mrs. Margaret Campbell, a very distinguished citizen, who wants to say a few words, and I think we ought to give her the opportunity. On top of that, we have airplane accommodation. You have been working very hard for a great many days.

Here is what I propose. At this moment I want to say to the committee that this is one of the most significant briefs that we have had. It is a credit to the City and a credit to your Committee. I notice the price of it is one dollar and it is a bargain. It ought to be thoroughly read. You have some further work at you are going to do, you have some further questions; and we may even ask you to do a little more than that by sending you some other material that we would like you to take a look at, because we have some appreciation of your judgment. So you are going to be asked to come back to Ottawa, and you have indicated you are quite happy to do that. We will arrange that at a convenient time for all of us, if that is all right with you.

Mr. Hunt: Yes, that is very fine, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: So that at this moment, with the consent of the senators, I want to start from this lady from Hamilton. Would you come up, please? It is very embarrassing to have the lady walk up to me and say, "Senator Croll, I remember you when you were mayor of Windsor and I was a very little girl". Incidentally, this lady wishes to remain anonymous for the purposes of the record.

A Lady from Hamilton: I just wanted to say that our committee has worked very hard and done a terrific job, and we need action, not talk, and passing the buck and all the rest of it. We need a lot of action.

On the recommendation for the incentives to work, along with help for a person in my circumstances, that was my recommendation and I would like to see something done on it. I would prefer to work without losing all my benefits for my family. That is about all I have to say.

The Chairman: You are not getting off that easy because you have raised a very important point, which was raised yesterday in a letter written to Alderman O'Donohue, who read part of the letter. I have read the rest of the letter and that is what they said. The complaint there was that a woman was working and after she had paid her car fare, lunches and certain deductions, she could get more on relief than she could get at the job.

A Lady from Hamilton: That is right.

The Chairman: So they told her to get off the job and go on welfare. Now, is that anything similar to your situation?

A Lady from Hamilton: It is very similar. I have a monthly cheque, and I would be allowed to make $36 a month without it being touched. If I make anything over it, a percentage of it is taken off. Now, what else could I work, because I do not have a trade? At the same time, I could go out and work part time and be home when I should be home, if I was not going to lose my hospitalization, OHSIP, dental and all the rest.

The Chairman: That is the point. The difference between people who work on the low wages and people on welfare is the dental, the medical and other services.

A Lady from Hamilton: These are very important to us.

The Chairman: Of course they are. You made a good point. Thank you very much.

A Lady from Hamilton: Thank you very much.

The Chairman: Mrs. Margaret Campbell. Senators, sitting on my right, is a very distinguished lady, a Queen's Counsel, a lawyer, and for many years in public service in Toronto where she did have a great deal of experience with a sitting committee on poverty in addition to other experience—Mrs. Margaret Campbell whose name is well known to you. She ask for an opportunity to say a few words.

Mrs. Margaret Campbell, Q.C.: Thank you, Mr. Chairman and ladies and gentlemen. I would just like to put a few points, if I may.

On the question of the guaranteed annual income, I am still open to be persuaded, but I am wondering if it is not going to again be a kind of "Band-Aid" service such as we have been doing in this country for the poor.

For example, at this point there are many experts who can tell us at a very early age that a child is going to be in need of special services because it is incipiently either to become a mentally or emotionally disturbed child. Therefore, it seems to me that the funds that are available should go into this preventive service, so that we can bring all of the talents of the community to prevent poverty, and not try to sort of "Band-Aid" treat the thing as we go.

The same thing applies to mental health and health all the way around. In Mayor Givens' "War on Poverty" Committee for the City, one of the things that came up more and more often was the very great effect of bad health on the whole of poverty. The fact is that the preventive health schemes are not here. We are prepared to spend a lot of money for hospitals and this sort of thing, but not to prevent people having to get into hospitals in the first place. So that mental health is one of the important aspects, and yet, if you look at the rules and the funds available, it gets a very small proportion of the national revenue of the country.

I would also like to point to the disabled. The disabled live in an alien community. None of the things are provided for them specially. If you look at some of them, you might wonder how some of them can even get a bath without the kind of things they need.

These people have been prepared to work, and most of them or many of them can be gainfully employed at salaries which could take them off any kind of allowance. But the great thing that has happened with our kind of thinking is that we have said to them: "Fine, if you earn, you get off your fund, pension or whatever you want to call it"; but they cannot afford to do this because they have very sophisticated medical needs. Why can we not bring to bear to the total person the kinds of needs that they have and see that these incentives are there? They have the incentive to work. Marina Lodge will tell you this, any of the people actively engaged will tell you this, that they are afraid to earn because it means they lose their advantages for medical treatment, and they have done this in the past. These are the kind of things, it seems to me, that we should be looking at under poverty. It is not just a lack of money, although that is important; it is also the lack of the things that people need for a total life.

On the question of the welfare allowance, let us take two people living side by side and one man is on the maximum welfare, which I think is $390 a month, and the man next door is earning $390 a month but has all of these deductions.

When you get into public housing, the man who is earning will pay the same rent as the man who is not earning, but the one has no deductions. You use the gross income formula rather than the net. These are the things that make a child look at its parents and say, "The man next door can give his kids this. You can't." So it becomes a thing with children that the father that is working is not a successful man.

I think most of the people I know who are on welfare in the City of Toronto would like to get off it. I can tell you of one woman specifically who tried to get off welfare, did eventually, and she was capable of earning too much to get into public housing. She was not capable of paying an economic rent with a housekeeper to look after her children. Every agency was polled in this woman's case to try to assist her.

It seems to me that with the vast brains in this country, including your own, we must look at ways and means to help people to get out of this welfare situation, because they are not able to live in dignity; but to give just guaranteed annual income is not going to resolve some of these problems to which I have directed your attention.

I would like to say more, but I know you are pressed for time, but I would urge you to think in this direction when you are looking at poverty—the prevention of it. Thank you.

Senator Carter: Mr. Chairman, could I ask Mrs. Campbell to clarify one point. I lost track when she was talking about two families earning $390 a month. I did not quite get that point. To evaluate that, were both families the same size?

Mrs. Campbell: Yes.

Senator Carter: Two families of the same size.

Mrs. Campbell: Yes, I am taking two families of the same size.

Senator Carter: And what was the distinction?

Mrs. Campbell: The distinction is, for instance, that the man who is working has these children who require extensive dental care, for example, and he may not be able to provide it.

The Chairman: Mrs. Campbell, you heard the lady who spoke?

Mrs. Campbell: I did not catch all of her points.

The Chairman: She made exactly the same point as you did, and she said, "I could not go on working because I had dental and medical expenses".

Mrs. Campbell: That is right.

The Chairman: The word in the Canada Assistance Act is "need".

Mrs. Campbell: Yes.

The Chairman: As far as we are concerned, from a federal point of view—we have it through rulings, we have it from the Department—it is an open-end cheque it is up to the provincial government to bill us for 50 per cent of the cost of that. They are free to do it tomorrow and some do.

Mrs. Campbell: One of the things I found it was that it was so difficult to get a definition of need, and we thought when this Act came into existence that it was a very great step forward and we were ready to commend the government for it. However, unfortunately somehow or other along the line—and I am not here to say who is responsible—"need" gets awfully defined out or refined, and it is not working in this way for people.

Surely we must not take the position that someone who is on welfare gets off welfare at a great price, and not give supportive services to them until they establish themselves firmly in the labour market. This is another thing that is so important, because the minute you get a job you are cut off, and they need that support when they are trying desperately to work at a sacrifice. Thank you, sir.

Mrs. Nina Herman: Mr. Chairman, is it possible to add some brief comments?

The Chairman: Yes, go ahead.

Mrs. Herman: I have been sitting here for two and a half meetings listening to these proceedings and hearing many proposals for the amelioration of the problems concerned with poverty, but there is one that I feel has not received sufficient emphasis and I would like to add a few comments on that if I may. This is the question of housing.

Many of the proposals which have been made in these hearings are terribly important, such as guaranteed annual income, negative income tax, family allowances, but it is not enough to put money into the hands of people.

Yesterday Aldermen Sewell and Jaffary proposed that we also have to put power into the hands of the working people. This is also important, but it is not enough.

Mrs. Campbell has also added this morning the importance of preventive services.

All these things are badly needed, but I think there is one more important thing that is desperately needed, and that is for us as a society to establish some goal, some social policy, to do some comprehensive social planning, and continually on this question of housing.

I am a social worker and a committee organizer in the area represented by Aldermen Sewell and Jaffary and if statistics are correct one-third of the people on public assistance live in our area; also one-third of the people in our area are on public assistance of some sort. One of the chief problems these people have is the condition and the high rental cost of their housing. Those who are not pushing enough to live in subsidized housing are living three or four families to an old, decrepit house owned by absentee landlords who do not keep these houses in decent condition, and who charge tremendous prices for rent.

Alderman O'Donohue read a letter yesterday from a woman who pays $150 a month for rent. I know of a woman with six children who pays $40 a week for four terrible rooms with a few sticks of furniture which allow their landlord to rent it as a furnished apartment. She is on welfare. Where do you think the money for the rent comes from? It comes from the food budget; it comes from the non-existent budget for clothing. Principals and teachers in our district tell us: "If only these children could come to school clothed and fed properly, we could get on with our job of educating them, but these kids are hungry".

I think we have to do something about this housing condition. In the short run, I think we must have an established policy of reasonable rents being established and a policy of rent controls. In the long run, I think that the government has to take a look at a plan for the provision of housing for people who need it on a much vaster scale than it has heretofore. I feel that a large part of housing has to be taken out of the profit market and put to the use of the people. Housing must be seen as a social service, and I beg you to look at it this way.

The Chairman: Thank you very much. This concludes our hearings in Toronto. We have been sitting for the last couple of days from nine-thirty in the morning to ten-thirty at night, and we have heard twenty-three briefs.

I think I should make it clear to everyone that we came here because we care, and we are on this Committee because we are concerned.

The voluntary agencies that have appeared before us have presented admirable briefs, which have been very rewarding, and they have made significant contributions. The permanent staff that they brought with them showed up very well. It may be that they brought their best, but their best is very good. They indicated a general concern and involvement.

We came here to give those in poverty an opportunity to state their views. If you have been with us on Tuesday evening, last evening and, of course, at our hearings here, you will realize that we encouraged it because we believe that involvement is most essential to the future of Canada and the future of the people who are at the poverty line and, yes, for those of us who are above the poverty line.

We feel, of course, that in coming here and undertaking these hearings we have given the Senate of Canada new dimensions and a new participatory role. These hearings that we are proceeding with will, we think, in the end improve the life of a great number of people.

We want to thank those people who took the trouble to draft briefs. They are not easy to draft and they take time, but they helped us better to understand poverty.

One of the things that is rather important and one of the reasons that we came to Toronto and that we are going to Montreal and some of the other capital cities, is that for too long we have brushed off poverty belonging to somebody else. Poverty?—the Maritimes, Western Provinces. That is not true and not factual.

The people who came before us, the aldermen who came before us, made a very good impression on us. The various committee said: "Yes, sure we know there is poverty in Toronto, a good proportion of poverty in Toronto". That in itself was significant that the words should come from them, to awaken the Toronto people that these are not faceless people, but they are neighbours and they are friends in whom they have to take some interest.

That people in other parts were saying this to people in other parts. They have to realize that it is not their problem; it is our problem and your problem and my problem, and that is the only way we are going to deal with it. If we awaken, if we resolve to do some sharing, we will do very much to alleviate poverty.

Most of you saw these flowers today. They do not usually throw flowers at me, but this happens to be a significant day for me. I think the members of the Senate and the staff for remembering this day. My days are going very quickly, and there is yet so much to do. Thank you very much on behalf of the committee.

The committee adjourned.

APPENDIX A

A BRIEF
PRESENTED TO THE SENATE COMMITTEE ON POVERTY
BY JUST SOCIETY: VICTIMS OF COMPENSATION AND WELFARE COMMITTEE

My purpose in coming before your committee this morning is to present to you a picture of what happens to people in our society when for one reason or other they are knocked out of the main stream of being productive, conforming and silent citizens. The picture that I will present is based on a random selection of personal cases that have come to my attention since I have been collecting information on people who have been dissatisfied with the treatment that they have received from the Workmen's Compensation Board. I hope that my remarks will assist the Senators in their quest to understand not only the actual conditions of poverty in our country but also how poverty is created, and that these remarks will further illustrate from the point of view of people who are up against the system what an individual has to put up with when he attempts to obtain his rightful assistance from institutions and agencies in our society.

As I mentioned, my remarks will be directed primarily about the operations of the W.C.B. in Ontario. Let me state at the outset that I realize that this Board comes under the jurisdiction of the provincial government, but I feel certain that this will not prevent the Senators from hearing me out for the broader implications of what I see happening are relevant to all areas of government action.

It is also worth noting by way of introduction that it would not alarm me if the Senators are surprised that I should take issue with the W.C.B. I realize that the W.C.B. has a reputation around the world for the efficiency and extent of coverage that it provides. It seems to me however, that such a reputation has been built on the opinions of politicians and W.C.B. administrators and certainly not by consulting those workers in Ontario who have had the misfortune of doing business with the Board.

The first and major point that must be emphasized is that the W.C.B. rather than alleviating and assisting the injured workman, actually acts as a creator of poverty. Numerous are the examples of men, once productive and responsible citizens in the community who, through an accident in the workplace, are reduced to a situation of poverty and many are forced to go on public welfare to eke out an existence.

In this respect there is the question of the amount of pensions. Although it must be stressed that adjusting the amount of pensions will in no way solve the major problems of the W.C.B. it is nevertheless a point which cannot be ignored. We think it is unfair that a ceiling of 75% of $7000 has been placed on the amount of compensation. Why should a worker who has been able to earn in excess of $7000 a year, and who has contributed to the finances of the country on that basis, be deprived of remuneration once he has had an accident.

The situation is even worse if a worker is fatally injured. In assessing pensions for widows at $125.00 a month with a $50.00 allowance for each child, the Board has condemned the family of a worker killed on the job to a life of poverty. The only alternative for a widow in such a position is to find employment herself in order to maintain her family (and with the low wages paid to women this is not an easy task) or to re-marry in which case the Board need no longer provide her with a pension.

Apart from the size of fixed pensions, the W.C.B. acts as a creator of poverty in the manner in which it assesses payments. Here many gross inequalities have come to my attention, I refer specifically to the case of Mr. Anton Matas who was injured two days after returning from his holidays. (Appendix A) It was to Mr.

Matas' great misfortune that after saving for several years to return to his homeland, he decided to take in addition to his holidays a ten day leave of absence in order to make the trip worthwhile. In calculating the amount of payment on the basis of his income during the four weeks prior to the accident the Board included his ten day leave of absence in which he earned no money. Thus his compensation was based on 75% of weekly earnings of $83.64 rather than his actual earnings of $135.60 per week.

In a similar vein, it is also interesting to take note of the decision handed down regarding Mr. Giuseppe Zuccaro (Appendix B), who while convalescing on doctor's orders was informed by the Board that his temporary compensation would be cut in half presumably because of the fact that Mr. Zuccaro was recovering. In other words, the Board is penalizing a patient because he responds to treatment. This man in order to survive, has been forced to go on public welfare.

Much suffering is caused by the delay which injured workmen face in receiving payments. This is especially true when a man has been cut off his full compensation and has been allocated a pension for partial disability. In many cases, the man is unable to find new employment yet the Board expects him to live on a pension which is often less than 10% of his previous earnings. Even if the worker decides to appeal the Board's decision he is forced to go on welfare in order to live.

The length of the appeals process subjects the workman to even further hardship. The policy that the Board follows is to provide nothing until the disability has been established and the responsibility lies with the worker to do this. In other words, the workman is judged guilty until he can prove his innocence. We feel that the workman requires more protection and that he should be entitled to his full compensation until his disability pension has been established to his satisfaction, or until the appeal process has been completed.

What is most important about all these points is that the injured workman has little or no say in these decisions and when he is informed of them no reasons are given. It is this type of a silent wall of bureaucracy that faces not only the injured workman but all the poor of Canada in their relations with government and government agencies.

This leads one to take a closer look at the attitude of the Workman's Compensation Board. Although 'general outlook' is a vague subject and certainly difficult to define, never-the-less let me point out that once you come up against the Board you realize in short order that it is also very, very real.

The most concrete example of this attitude is the administration of the W.C.B. Hospital itself. Protests have already been made and have received coverage in the media against the manner in which men and women are treated at the hospital. No longer are they considered responsible adult human beings but instead, they are subjected to a semi-military type existence in which they must sign in and sign out and bring notes and in which a crude form of "behave or we will deduct one half day compensation" coercion exists. (Appendix C)

This attitude however leads to a more serious criticism of the attitude of the Board for it points to a generally accepted notion that every claimant before the Board is, if not an actual, then at least a very real potential fraud. Men who have worked a lifetime to earn a living and provide for their families and have generously paid their way through society suddenly become suspect once they have been injured. This aspect of the entire problem cannot be overlooked for it is often the case that this situation is more difficult to bear than the actual physical injury and when one applies it to the wider operation of poverty it has even more importance. The generally punitive attitude of welfare workers and administrators and even of society at large towards the victims of an industrialized economy is unjustifiable.

It is not difficult to see that this is precisely an employer attitude and we wish to point out that the Board accepts in its operations the point of view and values of the employer. In other words, a man's value lies in his ability to participate as a productive member of industrial society; once he loses that ability then he is no longer of value and is in effect a burden. Although it may be distasteful for you Senators to come to grips with this fact, I assure you, that it is not until you do so that you will begin to understand poverty in our society.

It is also quite evident to me that the Board is very sensitive about having its position questioned. As you know, I have been attempting to organize for the past six months those injured workers who are not satisfied with the decisions of the Board. The response has not raised my opinion about the quality of job that the Board is doing. In this brief time, I have come in contact with over 1700 workers and I have begun to document almost 200 specific cases of injustice. What happens when people attempt to organize and fight for their rights? The answer is all too obvious. Only last week, I was ordered off the grounds of the W.C.B. Hospital although I was there DURING VISITING HOURS AT THE INVITATION OF SEVERAL PATIENTS and the Board without stating its reasons called the police to carry out its orders. I should think that the Senators of our country should be very concerned at the lack of freedom to dissent and appeal that exists (as in this case) especially because it is the powerless poor who are complaining.

The need for such a group of organized dissenters is painfully obvious. Under the present structure of the Board, a patient who is not satisfied with the treatment or settlement which he has received finds himself in the ridiculous position of having to rely on W.C.B. administrators as the only source of advice as to the method and procedure of making appeals. This situation which is at best completely useless, becomes even more frustrating when one realizes the difficulty in communicating from one department to another within the W.C.B. As if the physical suffering was not enough, an injured worker is subjected to endless anxiety in attempting to gain redress for his grievances. I should not have to point out that this bureaucracy, which has been known to confound the most polished lawyers, has to be challenged by men who have contributed to society through the labour of their hands and for whom writing one single letter becomes a major undertaking. It hardly seems fair.

A great deal of difficulty arising from the appeals process stems from the fact that the Board has complete power over its decisions. If the Board is to decide in favour of the appeal of a workman it usually means that it is going against the decision of one of its own administrators. Naturally, the Board is reluctant to do this. Once a final decision has been made there is no appeal beyond the Board. Not even the courts are entrusted with this much power.

We realize that given the nature of our judicial system it would be too expensive and be too lengthy a process for an individual worker to appeal through the courts. However, we do feel that the situation could be made more just if the appeal procedure was taken out of the hands of the Board and given to an independent authority. We also feel that workingmen should be included in the composition of such an authority.

I am sure the question in your minds right now is "what about the trade unions?" It is true that many unions have employees who work full time on compensation cases and for the most part we have no quarrel with their actions. However, it is also quite obvious that the trade unions are quite comfortable with the way in which the W.C.B. operates and are unwilling to use their economic and political strength to alter the situation. It is one of those areas in which the position of the employers, the trade union leadership and the government are peculiarly in harmony. On the whole, the trade unions have been unsympathetic to our appeals. One unfortunate explanation for this stems from the fact that the worker who is permanently disabled is no longer a union member and therefore is no longer contributing dues. There seems to be a direct relation between the amount of assistance one receives and the amount of power one has; the trade unions respond to this principle the same as every other institution in our society. This of course only magnifies the problem for those who are without access to power.

Another important issue which needs to be raised is the whole question of rehabilitation. At present, the W.C.B. limits its scope of action to physical rehabilitation - i.e. it will attempt to heal the injury and assist the patient to recover the use of his limbs etc. - but it does not include retraining a worker who has received a permanent disability to find gainful employment in some other occupation. To receive this assistance he is turned over to another government agency - mainly that of Manpower. We think this is unfair.

It should be the responsibility of the employer to ensure that an employee injured in his employ is rehabilitated. As in the case of a W.C.B. pensioner who is forced to go on public welfare, this is another example of a matter that should be financed by the employer instead of being shifted onto the shoulder of the general taxpayer. We have noticed that the W.C.B. has a habit of protecting the funds of the employer at the expense not only of the claimant but also of the public.

But the problem of rehabilitation goes further than this. What becomes painfully obvious when one considers the problem - but what continually escapes the Board - is the hardship faced by those who suffer a permanent, partial disability. It does not take much of an imagination to realize that a steeplejack who is 10% disabled in one leg, is 100% disabled as a steeplejack. We feel that it is the responsibility of the employer to find employment for the partially disabled worker. As the situation exists now, the employer can wash his hands of responsibility merely by stating that "it is economically unsound" to rehire such an employee. (Appendix D) But it is equally evident that no one else will hire a disabled man either. Once again it is clear that the W.C.B. is actually creating poverty. We feel that a fair solution to this problem is to follow the principle that a man should receive his full compensation until he has been rehabilitated to his earning power at the time of his accident. The responsibility to see that this is done lies with the employer through the W.C.B. - not with other governmental agencies.

A further point which must be discussed is the role that the medical profession plays in this process. Too often it has been realized by patients that their own doctor is unwilling to stand up to the Board to defend his diagnosis. (Appendix E) In other cases, it is obvious that the Board has intervened rather dramatically to discontinue or prevent treatment that has been prescribed. Furthermore, the letter sent to Mr. Cerosoli reveals how jealously the Board guards its regulations concerning doctors. (Appendix F) We realize that doctors must make decisions about matters in which we have little knowledge or understanding, but we do want to know why such decisions are made; - that much we are capable of understanding. The present system of secrecy creates an atmosphere of distrust between the patient, the doctor and the Board. We feel that when a case is in dispute, the Board fully reveal the reasons for its decisions.

It is all too easy to ignore the fact that it is people who are being affected. The urgent need for solutions to poverty will never be answered as long as one considers it merely as an economic problem. Bureaucratic obstruction will continue unless one realizes that human beings are being completely destroyed by the system in which we are living. The letters that I receive are filled with accounts of the sufferings of people. The letter of John Clayton (Appendix G) reveals how a once productive worker can be brought to complete ruin, his family divided, his status in the community destroyed and having to face the possibility of losing everything that he has worked to build. In addition to his physical suffering there is this mental anguish which must be borne. I cannot refrain from including a clipping (Appendix H) from the Toronto Star of last week which reports how a man was driven to steal because of the situation created when he was cut off from compensation and unable to live on welfare. This is how poverty is created; this is where crime begins.

It would be completely erroneous to leave the impression that problems such as the W.C.B. can be solved by making a few adjustments in the amount of pensions or in the administrative procedures of the Board. Our criticisms cannot end at these points but must include a criticism of the very structure of the Board. The motivation behind many varied forms of protest in Canada today - from tenant's rights to pollution committees, from welfare recipients to adversaries of expressways - come from the realization that people have no control over decisions that vitally affect their lives and the process by which such decisions are made. Nowhere is this more true than with the Workman's Compensation Board.

Therefore, we recommend that the only meaningful solution to this situation is that the people who are affected by the W.C.B. most directly - i.e. the injured workman - have a considerable and effective voice in the operation of the Board. To do any less would be to evade the issue.

In order that the members of this committee might have an opportunity to question our position and proposals as well to get a more detailed picture of the operations of the W.C.B. a number of injured workmen will be present (along with myself) to answer questions and to give a first hand account of our situation.

Hurt - Oct. 11th, 1955.

Operated on by Dr. MacMillian Hamilton 1958.

Was unable to do any work and was judged by them for light work only.

I was working for Piggot Construction, Hamilton, when hurt and they claimed I was not capable of doing their work. I was too big a risk and nobody would hire me when they found out I was on compensation. I went to Toronto Compensation office and asked them to train me as a cook to see if I could make a living. I saw Mr. Steele and he refused and asked me what was wrong with me and why I was not working, and I have copies of letters from Doctors saying I am only capable of doing light work.

In 1963 Dr. Dolan and Dr. MacMillian of Hamilton decided to put a body cast on from my hips and had the arrangements all made at the Chedoke Hospital, Hamilton, and the night before the Board phoned and told them not to do it and sent for me to go to Toronto before their Doctors and they refused to do anything and told me to work as long as I could and put up with the pain.

I went to the unemployment office to try to get work. They would not give me any work as they said I was unable to work and would not give me any unemployment money because I was getting a disability pension of $37.50 a month from the Board for my disability.

The Board wrote and told them I was fit for light work if light work could be found. I had a chance of light work in Woodstock so moved here 5 years ago. I was in so much pain I went to Dr. Kennedy in London. He had an x-ray on my back and a week later he admitted me into the Victoria Hospital in London. I was in hospital 2 weeks waiting for him to hear from the Board, and one morning he came to me and said he had a nasty letter from the Board and his hands were tied. He said he could do nothing for me so discharged me and said to try to keep working.

Then the Board sent me to Dr. Baily of London and sent their report first and that was the last I heard of that visit.

I am still in constant pain in back and leg, but have to keep going to live. They have always paid for my pain pills but lately have not even done that. If you want any more information I have letters to confirm all of these statements.

Move clear to you, the wife is living out of town in a rented apt. I am living in our own home in Paisley

Dear Sir:

I am writting to see if you can do anything for me. I have had a lawyer, Doctor & Member of Parliament appear on my behalf with the Workmens Compensation Board & at that time Nov. 9th/66 my Doctor stated that I was 75 per cent disabled but the Board only allowed 10 per cent disability & gave me a pension of $32.75, I have tried several times through my M.P. but nothing has been done to increase my pension so I have gone into debt so much my credit is no good anymore, and bills keep coming in. I applied for welfare on the 19th of January & was refused on the grounds that my wife is working out of town and has 2 boarders to help pay the rent of apt. and has a bit left over to pay for my hydro and gas but can't afford anymore then this as she only makes $40.00 a week take home pay. I have to heat my home, pay for phone and as I am under the doctors care, I have to pay for my prescriptions or do without and also I have to cloth myself and pay for my groceries. I have borrowed money from my friends in order to get enough to eat. My wife and I have deprived ourselves of a lot of things to hang onto our home but if it keeps up it will take everything we have worked so hard for to pay off our bills and it just doesn't seem reasonable to me and I thought maybe you could help. I was told to get a medical checkup with my doctor which I did and he clearly stated that I was unfit to carry on my normal routine of work and that there was no improvement expected in the future, other able bodied men either quit their job or are fired and their wives are quite capable of going out to work but don't as the welfare takes care of all their needs. I have worked hard in the past for my home and paid for it and would like to hang on to it as I have been living in the same house for 40 years. I have had several accidents at my place of employment through no fault of mine and have been left with several disabilities two injuries to my back, one to my left leg, one to my right hip and one to my right arm, but I am only receiving a pension for one disability to my right hip. I sure hope your organization puts these two outfits in their place as they have never been in their place, to look after the ones that rightfully deserve looking after. Do you arrange to have some one call on cases like mine or do I have to go to your office and at the present time I can't afford my next loaf of bread let alone make a trip to Toronto. I hope to hear from you in the near future. I am up against it so bad that I have to spend some of my old coins in order to post this letter to you.

P.S. my phone number is 353-5168

Yours sincerely

I have received one of your papers and would like to receive it regularly but I can't afford it at the present time.

APPENDIX B

Summary and Discussion of Reports of the Social Planning and Research Council of Hamilton and District Relative to Poverty.

RECOMMENDATIONS

The recommendations contained in this brief focus primarily on means which will improve conditions for those in poverty. We urge that governments at all levels explore through research and trial projects the means for eliminating poverty in Canada. All Canadians in need should receive the kind of help necessary to bring them beyond the poverty level through an uncomplicated mechanism that does not infringe on the dignity of the recipient.

SOCIAL WELFARE

1. Public assistance grants should not be below the poverty line, and there should be work incentives beyond the poverty line. At least until such time as grants are raised to the poverty line, additional money for public assistance is probably best spent in increasing the size of grants rather than in improving casework services. In no case should receipt of public assistance be dependent upon willingness to accept casework help.
2. The Province of Ontario should cease looking at social welfare as a program for community casualties only. It should adopt legislation making possible programs such as information services and other services for the entire community.
3. The Province of Ontario should pass legislation making it possible for the Province to take advantage of the Canada Assistance Plan in supplementing the incomes of those fully employed in jobs paying less than public assistance. It should also increase the amount that single parents receiving assistance and wishing to work may keep.
4. Public assistance programs at all levels should involve citizen committees and advisory boards on which representatives of recipients are included, and these programs should aim at increasing public appreciation for and understanding of public assistance through providing "community leaders" with opportunities to learn more about public assistance, through use of a program including going on home visits, with the consent of the clients.
5. All public assistance in Ontario should be provided through a single Provincial Department of Social and Family Services or through regional agencies with all operating functions, operating under regulations set down by a Provincial Department. There should be an adequate number of branch offices for accessibility, and public assistance workers throughout the area should be assigned caseloads in accordance with the degree and type of their training and experience. Scholarship help and leaves of absence should be available for public welfare staff wishing educational advancement and capable of utilizing it.

6. Various practices which tend to degrade recipients, such as taking license plates away, paying rent directly to landlords, holding interviews under unfavourable conditions, and asking recipients to be available for home visits over extended periods of time, should be eliminated wherever they occur. Control of client expenditure of money is appropriate only when the client is incapable of handling his money.
7. There should be programs to provide basic adult education for rehabilitation of persons who are not able to read or write at a minimally adequate level or who lack basic arithmetic skills.
8. There is need for more Canadian research in and by public assistance agencies.

HOUSING

9. The Federal Government should gather data about housing on a regular basis for central cities, metropolitan areas and provinces. The data should provide information about vacancy rates and quality of dwelling units, from a sample of all dwelling units, occupied and vacant, rental and otherwise.
10. The Federal Government should cease using housing as an economic regulator.
11. Appropriate levels of government should provide much more public housing and should take measures to increase the quantity of housing. Quantity of housing can be increased through more non-profit and cooperative construction and renovation made possible by low interest and/or no-interest long-term loans, loan guarantees, and grants. Stringent measures to counteract the inflation in land costs can be expected to increase quantity of housing even further.
12. Locally, a single department should be responsible for receipt of complaints related to quality of housing.
13. Quality of housing should be upgraded, using such approaches as tax holidays for improvement of substandard dwelling units and municipal trusteeship of such units.

THE ROLE OF SOCIAL PLANNING COUNCILS

14. As most programs require some degree of adaptation to local conditions, the Government should be aware of the social planning councils as a major resource in making these adaptations. The Government should take steps to make it possible for social planning councils to obtain Federal funds to carry out demonstration projects and to provide a continuing source for the kind of research information which they are in a unique position to supply.

15. Other social planning councils and voluntary agencies generally should become involved in assisting the organization of low-income citizen groups and in involving them more fully in existing organizations.

INTRODUCTION

- 0.1 This submission to the Special Senate Committee on Poverty will concern itself specifically with problems of poverty in Hamilton and District, the Hamilton Metropolitan Area of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, consisting of Hamilton, Wentworth County, and Burlington. A well-documented overview of the situation in an industrial community such as ours should be of use in painting a picture of urban poverty. The ramifications of the poverty situation are more than local, involving social policies for the whole Province of Ontario and indeed the whole country. Poverty, except for certain regional situations, is national in scope, both as to cause and as to the solutions which people have proposed. In addition, Canadians are a mobile people, and the poor, along with the rest of us, move from place to place.
- 0.2 In 1969, between 15,000 and 16,000 families in Metropolitan Hamilton were in poverty. Metro Hamilton is an important urban concentration, the second largest metropolitan area in Ontario, the most populous province. The problems of the Hamilton area are worthy of consideration because in Hamilton we have a modern industrial economic base. This is the steel centre of Canada. It is an area of a high level of economic activity. And it is evidence that such a high level of activity, important as it is, is not by itself the total solution to the problems of poverty. Other areas suffer from a poverty related to economic underdevelopment, a poverty of the past. The poverty existing in Hamilton is the poverty of a modern industrial city, the kind of poverty we can expect in other areas that are in the process of beginning to industrialize. Unless appropriate measures are taken to end poverty, ours is the poverty of the future, the poverty of a developed region.
- 0.3 The Social Planning and Research Council of Hamilton and District has been concerned with poverty since its inception in 1959. Poverty is at the heart of the problem of ordering priorities in the social welfare field. Concerned citizens sitting together to examine one facet or another of community services identify unmet needs and attempt to mobilize resources to meet them. In many instances, the needs are those of people without money. More recently, the Social Planning and Research Council has undertaken the task of assisting low income people to organize themselves, to work on their own concerns and set their own priorities. This work in organizing low income people is discussed briefly in the chapter on "The Role of Social Planning Councils in Dealing with Poverty".
- 0.4 What is poverty? Who is poor? What can be done to alleviate poverty? To eliminate it? Each of these questions has been discussed at great length in studies, essays, surveys, etc. An effort to provide definitive answers to all or any of these in the small brief submitted by the Social Planning and Research Council of Hamilton and District would be presumptuous.

- 0.5 The staff of the Canadian Welfare Council submitted a statement in June, 1969, outlining the issues surrounding poverty. They pointed to the way in which public attitudes affect anti-poverty policies, the social rights of men as they relate to poverty, provided a definition of poverty, and discussed its causes and approaches to combating it. Rather than attempting to rephrase what they say in their broad outline, we will attempt to focus on some specific aspects of poverty.
- 0.6 In the first section of this brief, we will attempt to define in financial terms what poverty is in Hamilton and District. Then we will discuss how widespread the condition is.
- 0.7 Following this, we will present material about problems in housing the poor, with some discussion of possible solutions, about public assistance, with proposals for changes in policies at various governmental levels, and about the role of social planning councils in dealing with problems related to poverty.
- 0.8 In a later submission, we will report on a survey of low-income families in Hamilton, providing information about their housing conditions, their reliance or non-reliance on public assistance, their attitudes toward their situation, etc. This survey material has programmatic implications, with which we will deal.
- 0.9 Hopefully, the wide public interest on the question of poverty and the stimulation of this interest which the Special Senate Committee on Poverty has induced will lead to further information-gathering surveys, including some specifically dealing with such problems as aging.
- 0.10 It is our fervent hope, however, that the interest of the Special Senate Committee and the efforts of those who have made submissions to you will have impact beyond research and reports, into areas of new policy and its implementation.

CHAPTER 1

A WORKING DEFINITION OF POVERTY

CHAPTER 1A WORKING DEFINITION OF POVERTY

- 1.1 In attempting to develop a working definition of poverty, the first thing we must bear in mind is that a highly precise definition is impossible. Economic deprivation and inequality are in their nature matters of degree: accordingly, one cannot fix precise levels below which there is poverty and above which there is not. Furthermore, while it is relatively easy to measure income and expenditure levels, the more subjective aspects of poverty are much more difficult, perhaps impossible, to quantify. Finally, since poverty is considered to be an undesirable state, an element of value judgement is involved when we attempt to delimit it.
- 1.2 In spite of these difficulties, however, working definitions of poverty are necessary. If we want to learn anything of the extent of poverty, the types of people who suffer from it, and the effectiveness of public programs in dealing with it, we require some method of determining who is poor and who is not. We do not need an absolutely precise standard, but we do need a definition that can serve as a basis for reasonable policy decisions. This is what we have attempted to develop.

MEASURES OF POVERTY

- 1.3 Measures employed in recent analyses of poverty have fallen into two basic categories - deprivation measures and inequality measures. Each type has particular characteristics which should be examined.

Deprivation Measures

- 1.4 The deprivation measures are based on a conception of poverty as a state in which essential goods and services cannot be purchased. In any given society, the cost of a minimum standard of living can be specified and these costs will determine the poverty lines for that society. While there is a strong element of value judgement involved in determining which goods and services should be available, and in what quality, it has proved possible in this way to arrive at poverty lines which have received wide recognition.
- 1.5 The commonest of these procedures is to establish minimum family budgets. This is done by welfare departments and consumer counsellors universally. But since price levels, as well as specific items required, will vary from one place to another, other, less detailed approaches must be used over larger regions. These are generally prepared by estimating the costs of some essential purchases, then multiplying by an appropriate factor to get a minimum level of necessary income.

Inequality Measures

1.6 The inequality measures are based on the assumption that poverty is a relative thing, which cannot be considered apart from the society in which it occurs. Poverty in a highly advanced industrial economy is something quite different from poverty in a non-industrialized, agrarian society. Those who are considered to be poor in the first case would be considered wealthy in the second. But, within either kind of society, the thing that defines a person as poor is simply that he is less well off than others. Since this is the case, the extent of poverty should not be measured against a standard of living scale but should rather be interpreted in terms of the distribution of wealth within the society. There is as yet, however, no widely accepted conception of the kind of distribution that would signal the end of poverty.

1.7 Several measures of income inequality have been used in recent poverty studies. One common criterion of inequality is the distribution of income by population quintiles. That is, the proportion of income received by the top twenty percent of earners is compared with the proportion received by the next twenty percent, and so on. Another method is to divide the income received by the earner at the top of the second quintile by the income received at the bottom of the fourth. The higher the ratio, the greater the inequality. A third procedure is to note the percentage of earners receiving less than a given proportion of the median income. Other related measures are used.

USES OF MEASURES

1.8 While we have laid out the two types of measures in such a way as to illustrate their differences, it should also be noted that they have a good deal in common. For example, in developing a deprivation measure one of the criteria that will be employed is the prevailing standards of the community. As these rise or fall, so does the concept of a minimum adequate standard of living. Thus, considerations of equality find their way into the deprivation measures. On the other hand, in order to specify an income distribution which would imply the elimination of poverty, one would have to answer the question of whether it meant elimination of deprivation. One would also expect that the two types of measures would be strongly related empirically. For example, if the incomes of those below the poverty line, according to a deprivation measure, are increased, the distribution of income will become more even. Or, if the proportion of income received by the lowest income earners increases, the numbers in poverty, by a deprivation measure, may be expected to decrease.

1.9 Although the two types of measure have a great deal in common, each has specific advantages. Deprivation measures highlight the economic difficulties of the poor in a concrete and, hence, understandable way. They make it possible to indicate how much the incomes of the poor would have to be raised in order for specified living standards to be achieved. They also set standards below which incomes should not be allowed to fall, whatever the overall distribution of income may be. Inequality measures call attention to invidious distinctions made on the basis of economic status. They remind us that there is a matter of will involved in bringing people out of poverty - the cost will have to be borne at the middle and upper levels of income. They remind us also that there is another standard by which adequacy of incomes may be judged than that of simple deprivation, namely that of equity.

- 1.10 It is interesting to note that while the two types of measure appear to be complementary, the most widely recognized poverty measures in North America have been of the deprivation type. Some possible reasons for this might include: 1) deprivation measures can be made more concrete and hence more memorable; 2) it is politically strategic to talk about "eliminating deprivation" rather than "redistributing income"; 3) some feel that our attention should be focussed on the acutely painful problems of deprivation rather than on the more general question of inequality; 4) it is easier to obtain agreement on what constitutes deprivation than it is to get agreement on how income ought to be distributed.

DEVELOPING POVERTY LINES FOR HAMILTON

- 1.11 In the course of our analysis of poverty in Hamilton, we have made use of both inequality and deprivation measures where we have believed them to be useful. But in order to maintain comparability with the generally recognized North American standards and to provide a basis for the sample for our survey of low-income families, we have made special efforts to develop a definition based on deprivation criteria.
- 1.12 In order to achieve some comparability with national figures on the extent of poverty, we have attempted to develop poverty lines for Hamilton in 1969 in a form similar to the 1961 poverty lines, developed in a census monograph, and later employed by the Economic Council of Canada. These were based on the criterion that a family which has to spend 70% or more of its income for adequate food, clothing and shelter, should be considered to be in poverty. The 70% figure was based partially on the empirical discovery that families tended to spend somewhat over 70% of their income on these three necessities at the lowest levels of income, and that this declined only slowly over a considerable income range before it began to fall off.* This was interpreted to mean that families tend to spend close to 70% (or more) of their income for these necessities to the point where they feel they are provided in a minimally satisfactory way. Only then does the proportion drop. According to this interpretation, the level of income at which the percentage spent on food, clothing and shelter begins to fall off from 70% is a good indicator of the upper limits of poverty. An underlying assumption in this approach, it should be noted, is that low income families allocate their resources effectively.

*This pattern appeared in the Dominion Bureau of Statistics City Family Expenditures Survey of 1957. It has also appeared in American studies.

1.13 While we could not draw on survey data for Hamilton to determine the rates at which the percentage of income spent on food, clothing and shelter declined, it was possible to carry out an analogous procedure. It was possible to get an indication from staff of the Public Welfare Department of the expenditure levels at which the low income families with which they came into contact felt they had received a minimum adequate standard of living. The cost of food, shelter and clothing could then be set equal to 70% of the income needed to bring the family to the poverty line.

1.14 There are two significant differences between our approach and that of the Economic Council. The first is that in replacing survey data with welfare workers' experience, we are forced to accept a non-random sample of low income people as our "judgement panel". One's concern on this point might be largely alleviated, however, by the sheer number and variety of cases with which a welfare department must deal. The second difference is that, rather than inferring standards of adequacy from expenditure patterns, we are relying on what has been expressed to welfare department workers. There are problems in each approach, but there appears to be no ready way of determining their different levels of accuracy. On balance, it would appear that while these two differences must be noted, the two systems have fundamental features in common and one might expect there would be strong relationships between the poverty lines developed from them. We will attempt to indicate more clearly their degree of similarity once we have outlined our own method in more detail.

1.15 A more important issue is the question of whether the 30% of income not allotted to food, clothing and shelter is adequate to cover other family needs - health care, school expenses, transportation, recreation, insurance, etc. These are all important elements in family budgeting and a fully adequate income would have to make it possible for these needs as well as food, clothing and shelter to be properly met. Further, in a healthy budgeting situation it would be possible to build up at least a small amount of savings for emergencies.

1.16 For lack of time, we have been unable to work out what alterations would have to be made in our definitions of poverty to take account of these needs. That is, for example, while it would be possible to estimate health care or insurance costs for families of different sizes, it would be much more difficult to determine what proportion of income ought to remain after these needs, along with food, clothing and shelter, had been provided for. There would no longer be a rationale for setting the needs allowed for equal to 70% of income, and to develop an alternative procedure would be very time-consuming. Even if this had been done, the difficulty would have arisen that our standards would have lost comparability with national standards. Accordingly, we have chosen to remain with the system we have outlined above, remembering that a detailed study of the adequacy of the incomes it suggests has not been carried out.

COSTS OF THE THREE BASIC NEEDS

- 1.17 In drawing up our estimates of the income required for minimum adequate living standards, we have assumed: 1) that the welfare allowance for food and clothing is approximately equal to the amount felt by low income consumers to be sufficient for food; 2) that welfare housing allowances represent the minimum satisfactory amount for housing; 3) that the estimates prepared by the welfare department teaching home economists represent the minimum satisfactory amount for clothing. Each of these assumptions will require some comment.

1. FOOD

- 1.18 The Hamilton Public Welfare Department has advised us that those who use the standard allowance for food and clothing for food alone generally feel that they have a satisfactory diet, but that their clients generally find it difficult to set aside much of the allowance for clothing. Accordingly, we have set our minimum figures for food equal to the standard allowance for food and clothing. This is not to say that a nutritionally adequate diet cannot be obtained for less. Many families, who are unable to avoid high expenses for other things, manage to reduce their food expenditures below this level without sacrificing nutrition. But there is clearly no room for easy living in the figures as they stand. For a family of four, the sum we have allotted is $137. (This is at the median of the allowances set for families of four, which vary according to the age of the children.)

2. CLOTHING

- 1.19 We have again followed the Welfare Department's advice in setting our figures for clothing. In doing so, we have set a number of criteria which should be spelled out.
- 1) It has been assumed that all clothing is purchased at "standard" rates. That is, the mother does not buy material and sew the clothing herself. Nor is it purchased, for example, through the St. Vincent de Paul Society or the Harbour Rescue Mission, or obtained from relatives.
 - 2) It has been assumed that hand-me-downs will have a negligible influence. Some assumptions had to be made as to the prevalence of this practice in estimating clothing costs. Since for at least a majority of smaller families, hand-me-downs can be used to only a quite limited extent, it was decided to make the simplest assumption possible - that they should be considered negligible in setting the basic estimates of clothing costs.

- 1.20 On this basis, the allowance for a family of four comes to $500 a year.*

3. HOUSING

- 1.21 There is some question as to the adequacy of housing available at the budgetary level permitted by Ontario welfare regulations. It is the experience of the Hamilton Public Welfare Department that most of its clients manage to obtain housing at, or slightly above, the standard allowance. ($95.00 per month, plus utilities, for a family of four) However, as we have argued in the housing section, a significant proportion of this housing appears to be inadequate.
- 1.22 The difficulty has to do with the amount by which the welfare allowance would have to be raised to provide proper quarters for those who are now inadequately sheltered. This would be possible, although not easy, provided that rents were closely related to quality, and provided that there was an adequate stock of low cost housing in existence. But neither proviso appears to hold true. Officials of the Hamilton Assessment Department have reported that the relationship between assessed value and rental is very weak. On the one hand, the sheer unavailability of low rental housing has made it possible for rents on substandard units to rise in many cases to virtually the same levels as those for more adequate units. At the same time, there appears to be a good deal of variation in price for units at about the same quality level, although this does not appear so much in the market because the "bargain" units are less likely to become vacant. Because of the ineffectiveness of the market in relating price to quality, we have been unable to determine what alterations should be made in the welfare housing allocation to take account of problems of quality. Rather than make an alteration in the absence of any clear indication of what it should be, we have chosen to remain with the official allowance, remembering that this should be taken as a minimum adequate figure.
- 1.23 When the respective figures for food, clothing and housing had been arrived at for each family size, they were added together and the sum was multiplied by 10/7. This yielded the basic poverty income for each family size. However, it was decided not to leave the figures in this form but rather to determine what the family income would have to be, in the modal case, if family allowances and income taxation were taken into account. To simplify our calculations, we assumed that the income was earned by a single earner. No allowances have been made for fringe benefits, because these vary considerably among employers.

*It is recognized that these, like expenses for food, will vary considerably according to the age of the children. But in order to keep our measure simple, an average figure has been used. In this case, approximately the cost for a family with a twelve year old girl and a nine year old boy.

1.24 Once these calculations were made, the figures were rounded to the nearest $100. The final figures are seen in the Table below.

POVERTY LINES FOR HAMILTON IN 1969 BY FAMILY SIZE

A single person	$2,200
2 person family	$3,200
3 person family	$4,100
4 person family	$4,800
5 person family	$5,600
6 person family	$6,300
7 person family	$7,000
8 person family	$7,700

1.25 As we tried to indicate, these poverty lines are by no means perfect indicators as to the economic status of families. Any particular family may require more or less income. Such factors as subsidized housing or a wife's ability to sew will make it easier for one family. Unusual health expenses or losses not covered by insurance will make it more difficult for another. The ages of children will affect the income requirements for all families. But the poverty lines we have set out do provide a general idea of the kind of income that is usually required to live at a minimum adequate standard. We have used them in that sense throughout the brief.

SOME GENERAL FEATURES OF POVERTY

IN METROPOLITAN HAMILTON

CHAPTER 2

SOME GENERAL FEATURES OF POVERTY IN METROPOLITAN HAMILTON

2.1 In this chapter we have brought together most of what can be learned about poverty in the Hamilton area from previously published material, together with comparative data for Ontario and for Canada. While some of the topics treated here will be examined in more detail as we analyze the returns from our survey, it has seemed appropriate to present an overview of previously available material to establish a context for our own findings.

THE PREVALENCE OF POVERTY

2.2 The first question we must attempt to answer is that of the extent of poverty. In the preceding chapter, we have outlined a series of poverty lines for 1969. These will be applied to the estimated distribution of income for 1969. But most of the income data for Metropolitan Hamilton, and for the rest of Canada as well, comes from 1961. Accordingly, both to determine what progress we have made, and to make comparisons, we will want to employ a series of poverty lines applicable to 1961 data.

2.3 The obvious choice is the series of poverty lines employed by the Economic Council of Canada. Since national and provincial estimates of the prevalence of poverty have been made in terms of these, they will provide a ready basis for comparisons. But before employing them, it will be useful first to indicate how they compare with our own poverty lines for 1969, which were developed in an analogous way.

2.4 Perhaps the best comparison is to project our own figures backwards to 1961. This requires us to compensate for inflation (approximately 25% by the Consumer Price Index) and to remove our alterations for income tax and family allowances. Neither of these was taken into account in setting the Economic Council's standards. The results of this approach are seen in Table I.

TABLE I

Poverty Levels of the Economic Council of Canada compared with S.P.R.C. Poverty Lines for Hamilton

	Economic Council of Canada	S.P.R.C. (expressed in 1961 dollars)
A single person	$1,500	$1,600
2 person family	2,500	2,500
3 person family	3,000	3,200
4 person family	3,500	3,800
5 person family	4,000	4,500

2.5

It appears that the major difference between the two approaches is that ours makes greater allowance for additional family members. It can be seen from Table I that for a family of two the figures are identical, but that for a family of five there is a difference of $500. Furthermore, the Economic Council did not extend its poverty lines to apply to larger families but employed the same standard for all families of five or more. We, on the other hand, have extended our own poverty lines to provide separate standards for families of up to eight.

The result of this is that by our approach more families, particularly larger families, will be found in poverty. In order not to be misled by this difference, we have made comparisons to national and provincial figures for 1961 entirely in terms of the Economic Council's system. When, on the other hand, we have wanted to make comparisons between 1961 and 1969 in our own area, this approach has had to be modified.

*Figures for Canada and Ontario are based on Table C-10, Bulletin 4.1-3 of the 1961 Census. Hamilton percentages are estimated from 1961 data as outlined in Appendix A.

Table II shows the percentages of families below the Economic Council's poverty lines for Canada, Ontario and Metro Hamilton. It can be seen from this Table that Metro Hamilton is more fortunate than the national non-farm population at all family sizes, and more fortunate than the Ontario non-farm population for all but the largest family sizes. It is interesting to note in comparing the Ontario non-farm population with Metro Hamilton that the differences are smallest with the two-person families at one end, and the six-or-more person families at the other. This might be interpreted to mean that these are the size groups where the relatively high income levels of the Hamilton area make the least impact. Two-person families are, in many cases, retired couples, on whom the high prevailing wage level will have limited impact. Among large families, there are many cases where the family is so large in proportion to the occupational skills of the head that the relatively high wage level for Hamilton will not suffice to bring them near the poverty line, let alone beyond it. Whatever the explanation for this phenomenon may be, the most salient feature of the table is that for all families only 17% in Metropolitan Hamilton are in poverty, compared with 20% in Ontario, and 27% in Canada.

- 2.8 A partial explanation of the lower percentage of poor families in Hamilton is simply that income levels are higher. Table III indicates that Metropolitan Hamilton family incomes are higher than Canadian non-farm incomes across the range from the tenth to the ninetieth percentile, and that up to the fiftieth percentile the difference is of the order of $700.* Metro Hamilton incomes are also higher than Ontario non-farm incomes until almost the ninetieth percentile. Up to the fiftieth percentile, the difference is between $250 and $300.

Canada (non-farm population)	1,679	3,122	4,680	6,656	9,442

Percentiles have been interpolated from data recorded in intervals ordinarily of $500 or $1,000. Hamilton figures are based on Table C-5 of 1961 Census, Bulletin 4.1-3. Other figures are based on Table C-10 of the same bulletin.

*A percentile is any one of 100 points which divide a series into 100 equal units. Thus, for example, the tenth percentile (P₁₀) divides the bottom ten percent of an income distribution from the upper ninety percent.

2.9 The fact that the ninetieth percentile of family income for Ontario is higher than that for Hamilton, while at other points in the table Hamilton is higher than Ontario, reflects another important feature of the Hamilton income distribution. Not only is it higher than average but it is also more equally distributed. This affects the prevalence of poverty because the more compact the income distribution, the fewer there are who will drop below the median to the poverty lines.

2.10 One way of examining this more closely is to consider the relationship between the twentieth and eightieth percentiles of household income. Here we have expressed the relationship 1) by considering P_{20} as a proportion of P_{80} and 2) by setting $(P_{80}-P_{20})/P_{50}$.

TABLE IV

Two Measures of Household Income Dispersion for Metro Hamilton, Ontario and Canada, 1961

	P_{20}	P_{80}	P_{20}/P_{80}	$(P_{80}-P_{20})/P_{50}$

Ontario (non-farm population)	2,641	7,483	.36	1.00
Canada (non-farm population)	2,241	7,016	.32	1.30

2.11 It is clear from Table IV that by these measures the income distribution of Hamilton is notably more compact than that of the Province or of the nation. Perhaps it might be useful, however, to put this in a broader context. Table V shows the relationship P_{20}/P_{80} for a number of industrialized nations.

TABLE V

Canada (non-farm population)	.32	4
Sweden	.57	1
United Kingdom	.48	2
United States	.30	5
West Germany	.35	3

*The data from different countries was collected in different years, but all data in this table come from the period 1960-1962. Figures other than that for Canada are taken from J.H. Chandler, "An International Comparison", Monthly Labor Review, U.S. Department of Labor, February, 1969, page 56.

- 2.12 It would appear from this chart that Hamilton's relatively compact income distribution would seem much less even in Sweden or the United Kingdom. But it would bear a similar relationship to the national figures in the United States or West Germany. It might be argued that Canada cannot differ too widely from the United States without risking emigration of professional and technical manpower, but it would appear that other industrial nations have been able to develop considerably more compact income distributions.
- 2.13 In any case, Metro Hamilton's position in Canada has been a quite favoured one. It has much lower percentages in poverty than the nation as a whole, at all family sizes, and a lower percentage than Ontario, at all but the largest family sizes. This reflects higher family incomes and a relatively compact income distribution.

CHANGES IN THE EXTENT OF POVERTY

- 2.14 A more important question than the extent of poverty is the extent of our progress in eliminating it. It is difficult to measure this because we do not have directly comparable material from different points in time. But we can, at least, get a general impression of what has been occurring.

2.15 This requires us, first of all, to modify the Economic Council's poverty lines for 1961 to make them more comparable to our own for 1969. While other changes might be introduced, we are making only one. We are increasing the poverty lines for families of six to eight by the same amount per person by which they were increased for families of two to five. Thus, the poverty lines for a family of six will be increased to $4,500, for a family of seven to $5,000, and for a family of eight or more to $5,500. These adjustments will help considerably to bring the Economic Council's poverty lines into harmony with our own. Even granted these alterations, the rate of increase for each additional person in our system of measurement is higher than in the Economic Council's. Some alteration could have been made to allow for this, but it was unclear to what extent it represented peculiarities in the Hamilton situation, to what extent it represented changes between 1961 and 1969 in the additional income required for additional persons, and to what extent it resulted from differences in the ways in which the two sets of poverty lines were drawn up. Accordingly, we have made no allowances for this.

2.16 What must be noted is that the re-adjusted poverty lines for 1961 will provide a lower estimate of the extent of poverty than a series of poverty lines which rose as rapidly with family size as our 1969 lines would have given. This will result in a smaller decrease in the percentage of families in poverty between 1961 and 1969. Nevertheless, this will not seriously distort our general view of the changes that have taken place.

* Methods of measuring the percentages in poverty for 1961 and 1969 are indicated in Appendix A.

This differs from the 17% figure in Table II because of the changed poverty lines for families of six or more.

2.17 It is clear from Table VI that quite dramatic reductions have occurred in the percentages of families in poverty. The total has declined from 19% to 13%. The sharpest proportional decline took place among four person families. The largest decrease in percentage points took place among seven person and eight-or-more person families, 16% and 15% respectively. The latter figures would have been higher, of course, if the poverty lines for 1961 had been modified so as to rise as rapidly with family size as the 1969 lines.

2.18 Another way to look at this, is to see what proportions of all families in poverty are contributed by families of different sizes.

*Percentages do not add to 100 because of rounding.

2.19 Table VII indicates that larger proportions of the poor in 1969 than in 1961 come from two-person families, and smaller proportions from families of three to five. Since many of the two-person families in poverty are retired couples, the two-person families have not benefitted as much from rising wages as the other groups. The six-or-more person families were frequently farther below the poverty line in 1961 than the three-to-five person families and hence were less likely to be removed from poverty.

Absolute Numbers

2.20 The decline in the percentage of poor families from nineteen in 1961 to thirteen in 1969 has not, of course, resulted in an equivalent decline in the numbers of the poor. While we do not have an accurate figure for the number of families in Metropolitan Hamilton for any year beyond 1966, it would appear that, on the basis of population growth, the figure is in the neighbourhood of 120,000, just over 20% more than in 1961. The decline in the numbers of the poor in our area has been proportionately lower than the decline in their percentage of the population. In 1961, just under 19,000 families fell below the poverty line. For 1969, the figure can be estimated at between 15,000 and 16,000.

SOME GENERAL CHARACTERISTICS OF THE POOR

- 2.21 It is unfortunate that we can gain very little direct information on the poor from existing statistical material. There is a good deal of data, which is broken down by income levels and a smaller, but substantial, body which is broken down by family size. But very little is available in terms of both dimensions. We have, however, been able to bring together some useful data on the kinds of people who are likely to be in poverty and the geographic areas in which they are concentrated.
- 2.22 Perhaps at this point, we should return our attention to Tables VI and VII, which throw interesting light on the relationship of family size and poverty. Table VI indicates that the percentage of families in poverty rises rapidly among families to over 50% for families of eight persons or more. But this should not lead us to develop a stereotype of poverty as a phenomenon particularly found among large families. Table VII indicates that more than 3/4 of the families in poverty consist of five persons or less.
- 2.23 A similar phenomenon appears with other characteristics. For example, while higher than chance proportions of poor families do not have heads in the labour force, the vast majority do. Table VIII indicates the percentage of poor families which are headed by wage earners. (A wage earner is defined, for census purposes, as a person who has worked for wages or salary in the week preceding the census.)

TABLE VIII

Percentages of Families in Poverty with Wage Earner Heads, by Family Size for Metropolitan Hamilton, 1961 and 1969

Family Size	Percentage Headed by a Wage Earner
	1961	1969
2	34	29
3-5	91	92
6+	94	94
All families	74	71

- 2.24 Table VIII indicates that only in the case of two-person families is there a preponderance of families without a wage-earner head. The two-person families, of course, are biased by the presence of a larger proportion of retired couples.
- 2.25 It should be noted that the percentage of wage-earner families declined between 1961 and 1969 from 74% to 71%. This is presumably a reflection of the fact that rising wages have removed a significant number of wage earners from poverty, leaving a higher proportion of non-employed among the remainder. This effect has only been notable among two-person families, but in this case it has been very pronounced. The percentage of wage-earner heads has declined from 34 to 29. This would seem to reflect the fact that two-person families where the head was working were likely to have been only a short distance below the poverty line in 1961, whereas, for larger families, the distances were often considerably greater.
- 2.26 There are two respects in which this table should not be misconstrued. First, it does not give a precise indication of the proportion of families with heads in the labour force, because the self-employed are not included. However, the extent of poverty among families with heads in the labour force who are not wage earners will be very low. The largest groups in the excluded category are retail businessmen, independent professionals, owners of construction firms (large and small), and farmers. With the exception of farmers, for whom no precise income information is available, all of these groups have well above average earnings. But, nevertheless, the percentages given here will be somewhat low as indicators of the proportion of poor families with heads in the labour force.
- 2.27 The other possible misinterpretation would be to assume that a wage-earner family head must be regularly employed. In order for a family head to be listed as a wage earner for census purposes, he had only to be receiving wages or salary in the week preceding the census. But the number of people with unstable employment will be higher than the number who are not employed in a given week (particularly in mid-summer when the census is taken). Another consideration is that an unknown percentage of wage-earner family heads will be working only part-time. Nevertheless, it can still be said that the preponderant majority of all but the two-person families in poverty are headed by a person who participates in the labour force.
- 2.28 We cannot determine from this what proportion of poor families are reliant on governmental support for a major part of their income. But we can get some indication from census material projected to 1969 and from agency statistics. From census material it can be estimated that, among the fifteen to sixteen thousand families living in poverty in Metropolitan Hamilton in 1969, there are approximately 3,000 retired couples.* It is estimated by the administrators of the regional office of the Department of Social and Family Services that in the Metropolitan Hamilton area there are around 2,750 families receiving pensions from them. At a given time, somewhere between 6,000 and 7,000 cases will be on Public Welfare rolls in the district. While we cannot be sure of the overall annual income of the families who receive short-term assistance from a municipal welfare agency, it is clear that in many cases these families would, over the year, remain in poverty.

- 2.29 While these figures do not give a precise indication of the proportion of the poor who receive governmental income support, they do provide the general impression that the proportion who must rely on at least some governmental assistance is relatively high. If we include only the retired couples and those receiving allowances from the Department of Social and Family Services, the figure is already 35%. If we make some estimate of the proportion of those receiving assistance from public welfare departments, the figure will go higher. It will also increase in terms of programs administered through other sources, for example, Workmen's Compensation payments.

GEOGRAPHIC DISTRIBUTION

- 2.30 While the census does not provide a clear indication of the geographic distribution of families in poverty, it does provide an indication of the location of families whose heads have relatively low incomes. A clearer picture of the distribution of the poor will emerge from our survey. But a preliminary analysis of data from it indicates that the distribution of the poor is heaviest in the areas where the lowest wage-earner family head incomes are found, and lightest where the highest wage-earner family head incomes are found. Accordingly, we have prepared a map showing the levels of wage-earner family head income for the City of Hamilton in 1961, which will give a good general indication of the areas in which the poor are most heavily concentrated. It will be seen that low income areas are concentrated in the north end of the city and the downtown area. When further data from the survey are available, we will be able to make further statements in this respect. (The map is found on page 20.)

*It should be noted that since the advent of guaranteed income supplement, these couples should not be living a great deal below the poverty line. When one considers that in these circumstances income tax often need not be paid on either the old age pension or the supplement, and that some services, such as public transportation, are available at reduced rates, it would appear that, in actual purchasing power, these couples should not be very far below the poverty line. This is not to suggest, of course, that their economic circumstances are comfortable. They are not. But these families are not as far below the poverty line as many others.

AVERAGE INCOME OF WAGE EARNER FAMILY HEADS BY CENSUS TRACTS

2.31 A precise picture of the distribution of poverty over different parts of the Metropolitan Hamilton area cannot be obtained from census material. But figures on family incomes are available, which indicate that in 1961 median family income in the City of Hamilton was $5,119, compared to $6,047 in the rest of the Metropolitan area.* We do not know what differences there may be between Hamilton and the rest of the area in the distribution of income by family size, but on the assumption that the only differences result from differences in income levels and family size, we can roughly estimate that in 1961 twenty-one percent of the families in Hamilton were in poverty, compared to fourteen percent for the rest of the area.

2.32 We have also prepared a map indicating the distribution of rates of juvenile delinquency, as measured by the number of occurrences recorded in police files. It will be noted that the rates seem to be highest in low income areas. This should be considered illustrative of the kind of social phenomenon which is often found in areas with high poverty concentrations, although not necessarily among families who are themselves in poverty. In other cities, such variables as alcoholism and schizophrenia have also been found to be more prevalent in poverty areas. But, in Hamilton, we have no evidence to indicate clearly the extent to which this is so. In any case, the correlation between low income areas and juvenile delinquency, at the very least, suggests that other social problems might be found to be concentrated in low income areas here as they have been elsewhere. (Juvenile Delinquency Map on page 22.)

POLICY IMPLICATIONS

2.33 The data we have presented bears an important relationship to social policy. We will be using it, together with the findings of our survey, to develop recommendations for reducing the extent of poverty in the Hamilton area. There are, however, some aspects of the data which bear sufficient notice that we are commenting on them here, although we have not yet formulated recommendations based on them.

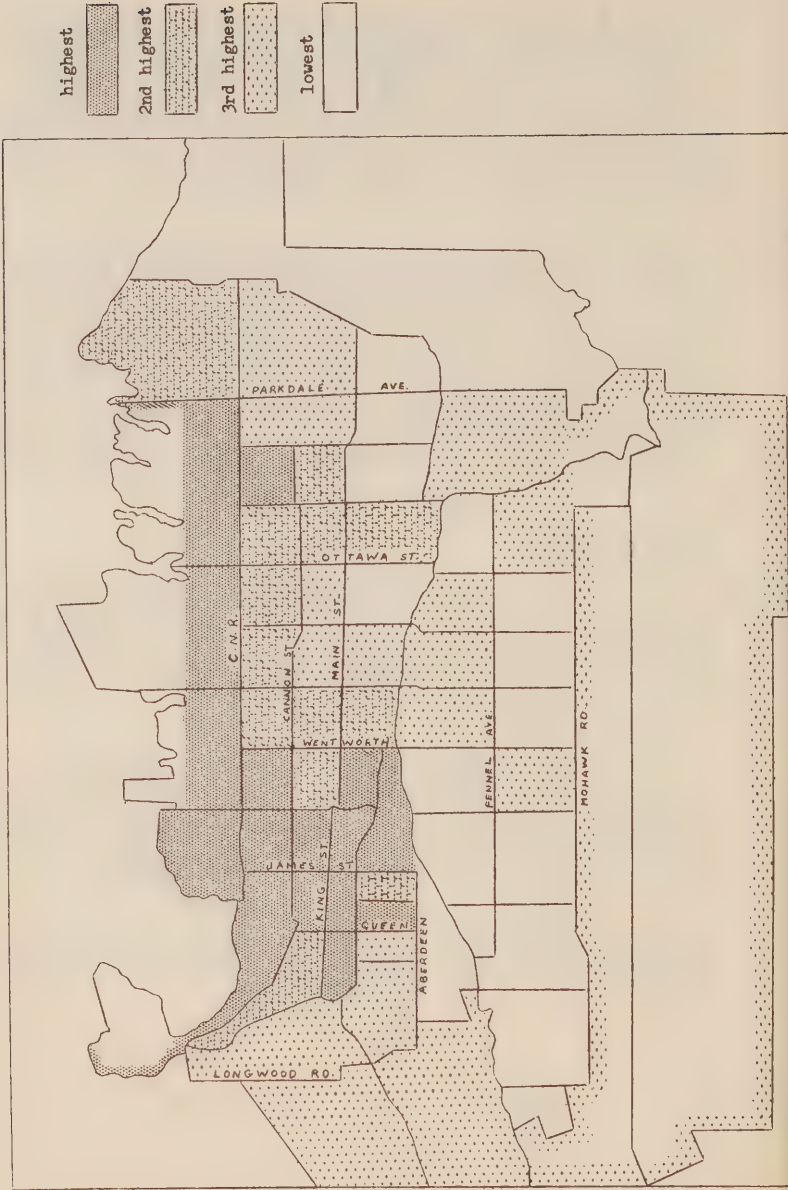

1. Retired Couples

2.34 Close to 20% of the poor families in Metropolitan Hamilton appear to be retired couples. Since the coming of the guaranteed income supplement, these couples cannot be as far below the poverty line as many others, but, nevertheless, there is a very real problem here. Since one cannot expect retired couples to obtain employment, poverty in this group must be primarily dealt with through income support programs.

* These figures were interpolated from data in Table C-5, Bulletin 4.1-3.

These estimates are based on the poverty lines for 1961 used in comparing Tables VI to VIII.

2. Larger Families

- 2.35 The percentage in poverty increases rapidly with family size, rising to over 50% in eight-or-more person families. This reflects two "obvious" factors, and a third, more subtle one. First, at any given income level, the more children a family has the more difficult its financial situation is liable to be. Second, the larger the family, the less likely it is that the wife will be able to work. The third, less obvious factor, is that the practice of birth control has, in the past, varied considerably in terms of education. The extent to which this is true today is an open question.* But the high concentration of poverty among larger families does imply a need for careful consideration of more adequate birth control programs, bearing in mind that these must be acceptable to those they are attempting to serve.

3. Geographic Distribution of the Poor

- 2.36 It is often said that in our kind of society the poor are invisible. This partially reflects their concentration in areas where middle and upper income people are relatively few. In terms of policy, what this is liable to mean is that the people who exercise a dominant influence will have little contact with poverty and, accordingly, will fail to see it as an important issue. This raises the question of how to develop an awareness of poverty among middle class groups.

*The Canadian Family Growth Survey, conducted in Toronto in 1967-68, with a random sample of 1600 married women, under 45 years of age, living with their husbands, found no differences in use of the pill that could be traced to education. While, among Roman Catholic women, the less educated showed lower use of the pill, this was attributable to the higher proportion of foreign-born women in the less educated group. See Allingham, J.D., T.R. Balakrishnan, and J.F. Kantner; "Time Series of Growth in Use of Oral Contraception and the Differential Diffusion of Oral Anovulants", Population Studies, March, 1969, pp. 43-51.

CHAPTER 3

SELECTED APPROACHES TO IMPROVING LIVING STANDARDS OF THE POOR IN HAMILTON AND DISTRICT

- a) PUBLIC ASSISTANCE
- b) HOUSING

CHAPTER 3

Responsibility for meeting problems of living today is not merely individual nor is it a responsibility of the community for individuals - it is a mutual responsibility of individuals and society.

The individual has responsibility for meeting his needs and for his behaviour insofar as this is possible for him; at the point where this is not possible, it becomes a social responsibility.*

ATTITUDES

3.1 If it is the responsibility of society to assist persons who are unable to function adequately on their own - in the case of public assistance, because of lack of adequate income - then the institutions of society are in danger of failing to perform their functions when the appropriate utilization of services comes into question or disrepute. In other words, if public assistance, a necessary social instrument, is seen as bad, the task of meeting financial needs for those unable to meet them on their own is threatened. To the extent that needs are not met, other kinds of social and physical dysfunctioning can be expected. And the ability of the instrument (public assistance) to perform will be impaired by neglect and public disrepute of public assistance.

3.2 A leader in the field of public assistance in the United States pointed out ways in which public assistance has been limited by negative attitudes and pointed to some of the reasons:

Public welfare leadership has never believed in relief grants alone as a solution to poverty. Unaccompanied by preventive and rehabilitative services, relief grants frequently serve only to perpetuate conditions of dependency. . . .

If the blame is to be placed someplace for the existence of this state of affairs, then it seems that it must be charged to the fault of public attitudes, cherished misconceptions about the nature of poverty, poor people and race, the Horatio Alger mystique, especially as these attitudes, until now, have been reflected in the elected representatives of the people and, to a much less virulent extent, in the media of communication.

The negative attitudes toward recipients of public assistance continue to be widely held and to be expressed by persons of prominence in the community as well. The longer these attitudes persist, the more we can expect programs in public assistance to be inadequate and the more we might expect that persons on public assistance will make less than the optimum use of public assistance. Even at the point of application for help, many people are reluctant to come forward, surviving on extremely paltry fare until only the severest desperation drives them to apply. One worker with the Social Planning and Research Council of Hamilton and District recalls from his own practice in the United States instances that are pertinent: the family of a man working in construction in Detroit, who during the winter months frequently found it necessary to turn to public assistance, but who would make do on oatmeal three meals a day till there was just no alternative to going to the Department; the mother of a fatherless home in Seattle who worked long hours in a hotel laundry at wages so low that they were supplemented by the Welfare Department, so seldom at home and so tired when she got there that she was unable to provide the necessary guidance to help keep her children from trouble; a woman in Denver desperately trying to find ways of forcing a deserting husband, who is back and forth over the Mexican border, to pay support for the family, attempting to avoid going back to the Welfare Department in spite of the great difficulties involved in obtaining court orders to enforce support payments across state - and even more, national - borders.

3.4

These cases, and many others that might be related, demonstrate that in order to get adequate public assistance programs and to have recipients see public assistance and their place in the public assistance program appropriately, there must be an improvement in public appreciation for the program, its purpose and clientele. Efforts to organize recipients of assistance and to involve community leaders in experiencing home visits and an orientation to public assistance have proven to be of value. Gains have been made by the Welfare Rights Organization and other groups of clients in the United States. Such groups are rather new in Canada, but we understand that some of them have been heard by the Special Senate Committee on Poverty. Home visiting of recipients with community leaders going along has had a positive impact on attitudes among local "power structures" in some American cities.

Illustrative of the kind of anti-welfare prejudice that constitutes a major part of the problem are not hard to come by. Three fairly recent ones will do:

At the Progressive Conservative Party Policy Conference in Niagara Falls, a Hamilton woman was prepared to see the party endorse an expansion of the welfare system but only if those who were solely recipients were deprived of the vote.*

Mr. Len Owen, Chairman of the Guelph Housing Authority, responded to criticism of admission and eviction policies from an incipient tenants' committee by pointing out that the committee was composed. . . of one member on welfare, "two members who have paid no rent since July 14," and one member on eviction notice who is behind in rent payments.

Mr. Gagliardi, Welfare Minister for British Columbia, told a conference in Vancouver that the government would provide employables receiving public assistance with an "incentive" to work by cutting allotments.

"We'll probably give them enough for food to keep them alive, but it's clear that we need some kind of incentive to get these type /sic/ of people back to work," he said later in an interview.

This kind of issue has been raised time and time again, as if there are substantial numbers of such persons receiving welfare, while in fact studies indicate that the bulk of caseloads are made up of the old, children, single parents, and handicapped persons. The extent of the inclusion of employables varies with the level of unemployment in a community.

While there has been feeling about the worth of persons receiving public assistance through agencies such as the Department of Social and Family Services and municipal departments with various titles but similar functions, little stigma is attached to those receiving other forms of public assistance such as: oil and mineral depletion allowances, no taxation of capital gains, expense account living, tax avoidance by living abroad, family allowance, old age security pension, N.H.A. loans, advance grain payments, government help in the form of payment of excess storage charges for wheat, etc. Some of these forms of public assistance are currently under consideration for change, as is indicated by the Carter report and

* "PC Delegates Oppose Annual Income Plan," in Toronto Globe and Mail, October 13, 1969. David MacDonald, M.P. (Egmont, P.E.I.), said that some participants "spoke as though they had a tremendous hankering to go back to the 1890's in the days of workhouses and debtor's prisons."

the White Paper on taxation, but the recipients of this kind of largesse are not thought of as being in the same category as recipients of what is more usually thought of as public assistance. No one talks of taking away the vote from recipients of mineral depletion allowances.

One element of the attitude toward the poor in receipt of public assistance is the charge of "chiselling". This term is used to indicate two kinds of behaviour: fraud and receipt of assistance when the person "should be working". Studies of fraud in Canadian public assistance are not known to Social Planning and Research Council staff. In the United States, there have been a fair number, especially as related to the Aid to Dependent Children program. An exhaustive investigation in Detroit, in 1948, resulted in a total of two warrants for fraud, neither of which resulted in conviction.* A study by the California Department of Social Welfare in 1958-1959 uncovered a rate of fraud of 1.5%. Greenleigh Associates, in a study of Aid to Dependent Children in Chicago, reported in 1960, found fraud (defined to include undisclosed income and/or presence of "absent" fathers) at under 2%. A massive study of Aid to Dependent Children conducted by the U.S. Department of Health, Education and Welfare, reported in 1963, found apparent fraud to be minimal - under 2% in 34 states, with only 8 states having fraud of over 3% and with Delaware and Nevada having the highest rates - 7.4%.*

The larger question is whether there are people on public assistance who "should be working". The bulk of public assistance recipients are the old, children, single parents, and the handicapped, with a very few employables. An economist, looking at 184 cases in Calgary,† found that there were 12 cases where one could "present reasonably valid arguments against the continuation of social allowance payments" and of the seven which the author describes, the evidence against continuation does not appear convincing in all cases. Nor does he demonstrate that there is indeed work available for them to do in Calgary. At most, he would question the appropriateness of less than 7% of his sample.

3.9 So far, "chiselling" has been examined as it relates to public assistance. There are, of course, other areas in which "chiselling" the government is possible. Since there has been such concern about "chiselling" on public assistance, it might be worth while to compare this problem to tax evasion. Our references are again from the United States, as there is a lack of Canadian material.

3.10 A former U.S. Commissioner estimates that 8% of tax returns in 1957 underreported gross income.* Another expert contends that in 1955 the most generous estimate is that in returns from business and professional proprietors only 81% of income was reported, and only 56% of farm income. Still another indicates a fairly constant rate of underreporting of dividends (close to 14%) from 1936 through 1957.

This same writer observes that:

It is hard to resist the conclusion that the zeal with which taxpayers reported their dividend income diminished between 1939 and 1952. A ready explanation lies in the change in tax rates. . . The response to tax rates has been symmetrical - just as underreporting increased as rates rose, so it declined when tax rates fell. But the fall in underreporting was not as vigorous as its rise earlier.*

Underreporting of interest was estimated at 57.8% in 1957.+ The automatic data processing system was first introduced into the Southeast Region of the Internal Revenue Service in 1961, and in 1962,

". . .the first year after the computers were installed in the Southeast Region, 45 percent more tax returns reported interest received from bank accounts and 20 percent more reported dividends from stocks. Besides, 7.7 percent more returns were filed in that region alone than had been received the previous year.++

"The remainder of the nation, then not under the ADP system, showed only a 5 percent rise in the number of returns filed."+++

+++ Loc. cit., fn.

Apparently, there are many sectors of society in which "chiselling" is more common than among those receiving public assistance.

3.11

The impact of the prejudice against poor persons on public assistance also includes another unfortunate element - the incorporation of the negative attitudes toward recipients by the clients themselves. Many recipients see themselves as second - or third-class citizens and voice this perception. The client who gratefully accepts whatever is given and is "appropriately humble" in the process is not a good prospect for rehabilitation. In fact, many workers in public assistance have commented that the "ungrateful" client who protests and fights the conditions to which he is subject is much more likely to show progress in movement away from reliance on public assistance. One of the more depressing aspects of work in public assistance is, therefore, the amount of apathy that one encounters.

INADEQUACY OF PUBLIC ASSISTANCE

Adequate functioning on the part of any person requires a combination of adequate environmental supports and adequate hereditary resources. Where the environmental resources are in abundance, a person may function adequately with less than average innate capacities, and where the innate capacities are extremely great, he may function adequately with less than average environmental support. In Figure I.,

FIGURE I

moving along the bottom line, the average person would be at a point half way along the line, with average environmental situation and average innate capacities leading to normal functioning. Moving further to the right, with a poorer environment, a person requires greater innate capacity to function adequately, till, at the far right, where environmental conditions are so bad that no amount of inherited strengths will produce adequate functioning. Moving to the left, one meets the same condition, till at the far left no amount of environmental support will be able to make up for hereditary deficits. An Einstein will not develop in a primitive Mexican Indian village, and a human vegetable will not become self-supporting regardless of how much care, how good a diet, how much love one gives him. Between these two extremes one finds the bulk of humanity, and with the person in between one strives for an average expectable environment as a minimum to nurture the person so that he can function adequately. At this point, there is relatively little we can do to improve human heredity, so that improvement in the human condition will necessarily depend on improvement in environment.

- 3.13 In looking at environmental components of a person, one must set some priorities. Not all aspects of environment are equal in effects, and some may be preconditions for ability to utilize other aspects of environment. As a psychology professor once observed, "Man does not live by bread alone - except when there is no bread." Yet, just as it is difficult to specify the extent to which inputs of environment are essential to adequate functioning, due to differences in heredity, so is it difficult to specify the quantity and time of receiving food, then shelter and clothing, then affection and socialization, and then other aspects of "culture" that an individual requires to function adequately. Again, we can state certain kinds of propositions about the limits, and we can point to problems arising with deficiencies, especially problems around greater anxiety and consequent movement away from adequate functioning. Another environmental consideration is the extent to which the quantity of goods and services which a person gets compares favourably with what others get. Even if calories are adequate to keep the person alive, if he sees others all around him living in considerable comfort, his functioning is apt not to be adequate. Our society is not willing, for instance, to accept the kind of social functioning demonstrated by the man who chose to make his home in a manhole in Toronto, regardless of his nutritional situation. At the nutritional level, if an infant with phenylketonuria (PKU) does not receive the appropriate kind of diet shortly after birth and for some years thereafter, the damage done will lead to gross retardation which no kind of help can reverse. Adequate diet would have prevented retardation. A man in Denver, suffering from diabetes and having trouble keeping on his diet on his public assistance grant, required amputation of limbs. Adequate financial assistance could have avoided this tragedy. These are rather extreme examples, but each relates to the kind of impact that society can have on environmental considerations, even if hereditary conditions are poor.

- 3.14 While the poverty line described in this brief is not a line below which everyone functions inadequately or above which everyone functions adequately, it is an effort to set down the monetary component of an average expectable environment at a somewhat minimal level, closely linked to the Economic Council's figure of 70% of income being expended on food, shelter, and clothing. Using the Economic Council's reasoning, the family of four in Hamilton receiving $4,800 a year is at the poverty line. Under the Ontario Department of Social and Family Services, the maximum which a family of four can possibly receive is $3,600, and almost all will get considerably less because they are not entitled, e.g., to special diets, etc.* General assistance in Hamilton, Wentworth County, and Halton County (including Burlington) is comparable.

- 3.15 From the obvious inadequacy of the public assistance grant, question can be raised about how serious government at all levels is about eliminating poverty. In the size of public assistance grants, it is in fact perpetuating poverty. Under such conditions, it is difficult to maintain that government has a policy of eliminating poverty.

We have been advised that the average family finds it possible to obtain housing and food from the basic welfare allotments but that clothing needs cannot be met from this source nor do family allowances ordinarily suffice to close the gap. Assuming that a family must go elsewhere for clothing, one can only predict that the family will attempt to obtain clothing from churches, friends, relatives, various agencies, etc. The ability of the family to function with dignity is inhibited, and a "begging" kind of behaviour is encouraged. Inadequate public assistance is public assistance that is self-defeating, and more than any other characteristic of the program the inadequacy cries out for correction. Obsequious behaviour does not promote rehabilitation and a program that encourages it is degrading to the people served by it.

- 3.16 Some have argued that additional funds should be put into services rather than higher grants. Essentially, this argument boils down to the contention that an income at the poverty level is higher than that required for adequate functioning. The position for the priority to be given to more intensive casework as against more adequate grants is not supported by the evidence. Let us examine two studies, one Canadian and one from the United States.

- 3.17 An experimental project by Community Research Associates in 1956 in three Minnesota counties, using Aid to Families with Dependent Children cases, divided cases into two categories, alpha and beta. Alpha cases were those who needed and could benefit from intensive agency services, and beta cases were those in which it was felt that only basic ameliorative services were necessary or possible. It proved impossible to service all of the alphas intensively, and therefore the alphas who did not receive special service provided a comparison group. "Although the 'Alpha-assigned' showed more improvement than the less-served cases, the differences were not great or statistically significant."

- 3.18 In the Family Centred Project in London, Ontario, 50 out of the total 80 cases treated were referred by the Department of Welfare, some jointly with other agencies. 62 of the 80 were on some form of public assistance at the time of referral, at least for part of their income. Only 4 of the cases had never received financial assistance.

* Public assistance also covers medical and drug costs, and there is no income tax to pay, but all of these factors will ordinarily not come anywhere close to making the $3,600 on assistance equal to $4,800 earned income.

Mencher, op. cit., p. 61. Emphasis added.

The experimental group of cases evidenced a somewhat greater incidence of improvement in overall family functioning, by the end of service, than did the control cases. The extent of the difference between the two groups is however limited. There were no cases in either group which achieved an "adequate" level of overall functioning by the end of service.*

SOME SPECIFIC CHARACTERISTICS OF PUBLIC ASSISTANCE IN HAMILTON AND DISTRICT

- 3.19 So far we have considered some of the global problems of public assistance, reflecting more or less universal characteristics. There are also aspects that relate more directly to characteristics of programs serving the Hamilton area that deserve some comment. One of these is the confusion that can arise from the multiplicity of public assistance agencies in the area. In addition to the Provincial Department of Social and Family Services, we also have the Department of Social and Family Services of Halton County, the Public Welfare Department of Hamilton, and the Social Services Department of Wentworth County.
- 3.20 On occasion an applicant waits all morning to be seen at the Public Welfare Department of Hamilton only to learn that he should have gone to the Social Services Department of Wentworth County. The Hamilton-Burlington-Wentworth Local Government Review Commission recommends that the public assistance programs be joined under a single agency responsible to a Metropolitan Council, the top layer of a two-layer government for the region. We concur with this recommendation, as far as it goes. At the same time, it is important that there be an adequate number of branch offices, for accessibility.
- 3.21 The Hamilton Public Welfare Department takes license plates from recipients, making these plates available to them again on the basis of specific needs which are approved by the Department. If a goal of public assistance is to promote independent functioning on the part of the client, this policy appears to have a contrary impact, leading instead to making the client dependent upon the worker for permission to use his own car, dependence of a sort that one would not expect from an adult. The Hamilton Department of Public Welfare will pay rent to landlords directly, if landlords insist. The Burlington Department of Social and Family Services, recently superseded by the Halton County Department, paid rent on Ontario Housing Corporation homes directly to the governmental landlord. In both cases, if the independent functioning of the client is a goal, it would be preferable for payment to be to the client, with the exception of the few cases in which the client is unable to manage his own affairs.
- 3.22 Hamilton's office for Public Welfare is inadequate. While the structure is relatively new, having been built in 1962, the wicket-like interviewing partitions were not designed to provide privacy, and the need to apply for public assistance is a matter of personal embarrassment to many recipients. In fairness, it must be noted that the Department attempts to carry on many private interviews in the home. The office is frequently very crowded, with applicants having to wait for long periods of time. There should be some way of simplifying interviewing procedures to reduce waiting time. Long waits are especially unpleasant because a few of those waiting are intoxicated. There are no magazines for those waiting. It would be some improvement if there were reading material available at the Hamilton Public Welfare Department. Applicants at the other departments in the area do not have such a long wait at the office to apply for assistance because of fewer cases.

* The Family Centred Project of London, Ontario. London: United Community Services of Greater London, 1967. Quotation is at p. 175. Emphasis added.

Donald R. Steele, E.A. Jarrett, and Brian W.B. Morison. Report and Recommendations. November, 1969, p. 123.

- 3.23 The Hamilton Public Welfare Department may ask that a man seeking public assistance stay home for as much as three specified half-days in a month in order to be seen by the worker at his home. This multiple appointment system conflicts with his ability to seek employment and should be reconsidered. If the problem is one of caseload size, more workers should be employed.

POSSIBLE PROCEDURES FOR UPGRADING THE QUALITY OF SERVICE

- 3.24 Recipients of public assistance have a variety of needs. Many require only financial help. Recipients should receive such aid as a matter of right, without also being required to accept casework or other services. Others also require help in dealing with emotional and other personal problems. It is apparent that differing degrees of training will be required to deal with the client needing solely financial aid and the person with serious emotional difficulties, retardation, mental illness, etc. With workers on the line having training varying from grade 12 through the M.S.W., the obvious strategy would be to utilize workers differentially, according to the differing degrees of difficulty which cases present. In fact, this procedure is in operation in the Hamilton Public Welfare Department and the Provincial Department of Social and Family Services and is planned in Halton. In the rather small Wentworth County Social Services Department there is no such division of clientele, largely because of the smaller nature of the operations. The Wentworth County operation attempts to employ personnel with a higher level of training than minimal in order to meet the needs of a wider variety of cases.
- 3.25 One kind of service that should be implemented, whether under a public assistance agency or elsewhere, is for basic adult education, for rehabilitation of persons who are not able to read, write, or speak English at a minimally adequate level or who lack basic arithmetic skills.
- 3.26 Caseloads in the Hamilton Public Welfare tend to be in the neighbourhood of 100 for district visitors, with the special unit for intensive casework having loads from about 45 to 50. The Provincial Social and Family Services caseloads are 220 families or 350 singles and married couples without children, a rather heavy load. Their Family Service Unit, which the social and family services regional administrator would like to expand further, has caseloads of 22 or 23, which provides opportunity for intensive service. According to Greenleigh Associates,

It is estimated that an intake worker should be able to handle 20 new cases a month. Caseloads for intensive undercare should be between 40 and 60, for medium service, 60 to 90, and cases requiring few services, 90 and over.*

The especially small caseloads on the Family Service Unit should provide for some very special kinds of work and for appropriate kinds of experimentation to justify this kind of work input.

Work with public assistance recipients requires a constant upgrading of the knowledge and skills of the staff. This upgrading is needed because workers in public assistance bring to their jobs such varied kinds of training and experience and because the recipients of service have so wide a variety of problems. In addition, the whole field of help with emotional and behavioural problems is very much in flux. Departments in the area provide in-service training, and remuneration for successful completion of course work at appropriate local educational institutions. Only the Provincial Department offers scholarships for completion of the Master of Social Work degree. This is the only profession that has shown interest in providing leadership specifically in public assistance. It is the view of the Social Planning and Research Council that more persons with training at the master's level are needed in public assistance to provide special services to problem-ridden clients, especially services experimentally oriented, to assist in inservice training, and to develop future leadership in public welfare. There are relatively few people so trained in the field. Therefore, scholarship help for people working in public assistance should be available to those wishing educational advancement and capable of utilizing it.

SHORTCOMINGS OF THE PROVINCIAL PROGRAM

Under the Canada Assistance Plan, provinces may opt to provide supplemental assistance to persons employed full time at wages so low that they earn less than would be provided under public assistance. The Province of Ontario does not make use of this provision and we recommend that it do so. Otherwise, we have a situation in which a person is penalized for working. Such a position is a disincentive to work. It is of course true that many persons on public assistance should not work, (the aged, the handicapped, etc.), but for those who can, work not only means a savings to the government but also provides the person with feelings of worth. All other things being equal, it is therefore, desirable to encourage work. If public assistance provided aid at the poverty line, it would be desirable to build in incentives for individuals were below that level but might yet work. However, simply allowing people to make up the difference between current assistance levels and the poverty line is not a desirable social policy because it ignores those most in need of assistance, those who for one reason or another are unable to work to attain adequacy of income - the person with a bad heart, the person who is sufficiently mentally retarded to prevent employability, etc. Assistance should be adequate, and incentives should be provided beyond the level of adequacy.

329 We also feel that there should be more adequate incentives provided for single parents wanting to work part-time.

3.30 A question of philosophy arises in another area of provincial concern. There are two general ways of perceiving social welfare and its role. One is to see welfare as having a residual role, dealing with the variety of conditions of people who have not "made it". Public assistance would be a typical "residual" service. The other looks at social welfare as having an institutional role, with service to the entire society as an objective. As well as public assistance, the family allowance program would be included as part of the social welfare field in the institutional approach.

The residual formulation is based on the premise that there are two "natural" channels through which an individual's needs are properly met: the family and the market economy. These are the preferred structures of supply. However, sometimes these institutions do not function adequately: family life is disrupted, depressions occur. Or sometimes the individual cannot make use of normal channels because of old age or illness. In such cases, according to this idea, a third mechanism of need fulfillment is brought into play - the social welfare structure. This is conceived as a residual agency, attending primarily to emergency functions, and is expected to withdraw when the regular social structure - the family and the economic system - is again working properly. Because of its residual, temporary, substitute characteristic, social welfare thus conceived often carries the stigma of "dole" or "charity".*

The institutional approach sees social welfare as the organized system of social services and institutions, designed to aid individuals and groups to attain satisfying standards of life and health. It aims at personal and social relationships which permit individuals the fullest development of their capacities and the promotion of their well-being in harmony with the needs of the community.

Walter A. Friedlander. Introduction to Social Welfare. New York: Prentice-Hall, 1955, p. 4.

3.31 Those seeing the role of social welfare as residual are apt to restrict the application of welfare to much more narrow realms. When the Social Planning and Research Council of Hamilton and District inquired about receiving Canada Assistance funds through the Ontario Department of Social and Family Services for an information centre, the Department stated that funding of such activity, though permitted under the Canada Assistance Plan, was beyond what is permitted under Ontario legislation. Alberta has appropriate legislation of this nature. We would recommend that Ontario take an institutional position on social welfare, adopting legislation allowing for programs such as information services and other programs providing services and amenities for the entire community.

3.32 An important shortcoming in Canadian public assistance is in the area of research. This report had to rely very heavily on United States documentation, simply because Canadian material is so minimal. Research should be related to issues both of large scope (policy) and of lesser scope (specific techniques).

TWO PROPOSED BASIC CHANGES

3.33 It has already been mentioned, but we consider it sufficiently important to stress again the high priority to be given to making public assistance payments adequate. If we wish to have recipients function adequately, we must also provide the wherewithal. Although the Social Planning and Research Council of Hamilton and District has not been able to give the time and study to the question of the form of income maintenance for which the Government should opt, it is our feeling that all those in need should receive the kind of help needed to bring them beyond the poverty level, through a mechanism that does not infringe upon the dignity of the recipient.

3.34 The provision of services would be enhanced by the establishment of a single public assistance agency in the region. In order for there to be a single agency, it would be necessary to abolish municipal departments and place their functions in the hands of the Ontario Department of Social and Family Services or set up a series of regional departments with all operating functions, subject to the regulations of a single provincial agency. Public Assistance is not merely a local problem. Ours is a mobile population.

3.35 This consolidation will eliminate the confusion that exists in the minds of many who need to apply for assistance, will make possible a greater upgrading of staff (e.g., through scholarships for training at various levels), and facilitate specialization of caseloads. There should be an adequate number of branch offices to meet needs, a factor to be stressed considering the recent consolidation of municipal public assistance into a single Halton County operation.

HOUSING IN HAMILTON AND DISTRICT

3.36 A major problem for low-income families is the cost of housing. Put quite simply, in the Hamilton area housing is in short supply, and when an item of universal need is in short supply the demand for it bids the price up. The tight housing market exists in spite of a tendency for the number of dwelling units to increase at a somewhat more rapid rate than population. (See Table I).

*Hamilton and District is the D.B.S. Hamilton Metropolitan area.

- 3.37 A critical issue is the vacancy rate. According to the Ontario Housing Corporation, (The Hamilton Housing Market, 1968, pp. 26-27):

A reasonable proportion of vacant units is necessary at at [sic] any given time to allow for mobility and to provide households with some choice in the selection of suitable accommodation. The vacancy allowance for rental units is generally higher than for sale units at any given time, due to the greater mobility of the group of persons renting accommodation. The centre for Housing and Environmental Studies, Cornell University* reports rates of 6 per cent for rental and 2 per cent for sale units as being reasonable. The 1.9 per cent vacancy rate recorded in the Market Area in 1968 can be considered low and indicative of a tight market.

In addition, the Economic Council of Canada recommends an overall vacancy rate of 4 per cent as desirable. Significant new construction will be required in addition to filling needs of newly formed households to meet this goal.

*Beyer, G.H., Housing Society, MacMillan Company, New York, 1965, p. 488.

- 3.38 The vacancy rate in the Hamilton area has been very low for as long as the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has collected such figures in this area (1965). Of eleven metropolitan areas on which they report in their June, 1969, apartment vacancy survey, Hamilton is the only city on which statistics have been collected since 1965 with a vacancy rate for that entire period under 2%.* Since 1967, the picture appears equally bleak for a number of metropolitan areas.
- 3.39 The low vacancy rate does not necessarily indicate that there is little turnover. In fact, especially at the lower end of the rental scale turnover is fairly common. The low vacancy rate bids up rents, however.
- 3.40 The most recent Hamilton area data continues the dismal picture. (See Table IV). As of mid-1968, according to the Hamilton Assessment Department, 1.7% of the single detached houses were vacant.

*The Apartment Vacancy Survey is conducted on a sample basis and only includes apartment buildings with six or more dwelling units. It does not cover structures completed in the six months prior to survey data.

The apartment vacancy rate picture for the Hamilton area is perhaps even more dismal if one examines the matter from the point of view of the large family. (See Table IV). According to the most recent figures, there were no vacancies in units of three or more bedrooms anywhere outside Burlington, a generally affluent, newer community. Vacancies in two bedroom units are under 2% except for an area designated "other" (outside Hamilton, Burlington, Dundas, and Stoney Creek), where it jumped from 0.0% in 1968 to 20.0% in 1969). This 20.0%* is based upon three buildings with a total of 43 units. Even among bachelor apartments the rate has dipped to 2.0% for the area.

*There appears to be some discrepancy in the percentage figure, in that there is no whole number of vacancies which will give a 20.0% rate on the basis of 43 units.

Some further important questions on the availability of housing have to do with other characteristics of vacant units. In a sample consisting of every 15th dwelling unit (houses and apartments) in Hamilton assessed at under $2,501 there was a vacancy rate of 8.2%, according to 1969 Assessment information. This seemed to indicate that the vast majority of vacancies in the city would be found in this assessment range. In order to learn more about these units that were vacant at assessment time, vacancies were surveyed in three of the 8 Wards. In Ward 2, 9 of the 13 "vacancies" were inspected; in Wards 7 and 8, 5 of 5 were checked. Inspections were almost all exterior.

Ward 2 is an older section of Hamilton, including downtown property. Of the nine locations, two had been demolished. One may have been vacant (a house). The still standing units consisted of one apartment, 4 houses, and 2 row houses. Five of the units appeared to be in good condition (2 of these in need of some repair), with 2 in poor condition. It is not unlikely that an inside inspection would decrease the number judged to be in good condition. The guess of the two staff associates is that two of the units date from before 1920, another 3 before 1930, and the other 2 before 1940. Some vacancies were seen by the two staff as they drove around.

3.44

Wards 7 and 8 are on "the mountain" and are generally a newer section of Hamilton. Of the 5 properties inspected, only one was vacant. That one was a small house in poor repair, apparently dating back to the 1940's. A torn-up "for sale" sign was lying on the side of the house. The other units were a small house, a dwelling unit attached to a variety store (in need of some painting), and apartments. These were all constructed probably in the 1960's, the late '50's at the earliest. One of the locations was a new apartment house with 180 units, listed on the assessment records as all being vacant. There were no vacancies. While the assessment rate per dwelling unit was under $2,501, the 180-unit structure did not appear to be "economy". The other "vacancies", except the actual vacancy, appeared to be sound but generally on the small side. Very few vacancies were observed in driving around. There were some single family dwellings under construction, but these appeared to be larger than the ones listed as "vacant", and one would guess that their assessment is higher.

One of the disturbing aspects of the housing picture is the very limited availability of data. C.M.H.C. collects vacancy rates on dwelling units in apartment houses of six or more. Hamilton Assessor's office has total vacancies in single-detached houses for the city. Any composite picture of the metropolitan area is largely guess-work. The census has gathered information on occupied dwelling units. Intelligent planning in the area of housing requires frequent periodic information about vacancies in rentals, properties for sale, ranges of prices, and variations according to number of bedrooms, at a minimum, and no one is compiling this kind of material, certainly not on a regional level.

HOUSING FOR LOW-INCOME PERSONS

3.46 We have argued elsewhere that the standard of living made possible by an income at the poverty line, as defined, is not a satisfactory one. This is supported further by information on the availability of housing to low-income groups.

3.47 An estimate of the average income of a wage-earner family head in Hamilton in 1969 is $6,479.*

3.48 If we compare these figures with the incomes of N.H.A. borrowers in 1968,

TABLE VINCOMES OF N.H.A. BORROWERS*, HAMILTON METROPOLITAN AREA

AVERAGE	$ 0-	5,000-	6,000-	7,000-	8,000-	9,000-	10,000-	11,000+

it is clear that N.H.A. mortgages are making little impact on the housing problem for average families, let alone low-income families. Fewer than 3 in a thousand borrowers are at the poverty line (family of four, $4,800). The average wage-earner family in Hamilton has a better chance, with almost one in five borrowers being at $6,999 or below.

3.49 Another way of looking at housing costs is to examine cost of new construction.

Table VI indicates a rapidly rising housing cost much of which is attributed to an increase in the price of serviced land. In 1968, of the 41 C.M.H.C. field offices, land costs for construction were second highest in Hamilton* (after Toronto). Though construction costs here were twenty-ninth, total costs (land plus construction) were still second only to Toronto.

Recent news indicates that efforts are under way to expand the quantity of available serviced lots by 38,000 by 1974, using 1,100 acres of land on the Hamilton Mountain, under control of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and Ontario Housing Corporation. While the Hamilton Board of Control has approved the idea, it is still to be approved by O.H.C. According to the Hamilton Spectator, November 12, 1969, Controller J. MacDonald said that if O.H.C. approves, "...Hamilton would be one of the two cities in Canada assured of having more available serviced land than is needed for the next decade". One would also expect such a development to have a deflationary influence on land prices in the area. Most of the Hamilton Mountain housing will be for "moderate" income families under The Home Ownership Made Easy (H.O.M.E.) program, with some public housing. Land in the H.O.M.E. program will be leased rather than sold, to cut cost.

*The C.M.H.C. Field Office in Hamilton serves Brant, Haldimand, Norfolk and Wentworth Counties and that portion of Halton County included in the Townships of Nelson and Trafalgar.

- 3.51 1,550 acres of land in Saltfleet is being held by Ontario Housing Corporation in a recently formed land bank. This area is planned for development as an integrated community - housing, industry, and business. The development would be gradual, and the beginning of activity after a land bank assembly is ordinarily five years away from the bank formation. The amount of housing available to low-income persons in this development is not known.
- 3.52 At a meeting of a Social Planning and Research Council committee in 1966, a committee member in construction said that his company "had abandoned low-income housing schemes, because they are unable to place a house e.g. a 3 bedroom bungalow, in a good area, on the market under $22,000." The problems are the high cost of servicing the land and the mortgage market. "He sees subsidized housing as the only answer to the problems of the low-income groups." In fact, it was noted at that meeting that Hamilton has more public housing per capita than any other city in Canada.
- 3.53 Michael Wheeler, of the Canadian Welfare Council, in a memorandum the following year, states:
- Given the current pattern of income distribution, the market alone is unable to supply adequate housing at price levels within the reach of a significant proportion of the total population. Given mounting costs in practically all the constituent elements of housing supply, income redistribution to the extent that would be required to solve this problem in its entirety is inconceivable, even if it were desirable. The solution depends in large part on the development and determined implementation of a public housing policy.
- 3.54 Informants from the field of real estate indicate that they see no way in which our hypothetical family of four could purchase a home in the Hamilton area. The next question is one of cost of rental accommodations. The Hamilton office of C.M.H.C. has provided figures for 1969:

TABLE VIIAVERAGE RENTS, APARTMENTS IN THE HAMILTON AREA, 1969

LOCATION	SIZE DWELLING UNIT	AVERAGE RENT
Hamilton	1 bedroom	$140-145
	2 bedroom	155-166
	3 bedroom	177-192
Burlington	1 bedroom	145-150
	2 bedroom	155-170

Stoney Creek	1 bedroom	130
	2 bedroom	140-145

SOURCE: C.M.H.C.

- 3.55 Since the C.M.H.C. does not have data on the range of rents, we contacted the Public Welfare Department and real estate informants about low rents. Hamilton Public Welfare Department informants indicate that there are a very few apartments available at $85 to $90 per month, but generally the lowest rate is $100. The cheapest house rental is in the neighbourhood of $125, and that is exceptional. One real estate informant referred to the current shortage of housing for low-income families in the Hamilton area as "appalling". Another, commenting on the $95 per month allowed a family of 4 by Ontario Welfare regulations for housing, said that nine or ten years ago he rented a 2 storey, 6 room house on a small lot, a house of average quality, for that rate. One thought that there might be a very few old row houses in the North End at $95 per month, in questionable condition.
- 3.56 The Hamilton Public Welfare office housing specialist gets about 3 to 4 calls a day from persons looking for living accommodations. Many of those calling are non-recipients of service, for example, a head of the household making $70 to $90 a week. There is a definite shortage of inexpensive rentals, in the view of the Department.
- 3.57 The Public Welfare Department and real estate informants agree that landlords are reluctant to rent to families with children, especially small ones, and give preference to those with few or none.
- 3.58 One obvious type of low-cost housing is public housing. Compared to other Canadian cities, Hamilton has been fortunate in the number of units here, and His Worship Mayor Copps has been very active and outspoken in seeking more public housing. Currently, public housing is under two different administrations, with housing for older people administered by the Hamilton Housing Company and other public housing under the Hamilton Housing Authority, both acting on authority from the Ontario Housing Corporation.
- 3.59 As of October 23, 1969, there were 803 units for senior citizens, with an additional 594 under construction. The waiting list consisted of 1,237 applications for bachelor apartments and 306 couples. The Hamilton Housing Authority has 1,693 units. Their major shortage appears to be in housing for smaller families, though one would expect the most acute shortage to be felt by larger families. It is only with the three bedroom units that new construction appears to begin to meet the waiting list problem, and the publicity around new construction may serve to bring more applicants, directly from individual families learning of vacancies through the media and from persons referred by agencies. The number of new public housing units scheduled for 1970 equals about 12% of Hamilton's building permits for residential construction in 1969.

3.60 There are also 50 units of public housing in Burlington and 24 in Stoney Creek.

3.61 Since adequate accommodations for low-income are in short supply, what are the consequences? The Social Planning and Research Council collected observations about the housing situation in 1965, and at that time Catholic Children's Aid Society of Hamilton reported:*

*Housing in Hamilton, 1965, p. 22.

- 3.62 We have done a quick survey only of open Protection cases of families served on an on-going basis. Of 164 families being served as of November 1, 1965, 26, or approximately 16% of active cases, had definite "housing problems", constituting a degree of inadequacy sufficient to contribute to potential neglect of the children or in turn because of the lack of housing, contributing to keeping children in our care because there was literally no dwelling available for the family's reuniting.
- 3.63 It was interesting to note that with most of these families usually several factors were applicable in concluding this or that constituted a housing problem and were composed of a combination of basic physiological, psychological, protection against contagion, and protection against accident, "needs".
- 3.64 Many of our families now appear to "think poor" as a result of years of inhabiting "poor" housing. Most dwell in houses inadequate in the first instance from the point of view of accommodation in relation to the structural soundness, cleanliness, inadequate services, (heat, lighting, plumbing). Some of our people with particular health problems, (cardiac conditions, crippled children, blindness, epilepsy, etc.) are forced to live in second or third floor "apartments" and there is constant danger of accidents on stairs, or a worsening of the physical handicap.
- 3.65 Most consider themselves fortunate to have, at the minimum, a "home" and either feel it is useless to seek alternate accommodation because of its lack or unsuitability or their inability to pay for same at any rate.
- 3.66 Many people seem to have developed "landlord syndrome", for want of a better term, in that they will not complain about inadequacies, accident hazards and the like, for fear of eviction for if such does happen, they are in no position financially to seek redress in the courts.
- 3.67 We note quite often the number of people whose sole income is from some form of Public Assistance. The parents earning minimal or marginal income in relation to the size of family also have unique problems in that most are not eligible for the presently available subsidized housing.
- 3.68 Many people too present problems for the landlord because of a previous history of failure to pay rent, damage to dwellings, disturbed and retarded children and mentally deficient adults. Of course, these latter problem areas are more related to community attitudes but do have a bearing on housing problems when it comes to renting.

QUALITY OF HOUSING

The question of the quality of housing in the area is difficult to pin down. Each municipality in Wentworth County has its own by-laws on the question of the quality of dwelling units. In Hamilton, most of the pertinent matters related to existing dwellings fall under one of three by-laws - a 1969 minimum standards by-law, affecting only the urban renewal area; a building by-law which includes provision for nuisance abatement and fire hazard abatement; and a health by-law. Enforcement is by the Building Department, the Fire Department, or the Hamilton-Wentworth Health Unit, depending on the violation.

The characteristics of dwelling units are not kept very up-to-date in governmental reports. Most recent statistics come from 1961:

TABLE IXDWELLING CHARACTERISTICS, HAMILTON METROPOLITAN AREA, 1961

No. Occupied Units	In Need of Repair		Lacking Exclusive Use of:		Average Month Rent		Median Value Owner-Occupied Single, Detached
	Major	Minor	Flush Toilet	Bath or Shower	Cash	Gross*

SOURCE: C.M.H.C., D.B.S.

*Including water, electricity, gas, and fuel.

Burlington is fairly recent and would presumably not present a problem relative to quality of housing.

Real estate informants asked about a dwelling at $95 for a family of four felt that the quality might be a problem. One commented that the place would have to be "substandard, marginal, of poor construction". A woman who was formerly employed by the Hamilton Public Welfare Department spoke of conditions she and her colleagues had seen in dwellings in which clients lived. She indicates that by poor conditions she is speaking about serious problems with plumbing or heating, structural damage or deficiencies in the foundation, or other major defects. Such conditions exist in from a fourth to a third of the cases, she estimates.

Other clients lived in units with less serious deficiencies, such as needing painting, etc. Hamilton Alderman William Scandlan states that he could at any time provide a list of 1,000 dwelling units in such serious condition that they would be immediately vacated by the Hamilton-Wentworth Health Unit. He does not do so, he said, because there would be no place for the inhabitants to go.

3.72 Looking at the question of constructing new rental apartments for low-income families one soon discovers the impossibility.

3.73 Calculating that a family of four require 800 square feet at the very minimum multiplying by $13 per square foot for construction, and adding $1,000 per unit for land, costs come to $11,400. Interest at 10% is $1,140 and taxes are about $280. Interest plus taxes are $1,420 per year. Rent of $95 per month brings in $1,140 per year, the amount of the interest only.

3.74 Our Public Welfare informant found that most of the housing in which her clients in Hamilton's North End lived was poor, but there has been, she understands from other workers, a marked improvement in over-all quality of accommodations in which recipients live in that area, due to urban renewal. There still, however, remains a substantial quantity of substandard housing scattered throughout the older area of the city.

SUMMARY OF THE HOUSING SITUATION

3.75 The tight housing market in Hamilton and District exists in spite of a tendency for the number of dwelling units to increase at a somewhat more rapid rate than population. Crowding, defined as a condition in which two or more families occupy one dwelling unit, declined between 1961 and 1966. Residential building starts have fluctuated markedly from year to year. While data on vacancy rates are not readily available in any comprehensive form, the vacancy rate in Hamilton in mid-1968 in single detached houses (for rent or sale) was only 1.7%; in apartments (where there are 6 or more units), the vacancy rate for rentals was only 1.3% in 1969.

3.76 N.H.A. mortgages do little for low-income persons, with the typical borrower having an income in the $6,000 to $8,999 range. The cost of new construction in Hamilton has risen markedly, with the most spectacular increase coming in the cost of serviced land, which constitutes roughly 30% of the cost of land and house. The quantity of housing in the Hamilton area may be adequate with the development of C.M.H.C. - O.H.C. acreage on Hamilton mountain in this decade, but how much of this will be accessible to those of low-income is another matter. Certainly private developers are not able to create low-income housing.

3.77 A few apartments are available for rent at $85 to $90 a month, but more typically low-income apartments would be at $100. The cheapest house rental would be $125, and there are few at that rate. The housing specialist of the Hamilton Public Welfare Department gets 3 to 4 calls a day from persons looking for accommodation, many of them non-recipients of public assistance on low-incomes. There is a definite shortage of low-income rentals, in the view of the Department.

3.78 Public housing in the Hamilton area meets part of the need, and in fact Hamilton is well provided with public housing compared to other cities. However, the amount of public housing does not begin to meet the need for low-income housing.

3.79 Lack of adequate housing for low-income families results in some rather spectacular and disastrous situations for families. A 1965 report from Catholic Children's Aid Society of Hamilton reported that 16% of their active cases involved housing problems. Inadequate housing had a depressing influence on a number of the families, and in some cases the particular facilities were inadvisable for reasons of physical handicap. In some cases, families were kept separated because there was literally no place for them to live together.

3.80 While information about the quality of housing available to low-income families is not readily available in a quantified form, one former worker for the Hamilton Public Welfare Department felt that from a fourth to a third of the dwelling units occupied by her clients had serious defects.

REMEDIES FOR PROBLEMS IN HOUSING

3.81 Housing, especially low-income housing, is an area of concern which is not a single problem entity. It is a collection of problems, and the ways of attacking these problems are numerous. It must be recognized, however, that not all solutions are "equal" in the kind of impact they have on the problem. It is also important to understand that the kinds of governmental action required for dealing with the housing problem complex raise major issues of political philosophy and challenge the values and interest of many.

3.82 The first issue that strikes one in examining the housing picture is the paucity of statistical information - information about vacancy rates and information about quality of dwelling units. The lack of reliable data on these issues makes intelligent overall planning and policy-formation most difficult. One lacks information on the number and type of vacancies needed and the rates which people can afford. It is important that such material be gathered on a regular basis for central cities, metropolitan areas, and provinces, especially as various kinds of responsibilities must be taken by various governmental bodies. The information should be gathered from a sample of all dwelling units, occupied and vacant, rentals and otherwise.

It is important that Government recognize the priorities it sets by its own policies. Thus, it should clearly be faced that certain kinds of deflationary policies will add to the housing problem. The Economic Council of Canada has expressed its view on the priorities that should be involved: "The use of housing as an economic regulator should not be continued to such an extent in the future."* One may disagree, but all who feel that the housing situation in Canada is acute must weigh the alternatives carefully - so much deflation with so much less housing, less deflation with more housing. The problem of the lack of housing is especially acute in the Hamilton area, but the problem is also national in scope. Use of manipulation of the housing market for deflationary purposes intensifies the housing problem nation-wide.

Ancillary to the principle of carefully weighing policies which have a side effect of reducing the number of housing units available compared to the number there would be with another, different policy is the idea of Government having a land policy, just as it has monetary and fiscal policies. Thus, one might argue, Government should buy and sell land in order to affect its price. The land on Hamilton Mountain to be developed by Ontario Housing Corporation might be used in this way. Of course, objections might be made about the cost of such a program.

One area of possible activity is in ownership of land. Since the cost of land is such a large part of the cost of housing, and since land costs have been rising so markedly, one might consider the common European practice of municipal ownership of land. Such ownership could in fact take place at the provincial level also. In Europe, municipalities do not ordinarily purchase all of the land but do purchase some of it with the purpose of controlling its use and influencing the use of land which was not purchased. If municipal government did purchase land in order to keep prices down, it would find itself at cross-purposes because of the reliance of local government on the property tax. One must also face the value question here, as many people have a strong commitment to the right of the individual to own his own piece of land and house.

*The Canadian Economy from the 1960's to the 1970's (Fourth Annual Review). Ottawa: Queen's Printer, 1967, p. 265.

Eva Hamrin and Erik Wirén, Town and Country Planning in Sweden Today, Stockholm: Swedish Institute, 1964, p.p. 6-7. "In Stockholm, a conservative local government began buying up land systematically in 1904. By parcelling out the land under a system of leaseholdship rights, the city could keep prices of building land under effective control".

3.86 The question of ownership is, however, not so simple as that of a person having all rights to a piece of land and a house thereon. Ownership is a much more complex concept, as it has always been. Essentially, it consists of a set of rights and duties related to a piece of land. These rights are not and never have been absolute. Today, rights to use of land are defined by zoning laws, limits placed by right of expropriation, covenants, easements, taxation legislation, etc. Another way of looking at the question of "Governmental ownership" would be to see it in terms of redefining the right to use of land in such a way that conveyance could only be to the government, and government could convey through an instrument similar to what we call a lease. In fact, the H.O.M.E. program utilizes a lease approach in keeping housing costs low. Whether such policy should be widespread is a question related to values and the importance one places on continued reliance on the property tax base, for if such a system did not cut property tax revenues on land it would not meet the purpose of decreasing the cost of housing.

3.87 Imposition of a capital gains tax on land would have limited impact on the increasing land prices*. Part of the cost of residential land is due to speculation, which would only be partly affected by such action. In addition the increasing price of land is also related to increasing population and the current small number of vacant dwelling units. Differential taxation policies for farm and non-farm land would have the effect of raising the cost of non-farm land by lessening the availability of land for residential use. A direct tax on speculative land profits could help, if the proceeds were utilized to build homes, but unless the tax were 100% the residual untaxed portion would still be inflationary.

* "Dean Gerald Carrothers, head of York University's School of Environmental Studies, says, however, that 'a capital gains tax won't reduce the cost of housing in the Hamilton area.

"It would simply siphon off extra revenue and redistribute it throughout the whole country.'

"But he does offer an adaptation of the taxation solution which might work to direct effect on housing.

"A more direct taxation could, he says, be aimed at speculators' 'excessive profits'. The yield from this could then be ploughed directly back into the housing field where it could be put to the good of those in need of homes."

Gerry McAuliffe, et al. "The Great Land Rush," in Hamilton Spectator, December 31, 1969, p. 21.

- 3.88 Raising the quality of substandard dwelling units is another matter for legislative concern. At the municipal level, to what extent should enforcement of by-laws related to quality of housing be distributed among different governmental agencies? We recommend further centralization of responsibility, so that one department enforces all of the pertinent by-laws.
- 3.89 Legislation to provide for different taxation criteria for dwelling units seems appropriate. Perhaps entrepreneurs who purchase substandard properties and make them standard could be rewarded with a tax holiday on the value of improvements for a given number of years. (This principle might also apply to repair of owner-occupied dwellings). Provision should also exist for municipal trusteeship of substandard dwellings, with rents to the municipality until deficiencies are eliminated through rent payments. There should be no right to be a slumlord and no advantage to being one.
- 3.90 Some would see rent control as at least a partial solution to rising rents, as they directly limit rental costs. In fact, total rent controls present many problems, and while they might serve as a partial stop-gap, they are possibly too difficult to enforce, especially in a tight housing situation. The well-known war-time difficulties give evidence here: problems around "key money", rental agencies paying fees back to landlords, charges for minimal furniture, etc. The violations of rent control occur primarily at the point of moving in, and there are therefore, relatively few illegal acts per rental to detect. On the other hand, policing of substandard conditions involves an ongoing situation and can be detected at almost any point in time.
- 3.91 There are other Governmental measures which could be taken to improve the quantity and quality of housing, especially for low-income families. The Government could insure or directly provide more low-cost mortgage money, perhaps requiring that a given portion of pension fund money be allocated to such use. The Government should also encourage all kinds of non-profit and cooperative construction and renovation and allocate enough money to make such work possible, through low interest and/or no-interest long-term loans, loan guarantees, and grants especially for low-income home owners to repair their houses. The renovative programs would probably have greater direct impact on low-income housing than those programs aimed at new construction. Therefore, there is also a need for more public housing. Cost seems to be a major hang-up in implementing such policies, but we must also keep in mind the costs of neglect, costs illustrated in the statement of Catholic Children's Aid Society of Hamilton, for instance.
- 3.92 One might think that the quality of housing of people on public assistance might be enhanced by increasing the housing allowance in their grants. This idea is questionable. If a recipient of public assistance is spending more for housing than he is allocated (i.e., the rent payment must be made from some money budgeted for food, etc.), there is certainly every reason to raise the grant to a level where the housing cost is met. However, if additional money beyond what is being currently paid to landlords were given for rent, especially in cases where the Department makes direct payments to the landlord, the result would be an increase in the cost of housing.

3.93 To clarify, imagine that government said that it recognized that $95 per month rent is unrealistically low in the Hamilton area for a family of four. Families are in fact paying $125, and so the rent allocation will be $125 so that it will not be necessary for poor families to cut into food, etc. to pay the rent. So far, so good. But if the government then decides that the quality of housing at $125 is often poor and that welfare families of four should be granted $135 for rent, then the result will be higher rents for the same facilities, not better facilities.

3.94 An increase in rental allowances will result in an increase in rents for three reasons - 1) the shortage of housing; 2) the inability of the construction industry to build low-income housing profitably and 3) the relatively inflexible way in which the law of supply and demand operates in the field of housing.

3.95 Because housing is in short supply, a renter, even with slightly more money in his pocket, will not find new quarters very readily. But if a person must move, the money available for him to pay is apt in fact to be paid, for he will get the best quarters he can at the money he can afford. At the same time, other people will be bidding for dwelling quarters in the same market (a relatively fixed quantity of housing), and so they also will bid higher. The consequence is that the price will rise, as effective demand rises while supply remains relatively constant (especially the supply of low-income rentals).

3.96 We have already indicated that rising costs make it impossible to build low-cost housing. But let us suppose that a ceiling were imposed on existing rentals but not on new ones. At that point, the bidding up of housing and then the freezing of existing rentals would represent an incentive for new construction. Even so, the supply would not expand rapidly, for several reasons:

1. Housing is a large item, taking time to construct;
2. Payment is generally not in cash, and the quantity therefore responds to the availability of mortgage money. The would-be owner or entrepreneur's ability to spend more money per month for housing is not enough. He must also be able to get a mortgage, and much of the cost is the cost of mortgage financing;

3. It is ordinarily necessary to recruit a large number of producers for each unit - electrical contractors, plumbing contractor, etc.;
4. In construction, the producers are relatively small operators;

33	252	3	104	3	208	1	203	40	667

SOURCE: C.M.H.C.

5. The construction industry has been characterized by cut-throat competition, and instability in the capital market, with the result that producers are often driven from the field. As a result, many who are left may be wary about taking chances;
6. Builders must be reliant on local licensing bodies.

All of these factors together make the operation of the law of supply and demand very sluggish in housing. For that reason, more direct intervention is needed to promote home construction.

The small and precarious nature of construction firms minimizes the amount of research done in construction. Research on improved construction techniques should therefore be supported heavily by government. If such research is under federal auspices, improvements in techniques and building materials which might otherwise be banned in local building by-laws might be more readily accepted nation-wide.

CASE HISTORIES

- 3.98 This report on housing has provided a picture of housing from a statistical point of view and a discussion of some kinds of policy that might be put into operation to deal with the housing problem complex. But it is people who feel the effects of housing conditions, and for that reason we include two case-histories, illustrating some of these problems. It is for these and other Canadians and in another sense for all of us that we must come to grips with this problem complex and make it possible for every Canadian to have decent accommodation.

A LOW-INCOME HOME OWNER

- 3.99 Mrs. Smith* is a low-income home owner in Wentworth County. She and her family moved into their modest 3-bedroom home in 1960. In 1961, her husband died in a work-related accident leaving her with three school-aged children. She has owned the house free and clear since 1967, paid by her husband's life insurance. Her current income is from Workmen's Compensation, in the amount of $275 per month. In 1961, she was getting $150 a month, with a raise to $195 in 1963 and to $275 in 1968. Earlier, she received an additional allowance from the Ontario Department of Social and Family Services for oil in the winter, but currently she is not eligible for oil because of the higher Workmen's Compensation. She owes $114 for last year's oil and has trouble getting oil for this year.
- 3.100 Expenses are hard to estimate precisely, as there is the odd broken window from playing ball, etc. She has a friendly neighbour who has done her plumbing work free. In 1965, she had imitation brick siding installed, both to cut down on the need for paint and to provide insulation. The cost was $1,200. She also had painting done that year at a cost of $50. In 1962, she lost a tank of oil in a flood.
- 3.101 Averaged over recent years, her expenses on the house include:
- | | |
|---------------------|-------------------------------------|
| Furnace | - $30 per year. |
| Repair of well pump | - $20 per year ($65 since 1966). |
| Fire Insurance | - $25 per year ($75 for 3 years). |
| Property taxes | - $291 this year (plus interest). |
| Pumping septic tank | - $10 ($20 per 2 years). |
- 3.102 Currently, she has had dirt put into a ditch ($100) and plowed ($42). She will need another 10 loads (at $150 in all) to finish filling the ditch. She feels this step is needed to prevent flooding and cut down on pollution of her well. A child was hospitalized from the water with dysentery, she reports. Street lighting is soon to be added, at a cost of $45.54 plus an extra $5 per month on the Hydro bill.

- 3.103 The house needs new roofing. It needs some electrical work. Back and front stairs need repair. The area needs storm and sanitary sewers, and in the absence of storm sewers she feels the house should be raised to provide greater protection from flooding. When sewers are installed, she will be assessed for sewer services. Water service is also likely to be added. None of these items have been estimated.
- 3.104 Assuming that extraordinary expenses will be at about the same rate she has already paid in 1969 plus anticipated costs for street lighting, it appears that she will be putting out about $49 per month on the house. Even though her housing cost is well below the $95 a month allowed in the $4,800 yearly budget for a family of four, a recalculation based on this rate of housing costs would find her over $1,000 below the poverty line if all other things were equal. In fact, all other things are not equal.
- 3.105 This family lives in an area rather remote from facilities of virtually all kinds. The shopping is done at one butcher and one small grocery-variety store, the only places in the vicinity. Because the grocery-variety has a small turnover of merchandise relative to, say, supermarkets, and because she is unable to "shop the specials", Mrs. Smith pays more for food. She has no car, and so trips into shopping areas for other goods make her reliant on friends and acquaintances to drive her or occasionally on taxis. Public transportation does not exist in the area.
- 3.106 Mrs. Smith responds to her difficulties by spending a considerable amount of time contacting government officials, both civil servants and elected persons, at all levels of government. She is only sometimes successful in getting what she wants. Some of the officials resent her taking up their time, which they feel might be spent more profitably in some other way. The cost of this time must also be seen as part of the cost of poverty in this country.

PROBLEMS OF HOUSE-HUNTING IN HAMILTON

3.107 The Pratt* family consists of a husband in his late 40's, a wife, and a seven-year-old son. Mr. Pratt is a pleasant, personable individual who likes to help others. A dislocated disc in his back and his lack of any particular skill or training make it impossible for him to get steady work. He works for a church as a part-time caretaker at night and he gets a disability pension. Mrs. Pratt quite often does day housework.

3.108 The story of the Pratts' difficulties in housing began about five years ago, in 1964, when Mr. Pratt became sick and was unable to keep his job as superintendent at two apartment buildings on Hamilton mountain. The owner of the buildings moved him to an apartment in the older section, but he was asked to move after a month. He then moved to the third floor of a house in the centre of town. He understood the rent to be $60, but it was raised to $85. He found the place infested with vermin, particularly bedbugs, so numerous that they dropped from the ceiling. The landlord refused to fumigate, and Mr. Pratt reported the condition to health authorities. They fumigated and sent the bill to the landlord, who evicted the Pratts.

3.109 Mr. & Mrs. Pratt and their son then moved to a third floor apartment on a main downtown street, over a store. They stayed there a year, paying $80 a month. He had again become ill and was unemployed, and he had to move because the building he was in was torn down to make room for a parking lot. He tried to find a cheaper place, finally finding one at $75, over a store in the East End business section, badly in need of decoration. The water heater in this apartment broke, and the landlord put another one in with only a 14 gallon capacity. They had to request its replacement because of its inadequacy, and when workmen moved cupboards out to put in the other one, they would not replace the cupboards, as the landlord said that he would have to raise the rent if he did things like that. Mr. Pratt had to replace the cupboards himself. He stayed two and a half years and redecorated the place. The building was sold at that time, and the new owner, seeing the condition of the unit, raised the rent to $100. Mr. Pratt was afraid he would raise the rent again and therefore this year he began to look again.

3.110 After 3 or 4 months of intensive searching, he found a place in Hamilton's main urban renewal area, a second floor apartment with two bedrooms, a living room, kitchen, and a sun porch, for $90. Such places are exceptionally rare.

3.111 On some occasions, Mr. Pratt had lost the deposit on units in spite of his improvement of facilities. In the process of searching, Mr. Pratt found many places that were very dirty and in poor repair, renting for from $85 to $125 per month. He had himself to settle for places in poor condition, which he renovated, but he selected some of the better ones.

- 3.112 Mr. Pratt is handicapped to some degree by his physical condition. He has also been depressed at times by his housing condition, to the extent that his capacity to apply himself to improving his job skills is sometimes impaired.

PROBLEMS OF HOUSING SEEN BY A TEACHER IN A LOW-INCOME AREA

- 3.113 One mother brought her children to school late because the pipes had frozen and she had to take the children to a restaurant to eat. They paid (in 1966) eighty-five dollars a month for a four room house through the walls of which you could see daylight. It cost them about one hundred dollars a month to heat it by space heater. They couldn't find anything better where they could take six children. One child was often late for school because they had to share the bathroom with a neighbour. There was none in their house and a family of eight. In another home, there were three rooms for eight people. One was the kitchen-dining-living-laundry room combined. They had two babies. There was a hot plate and no evidence of a refrigerator. There was a radio, record player, washing machine and sink, with a few cupboards. Walking room was about three square feet. One room was a bedroom with a double bed and a dresser. The other room was empty except for some odd items. Where did six children and two adults sleep? Total walking room for eight people would be about 84 square feet. It was a second floor apartment with stairs that seemed about ready to collapse. There was no backyard. The children played on the street.
- 3.114 Rats and mice are very common, creating all kinds of problems from soiling food to biting the small children. We had a conversation time at school where the children compared rats as other children might compare pets. "We had a rat at our house and my mother threw her shoe at it, but it wouldn't go away." "How big was it?" "Oh about so big," indicating about eight inches. "That's nothing! We have one this big," indicating about ten inches. The conversation continued, and almost everyone had a rat, rats, or mice. One parent excused her son from class about four times one year because the Board of Health was fumigating the house.
- 3.115 There are other health problems because of poverty. Crowded conditions lead to lack of sleep because they have crowded beds or no bed at all, but rather a place on top of a trunk, etc. They may sleep in the room with the television and can't sleep until the last one goes to bed and the set is turned off.
- 3.116 Frequently these are a transient people. Some move to avoid a month's rent or because rents are raised. They usually stay in the same area, however, just moving a few blocks. Public housing has now been built in our area, and many have a comfortable place for the first time in their lives. One child who moved into a unit last spring, wrote in a story that she now lived in a "whole house" meaning it wasn't shared quarters with one or more families.

CHAPTER 4

THE ROLE OF SOCIAL PLANNING COUNCILS IN DEALING WITH POVERTY

THE ROLE OF SOCIAL PLANNING COUNCILS IN DEALING WITH POVERTYGENERAL REMARKS

4.1

Social planning councils are community social agencies designed to enable their local communities to plan their services and take part in solving their problems. Their object is to encourage community-wide planning, through a partnership of community interest - governmental and voluntary, lay and professional, organization and private citizen - and to promote the development and maintenance of adequate and economical health, recreational, welfare and other social services and facilities.

4.2

The Social Planning and Research Council of Hamilton and District was set up to carry out three basic objectives:

- Conduct research into social needs and community problems.
- Co-ordinate the work of existing services.
- Assist citizens and community groups to plan efficient and effective health, welfare and recreation services.

Within these three basic areas, the services provided include:

- Surveys and studies of social problems and agency services.
- Consultation with agencies, clubs and other community organizations on matters relating to the health, welfare and recreation fields.
- Information about health, welfare and recreational matters.
- Conducting workshops and conferences on matters of public interest.
- Publishing. . .
 - * Reports of research projects and studies.
 - * Council newsletter.
 - * Directory of Community Services.
 - * Camp Directory.

- * Directory of Community Services for Older People.
- * Directory of Services for Physically Handicapped People.
- * Manual of Agency Policies.

4.3 The work of the Social Planning and Research Council of Hamilton and District involves a variety of fields and serves a multiple purpose. It endeavours

- To prevent wastage and duplication of effort.
- To encourage co-operation among federal, provincial, municipal and voluntary agencies.
- To promote sound public opinion on health, welfare and recreational matters.
- To advise the United Appeal on the most effective use of voluntary funds.
- To promote high standards of economy and efficiency in tax-supported and voluntary agencies.
- To spot neglected areas in the social welfare field and promotes development of necessary health and welfare services.
- To assist in the recruitment, training, and placement of volunteers for community service.

4.4 The many functions of the Social Planning and Research Council of Hamilton and District are carried out by a small professional staff and a large number of individual citizens, representatives of various agencies, clubs and other community organizations who contributed their time and talent voluntarily.

4.5 Like most other social planning councils, ours is a member of the local United Appeal. Many are departments of local United Appeals. From time to time, a local United Appeal has reports done on the functioning of existing United Appeal agencies and on applications for admission to the Appeal. Generally, it is the social planning council which carries out the study. Again like others, we receive funds from a variety of additional sources. Faced with the tight budget situation which is common to many reliant on United Appeal and governmental support, from time to time we have been able to obtain special funding for particular studies, such as the current study we are conducting on day care services, made possible by grants from the Canadian Welfare Council and the City of Hamilton. Unfortunately, there are very few sources to which social planning councils can apply for grants with any hope of success. One of our problems in producing this report was a shortage of funds for the survey material. Foundations to which application might be made are for the most part limited in range of interests, size of grants, or both. It is difficult to obtain money from senior governments because they tend to feel that research into local needs should be locally funded. Or, if the proposal is of more than local interest, because of theoretical or methodological implications, they seem to feel that it might be done equally well by other bodies. If the supply of funds were greater, these considerations might not weigh so heavily, but in a highly competitive situation they are very serious. It is therefore not surprising that few social planning councils have research staff, and these in the larger cities only.

4.6 Another difficulty is that it may take a protracted period of negotiation to obtain funding for such studies. This affects planning bodies more severely than others because in planning it is often important to have specific information available at a strategic moment.

4.7 Social planning councils are in an especially good position to conduct research on some matters because of the network of social agencies in which they are situated and because, therefore, the recommendations flowing from research projects may have a better chance of implementation. It is a general practice of social planning councils to include on advisory committees individuals from agencies and organizations that might be affected by such studies, in that way getting them involved on the need for changes right from the start in a meaningful way.

4.8 Because social needs and community problems relate in many instances either mainly or in large measure to the poor, the kinds of activities that a social planning council undertakes should be of interest in considering the question of poverty. Many agencies, both public and private, provide service to clientele made up of low-income persons to varying degrees. And groups in the community contact social planning councils for assistance around a variety of matters. Sometimes these are groups of poor people, and sometimes they are more affluent groups with concerns that relate to poverty.

4.9 The activities of social planning councils can and should be pertinent in dealing with poverty in helping to achieve higher levels of service (qualitatively and quantitatively) from social agencies in the community, in helping to insure that low-income people receive an appropriate share of these services, and in providing direct assistance to low-income groups requesting such help.

- 4.10 As is obvious from the foregoing, a considerable amount of our agency concern relates to matters bearing on poverty, often in a fairly direct manner. One way in which our activity relates to poverty is in production of pertinent reports and briefs. Currently, we are working on at least three such reports - one on day care, one on the field of rehabilitation services, and one on delivery of services to residents in seniors' apartments. In recent years, reports have been produced on the need for a comprehensive home care programme for the area, on the need for foot care, on the needs of skid row men, on the need to replace the Barton Street Jail, on the provision of service for overindebted families, and on information centres.
- 4.11 Comprehensive home care and foot care are especially concerns of the aged, and older people are often poor people. Comprehensive home care in Ontario is important because of the cost of nursing home care, not covered under Medicare. Foot care is a problem in part, because of a lack of training of nursing personnel at different levels and in part because podiatric services are not covered under Medicare in Ontario.
- 4.12 Skid row is a poverty area that frequently has a number of services but services that are often uncoordinated. The Social Planning and Research Council has attempted to study the local situation and make recommendations for improvement of the local picture.
- 4.13 Jails are also a problem of the poor because poor people are more apt to be in jails than are the more affluent. The whole issue of jail conditions raises the question of the applicability of the Canadian Bill of Rights guarantee against "the imposition of cruel and unusual treatment or punishment." What we have read in the press indicates that the Special Senate Committee has had other reports about jail conditions.
- 4.14 Debt counselling is needed by people at various social strata but especially by the poor. Similarly, information centres fill a need for all classes, but social services that are unknown to poor persons are apt to be of little assistance to them.
- 4.15 An appendix to this brief will summarize and discuss these reports in more detail.

ORGANIZATION OF THE POOR

- 4.16 People who have written about the poor have commented that characteristics that are more common among them than among others are a lack of social roots or guides to behaviour and a feeling that their interests are different from or contrary to those of society as a whole. This is not to suggest that all or even most poor people share these traits, but simply that these traits are found more often among poor people than among people in general. Organization of low-income people can serve to provide a mechanism to relate to the larger social system and its institutions. Such organization can also help in creating normative standards, to help in dealing with the problem of lack of guides to behaviour.

4.17 In response to a request from a resident of a public housing project in Hamilton, the Social Planning and Research Council has provided staff help to a tenants' association. It is our feeling that low-income citizen groups should receive help in order to make their voice effective in society. By bringing into the social arena a new force, the policies and decisions made by officials both elected and appointed are likely to be more affected by the perceptions of low-income people, and low-income people will be less apt to sink into apathy and despair. Among social planning councils, leadership has been taken in the area of work with low-income citizen groups by Le Conseil de Développement Social du Montréal Métropolitain, which has a large section devoted solely to this kind of work.

4.18 Our Council is considering several possibilities in relating more effectively to the needs for organization of low-income people in the Hamilton area. Among approaches being considered are continued service to one area till that area is relatively self-sufficient, followed by consultative service on an on-call basis; work with another area after termination of on-going service to the present client-community; staff assistance to an over-all body serving to co-ordinate community organization in low-income areas; and recruitment and training of volunteers to work in community organization under the supervision of Social Planning and Research Council staff.

SUMMARY

4.19 Social planning councils are involved in dealing with poverty in a variety of ways, in areas of research and policy recommendations, in co-ordination of existing services, in assisting in the planning of services in the health and welfare field, and in other ways. A number of the reports and briefs of the Social Planning and Research Council of Hamilton and District are fairly directly pertinent to dealing with problems of the poor. Social planning councils often find it difficult to obtain funding for needed activities. Special studies that require extraordinary funding are difficult to implement because of the paucity of funding sources and the limited range which these sources will fund. The Social Planning and Research Council of Hamilton and District has recently moved to provide direct service to low-income citizen organization, following the lead of the Conseil de Développement Social du Montréal Métropolitain.

RECOMMENDATIONS

1. As most programs require some degree of adaptation to local conditions, the Government should be aware of the social planning councils as a major resource in making these adaptations. The Government should take steps to make it possible for social planning councils to obtain Federal funds to carry out demonstration projects and to provide a continuing source for the kind of research information which they are in a unique position to supply.
2. Other social planning councils and voluntary agencies generally should become involved in assisting the organization of low-income citizen groups and in involving them more fully in existing organizations.

APPENDIX AMETHODS OF ESTIMATING INCOME BY FAMILY SIZE FOR METRO HAMILTONESTIMATES FOR 1961

- A.1 Data on family income by family size is not available from the census for areas smaller than provinces. This has required us to make estimates on the distribution of incomes by family size for Metro Hamilton from a series of related tables. Our procedure can best be summarized as a series of separate steps.

Step 1

- A.2 Table 42 in Bulletin 2.1-4 of the 1961 Census provides data on wage earner household size by incomes of household heads. It was necessary, first of all, to remove non-family households.

Step 2

- A.3 Table 14 in Bulletin 2.1-2 indicates the number of persons in each household by household type for all households. It was assumed that wage earner households, making up over 3/4 of all households in the Metro Hamilton area, would be distributed by size in the same way as the total of all households for each household type. Thus, the size of non-family households could be estimated and these could be removed from the table.

Step 3

- A.4 Table 22, Bulletin 2.1-2 provides data on the incomes of wage-earner household heads by household type. It was assumed that the income of household head would be independent of the household size for non-family households. This enabled us to develop from Table 22 the income levels of the households removed in Step 2. We were left with a table estimating the incomes of wage-earner household heads by household size for family households.

Step 4

- A.5 The next step was to remove households where the head was not the family head. This was necessary because in this case the income of the head gave no clear indication of the economic status of the family. This was accomplished in the same manner as the removal of non-family households.

Step 5

- A.6 Next, we were required to reduce the size of single family households in which persons other than the family of the head were present to bring the household size into line of the size of the nuclear family within it. Table XXVI in Bulletin 7.2-3 of the 1961 Census indicates the numbers of households with lodgers by number of lodgers for Metro Hamilton. Bulletin C.T.-8, page 10, indicates the number of lodging families. These tables enabled us to estimate the numbers of lodgers found in the single family households. (The number of single family households with additional persons was greater than the number of households with lodgers. It was assumed that, in the additional cases, there would be only one other person present.) Given the assumption that the income of the family head was independent of the family size, it was possible to "remove" households from the table and to "replace" them at their estimated actual size.

Step 6

- A.7 The final step in preparing a table of wage earner family income by the size of the income of the head was to remove two or more family households to estimate the size of the families they contained, and the incomes involved, then to re-insert them in the table. In doing this, several assumptions were necessary:-

- a) that the proportion of households containing more than two families was the same for wage earner households as for all Hamilton households. (The Hamilton figure could be estimated from Table 14, Bulletin 2.1-2.) All of these for purpose of estimating family size were assumed to be three-family households;
- b) that in two-family households of six or more, where the size of the families involved could vary, the most "balanced" combination, i.e. one where the two families were as close as possible in size, would be twice as common as the next, which, in turn, would be twice as common as the next, and so on;
- c) that in three-family households of eight or more, where the size of the families involved could vary, the most "balanced" combination would be twice as frequent as the next, and so on;

(It should be mentioned that the procedures in b) and c) when applied to all households at the same time as the estimates outlined in Step 5, produce a distribution of family sizes very similar to the actual distribution.)

- d) that where the family differed in size, the head of the larger family was the household head;
- e) that the income of the household head and the size of his household were independent.

A.8 On this basis, it was possible to remove multiple family households from the table. In cases in which the household head's income could be estimated, they were re-inserted in the table in accordance with their estimated actual size. In the case of families whose heads were not household heads, it could not be determined how many were wage earners or what their incomes were. However, Table 86 of Bulletin 2.1-10 provides figures on the numbers of wage earner families by the incomes of their heads. From this, the numbers of these families which were headed by wage earners could be determined by subtracting the number of families we had accounted for from the total in the table. The distribution of incomes of the heads of these families could be determined by the same means. On the assumption that the income of the head was independent of the size of the family, they could be replaced in the table.

A.9 The next problem was to determine how to allocate the earnings of other family members than the head. This was approached in four steps.

Step 1

A.10 Table 23 in Bulletin 3.1-16 gives the number of married women in the labour force for Metro Hamilton. Table 91 in Bulletin 2.1-11 gives the number of cases in which wives worked, but not husbands. Subtraction gives the number of working wives in families with heads in the labour force. It was assumed that ninety percent were in families headed by wage earners. (This is slightly above the proportion of wage earner heads among heads in the labour force. For wage earner families, however, the proportion of working wives is related inversely to the income of the husband. Non-wage-earner family heads who are in the labour force have higher incomes than wage-earner heads. Thus, it seemed reasonable to assume that a lower proportion of working women would be found among them.)

Step 2

A.11 It was next necessary to determine how many would be working at each family size, and what proportion would be working full-time. Table 16 in Bulletin 3.3-12 indicates the earning levels of female wage earners in Metro Hamilton by the number of weeks and the number of hours worked. From this, we extracted the distribution of income for women working full-time (forty or more weeks, for thirty-five hours a week or more), and for women working less than full-time. Table 20 in Bulletin 3.3-6 gives the earning distribution of female wage earners in Metro Hamilton by marital status. From examining the upper and lower ends of this distribution, where there is little overlap of the full-time and less than full-time distributions, it was estimated that approximately fifty percent of the full-time workers were married. On this basis, the number of married women working full and part-time could be estimated.

Step 3

A.12 There is no information available on the labour force participation rates of married women by family size for Metro Hamilton, or for the different proportions, by family size, who are working full and part-time. Estimates were made for these factors by calculations based on the results of the 1956 Department of Labour survey of working wives.* Participation rates were obtained by comparing the number of working women by number of dependent children with the number of families in metropolitan centres in 1956 with the same numbers of children, then adjusting upwards to allow for the higher overall participation rates in Hamilton in 1961. Upward adjustments were greatest for smaller families to allow for the increasing number of women whose families had reached an age of relative independence who were entering the labour force during the 1950's. The percentage working part-time in the National survey in 1956 was considerably lower than the estimate for Hamilton, partially because of a different definition of part-time work. We attempted to maintain a similar relationship among family sizes at the higher levels found in Hamilton.

Step 4

A.13 With the resulting estimates of the numbers of women who worked full and part-time, by family size, we could estimate the number of wage-earner wives by earning levels by family size. It was decided that, since wage earners make up about ninety-four percent of the married women in the labour force, the distribution of earnings for all women in the labour force could be approximated by the wage earner distribution. The numbers at each family size were increased proportionately to allow for this.

A.14 Next there arose the question of how to distribute the wife's earnings by the husband's. We had no local data to go on, but Table 94 in Bulletin 2.1-11 gave the distribution of husband's earnings by wife's earnings for families in which both husband and wife were wage earners for Ontario. It was decided to distribute the wife's income in Metro Hamilton in accordance with this table.

A.15 This resulted in a table showing wage earner families by size of total earnings of husband and wife. One further step was required to convert this into a table showing total family income. Some allowance had to be made for other income of husbands and wives, and for the income of other persons within the family. We could find no way of determining how these earnings should be allocated by family size, so alterations were made proportionately at all levels of family size to bring family income into line with the total family incomes of wage earner families in Metro Hamilton as given in Table 86, Bulletin 2.1-10.

J.D. Allingham, "Women Who Work", Special Labour Force Studies, No.5, D.B.S., Ottawa, 1967, page 12, passim.

- A.16 Wage earner families make up over 3/4 of the families in Hamilton in 1961. Two other groups, making up about eighty percent of the remainder, could also be isolated: retired couples and families headed by someone in the labour force who is not a wage earner. The income by family size distribution for these two groups could not be specified as clearly as the distribution for wage earner families. But it was considered more desirable to make separate estimates for these groups than to simply lump them together with others and to distribute income randomly.

1. Retired Couples

- A.17 Table 74 of Bulletin 2.1-7 indicates the number of couples with husbands over sixty-five and no one else present in the family for Metro Hamilton. Tables 73 in Bulletin 2.1-7 and 88 in Bulletin 2.10 indicate the numbers of such couples in the Province of Ontario, and the number where the head is a wage earner. On the assumption that the Hamilton situation was similar to the Ontario situation, the number of retired couples could be estimated. The income distribution applied to this group was that given in Table C.12 in Bulletin 4.1-3 for families in Ontario whose major source of income was not employment.

2. Households Headed by Labour Force Members Other Than Wage Earners

- A.18 The size of these households could be obtained by subtracting the figures for wage earner families in Table 42 of Bulletin T.1-4 from the totals given in Table 40, Bulletin T.1-4 for all households headed by labour force members. It was assumed that the size distribution of families within these households should be modified to the same degree as the size distribution of wage earner households. That is, the cumulative distribution function of household sizes was shifted to the same degree as it had shifted for wage earner households to give the size distribution of families. No data was available for Hamilton on the employment income, so the basic income of these family heads could be estimated from a ratio with national data. The ratio was -

National Non-Farm		National Non-Farm
Wage Earner Income	=	Self-employed Income
Metro Hamilton Wage		Metro Hamilton Self-
Earner Family Head Income		employed Family Head Income

- A.19 Since the two distribution on the left and the numerator on the right were known, incomes of self-employed family heads could be developed.*

*National data was taken from Table B4 in Bulletin 4.1-2. Metro Hamilton wage-earner family head income comes from Table 86 in Bulletin 2.1-10. National data is for employment income only.

Some modification was required in that for self-employed persons, income other than employment income becomes a significant factor, averaging 6.3% of employment income. (This can be calculated from data in Table B4 in Bulletin 4.1-2.) It was assumed that the importance of investment income would decline from ten percent for family heads earning over $10,000 to seven percent for those earning from $7,000-$10,000, to four percent for those earning $6,000-$7,000, and to one percent for those earning from $5,000-$6,000. This yielded a total increase of just under 6.3%. It should be noted in passing that even if this allocation is somewhat inaccurate, it will have no effect on the proportion of the population in poverty, since virtually all of these families will be above the poverty line.

- A.20 It was then necessary to make a correction for the influence of other earners. It was decided that this influence should be estimated by assuming that the effect of other earners would influence the cumulative distribution function of non-wage earner family head incomes to the same extent that it influenced the cumulative distribution function of wage earner family head incomes. This assumption enabled us to develop a table of family income by family size. There were gaps in the table showing the total number of families in Metro Hamilton by family size (Table 47 in Bulletin 2.1-5) and in the table showing total family income (Table C5 in Bulletin 4.1-3). It was decided to distribute family income randomly by family size to fill the remaining spaces in the tables. This yielded the income-by-family-size table from which our 1961 poverty estimates have been made.

ESTIMATES FOR 1969

- A.21 No independent data was available for 1969, but estimates on the extent of poverty could be developed on the basis of assumptions about family size, income levels, and the distribution of income.

1. Family Size

- A.22 Average family size in Metro Hamilton rose slightly between 1961 and 1966, due to a change in population structure, with a larger proportion of younger families being present. We do not have figures for 1969 for Metro Hamilton, but, nationally, family size appears to be falling, as the declining birth rate has outrun the shift in population structure. Accordingly, we have assumed that family size in 1969 is equal to that of 1961.

2. Income Levels

- A.23 Family incomes vary in extremely close relationship to personal income per capita.* We have no data for Hamilton, but 1961 and 1968 figures for personal income per capita for Ontario could be taken from the Ontario Statistical Review. The 1968 figure was modified upward to allow for inflation and real growth estimates for Ontario for 1969. This yielded an overall increase over the period of 63%. This was applied to the Metro Hamilton income distribution of 1961 to get an estimated distribution for 1969.

3. Distribution of Income

- A.24 We have no data on the distribution of income by family size in 1969. Nor do we have information on possible changes in the shape of the income distribution. But the latter factor, at least, is known to change quite slowly. Accordingly, it has seemed reasonable to assume that the distribution of income has remained stable between 1961 and 1969.
- A.25 On the basis of these three assumptions, it was possible to estimate the income distribution by family size for 1969. While any of the assumptions might be somewhat inaccurate, it was felt that they would be unlikely to result in serious distortion of the overall poverty situation.

APPENDIX BSUMMARY AND DISCUSSION

REPORTS OFTHE SOCIAL PLANNING AND RESEARCH COUNCIL OF HAMILTON AND DISTRICTRELATIVE TO POVERTYCOMPREHENSIVE HOME CARE

- B.1 The Brief to the Geriatric Committee of the Hamilton-Wentworth Health Unit on the Need for a Comprehensive Home Care Programme for the Hamilton area came about because of concern with an apparent shortage of chronic beds for older people. The Brief states that some older people needing such care are at home or in nursing homes while some in chronic beds could get along with less intensive care in nursing homes. Cause of the bottle-neck appears to be the fact that chronic bed care is covered under an Ontario Hospital Services Commission (O.H.S.C.) programme and nursing home care is not. There also appears to be a slight but increasing shortage of chronic beds aside from the question of some being in chronic beds who should be in nursing homes. The full Comprehensive Home Care Programme would lessen the need for the quantity of chronic beds by providing the care at home or in a nursing home. The nursing homes themselves should be classified as to different levels and kinds of service and differentiated by personnel and fee schedules. Some are in nursing homes who could use the even less intensive care of a home for the aged, but it appears that another such home is also needed, especially as indicated by the size of waiting lists.
- B.2 Low-income elderly persons are apt to attempt to get into chronic beds, paid through hospital insurance, rather than into nursing homes, and are apt to try to stay in chronic beds longer than optimal. As a result, chronic beds are in short supply for all older persons needing them. Some are in nursing homes inappropriately, waiting for chronic beds, and they tend to create a nursing home bed shortage as well.
- B.3 More recently, the Social Planning and Research Council has endorsed the idea not only of classification of nursing homes but also of coverage of appropriate classifications under hospital insurance. The primary recommendation of the Council relative to home care and its implications is as follows:

Appendix - Previous Reports of the Social Planning and Research Council

RECOMMENDATION: That the Hamilton-Wentworth Health Unit establish a "Services & Supervision" function in our community, as outlined in the report prepared by the Inter-departmental Committee on Home Care of the Ontario Department of Health and Ontario Hospital Services Commission (O.H.S.C.).* This "Services & Supervision" function will complement the "Treatment" function of the existing Home Care Programme, administered locally by the Victorian Order of Nurses, and will provide the Hamilton-Wentworth area with a Comprehensive Home Care Programme.

Comprehensive Home Care consists of two parts - "Treatment", which is currently offered through the Hamilton-Wentworth Health Unit, and "Services and Supervision", which is not available in the area. A description of these two parts follows:

Comprehensive Home Care(a) "Treatment"

- For selected patients in their own homes. This is a specialized program providing the equivalent of hospital care.

"Selected patients" are those accepted because -

- Treatment can be provided in their homes;
- needs cannot be met on an out-patient basis;
- the home is suitable, physically and psychologically;
- the services required are available in the community.

"Treatment" services exist in the Hamilton-Dundas-Burlington area under the administration of the local branches of the Victorian Order of Nurses. They make available the services of a visiting nurse, a visiting homemaker, a physiotherapist and some casework counselling where necessary. In 1968, the "Treatment" services of the Hamilton-Dundas V.O.N. served 538 patients and saved countless days of hospital care.

*Dept. of Health and O.H.S.C. Inter-Departmental Committee on Home Care, The Home Care Program in Ontario, Oct. 5, 1967.

Appendix - Previous Reports of the Social Planning and Research Council(b) "Services & Supervision"

This function arranges for the care of persons in the most appropriate manner, whatever their needs may be, and provides continuing supervision, with necessary adjustments from time to time, in as normal a living arrangement as is possible. It deals with all types of care problems and is much broader in scope than "Treatment" services which is a specialized program for selected patients. "Services & Supervision" makes the best use of all services and facilities, proper referral to other programs, arranges hospital care when needed, facilitates discharge from hospital, arranges for adequate post-hospital care, and provides follow-up supervision as required. It is a service designed for those who are unable to arrange for or manage their own care requirements.

"Services & Supervision" will not only assist individuals, but will aid hospitals, local Welfare Departments, or other branches of municipal government in meeting the needs of the aged, infirm, or chronically ill who require special assistance.

Staff for "Services & Supervision"

The Inter-Departmental Report suggests that staff might include:

- 1) Director - a competent person with administrative experience, either a nurse or social worker.
- 2) Medical consultant - part-time or full time.
- 3) Case workers - full time nurses and social workers, the number depending upon the caseloads.
- 4) Occupational therapist - part-time or full time.
- 5) Secretarial staff - as required for caseloads.

In the "Treatment" service administered locally by V.O.N., staff are required for administration only; direct service is purchased from existing agencies and services. In contrast, "Services & Supervision" requires staff for direct service, such as counselling, supervision, etc.

Appendix - Previous Reports of the Social Planning and Research CouncilHelp Provided by "Services & Supervision"

- 1) Advisory services, counselling and referral for those who are otherwise able to arrange for and manage their own care program with the assistance of relatives, friends, etc.
- 2) Direct service or supervision of the applicant's care plan. This would require a comprehensive assessment, conferences with family, home visits, etc.
- 3) Direct service and continuing supervision of individual cases by the staff:
 - a) Arranging appropriate placements;
 - b) Escorting patients on moves from hospital to home, visits to physician or out-patient departments, etc.;
 - c) Making arrangements for continued medical care and supervision;
 - d) Attention to nutritional needs;
 - e) Arrangements for dental services; optometric services, etc.
- 4) Services arranged from other agencies:
 - Red Cross Loan Cupboard: wheelchairs, walkers, crutches, etc.;
 - podiatric services;
 - visiting nursing service as required;
 - homemakers service, if required;
 - legal aid, etc.

FOOT CARE

- B.4 The report on foot care also relates primarily to the aged. A member of the Board of Directors of the Social Planning and Research Council brought to the attention of the Board a concern for the home-bound and/or crippled condition of older people who had inadequate foot care. No survey in Hamilton was done, but a study in 1965 by Dr. Cope Schwenger, using public health nurses as interviewers, found in Toronto and Orangeville that just under half the older persons interviewed had foot problems, with large numbers getting no treatment.

- B.5 Some of the treatment for foot care is provided by physicians, some by others. As a result of activity by the Sub-Committee, training sessions have been arranged for nurses and other nursing staff. These persons are not equipped to provide treatment for diabetics, for horny nails, or for a variety of other conditions. Such conditions require a physician, perhaps one trained in orthopedic surgery, or a podiatrist.
- B.6 The precise role of the podiatrist is in dispute between the Ontario Medical Association and podiatrists. It does seem that there is agreement as to the appropriateness of their practicing their profession on nails, skin, and subcutaneous tissue (i.e., tissue just below the skin). In fact, it appears that many doctors prefer not to deal with nail cutting, etc. because of the many demands on their time to utilize the more specialized knowledge and skills they have. A limited survey of general practitioners, Orthopedic surgeons, nursing services, social agencies, and podiatrists in Hamilton found feeling in each category that more podiatric services are required in Hamilton, as well as more education in foot care.
- B.7 Podiatric services are not covered under Ontario Health Services Insurance Plan (OHSIP). There are relatively few practicing podiatrists in Ontario, and therefore inclusion of podiatry would probably not be very expensive for the province. Currently, as many older people have limited incomes, they are hard-pressed to make use of podiatric services.
- B.8 There is no podiatric training available in Canada, and podiatrists who wish to practice in Ontario must currently be trained in the United States. Those trained in Europe are unacceptable in this province. As a result, relatively few podiatrists from Canada are trained, not all of these return to Canada and a number in Ontario from elsewhere in the world are unable to practice their profession in Ontario without going to the United States for further training.
- B.9 There is one foot clinic in Hamilton, staffed by an orthopedic surgeon and a volunteer podiatrist. The Social Planning and Research Council Sub-Committee on Foot Care successfully encouraged more publicity about this service, as well as themselves urging nursing personnel to refer more to this resource. They suggested to McMaster University that they consider including podiatric training at the new medical training complex.

Appendix - Previous Reports of the Social Planning and Research Council

- B.10 The Sub-Committee recommended that transportation to foot care be readily available. They observed that podiatric care would cut down on the number of bed-bound patients in chronic beds, nursing homes, and homes for the aged. The decline in the number confined to bed might also cut down on the chronic bed shortage. They also recommend the creation of a sub-professional category of foot care technicians trained by orthopedic surgeons and podiatrists.
- B.11 As a result of this report, training sessions have been held at various nursing homes, etc. by the St. Joseph's Hospital Foot Clinic, with the assistance of podiatric and medical volunteers.
- B.12 Problems of older people are of course more severe for those lacking the wherewithal to have their needs met by reliance on their own financial resources.

THE BARTON STREET JAIL

- B.13 Another area that affects the poor more than the more affluent is corrections. The inmates of jails are apt to be of low-income, and conditions in the Barton Street Jail are bad, even after recent renovations. These conditions have been a constant source of condemnation by Grand Juries. One renovation consisted in construction of two 4½ x 8' interviewing cubicles, without doors and with walls not reaching the ceiling. The facilities make segregation of offenders difficult especially for females, with the result that hardened offenders are able to have a corrupting influence on others in for very minor offenses, especially among the females. It must also be recognized that most persons in the jail have not been convicted and must be presumed innocent. The appearance of the building is institutional, in spite of attempts to cheer it up by renovation. Over-crowding is very serious, both for the residence area for prisoners and for the staff facilities. The Social Planning and Research Council made the following recommendations in a Brief to the Honorable Allan Grossman, Minister of Correctional Services, Province of Ontario, About the Need to Replace Barton Street Jail in Hamilton as Soon As Possible:

RECOMMENDATION I

That the Task Force established by the Minister of Correctional Services to appraise the conditions of the 37 jails across the Province look upon Hamilton as a top priority area for a new regional jail so that construction can begin as soon as possible.

Appendix - Previous Reports of the Social Planning and Research Council

RECOMMENDATION II That the Task Force consult with the Hamilton-Wentworth Regional Detention Centre Board to take full advantage of the knowledge which the Board has accumulated during many months of planning a regional centre.

RECOMMENDATION III That Barton Street Jail in Hamilton be replaced as soon as possible by a regional detention centre with suitable facilities for incarceration and rehabilitation.

SKID ROW

B.14 The Council also issued a report, The Findings of the Study Committee - Single, Unemployed Men's Report, with recommendations regarding the skid row population:

AREA I - GENERAL RECOMMENDATIONSRECOMMENDATION (a)

"That a network of referral, treatment, and rehabilitation services for single, unemployed men be clearly established in Hamilton; all groups must play a co-operative part in this network if it is to be successful."

RECOMMENDATION (b)

"That appropriate responsibility be determined among the services and agencies in Hamilton which work with the chronic drunkenness offenders among Single, Unemployed Men."

RECOMMENDATION (c)

"That the Addiction Research Foundation be approached by the Social Planning and Research Council to take leadership on a permanent basis in the treatment of chronic alcoholics and in organizing and co-ordinating existing services."

AREA II - MEDICAL DIAGNOSIS AND TREATMENTRECOMMENDATION (a)

"That a detoxication and diagnostic centre for alcoholics be established in conjunction with one of the existing community hospitals."

Appendix - Previous Reports of the Social Planning and Research CouncilRECOMMENDATION (b)

"That until a detoxication centre is established, hospitals be encouraged to improve their emergency and admitting services to drunks so that a sound medical diagnosis can be made when illness or injury is suspected."

AREA III - POLICE AND COURTSRECOMMENDATION (a)

"That a change be made in the law which deals with drunkenness offenders to allow the full potential of a detoxication centre to be realized. This will require the support and co-operation of the Police, Justices of the Peace, and Magistrates."

RECOMMENDATION (b)

"That the police and courts ask the Provincial Probation Services to provide Probation Officers for 'Drunk Court' so that some offenders may be properly referred to psychiatric clinic for examination; sentences might then be based on psychiatric assessment and pre-sentence reports."

AREA IV - RESIDENTIAL FACILITIESRECOMMENDATION (a)

"That more half-way houses be established to fill the gap between detoxication and treatment centres and the community."

RECOMMENDATION (b)

"That special residences, farms and institutions be established as permanent or semi-permanent homes for Single, Unemployed Men in need of these resources."

RECOMMENDATION (c)

"That sheltered workshops centred around work and work opportunities be available to those suitable among Single, Unemployed Men to provide a 'middle-ground' between jail or hostel and the normal labour market, and to teach at least some simple skills or techniques from which a man can make a reasonable beginning in employment."

Appendix - Previous Reports of the Social Planning and Research CouncilRECOMMENDATION (d)

"That Day Care Centres be established in the downtown area of the city so that the hostel population as well as lonely men living alone in single rooms, etc., have a place to go and participate in organized programs or just to relax and chat."

RECOMMENDATION (e)

"That existing hostels and future facilities be encouraged to more specialized work with the diverse groups known to exist among Single, Unemployed Men. The hostels cannot be all things to all people and the community should not expect this of them."

AREA V - EDUCATION AND RESEARCHRECOMMENDATION (a)

"that the Alcoholism and Drug Addition Research Foundation be lauded for its campaign to educate the public about the dangers of alcohol and drugs and that this education be introduced into the schools as soon as possible."

RECOMMENDATION (b)

"That a cost-study be made by the Addiction Research Foundation of services presently given to chronic drunkenness offenders and drug addicts in Hamilton to ascertain if there are methods of dealing with them that are more economical as well as more productive than present methods."

- B.15 While recommendations on skid row have for the most part not been implemented, the interest and concern on the part of the Social Planning and Research Council and of others in the community continues.

DEBT COUNSELLING

- B.16 More successful has been the involvement with the problem of overindebtedness, where recommendations have largely been acted upon. The Report on the Provision of Service for Overindebted Families in Hamilton and District relates to concern within Hamilton and District about the need for and availability of debt counselling. While debt is a problem of families at any income level, it is especially pressing as a problem of the poor.

Appendix - Previous Reports of the Social Planning and Research Council

Because the Social Planning and Research Council felt:

- a) that the establishment of a new agency to counsel families involved in debt would be uneconomical;
- b) that specialized credit counselling services do not seem able to provide a comprehensive service which might recognize and help clients deal with emotional, personality or family problems related to the debt situation;
- c) that it would not be advisable, therefore, to set up a specialized agency in Hamilton to provide credit counselling service;
- d) that it would be in the best interests of the community that the budget counselling services of the Family Service Agency and the Catholic Social Services be expanded to deal with a larger number of families than at present;
- e) that financial support for this programme should come from a broad base across the community. Support from credit grantors, business, industry, labour and various levels of government could be expected to supplement funds assigned to the programme by the agencies out of their normal budgets.

It Recommended:

- I That the Budget Counselling Services of the Family Service Agency and the Catholic Social Services be operated as separate departments within the Agency structure, but with budgets distinct from the general agency budget;
- II That the two family agencies take the initiative in establishing a body which might be called the Debt Management Advisory Board, of which no more than half the members should be nominated by the Family Service Agency and the Catholic Social Services. The other members should represent the community at large, e.g., credit grantors, industry, labour, the social welfare field, the legal profession, and consumer groups;
- III That any developments in the policy or programme of the Budget Counselling Services of either of the two family agencies be made in consultation with the Debt Management Advisory Board and the United Appeal;

Appendix - Previous Reports of the Social Planning and Research Council

- IV That the Debt Management Advisory Board be responsible for expanding the service presently provided to the community by the Budget Counselling Services of the two agencies. In order to accomplish this, the Advisory Board should have the following functions:
- a) To ensure the co-ordination of the activities of the budget counselling department of both agencies;
 - b) To advise the Boards of Directors of both agencies in matters relating to the Budget Counselling Service;
 - c) To develop, in consultation with the United Appeal, the financial resources required to enable the expanded services to be operated effectively;
 - d) To act as liaison between the Budget Counselling Service and the business and credit community, between the Budget Counselling Service and the groups or institutions through which therapeutic or preventative educational programmes might be developed, and between the service and neighbourhood centres where service is required and would be considered useful;
 - e) To establish and maintain a planning and research sub-committee charged with the responsibility for evaluating the procedures used by the agencies and the results obtained, and recommending policies designed to reduce the extent of indebtedness in the community at large;
 - f) To recruit volunteers to act as counsellors;
 - g) To establish a programme of training, as required, for volunteer or paid credit counsellors;
- V That the Debt Management Advisory Board be set up in such a way that its structure and method of operation can be readily modified if this proves to be necessary.

INFORMATION CENTRES

- B.17 Another timely area in which the Council has been involved is relative to the importance of information and referral centres. The Council conducted a pilot project in Burlington and has issued reports stressing the importance of a central information agency and neighbourhood information centres. The Report of the Ways and Means Committee on Developing Neighbourhood Services sets out a plan for a Central

Appendix - Previous Reports of the Social Planning and Research Council

Information Service and a network of Neighbourhood Information Centres designed to provide a comprehensive information service for Hamilton and district residents. The basic purposes of the information service would be to help the general public use more effectively available health, welfare and social services (both public and voluntary) and to identify unmet needs. The network of Neighbourhood Information Centres would be developed over a period of time.

- B.18 The whole area of information in our society has been stressed in recent months in discussion around the report of the Federal Task Force on Government Information and discussion of Information Canada. Essentially, the point is that many people in our Country are unaware of where to turn with any of a variety of problems - governmental, personal, etc. The availability of services for the poor and indeed for all Canadians is little more than hypothetical unless people have some way of learning of these services, and the existence of information centres also makes possible the identification of lacks in needed community services.
- B.19 The first phase would involve the establishment of a Central Information Service as the core unit, and the co-ordination of existing or embryonic neighbourhood and specialized information centres to form a flexible network relating both to the Central Information Service and to the citizen in his own neighbourhood. The second phase would involve the development of additional Neighbourhood Information Centres which could be added to the network as special needs were identified in certain neighbourhoods and as resources were developed to support new centres. It is recognized equal coverage of different areas in the city and district would not be provided in the early phases in developing the network, as the location of Neighbourhood Information Centres is likely to depend largely on the initiative of local groups.
- B.20 Many people are uncertain as to what they are entitled to under legislation or where to go in a community for various kinds of help, be it around physical problems, need for financial assistance, emotional difficulties, etc. Such uncertainty is especially characteristic of poorer people, who lack the right "connections" and who are less sophisticated about resources.
- B.21 The basic purpose of an information agency is to help the general public utilize more effectively the available health, welfare and social services in the community, the identification of unmet needs, and the prevention of social ills.
- B.22 From this basic purpose, these functions follow:

Appendix - Previous Reports of the Social Planning and Research Council

1. To provide information regarding health, welfare, and social services to individuals and to co-operate with groups and agencies to provide information and make known the services that are available.
2. To refer individuals, or others inquiring on their behalf, to the appropriate health, welfare, and social services. This can be achieved by obtaining factual information through telephone or personal interview to determine the agency resource suitable to the need. Adequate information should be given to the client which will enable him to choose appropriate resources. If indicated, appointments should be arranged for the client.
3. To interpret services provided by community agencies and to make available to those auspices information regarding other services.
4. To interpret legislation.
5. To assemble data concerning unmet needs, gaps in services, changes in social conditions and other pertinent material regarding services and to bring such information to the attention of the appropriate planning, research and co-ordinating body.
6. To maintain information regarding community health, welfare, recreation and other social resources.
7. To maintain and distribute appropriate directories and special informational folders.

THE SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON POVERTY

EVIDENCE

Ottawa, Tuesday, March 17, 1970

The Special Senate Committee on Poverty met this day at 9.30 a.m.

Senator David A. Croll (Chairman) in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, this morning we are to hear from Mr. Jean Séguin, Director of the Social Welfare Service of the City of Montreal. Mr. Séguin completed his B.A. degree at the Collège de l'Assomption in 1943, and his B.A. in law at the University of Montreal in 1946. He recently graduated from the University of Montreal with a master's degree in social services.

He joined the City of Montreal in 1954. Since then he has done various jobs in the Social Welfare Service of Montreal, and became the Director in March, 1969. Mr. Séguin is married and is the father of six children.

Mr. Séguin, you may make an opening statement in any language you wish, and then we will proceed to the questions.

[translation]

Mr. Jean Séguin, Director, Montreal Social Welfare Department: Mr. Chairman, you are giving me an opportunity today to familiarize you with a few aspects of poverty in Montreal, and to suggest to you some elements of a solution to this serious problem. For this I am grateful to you, but before saying any further I would like to stress that the author of this brief, far from being a well-informed thinker, is immersed by the nature of his work in practical examples of poverty that he has to remedy immediately.

Our brief is intentionally short. We wished to avoid lengthy dissertations and emphasize practical solutions. Our remarks deal only with welfare recipients. In our opinion, they are a very underprivileged group. Since we rub shoulders with them daily, we believe we know them well.

We shall eliminate poverty when we have the staff and the money we need and are fighting on several fronts simultaneously, since poverty has various causes and it is only when all these have been removed that it will really be beaten.

Though all-embracing, the war on poverty will have to stress certain things in any given context. Thus, in some parts of Montreal, housing is the number-one problem, while in neighbouring districts educational shortcomings may be the most notable. Because of this inconsistency in the seriousness of problems, there must be some autonomy at the local level. Rural poverty differs appreciably from its urban counterpart. So even though the basic objectives of the war on poverty remain the same everywhere, the gravity of some aspects is not identical. The methods used must therefore suit a given situation. In Montreal, for example, mothers who are heads of households deserve very special attention.

The establishment of machinery to redistribute resources among the various social categories constitutes a major weapon in the war on poverty. As an example, we may cite family allowances, but we are seriously questioning this program. First of all, we feel that $6 or $8 in no way represents the cost of caring for a child. We would prefer to see the allowances increased in proportion to the number of children. After all, for a given amount of money would it not be better to ignore the first child and pay more to large families? Substantial family allowances might also diminish the abuse of assistance payments. It has often been shown that a man who has a large family and is unable, through lack of education, to hold a sufficiently well-paying job, has very little incentive to go back to work. For such a man, assistance payments may equal or exceed the salary he is able to earn.

It is often said that prevention is better than cure. In the light of that proverb, it is desirable that first-class medical care be provided in impoverished areas. This would prevent new clients from adding their names to the welfare rolls, and would help those we already have to get off them. We note that very few doctors take up practice in poorer areas, but if we placed a multidisciplinary team at these people's disposal, they would not long hesitate before making use of its services.

The war on poverty requires contributions from practitioners in a variety of fields. We are currently involved in a very encouraging experiment. We took part in establishing the Pointe St-Charles Community Centre, where a number of public and private agencies have all come together under one roof. We work together to rehabilitate our common clients. We learn to know each other, and to assess the contribution each participant can make. This daily proximity, despite all the possible personality conflicts, leads to a sincere desire to work together to serve our clients well. We believe that with government help, similar experiments should be conducted in other areas.

I wish to conclude these remarks by drawing your attention to the basic obstacle confronting the war on poverty. Our efforts will be almost completely in vain if the Canadian people are not convinced that every citizen is really entitled to a standard of living in keeping with his needs and aspirations. If we continue to think in terms of charity, the poor will continue to receive little in the way of money and assistance. If we persist in considering the poor as failures or frauds, then obviously we shall never win the war.

Only a minority really believes in the right to adequate assistance. If this minority is to be increased, more Canadians must meet the poor and communicate with them. They will then note that these people are citizens like any other, and that more must be invested in education, housing, health and welfare if we really wish to help them break the cycle of dependence.

The Chairman: This morning we have Senators Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche), Fergusson, McGrand, Pearson and Carter who will be asking questions.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): Mr. Séguin, if I understand correctly, you have 16 years of experience with the Social Welfare Department of the City of Montreal?

Mr. Séguin: That is correct.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): Then you are certainly qualified to answer our questions, and I am sure there will be many questions from my colleagues. In the light of your years of experience, has there been a difference in poverty conditions in Montreal since Expo?

Mr. Séguin: Well, the major difference is that following Expo, some people stayed in Montreal hoping to find a job there. At that time, the number of active cases in our files went up slightly. That is about the only difference I see. Many people came to Montreal with the hope that, with Expo on, they would find a job; some of them did not succeed, but stayed in Montreal.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): When you say it went up slightly, I think I read an article not so long ago that said the unemployment rate in the City of Montreal was between 16% and 18%. Do you agree?

Mr. Séguin: It is true that the number unemployed in Montreal is rising noticeably, but it is remarkable that the number of people we help who are fit for work is not increasing at the same rate. To give you an example: on February 1, 1969, we were helping 4,057 people who were able to work; on February 1, 1970, we were helping 3,057 such people. It is difficult, perhaps, to understand the decrease of exactly 1,000, but that is the present situation.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): At the present time are you required to assist people who would not be described as poor were it not for the current unemployment situation in Montreal—the effects of Expo, and so on? I am thinking about people who have a skill and who made good money when conditions were good. Let me give you just one example. I know a man who completed his training in draughtsmanship and is now a highly qualified draughtsman, but he has been unable to find a job in Montreal for six months. Are you required to assist people who fall into that kind of category?

Mr. Séguin: This is what happens in practice. I stay with your example of a draughtsman who can no longer find work: when that happens, he must change his occupation. A person who is reasonably resourceful will find other work. You won't find these people on our lists. Our people are much further down the social ladder, as I said. They are the poorest of the poor.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): You suggest that this man should learn another trade. Is this an educated man of thirty who received a B.A. and then spent four years studying draughtsmanship? It is rather difficult to say to a fellow like him, "You're in the wrong trade; you'll have to learn another." This has happened in a number of cases and it is happening today in your community. It is easy to train someone who has only grade 5 or 6 education. You send him to a technical school where he can learn one trade or another. He becomes semi-skilled, a qualified assistant, and then perhaps he can get back on his feet. But it doesn't make much sense, you know, to tell a skilled person of thirty or thirty-five—perhaps you cannot call him professional, but he is in a way—"Listen, my friend, you're in the wrong trade. You'll have to change." It is not easy for him to do that.

Mr. Séguin: No, I agree with you that it is not easy. Take the case in Montreal of Canadian Vickers which reduced its activities considerably, not to mention closed down. At that time there were highly qualified people who had 20 or 25 years' experience in an extremely specialized field and they found themselves out of work with no chance of employment in their field. Obviously it was one thing or two her: either establish industries where these talents could be used, or retrain the men. It has to be one or the other; I do not think there is any other solution. If economic circumstances bring about a stoppage of work at Vickers or a similar type of firm, these men will get their jobs back; otherwise they will have to do something else. It is regrettable. I agree with you that it is very difficult after one reaches middle age. I am putting myself in the place of the draughtsman you talked about. I imagine that perhaps six months he is going to be really upset in his situation. He sees that he is forced to come—I don't know—an office clerk. Yet he has talent, ability and qualifications to be a draughtsman.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): Now I will move on for the moment. I shall come back to it.

[English]

Senator Fergusson: I would like to refer to section 1 where the brief says that people before they can be recipients of good health must either produce a certificate or show that they have applied to the employment board. You go on to say that mothers who are heads of families do not have to do this, because it is then for granted that they cannot work. But do not such mothers have to produce something besides the fact that they have children? How do you decide which mothers are going to be eligible?

[Translation]

Mr. Séguin: I shall take the liberty of replying in French, so as to give possibly a more complete answer. I help women with families where the husband has disappeared or is sick, and where he is sick in an institution. What is required of the client in such a case is evidence that the husband is in jail or sick in hospital for a fairly long stay, or has simply left home. For the first month we do not ask the client to apply for a failure-to-provide order. But if the situation persists, we will require the woman to lay a complaint, to sign a failure-to-provide order against her husband. Now, we also make inquiries in an effort to find the husband if we know that he has disappeared.

[English]

Senator Fergusson: What about the working poor, the people who work but do not make enough to meet the poverty line? Do you give them any help at all?

Mr. Séguin: In this instance we assist only families which have a large number of children, because on account of our rates, the rates are low, we cannot do much. Let us take an example. You have a family of four children and the father is earning $60 a week, which is not too big a salary. If we count that at $15 per week for four weeks, it is $240 and that is above our scale, so we cannot assist this client on the regular basis. In some instances we can give emergency assistance.

For example, about two months ago, I had a case of a father of nine children. He was two months in arrears in his rent. He worked at just a little over the scale. So what do we do? Do we place the nine children, or do we accept to pay, let us say, for the arrears of rent? Of course, we elect to pay the $200. But that is an emergency and is not on a regular basis.

Senator Fergusson: You have that discretionary power in the case of an emergency?

Mr. Séguin: Yes, we can stretch it.

Senator Fergusson: I was also interested in your reference to day care nurseries. Does the Government support day care nurseries in Quebec?

Mr. Séguin: It is just starting in Quebec. I know that we have in Montreal the Garderie de Saint Elisabeth, which is a small nursery attached to a church; it is a new nursery which has just been opened. But on the English side we have more nurseries—in the Province of Quebec—for the English speaking children than we have for the French speaking.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): Do you have the service of VON?

Mr. Séguin: We have VON, and its counterpart, SIV, the Société des Infirmières Visiteuses.

The Chairman: Senator Fergusson, will you find out how these nurseries are organized, because the witness is putting in on a basis of English and French. I do not understand that. Will you follow that up?

Senator Fergusson: Yes.

Mr. Séguin: Do you mean, why there are more English than there are French? It is because there are more opened by volunteer organizations. That is the difference.

Senator Fergusson: They are not all supported by the Government?

Mr. Séguin: Very little. Just a small amount. The Garderie de Saint Elisabeth is about 95 per cent subsidized by the provincial authorities.

Senator Fergusson: Why do they get so much more in subsidies?

Mr. Séguin: You mean, the French one?

Senator Fergusson: Yes.

Mr. Séguin: Because the French one is located in a very grey area.

The Chairman: A very, very poor area.

Senator Fergusson: I see.

The Chairman: How many day nurseries would you have in Montreal?

Mr. Séguin: You mean, not commercial ones? We have commercial ones besides that.

The Chairman: How many commercial ones?

Mr. Séguin: I would not know exactly.

The Chairman: What do you mean by a commercial one?

Mr. Séguin: Where you pay.

The Chairman: Does that mean that the ones we are talking about are available to poor people, free of charge?

Mr. Séguin: Free of charge or a nominal fee.

The Chairman: How many of those would you have in Montreal—English, French or anything else?

Mr. Séguin: On a nominal fee, or no fee?

The Chairman: On a nominal fee.

Mr. Séguin: I would say, as far as I am concerned, not more than five or six.

The Chairman: Between English and French?

Mr. Séguin: That is correct.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): Would you say five or six organizations or five or six nurses?

Mr. Séguin: Organizations; but there is about one nursery . . .

The Chairman: One trained personnel.

Mr. Séguin: One location.

The Chairman: Would you have someone trained there?

Mr. Séguin: Some persons are trained, others are not.

Senator Fergusson: Is there any licensing of nurseries?

Mr. Séguin: Yes, there is municipal licensing, and provincial licensing.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): The VON are trained nurses.

Mr. Séguin: Yes but they visit people at home. It is different.

The Chairman: That is not day nursery system. The VON gives you nursing at home, for which you pay a fee, though it may be nominal.

Mr. Séguin: If you cannot pay, you receive the service free of charge. The Société des Infirmières Visiteuses is exactly the same thing?

Senator Fergusson: But they have nothing to do with nurseries.

Mr. Séguin: No.

Senator Fergusson: There is one other section which I have a question. It is 492 in which you refer to the prejudice that exists in Canada, and you say that this must be overcome. How are you going to attack that, or have a campaign that will overcome this prejudice?

Mr. Séguin: First of all, you can use the newspapers. That is one thing.

Senator Fergusson: You may have the idea using the newspapers, but they may not feel that way.

Mr. Séguin: I have a certain confidence in the media, but, even if school children were to help some poor families around Christmas time, that would be one way for them to learn something about the problem. You should not wait until you are about 40 years of age, but should become involved at a much earlier age than that.

For example, if you live in the town of Mount Royal you may never have seen a poor person. However, if you go to Point St. Charles that is quite a different situation. Presumably, though, there are persons from the town of Mount Royal who have never even visited Point St. Charles, and the point is that you need to have an opportunity to get in touch with people in order to know what they are like. The big trouble is not necessarily with the poor people, because the rich people are inclined to give money because they can afford to give a certain amount, even if it is not enough; but the problem is with the middle-class people. Just to give you an example, a friend of mine who is a taxi driver told me that it really infuriates him when he drives indigent passengers to my office. He cannot understand why an indigent person can afford to use a taxi to come to my office. He says that he works to 14 hours a day but these people use the taxicab to come and collect money from me. How can you convince that kind of person?

The Chairman: How do you convince him?

Mr. Séguin: Well, in his case he is a friend of mine.

The Chairman: All right, how do you convince us?
 y it out on us.

Mr. Séguin: Well, I would say to him that, yes, people are using his taxi to go to my office, but some of them are sick and cannot travel otherwise; it's more important than that is that this is a free world and people can do what they want with their own money. If a person prefers to use a taxi and eat hamburgers and spaghetti during the whole week, that is his business. He can do whatever he wants. Perhaps he is not bright enough or perhaps he should do the opposite. Maybe he should buy rib steaks instead of eating hamburgers, but if he prefers to use a taxi that is the way he wants to do it.

Senator Fergusson: Does that argument convince your friend?

Mr. Séguin: Well, slowly it does.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): I agree with people who use taxis live in a free world, but isn't it true that the person who used the taxi could have walked perhaps a quarter of a mile or something like that?

Mr. Séguin: Perhaps.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): We hear of people complaining because the welfare office has no chairs to sit on or that there is no music to entertain them when they go to collect their cheques. It seems to me that the lady who uses the taxi will spend the welfare money very freely for all kinds of things and then she will always be back at our door for more money.

Mr. Séguin: That happens sometimes, but it is not the case with very many of our clients. As of February 2, we had 28,586 clients, and of that number very, very few would be using taxis to go to one of our offices.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): I agree with that.

The Chairman: Was that the total of clients for the month?

Mr. Séguin: There were approximately 28,000 acute cases at the beginning of February.

The Chairman: We learned from Mr. Anderson, the Director in metro Toronto, that there were 60,000 cases on his list, and I understand that the populations in metro Toronto and greater Montreal would be about the same.

Mr. Séguin: Yes. The numbers I gave you just now did not include the categorical assistance which is given directly to the client from the province of Quebec. That would be another 13,000, approximately, which would give us a total of about 42,000 altogether.

The Chairman: Is there not an assumption that Montreal is poorer than Toronto? That is what I have heard.

Mr. Séguin: From what I hear, too, that would seem to be the case.

The Chairman: And yet there is a difference there of almost one-third. How do you explain that?

Mr. Séguin: Frankly, I don't know.

Senator McGrand: The people who use a taxi to go to your office are those who live a mile or more away. It is not those who live four or five blocks away. Is that not correct?

Mr. Séguin: Yes. That is right. We do have offices throughout the city, which is one way to give better service to our clients, because if we were located in one central locality it would be more difficult for the clients to get in touch with us.

Senator McGrand: According to certain information we received in Toronto, out of 1,700 migrants going into the Toronto area on relief, 1,400 of them were native Canadians and 300 were immigrants from European countries. Can you tell me what percentage of those in poverty in Montreal are native-born Montrealers or have lived in Montreal for most of their lives?

Mr. Séguin: Over 90 per cent of our clients are French-Canadians. We don't have very many immigrants. I think you could probably count on one hand the number of Italians, Greeks and Portuguese, for example. Ninety per cent are French-Canadian.

The Chairman: What percentage of the population in Montreal is French-Canadian?

Mr. Séguin: About 70 per cent or 75 per cent of the people in Montreal are French-speaking. So in terms of our clients, there is a higher ratio of French-Canadian as compared to the ratio in terms of the population of Montreal.

Senator McGrand: Then the ratio between French and English on relief would show that there are more French...

The Chairman: Senator, Mr. Seguin said that 90 per cent are French-Canadians and the rest are other people. The fact is that the population of Montreal is 70 per cent or 75 per cent French. Can we not leave it at that?

Senator McGrand: What percentage of people on assistance would come from rural Quebec or from the maritime provinces? What percentage of them would be blacks from the Caribbean?

Mr. Séguin: I don't know of any Negroes on our lists.

The Chairman: They wouldn't have any.

Mr. Séguin: As to the rural parts of our province, it all depends. Do you mean people coming directly from the rural parts of the province and being eligible for welfare, or do you mean those who have come from the rural parts but have been in Montreal for a generation?

The Chairman: I think he means directly, or who have been in Montreal only a short time.

Mr. Séguin: I presume that about 10 or 15 per cent of our clients come from the rural parts of the province.

Senator McGrand: A group of witnesses from Montreal appeared before us some time ago. They called themselves the "Up To The Neck in Poverty" group. I asked them this same question and they told me that their English-speaking poor in Montreal came from the Maritime provinces and that the French-speaking poor came from the Gaspé.

Mr. Séguin: Exactly. First of all you have to keep in mind — and I would agree partly with your statement that most of the English-speaking poor come from the Maritimes — that in Quebec you have people coming from Gaspé and you also have others coming from other parts of the province, from Abitibi, for example.

Senator McGrand: When I refer to the Gaspé, I refer to the entire area including Kamouraska — the 16 eastern counties.

Mr. Séguin: But you have to keep in mind the fact the people are coming from Abitibi also which is far from the Gaspé area. We also have people coming from the eastern townships too. For example, we have a little place called Cap-Aux-Meules which is situated very far from the Gaspé Peninsula. The first one coming to Montreal from there found a good job as a longshoreman with the result that afterwards everybody coming to Montreal from that area thought he too was going to get a good job as a longshoreman. It did not work that way, of course.

The Chairman: When we got to Toronto, they told us that the people coming in there in need of assistance were from the Maritimes. Now we hear the same thing about Montreal. Is there anybody left from the Maritimes?

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): There are very few left.

Mr. Séguin: I think what happens is that people think they have more and better job opportunities in big city such as Toronto or Montreal. They have heard about relatives who have found good jobs in Toronto or Montreal so they think that if they go there they too will find a good job. Where I live in Montreal which is north of the centre of Montreal, there are many families coming from the Gaspé and other rural parts of the province because they know that it is easier to find a job in Montreal than in Gaspé.

The Chairman: Of course if you had not had the people in the last 10 or 12 years you would not have had the tremendous amount of construction in Montreal that in fact you had.

Mr. Séguin: That is right. They are not all welfare. Many of them have indeed succeeded in finding good jobs and in earning a good living.

Senator Pearson: Of the six senators here at the moment, five are from the Maritimes and I am the only one not from the Maritimes.

The Chairman: It just goes to show they are hard workers. What has happened in fact, and we senators know this because we know our way round, is that many people came from the Maritimes to the Toronto area and the Montreal area where there was a great boom in construction. They did all the menial tasks, the dirty work and the heavy work. Now when we find there is a tightening up in both Toronto and Montreal, we hear talk about the immigrants coming from the Maritimes. Frankly those of us who sit here just do not like that sort of thing.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): At the moment there is no more dirty work to be done.

The Chairman: There will be, but we do not want to give the wrong impression. I know the witness does not want to give the wrong impression either. He is being very fair and very competent.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): He is only proving what we have been saying for the past 10 or 25 years, that we export our brains from the Maritimes. We find them all over Canada.

The Chairman: But you export them to the States mostly.

Senator Pearson: Mr. Chairman, you must feel quite honoured sitting there this morning with an Irishman on either side of you.

The question I would like to ask here is this; the war on poverty which is one of your recommendations has to be looked at from many angles at the same time. You say you have a great number of outlets in various parts of the city where you look after the poor. What arrangement do you have for bringing these people in the street and putting them through a clinical test? Or do they just come in and say "I want a job"? Is that what happens? And then you look for a job for them.

Mr. Séguin: If we really want to fight poverty, we have to do something else. We have to motivate these people to go back to work. You see, when a man has been on welfare for six months or a year it is very difficult for him to be motivated to go back to work. Secondly we have to find the proper job for such a man.

Senator Pearson: As the Director of Social Services, do you work in other areas yourself? Do you attend meetings of all your representatives so that you can discuss the various problems that happen in particular areas during the day or during the week?

Mr. Séguin: Well, I have 430 employees so I cannot visit all the sections in a week. However, what I do is to delegate somebody, say a superintendent or assistant superintendent, and say "you are going to be in charge of the western section..." or the eastern section as the case may be. I took a special interest in the Pointe St. Charles community services for two reasons. The first reason was because it was a completely new approach and the second was that when my father came to Montreal he came to Pointe St. Charles.

Senator Pearson: Did he come from the Maritimes?

Mr. Séguin: No, he did not.

Senator Pearson: Do you have the same problem in bringing new immigrants established as you do with Canadians who have become poor due to economic and technological changes which have caused them to lose their jobs?

Mr. Séguin: We do not have too many new immigrants. By this I take it you mean people from Europe?

Senator Pearson: Yes.

Mr. Séguin: In Montreal, and I do not know if this is the same situation throughout Canada, we do not have too many Italians to look after, even though there is a very large Italian population. We do not have them on our list, except for a very small number. Let us say, for example, that an Italian family comes to Montreal. The first thing they will do is to live with another Italian family.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): They will go to St. Leonard. They will not be living all alone.

Mr. Séguin: There may be two or three families in the same place. Afterwards, when they are able to manage well, they spread out.

Senator Pearson: In other words, the Maritimer does not look after his own, but lets everybody look after themselves?

Mr. Séguin: This is the difference between the Canadian mentality and the European mentality. I had an example last year. We were giving some passes to see "Man and His World" to people on welfare or who were nearly on welfare. One day I received a call from the YMCA saying "We have about 200 persons who would like to visit 'Man and His World'." I replied, "Are they welfare recipients, or are they on very low income? I would need the names and addresses, and that is all," but they refused. This was not the lady who was calling me, but the individuals themselves who refused, because this was the International "Y"; they were afraid to get in touch with the government, even though there was no investigation to be done afterwards. It was just to make sure passes would be given to them; that is all. I did not intend to visit them to find out whether or not they were able to pay $2.50.

Senator Carter: Mr. Seguin, in your brief you speak favourably of the guaranteed annual income.

Mr. Séguin: Yes.

Senator Carter: And in your presentation after the brief you spoke very favourably about family allowances, which you felt perhaps be increased and put on a slightly different basis. Each of these will cost a large sum of money.

Mr. Séguin: Yes.

Senator Carter: If there is only money enough for one, which of the two would you prefer?

Mr. Séguin: As far as I am concerned?

Senator Carter: Which of the two do you think would be best suited to conditions?

Mr. Séguin: As far as I am concerned, family allowances, right away, because the families have greater difficulty in earning a living than the single person. A single person can always, or nearly always, manage, but when you have four or five children it is more difficult.

Senator Carter: When the children grow up and go, what happens then?

Mr. Séguin: If they go, they can be on relief, but the rates could be increased. Maybe the relief rates are a little too low. Maybe they could not reach a very high amount, but just to give a certain amount.

Senator Carter: Through your experience with poverty in Montreal, you think family allowances would be a better remedy than the guaranteed annual income, even if the guaranteed annual income took into consideration the size of the family?

Mr. Séguin: It all depends on what you mean by "guaranteed annual income." You might pay $100 a month, but is that enough? I am much more concerned with the children. It all depends on the amount of money you can spend. This is the reason why at one moment I said, given a certain amount of money, maybe we could leave the first child and give more to the other children. It is the same thing with the guaranteed annual income. Given a certain amount of money, what do we do? Do we look after the guaranteed annual income or give a higher amount in family allowances?

Senator Carter: It averages out now to about $6 a month a child. Is that it?

The Chairman: It is $6 and $8, so it would be, say, $7.

Senator Carter: Say $7. That is only $84 a year per child, and if you have five children that is only about $400. If you had a guaranteed annual income based on a basic allowance for an adult and so much for each child, the guaranteed annual income would certainly average out to be more than $400 for a family of five.

Mr. Séguin: I hope so.

The Chairman: The Economic Council put it on the basis of $500 a child.

Senator Carter: Which is far greater than your family allowance would be. What I am trying to get at is if you have a certain fixed concept of what "guaranteed annual income" means. You are not thinking of it as a flexible thing which would vary with regard to the size of family?

Mr. Séguin: It will have to, otherwise it does not mean a thing.

Senator Carter: If it did, would you prefer family allowances still?

Mr. Séguin: No. The only problem is, is the Government or is Canada ready to pay the total amount? That is the problem: How much will it cost? Because you give a real guaranteed income and not a nominal one, how much will it cost?

The Chairman: Do you know what the Economic Council says?

Mr. Séguin: No.

The Chairman: If you will excuse me for a moment Senator Carter, I will give the figures.

Senator Carter: Certainly, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: The Economic Council says $1,800 for a single man, $3,000 for a married couple, and $600 on top of that for each child. Then when you get into the big families it goes up to about $5,400.

Mr. Séguin: This would be quite a good start compared to what people are receiving now on public assistance, for example, and through family allowances.

The Chairman: What Senator Carter was asking you was: Which would you prefer as between the two? And I will add: And what would you do with those people who are no longer in the labour force, if you had the family allowance only?

Mr. Séguin: You have the Old Age Security system.

The Chairman: Yes, that is at age 65.

Mr. Séguin: But it could be dropped to 60 or even lower.

The Chairman: Well, . . . !

Mr. Séguin: I agree with you, if it is possible. I am interested in people receiving a sufficient amount of money, whether it is through a guaranteed annual income or through family allowances. I am a social worker: I am not an economist; I am not an expert in this field.

The Chairman: You say, "I am a social worker; I am not an economist . . ." Really, what you need for this is not a social worker or an economist but a real —and this is what you see around you.

Senator Carter: I would like a little more information on your scale of welfare in Quebec. Is it supplied by the province?

Mr. Séguin: Yes.

Senator Carter: What you pay in Montreal is determined by the province?

Mr. Séguin: Yes.

Senator Carter: Are you free to supplement the provincial rates, in any way?

Mr. Séguin: No, not at all. There is no municipal amount involved, except for the administration. As I said, my budget is $63 million. $59 million come from the provincial government, and there is the $4 million for salaries, and no amount is given directly to the poor.

Senator Carter: You do not receive any money from the municipality of Montreal?

Mr. Séguin: I work for the City of Montreal.

Senator Carter: Well, some cities have their own supplements.

Mr. Séguin: In Quebec it is different. There is no municipal share. When I started with the department it had to be half and half as between the provincial Government and the City of Montreal, and then it went down to 64:36, and then to 18:82, and now it has disappeared. There is no sharing.

Senator Carter: Does Quebec have an agreement with the federal Government with respect to the Canada Assistance Plan?

Mr. Séguin: Yes, it does.

The Chairman: No, not quite. It opted out, and it got the equivalent. Dr. Willard told us that it is about the same as the others.

Senator Carter: Yes, they get the equivalent. They get back the money that they spend, but I am wondering whether they spend it in conformity with the usual agreement under the Canada Assistance Plan.

Mr. Séguin: That I cannot say, and I would not tell you even if I knew. After all, I am working for the municipal government. Do not try to ask me whether the Government is doing something wrong about this. I have had a little experience in politics.

Senator Carter: Can you tell me whether there is any definition of need in Quebec?

Mr. Séguin: There is a scale for, let us say, the rent that you have to pay according to the children that you have, for meals, for gas and telephone, and so on. That is on the list of needs. There is a scale for it.

Senator McGrand: Does it include repairs to the houses?

Mr. Séguin: Not very often, because most of our clients are not owners of houses. I would say that 95 per cent are not, so we do not have this problem.

Senator Carter: In paragraph 1(a) you talk about the Animation Sociale not being too successful in helping the poor because of the feelings of fear and alienation. Would you discuss that a little further, and explain it?

[Translation]

Mr. Séguin: I would like to make a distinction here. Perhaps it was mistranslated. But what I said in French was: "Despite all the social action movements, the poor are often inclined to hide their identity".

[English]

That does not mean that I say the social animation movement does not help the poor because it has helped them, but nevertheless some poor people—well, they do not want to get involved in social animation. They are too shy. I attended a meeting a year ago with the deputy minister of Quebec in Montreal, and there were some "social animators" in the room, and there was quite a fight about the guaranteed income and everything else. But, what happened was that after the meeting I had to stand by the door for about an hour and a half listening to clients one after the other saying: "Mr. Séguin, can you give me some money because my child is sick?" "My husband has disappeared; what can you do?" and so forth. They were asking for individual help, which was much more important to them than the guaranteed income, so far as they could understand.

I do not say that the guaranteed income is not important, but what they were looking for was help in respect of their individual problems, which to them were much more important than the general problems of Canada.

Senator Carter: We met the same thing in Toronto. In answer to Senator Fergusson, you spoke about how you are going to overcome these adverse attitudes on the part of the public, and the prejudice that the public has, and you said that you would put the rich and the poor together. I think that is what you said. But, if the poor are as you have just described them, would they not be too shy to have this done? Would they not feel that the rich were sort of intruding on them?

Mr. Séguin: Some will think as you have said, but it is very difficult. You have to avoid generalizations. You have to take a certain group of people who are ready to do something on either the one side or the other, and work with them. You must not try to involve everybody in this. There will always be some people who will deny being on welfare. They will not accept it. But, there are ways and means of getting closer to them. At around Christmas time, for example, there are ways of getting in touch with them in a very general way. Some will refuse. If they refuse, then they refuse, but nevertheless you can reach a large number of people.

For example, in Montreal we have a group known as L'Aide à la Jeunesse which was formed by the police department. In this group you have some very young girls who belong to the middle class. They visit children in the poor areas, and they take them to Man and His World, and they take them here and there. At the same time they are learning about the poor, and the poor are learning something from these young girls. I think it is a very good experience.

Senator Carter: You have not mentioned much about the working poor in your district. Have you any idea of how we can tackle their problem? What do you think is the best way of tackling it?

Mr. Séguin: The working poor?

The Chairman: Senator Carter, do you mind if I put this question, because it is one that I was going to ask?

At the present time to a family of four you pay about $278?

Mr. Séguin: We do?

The Chairman: What do you pay?

Mr. Séguin: For a family of four we pay about $175.

The Chairman: That is without medical, without dental . . .

Mr. Séguin: No, they would have their medical assistance card on top of that.

The Chairman: And dental?

Mr. Séguin: No, if they need some dental care then maybe they are eligible for special assistance.

The Chairman: Let us take the normal situation. In the normal situation they have medical assistance?

Mr. Séguin: Yes, a medical assistance card.

The Chairman: And dental care and drugs are special?

Mr. Séguin: Yes, except for the first $10.

The Chairman: Suppose a man who is supporting a family of four and eligible for $175 can earn $150 by working regularly?

Mr. Séguin: Yes.

The Chairman: Suppose he comes to you and says: "I cannot get along on $150. I have to pay my own medical bills, my own dental bills, and my own drugs.

I want you to raise my income up to the amount you would give me if I were on relief." What would you do in that circumstance?

Mr. Séguin: I would accept.

The Chairman: You would do it?

Mr. Séguin: Yes, because his income is $150 compared to my scale of $175.

The Chairman: If his income was $125 compared to your scale of $175, what do you do?

Mr. Séguin: I give him a supplement.

The Chairman: You were asked earlier in the day whether you gave a supplement, and you said . . .

Mr. Séguin: But you do not very often find persons who earn $125 per month on a regular basis.

The Chairman: You are talking about a man who earns $60 a week, and four times $60 is . . .

Mr. Séguin: It is $240.

The Chairman: But, we are talking about a man who has a part-time job who earns $125.

Mr. Séguin: If the fellow is working on a part-time basis then I have to find out, first of all, whether he can work on a full-time basis. I can assist him for a certain period. Let us say that he has been on relief for a certain period, and the doctor has said that he can work for two days a week. If he does work for two days a week and earns a certain amount which is less than the maximum for which he is eligible, then I will give him the difference.

The Chairman: Have you had any of those cases?

Mr. Séguin: I should have had advance notice of your question.

The Chairman: Just try to answer it from your general knowledge, because we did not know what you were going to say or what we were going to ask you.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): I have been told and we know that a man will not work two days a week because he is afraid of losing his social welfare.

The Chairman: No, the witness tells us that if he works two days a week with his permission his earnings are supplemented.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): Yes, but this is not general across Canada.

Mr. Séguin: First of all I will say there have been no more than 300 cases, because generally the man is earning more than the scale.

The Chairman: Is that for long or short term?

Mr. Séguin: It will depend; if he is unable to work on a full time basis due to his physical condition he can receive the supplement on a long term basis.

The Chairman: I should make this statement in Senator Fournier's presence. I said this in Toronto one day when you were not there. In every province in Canada, with the exception of Ontario and a very little bit in Quebec, there is supplementation of earnings. Some provide more, some less; some are reluctant, some are willing. In some provinces it is done very well. This is what is done now and what we are talking about. However, there is very little in Quebec, as the witness has indicated to us.

[translation]

Mr. Séguin: To get back to Mr. Fournier's question, it is phrased as follows. The fellow is receiving welfare, and he could work two days a week. That is not the same thing. What Senator Croll, the Chairman, said, is that the fellow is not working and he is capable of working in the morning, every day. The same can be done in the case of a client who is able to work two days per week. You have to know whether he is capable to do more. If he says: I only work two days, and the other three days I can get by on welfare, that is another matter.

[English]

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): That is what happens. That still is not my point. This question is not clear in my mind as to a man being offered a job maybe for one day of casual labour. He may be a plumber or a painter. I can relate a personal experience. I needed a painter during the wintertime at home but I could not get one at any price because they said "No, we will lose our benefits."

Mr. Séguin: If it is a single person, that is right. However, if the man is married with a certain number of children he can earn a stated amount without deduction.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): This is not means well understood.

The Chairman: But, Senator Fournier, the Province of New Brunswick is one of those provinces that is doing more in the way of supplementing than any other province except Nova Scotia. What the witness is saying is eminently true, it is done to a more or less extent throughout the country. According to the evidence we have heard that plumber is misleading. I do not know why he should not work unless he is a single man. The married people get some relief. How much would you let him keep, for instance, without deduction?

Mr. Séguin: If he is considered able to work he can earn up to $300 a year. If he is unable to work he can earn about $600 per year.

The Chairman: In the Province of Ontario it is $32.

Mr. Séguin: If the person is unable to work, let us say it is a mother with a family, she can do some babysitting, and the amount she earns will not be deducted, except if she is sitting every night of the week.

Senator McGrand: Further to the discussion with reference to Montreal, you work for Montreal and not for Westmount?

Mr. Séguin: That is right.

Senator McGrand: That is the answer to the question I raised a moment ago.

The Chairman: You mean he works for the poor people.

Senator McGrand: I understood you to say that there were very few people from Jamaica and the Caribbean on relief. You said that you may have 100.

Mr. Séguin: Yes.

Senator McGrand: At the same time you say there is prejudice against the poor. I have read several articles regarding Jamaicans in Montreal. They are on the increase, there is prejudice against strangers coming in and there is prejudice against the poor. These people coming into Montreal are not entering the higher brackets of employment. How are they able to manage and why are there only a few of them on relief?

Mr. Séguin: As I said, it all depends. You have some people who are afraid to come to government, whatever government it is. However, if a person comes to us we do not care whether he is French, English, black or white.

Senator McGrand: How do they get by? I understand the Italians and most of the Europeans have a system, the Chinese especially, whereby they will not allow their people to go on relief. Have these people a sort of fraternity?

Mr. Séguin: I presume they help one another within their group. That is what happens. We do not have too many black people on our rolls.

The Chairman: What is happening with respect to Jamaicans, whether in Toronto or the other place, is obvious. They come to this country and the last thing they are going to do is to apply for relief, because they are afraid of being deported. If in need they go to their families and their groups.

Referring to the English section of the summary, number one, we find the story of what we have heard: 44 per cent are from 60 to 64 years of age; 82 per cent have not reached grade 8; many have no family relations. Over 20 per cent are psychiatric patients and 47 per cent female heads of families. We have heard this throughout the country. It is no different in Montreal from any other place. It is always age, education, lack of family environment, illness, psychiatric trouble and female heads of families. The only class not mentioned is the working poor.

Senator Carter: They are included in the 80 per cent who are not at grade 8 level.

The Chairman: Yes, and that is the whole story.

Senator Carter: Mr. Séguin, when did this scale come into effect and how up to date is it?

Mr. Séguin: We had some interim scales last year but now in Quebec there is a certain bill, called Bill 26. We are waiting for that new bill to be implemented.

The Chairman: Mr. Séguin, while we are at this, we are not here to criticize. We have an overall job and the people you are referring to are those we hear and see all across the country. We were in Toronto last week; it does not make any difference whether it is Toronto or any other place. In Ontario a family of four can receive $300 plus medical, dental and drug payments. A similar family can receive that in Alberta, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and many Maritime provinces. However, forget them. In Ontario a family will receive $300 plus $40 for medical expenses and so on—$165 more a month in Ottawa than in Hull.

Mr. Séguin: That is right, about that.

The Chairman: How do we explain that or justify it?

Mr. Séguin: It is very hard to justify it. Maybe it is a political question. Maybe the government is not ready to include all these amounts in a social welfare budget. Maybe the government has decided that we have too many clients, that we cannot afford to do this financially. However, I am not here to discuss politics.

The Chairman: It is not politics. These are facts.

Mr. Séguin: For example, during perhaps the past ten years the government has put a lot of money into education. Maybe the government decided to put it into education instead of into welfare; I do not know.

The Chairman: You mean the priorities?

Mr. Séguin: The priorities. They perhaps decide to give priority to education. If priority is given to one thing, one cannot at the same time give something else a large amount.

Senator Pearson: The $300 a year that can be earned before deductions are made is for a single person, is it?

Mr. Séguin: A married person able to work.

Senator Pearson: With no children?

Mr. Séguin: Able to work.

Senator Pearson: Suppose that man was allowed to earn $50 a month before any deduction was made, would that not give him an incentive to do the extra work and stay at it?

Mr. Séguin: If a man starts to work we do not cut him off immediately. We have to be careful. We deliver our cheques at the beginning of the month for the current month. We pay nearly in advance. The cheques are issued on the third day of the current month. If a man starts to work, say, March 15, we will not ask him to reimburse us. If he starts at the end of the month working for, perhaps, the C.P.R., he will not receive his pay before the end of the following month, and we will give him an allowance for the month even though he is working, because he will not have received any money.

Senator Pearson: My point is that the man who is receiving help from you is part of the working poor, and we must try to get that member of the working poor running on his own. I would think that building up that incentive might help him to do that.

Mr. Séguin: The real incentive would be to have a real plan to help him. To have him work one day here and two weeks after that a day somewhere else is not a good policy.

Senator Pearson: No.

Mr. Séguin: I think the best policy is to see the man's potential, what he can do, motivate him to work and then find him a proper job, and perhaps give him a month's allowance to start with even though he has started to work.

The Chairman: We are talking about $60 a week which is $240 a month. The scale is $300, there is a problem in Quebec, where it is $175.

Senator Carter: I am not sure how old that scale I asked the question but Mr. Séguin said that there were some interim scales. Is that an interim scale? How far back does it date?

Mr. Séguin: The actual scale for about four children would be $175 to $185 for regular assistance.

The Chairman: The question is when that scale was last adjusted up or down?

Mr. Séguin: Up or down? There were some minor changes, but the scale has existed for years.

The Chairman: When was an adjustment last made? Ten years ago, three years ago, last year, last month?

Mr. Séguin: It changed, I would say, five years ago, a small change. The provincial government has made some minor changes, but the basic scale has been in force for many years.

Senator Carter: This basic scale now is worth about 2 per cent less than when it was introduced?

Mr. Séguin: Yes, but on the other hand, they have changed the regulations, not the scale. In other words, we were able to give the maximum. Order in Council 31 gave us permission to give $25 per month to a family. It was not on the scale, but if there was any urgent need not covered we were able to give $25 per month. It means we give that $25 a month to about, I would say, 95 per cent of our clients, though it is not in the scale itself. That is one way of doing it.

The Chairman: It gives a little flexibility.

Mr. Séguin: The scales are different throughout the province. They are not the same in Montreal as in Gaspé.

The Chairman: That is another point.

Senator Carter: You have a city scale and a rural scale?

Mr. Séguin: We have three scales: a rural scale, a scale for small cities and one for Quebec and Montreal.

Senator Carter: I take it that for Quebec and Montreal they are the biggest scales?

Mr. Séguin: Yes.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): Is it Quebec City or the Province of Quebec?

Mr. Séguin: Quebec City. There are scales for the rural parts of the province, the small cities and the cities of Quebec and Montreal.

The Chairman: Could you equate the $175 to the other two areas?

Mr. Séguin: I would not know in the rural areas.

The Chairman: Semi-rural?

Mr. Séguin: I do not know.

The Chairman: If you do not know then there is no use giving us a rough figure. What is the percentage of single people on relief?

Mr. Séguin: Single persons at this moment?

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Séguin: Out of 28,586 there are 15,800 single persons.

Senator Pearson: More than half.

Mr. Séguin: It is a little more than half.

The Chairman: Single persons?

Mr. Séguin: Yes. "Single persons" means people living by themselves. They may perhaps be married.

The Chairman: That could mean a man or a woman single person.

Mr. Séguin: Yes.

The Chairman: Last week in Toronto when we were given a figure I questioned it. We checked it in Halifax, Winnipeg and Ottawa and found that is what it is, about 50 per cent.

Senator Carter: Senator Fergusson asked a question about deserted wives. How many cases do you have where the husband and wife have agreed to separate because by doing so each one can get more than by living together?

Mr. Séguin: No, they cannot get more, because this is one way to trace the husband. If we are helping Mrs. So-and-so and Mr. So-and-so comes and asks for relief we will not assist him.

Senator Carter: Suppose he changes his name and lives in a rooming house somewhere?

Mr. Séguin: When he comes to our office he has to identify himself and we will then visit him. There are different ways of finding this out. Of course, some succeed, I agree, but not too many.

Senator Carter: Not too many?

Mr. Séguin: Not too many. As I say, I wrote my thesis in university on fraud among public relief recipients.

Senator Pearson: How successful are you in chasing down husbands who run away and will not pay?

Mr. Séguin: Not too successful, because there are too many. The police say they have too many other things to do besides looking for missing husbands. Of course, the police have the name and if by any chance the man gets involved with the police and is arrested they will notify us, but they will not otherwise be looking for him.

Senator Pearson: I have a feeling that many of these husbands do not get too far away.

Mr. Séguin: That is right. They can go right next door and live with another woman.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): With two women.

The Chairman: When you have caught the husband what do you do with him, throw him in jail? Does that get any money for the woman to help the family or does that assist a proper reconciliation?

Senator McGrand: It is usually a man who has not earned much in the first place.

Mr. Séguin: Somewhere in my brief I mentioned that one of our functions was to look after the rehabilitation of married persons. We have an agreement with the municipal courts where the husband is brought in for non-support, assault, et cetera, towards his wife. Very often the judge will refer the family to us to find out if reconciliation would be possible and if not, whether the husband would be able to pay a certain amount. Sometimes there is no use in bringing him home because he will just leave the next day. We have some welfare officers who get in touch with the husband and wife and discuss the problems and sometimes they succeed and sometimes not.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): Many of my questions have already been answered. How many officers do you have in Montreal?

Mr. Séguin: We have about nine sections.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): Some time ago we discussed the problems of immigrants and the fact that there are so few of them on welfare. One of the reasons mentioned, which should not be overlooked, is that when an immigrant comes to Canada he is really under pressure, having gone through all the machinery of getting into this country. When he arrives in Canada he will work under conditions which our Canadian people would not accept. I remember seven or eight years ago going to a restaurant to find that everybody damned the immigrants because they were taking the cook's job and working in the kitchen. In the hotels the immigrants were damned because they were taking the elevator operators' jobs and others. The point is that when these immigrants come to Canada they are still unspoiled, but we spoil them within a few years.

In your brief you mentioned something new, that is possibly your opinion that there should be a Family Allowance for the first children. I think this is the first time that I have heard that. Maybe it has a lot of merit. My question is, when the second child arrives would you pay for one or two then?

Mr. Séguin: We would only pay for the second or Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): Never the first one?

Mr. Séguin: Never the first one.

Senator Carter: It is better that they don't have the first one then.

Mr. Séguin: First of all, I think you have to keep in mind the fact that the second child, if he is not too far from the first one, will not cost too much. This is only a suggestion.

The Chairman: That was put forward a couple of years ago by the Province of Quebec on that basis before they put in the Youth Allowance. It was discussed at that time, but they decided not to go ahead with it.

Mr. Séguin: This is not a new idea at all.

The Chairman: Senator Fournier said it was the first time that it has been presented to us.

Senator Carter: I would like to follow Senator Fournier. Is Family Allowance included as income on your scale?

Mr. Séguin: No.

Senator Carter: So if they get Family Allowance that is extra?

Mr. Séguin: Yes. That is the same thing even with provincial Family Allowances; we do not count them.

Senator Carter: And Youth Allowance, as well?

Mr. Séguin: The same thing applies to Youth Allowance.

Senator Carter: Thank you.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): We spend a lot of time in training people, having consumer training, because the women are usually the bank managers and the buyers. I am not referring to poor people. It is the rich people who have the money to do it. If you watch a lady in the shopping centre, you will see what these people on welfare are buying.

Mr. Séguin: It is true. There is a movement called L'A.C.E.F., which is the L'Association Co-opérative de l'Économie Familiale.

The Chairman: That is the Co-operative Association of Family Economy.

Mr. Séguin: I do not think it is exactly the same as the Consumer Association. You have some who are members of L'A.C.E.F. who are also members of the Young Canadians. This movement goes like this: we go to different parts of the city and try to educate people about their rights with regard to rent, and so on. They even fight the finance companies before the courts in order to help people and they give courses as to whether or not one should buy sugar, depending upon one's diet. They also give general information and try to educate the people. They are doing a good job in Montreal. As a matter of fact, they have been giving courses to my employees so that they will be able to pass along a certain amount of information.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): When I am talking about consumer training I hope that I am not referring to the poor only. I know that my wife spends a lot of training, because upon entering a market she is tempted by many things which she does not need. The first thing that happens is that she has a wagon full of groceries worth about $30. Fifty per cent of these groceries are not needed, because we have them on shelves at home.

The Chairman: Let us go off the record.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): I have only simple questions. Sir, do you think this commitment will be welcome in Montreal?

Mr. Séguin: It will be welcome.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): You do not have to answer that.

Mr. Séguin: Why not?

The Chairman: Why not? This has never occurred to me. We have been welcome in every other place. I do not know why the question even arises.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): I am satisfied. In your brief, sir, you mention "a Canadian objective in the war against poverty". What would be that Canadian objective? Could you elaborate on that, please?

Mr. Séguin: What I meant was that it should be a fight fought by everyone. It should not be fought only by a small group. If Canadians at large really felt that the poor should get more services and more money, things could change, but the attitude of most people is that it is too bad that there are poor people, but it is not up to them, individually, to help pay the cost of services. You can see that from the fact that there are numerous charity campaigns in Montreal, as there are all over Canada, and the people who are getting good salaries are not giving much to these campaigns. As I say, their attitude is that, yes, there are poor people and there are services to be given, but it is not their responsibility; it is somebody else's responsibility. They are not going to pay for it. And then, of course, they try to rationalize why they should not give.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): They find arguments not to give money, you mean?

Mr. Séguin: Yes, afterwards.

Senator McGrand: Is it not a fact that in the current renewal of the churches more emphasis is being placed today on the problem of charity than ever before? Perhaps the churches are the ones to take that message to the people.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): But people don't go to church any more.

The Chairman: We are going to have the churches appearing before us at the end of next month. Perhaps they will have answers to some of the questions that have been raised so far.

If there are no further questions, may I thank you, Mr. Séguin, for appearing before us this morning. You have given us a practical brief, one showing deep understanding. You have been very good in answering the questions and in helping us to understand the problem, particularly in Montreal, and to realize what hardships and difficulties are faced there. We are very much impressed. Thank you for coming.

The committee adjourned.

Special Senate Committee

APPENDIX "A"

A BRIEF

presented to the Special Senate Committee on Poverty

by the

Welfare Social Services

of the

City of Montreal

March 17, 1970

PREFACE

This brief deals exclusively with the clients of the Welfare Social Services of the City of Montreal, that is, those who receive public assistance allowances through the Department.

We help both those who are able to work and those who are not, the latter being by far the larger group in numerical terms. Some characteristics of our clients:

1. 44.7% are between 50 and 64 years old.
2. 80.2% did not reach grade 8.
3. Many have no family ties.
4. A high percentage fall into the categories of unskilled, service or recreational workers.
5. 19.8% of those of our clients who cannot work suffer from psychiatric disorders.
6. 47.5% of the mothers with families we serve live apart from their husbands.

Our recommendations may be summarized as follows:

1. The war on poverty must be waged on a number of fronts, simultaneously.
2. Nevertheless, there must be a strategic emphasis on certain areas.
3. A multidisciplinary approach and participation by welfare recipients are essential.
4. The war on poverty should begin among welfare recipients, who are the most impoverished of all.
5. A guaranteed minimum income should be introduced step by step.
6. Medical clinics should be set up in depressed areas.

7. Mobile clinics should be introduced to give at-home treatment.

8. Higher tax exemptions should apply where a member of a family is physically or mentally handicapped.

9. More protected workshops should be provided.

10. Women raising families need

(a) the establishment of family courts;

(b) day nurseries; and

(c) greater severity in dealing with husbands who refuse to pay maintenance.

11. Programs for a return to normal life should be put into effect.

12. Financial assistance should be provided for clients returning to work.

13. A degree of local autonomy is necessary.

14. In order to encourage the whole country to take part in the struggle, we should

(a) convince people that it is justified;

(b) combat prejudice; and

(c) disseminate information about the poor.

1. Defining Poverty

1.1 There is certainly no shortage of definitions for poverty, and this is explained by the variety of forms it can take. Poverty is blamed on economic, cultural, sociological, psychological, political and a whole host of other factors.

1.2 We shall deal only with our own clientele—welfare recipients who receive public assistance allowances through the Social Welfare Department of the City of Montreal.

1.3 They exist at the lowest level of poverty; the allowances they receive are well below the

- guaranteed minimum income recommended by a number of authorities, and constitute their sole source of income.
- Almost all these people are without any means of support. They do not qualify for benefits under the many assistance and insurance plans operating in Canada, and they come to us as a last resort.
- Some are on our lists only briefly, while others merely follow in their parents' footsteps. The former will soon be able to support themselves and their families, but the latter need various kinds of professional help in order to change their financial circumstances.
- Poverty in Montreal—urban poverty—differs markedly from that found in rural areas. In the latter case, it often happens that a given area simply does not have adequate resources to support its population at a reasonable level. Montreal, on the other hand, is relatively prosperous and has a high growth rate.
- In towns and cities, poverty is often an impersonal thing, because the dazzle of wealth blinds us to the shadows of poverty. Beside the skyscrapers, the symbols of power and wealth, crouch the hovels that house most of our clients.
- Despite all the social action movements, the poor are often inclined to hide their identity. They avoid participating in the life of the community because they are fearful or unsure of their own worth. They develop a distrustful and fatalistic attitude towards society.
- Many Montrealers are thus unaware of what poverty really is, and find it difficult to believe that some of their fellow citizens live in deplorable conditions.
- The press, radio, television and the wealth around them tell the poor what could be theirs if they had the money. They find this an intolerable situation, for they are frustrated in their quite legitimate aspirations.
- Most of our clients owe money to loan companies. Advertising and the very ready availability of credit have encouraged them to acquire goods, but they experience tremendous difficulties in meeting their commitments.
- The Functions of the Montreal Social Welfare Department*
- We are authorized by the Quebec Government to administer the Quebec Public Charities Act within the Montreal city limits.
- Our main task is to study applications for financial help, make decisions, issue cheques where appropriate, and make periodic checks after an application has been approved.
- 2.21 Without going into the details of the eligibility requirements, we can say that the applicant must show that he has registered recently with the Canada Manpower Centre or, if he is ill, show us a doctor's certificate to that effect. An exception is made for mothers raising families, who are not required to present either of these documents, and who, because of the presence of young children in the home, are classified as being unable to work.
- 2.22 The following table shows the situation as on February 1, 1970:
- | | |
|------------------------------|--------------------------------|
| Clients able to work: | |
| Heads of families | 1,907 |
| Childless couples | 339 |
| Single people under 30 | 22 |
| Single people over 30 | 789 |
| | 3,057 |
| Clients unable to work: | |
| Heads of families | 8,778 |
| Childless couples | 1,756 |
| Single people | 14,995 |
| Total: | 25,529
28,586 |
- 2.23 Monthly expenditure is about $4 million, and we are fully reimbursed for this by the Quebec Government.
- 2.3 Our second function is the placing of adults in supervised hostels or provincially-licensed establishments.
- 2.31 On February 1, the total of adults placed by us was 2,099, and the monthly cost was close to $350,000.
- 2.4 We are also responsible for placing handicapped children and normal French-Canadian Catholic children.
- 2.41 On February 1, the total of children on the Department's books in this respect was 5,684, with monthly expenditure at about $275,000.
- 2.5 We administer the Meurling Rehabilitation Centre, which can accommodate 90. It is open to single men, and provides them with bed and board and assistance in their return to society, or places them in homes or institutions.
- 2.6 We also perform other tasks, such as the rehabilitation of married couples, legal representation, the burial of the indigent, the issuing of licences for charitable campaigns, etc.
- 2.7 We have a staff of 430, and an annual budget of about $63 million, $59 million of which is reimbursed to us by the province.

3. The Clientele of the Montreal Social Welfare Department

- 3.1 In order to familiarize you with our clients, we shall make some comments on a survey of them that was carried out in November, 1965.
- 3.2 44.7% of our clients are aged between fifty and sixty-four. Age is an important factor affecting the possibilities of finding work. The society in which we live is likely to favour the young far more than the not-so-young when a candidate is being sought to fill a vacancy. In addition, the lack of a trade is a very serious handicap when a man of fifty or more is looking for a job. Finally, health deteriorates with age.
- 3.3 80.2% of our clients had not reached the eighth grade. Those who lack education are natural prey to unemployment, since modern technology requires from the workers a body of knowledge that our clients often do not possess. Once, a man with but a few years' schooling could nevertheless get by on the labour market. Today, things are different, and the lack of a fairly high standard of education constitutes a handicap that is very difficult to overcome.
- 3.4 "The city has become the preferred habitat of young adults, small families and people without family ties" (Tr.).¹ The cities attract rural youth, either because advertising helps to convince them that the chances of making good money are better in the cities, or because a desire for independence leads them to quit their villages." They often arrive penniless, unprepared, uneducated and unskilled. They become discouraged and panic when they do not find a job at once. (Tr.)"² Furthermore, the number of large families is decreasing in Montreal. For one thing, it is mainly apartment blocks that are being built in the city, and for another, people who do have a number of children dream of owning a house in the suburbs. Finally, the anonymity the cities offer suits a certain kind of person, and because of the large number of hospitals in Montreal, many people take up residence there so as to be able to get the treatment they need.
- 3.5 The number of technical and white-collar workers is constantly increasing, and service occupations are becoming more and more important. Our clients rarely have a trade, so many of them are manual labourers. Prorating the figures for the population of Montreal, we find that 9.1% of those in the service and recreational fields are receiving allowances from the Department. This phenomenon can be explained by the fact that work in those fields is often sporadic.

- 3.6 The very great majority of our clients are unable to hope for an early return to work, either because they have a temporary or permanent incapacity as shown in the medical certificate they have given us, or because they are mothers who are heads of households.
- 3.7 There is often a relationship between poverty and poor health, since the poor find it difficult to obtain the medication they need, and a sick person is at a disadvantage on the labour market. We have noted that very few of our clients have medical insurance.
- 3.8 Our studies of medical diagnoses show a high incidence of psychiatric disorders—19.8%. At first glance, it appears that the frenzied pace of modern life—especially in the cities—is conducive to this kind of disease.
- 3.9 47.5% of the female heads of households are separated de facto. Many husbands do not pay maintenance, either through negligence or because they have disappeared. They have lost their sense of family responsibility, and show no affection for their children. Some leave and form new family units elsewhere, others prefer to leave the country.
- 3.91 We can sum it all up by saying that the majority of poor people are "ordinary human beings grappling with problems caused by rapid and complex social changes".¹

4. Recommendations

- 4.1 In order to win a war, one must attack the enemy on a number of different fronts simultaneously, and the war on poverty is no exception to the rule. This enemy is present in a number of places, and cannot be beaten by an attack on a specific point. It would be stronger in other areas, and this would delay and endanger victory.
- 4.11 Since poverty may stem from economic, social, logical, psychological or cultural causes, in all these causes we must attack.
- 4.12 In any given area, however, it will doubtless be necessary to emphasise one particular point of strategic importance. Obviously, the dominant cause of poverty requires more intense and more sustained action.
- 4.13 It must not be thought that there is any simple solution to the problem. He who would attack it must seek the assistance of people with various skills. He must also be very attentive

- the wishes and opinions of the poor, for things should not be forced upon them for which they do not feel a need.
- 14 Long-term and short-term objectives must be defined. The former are goals which, however desirable they may be, are for various reasons impossible of achievement in the immediate future. Since the latter, on the other hand, can be realized quickly, there must be no delay in exercising every effort to ensure that this is done.
- 2 The war on poverty should begin with welfare recipients, for they are at the lowest point on the poverty scale. Furthermore, since in our modern society the poor are getting poorer and the rich richer, we should not merely stop the gap from widening, we should make every effort to eliminate it.
- 21 Unemployment, a lack of education, poor health, technological progress and psychological problems are the major causes of the deplorable situation affecting our clients.
- 3 The guaranteed minimum income could be a valid answer to the problems of many of the poor, but there is some reason to wonder how such a thing would be administered.
- 31 The Government of Canada provides the elderly with a form of guaranteed minimum income. We recommend that this policy be extended to cover other groups of Canadians. Thus, a guaranteed minimum income should be granted to invalids and to mothers who have been abandoned by their husbands for more than a specified amount of time.
- 32 Instead of introducing a universal guaranteed minimum income immediately, governments should move progressively in this direction by adding different groups of people from time to time to the ranks of those qualifying.
- 4 Since education is under the jurisdiction of provincial authorities, it is up to them to promote education for the poor.
- 41 We are pleased to point out the quite unusual effort that the Montreal Catholic School Commission plans to undertake in impoverished areas. Children from such areas are handicapped from the start, and in addition to the services normally provided by the School Commission, they also need special services in order to be assured of equality of opportunity.
- 4 In some areas, doctors are few or non-existent. We therefore recommend the establishment of government-financed, multi-disciplinary medical clinics for diagnostic services, minor treatment, counselling and citizen education.
- 41 We also recommend the establishment of mobile clinics for home treatment in short-term cases where the patient cannot leave his home.
- 4.52 We recommend an additional tax exemption where a child or dependant is physically or mentally handicapped. Care is often expensive, and this strains the family budget.
- 4.53 There are very few protected workshops for the handicapped. We therefore recommend that governments and industry cooperate in establishing the needed facilities. We are convinced that clients of ours who are unable to compete on the labour market might very well be successful if they were given the opportunity to learn their skills in a protected environment.
- 4.6 With regard to mothers raising families, we recommend:
- (a) the establishment of family courts;
 - (b) day nurseries to assist working mothers; and
 - (c) in cases of desertion, greater severity in applying the law in order to guarantee the payment of maintenance.
- 4.7 In order to encourage the poor to get themselves off the welfare rolls, we recommend the implementation of programs for a return to normal life. The Government of Quebec has already begun to institute these programs.
- 4.8 We recommend that when a welfare recipient returns to work, his welfare allowance be paid to him nevertheless for one month if he has been out of work for a fairly long time.
- 4.9 It is up to the higher levels of government to draw up general policies designed to eliminate poverty. There should, however, be some degree of local autonomy in the implementation of such policies. Senior governments should decide the basic outlines, and agree to the local agencies' taking whatever action they wish, provided it is in accordance with the basic philosophy. For in the cities, we have to cope with situations that do not exist in the country. A fair amount of decentralization often ensures better services.
- 4.91 In order to encourage the whole country to take part in the war on poverty, we should:
- (a) convince people that the war is justified;
 - (b) combat prejudice; and
 - (c) make the poor known to their fellows.
- 4.92 If a war is to be won, those fighting it must be convinced that the cause they advocate is a just one. If the attitude of the Canadian people towards the poor does not change, all thought of victory will be in vain.
- 4.93 There are certain prejudices against the poor that should be condemned.
- 4.94 It is claimed that welfare recipients are so lazy that they do not wish to work. It is true that there are a few socially disturbed people, but the prosperity that followed the Depression brought about a marked reduction in the number of people on welfare, which shows that when conditions are favourable, the poor will rapidly return to the labour market.

- 4.95 Some people affirm that many of our clients are frauds. Various studies of this aspect indicate that, on the contrary, fraudulent use of welfare allowances is rare, varying between 2% and 5%.¹
- 4.96 People readily link poverty with a whole series of other social problems like delinquency, alcoholism and immorality. Delinquents, alcoholics and immoral people, however, are found in all social strata.
- 4.97 There are various ways of educating people about poverty. We recently had an opportunity to see the film La belle vie et l'autre, produced by the United Appeal. It is often said that a picture is worth a thousand words. All those who see this film will be struck by the message it bears.

- 4.98 The twinning of rich and poor areas is another way in which we can get to know each other better.
- 4.99 Well-to-do young people should meet those who are not so well-to-do. They would note that the latter are basically similar to themselves. As they grew older, they would be more inclined to help them because they would know them better.
- 5.00 In a rich country like ours, poverty is intolerable. If we really want to, we can defeat it. "We should define our objectives clearly, and then ask ourselves what are the best means of achieving them."²

EVIDENCE

THE SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON POVERTY

Ottawa, Tuesday, March 24, 1970

The Special Senate Committee on Poverty met this day at 9.30 a.m.

Senator David A. Croll (Chairman) in the chair.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, I call the meeting to order. This morning we have before us the Canadian Association of Social Workers. On my immediate right is Dr. Brian Wharf, Professor of the School of Social Work, McMaster University. Next is Leonard Levine, Assistant Professor, Department of Psychiatry, McMaster University. Miss Paulette VanLammers is Senior Social Worker, Catholic Family Service, Ottawa. Next to Miss VanLammers is Kenneth E. Calmain who is the C.A.S.W. Staff Secretary, Committee on Poverty, and last, but not least, is A. Campbell McCallum, Supervisor and case-worker for the Children's Aid Society, Ottawa.

Professor Wharf will open the meeting.

Dr. Brian Wharf, School of Social Work, McMaster University: Mr. Chairman, honourable senators, my fellow social workers here and I deem it a privilege to be appearing before you. We believe that you are making a great contribution by bringing the problem of poverty to the forefront of attention and keeping it there. All too often in the past there has been sporadic interest in this problem but never the kind of systematic attention which this committee is giving to it.

I should first like to make some introductory remarks before turning to a summary of the brief. These remarks are by way of addition to the brief rather than clarification.

At the outset, I should emphasize that many of our recommendations that call for improved social services and improved allowances are going to cost a great deal of money. We believe that a rich country like Canada can afford the price it will have to pay for eliminating poverty. We are also conscious of the fact that with the experience the committee has gained over the period of its hearings the committee has become very knowledgeable on the subject of poverty. In fact, the Senate committee may have outstripped many of the groups appearing before it in terms of the knowledge of the incidence and extent of poverty and in terms of awareness of possible solutions.

Hence, the committee might find that future briefs contain, largely, points and recommendations that are already known to the committee. For example, many groups have expressed approval in principle of the guaranteed annual income; yet few, if any, have given any real, specific consideration to the various ways of implementing the guaranteed annual income. As you will see from our brief, we are really no different in this regard in that we have come out in favour of the principle of the guaranteed annual income without carrying it much further. We are, however, preparing a statement on the guaranteed annual income and we would like to present that statement when it has been completed.

We have also noted that various professional people appearing before you have stressed the limits imposed by their professional specialization. Thus, the economists say they are not social workers and therefore do not know about social services; and social workers say that they are not economists and therefore do not know about fiscal policy. This explicitness is, of course, realistic and serves to underscore the complexity of the problem.

In view of these points I have just made, I should like to raise some suggestions which the committee may already have considered or may be considering. Nevertheless, they may be worthy of attention.

First, it might be constructive to invite representatives from some of the countries that have accomplished a good deal in eliminating poverty. In respect of that, we do make reference in the brief to such countries as Sweden and New Zealand, for example. I am not very knowledgeable about the particular people involved, but one name that comes to mind is that of Richard Titmuss of Great Britain. He has visited both the United States and Canada and is regarded internationally as one of the leading authorities on social policy.

Second, I am wondering about the advisability and possibility of establishing an interdisciplinary task force—a term that has come into very popular usage—which would have the specific charge of looking at various ways of implementing a guaranteed annual income—for example, the demogrant approach, the negative income tax. It would also assess the cost that would be involved there and would look at the administrative arrangements required and would examine the political feasibility of implementing each of these proposals.

Thirdly, about groups who may be antagonistic to some of these concepts such as the guaranteed annual income, I wonder whether inviting them to appear before the committee might not be a useful thing to do in order to get a cross-section of opinion and in order to get a different body of opinion from what has been appearing before you.

I have one further observation which is somewhat unrelated to the above and some suggestions that are additional to the brief. I have been impressed as have the senators by the discrepancies that exist between the intent and provisions of the Canada Assistance Plan, and the way it has been implemented in various provinces. There are many variations with regard to the provisions of the Plan. I wonder if there would be any interest in launching a study to describe in detail the discrepancies and the variations and perhaps to speculate on the reasons for this. I have a secondary axe to grind here in that I am presently attempting to assist the Canadian Welfare Council to develop the second part of its social policy statement. This one would be focused on social planning and the implementation of programming issues rather than the rather lofty goals contained in the first statement, and I thought this might be a useful part of this second social policy statement. That is a study of the Canada Assistance Plan and the way in which it has been implemented in the various provinces. I would like your reactions to that at some point.

The Chairman: We are doing that. It has been under way for six or seven months by a member of our staff.

Dr. Wharf: With regard to the brief that we have presented, you will find the main conclusions and recommendations summarized on pages 2 and 3 in point form with reference to the paragraphs in the body of the brief. I would propose now to mention some of these and afterwards we can go on to the questions. The first point refers to the value issues—the value section of the first portion of the brief where we talk about the attitudes of the majority setting limits on what has been done about poverty—that relative poverty is an important determinant of a sense of discontent and the illustration of Caesar's light bulb is used to illustrate this point. We emphasize that the worst effects of long-term policy are on children and we do have, as we have indicated, Mr. Chairman, a member of the Children's Aid Society of Ottawa with us today. Despite the odds that face them, many poor people are able to survive and persevere because of unusual special strengths and special talents. Then we make the point that we have already mentioned that we have not done in comparison with some other countries as much as we could have done to reduce the element of poverty or to eliminate it. We refer to the doctrine of political democracy, high productivity and universal education and we feel that this is insufficient to deal with poverty as it exists today.

We talk at some length about economic incentives as reflected in the welfare system and in the proposed tax reform. We support the general thrust of the White Paper on Taxation, feeling, contrary to some groups who have expressed themselves to date, that it does not go far enough. We stress also that Canada draws a sizeable amount of revenue from the poor through direct and indirect taxation, and one of our main recommendations is that the poor should not be taxed at all.

Finally, while awaiting a plan of guaranteed annual income, there are improvements which can be made in the present public assistance system. These would not be as far-reaching or as difficult to undertake and they would serve as antecedents or as a preparation to the introduction of a guaranteed annual income.

Following this our recommendations on page 3 are that income maintenance should be provided to those in need without conditions and administered with minimum investigation, and here the phrase "without conditions" is referring to social services such as job training, job placement, counselling, et where, as I think the brief makes clear, we make a clear distinction between income maintenance—that is income to assist the poor who need income—and other social services which some of the poor may need but which other people also need. In line with this we feel that social services should be expanded, extended to all and publicized. The rather cute phrase “social services should be established in neighbourhood locations within pram-pushing distance”—is a quote from the Leeborn Report from Great Britain which has just recently been published. Obviously it does not have as much reference to Canada where prams are not as frequently pushed.

Again, point 3 is the provision that social services should be separated from the administration of financial aid and we have given some reasons for this in the brief which we could refer to if the senators wish to look into this in detail.

Next we say that appeal procedures should be improved and we note here that this was a condition of the Canada Assistance Plan and that somewhat belatedly provinces are getting round to instituting these procedures. Some are more advanced than others, but in general they can stand to be improved.

Then there is a set of recommendations with regard to adjustments in allowances having regard to increased cost of living to effect changing needs, and the reform of the tax structure to reduce regressive elements, and, as I say, to follow more closely the principle of ability to pay.

Finally, the reduction of barriers to education and the early introduction of a program of guaranteed annual income.

That concludes my opening remarks, Mr. Chairman, but perhaps some of the other members of the panel would like to comment.

Senator Carter: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, I should like to congratulate the Canadian Association of Social Welfare Workers on this brief which I found very interesting. I think it is one of the best briefs we have had before and certainly the best documented brief I have seen since I have been on this committee. There was one point in the brief that is intended at but not very fully developed. Now I like it that your Association is made up of professional people in all provinces working with departments of welfare. What proportion of your time is spent doing professional work as against the proportion spent doing, say, investigatory work, clerical work and other non-professional work?

Dr. Wharf: The Association is composed, as I say, of professional social workers, and these are defined as graduates from a university school of social work and the present requirements which stand to be revised during the summer involve the obtaining of a Master's degree in social work. As I say, we hope to revise this during the summer to a Bachelor's degree.

We anticipated part of this question, and we tried to find out what percentage of those employed by public assistance departments are graduate social workers. We were not able to find this, but I would say without much hesitation that there is a very small percentage of the people employed in public assistance departments—that is determining eligibility for assistance—who are professional social workers. The figure in the United States is somewhere around 4 per cent and I would doubt that it is much higher here. The majority of people in these public assistance departments who are graduate social workers are in administrative positions. Mr. Godfrey who appeared before you would be one example and there would be other examples in Calgary, Edmonton and similar places. But the main point is that by far the vast majority of the people employed in public assistance departments are not graduate social workers.

Senator Carter: I appreciate that, but that was not quite my question. My question was: You take any individual worker out in the field; he is hired to give a professional service. How much time does he have to give that professional service, and how much of his time does he end up doing work other than that involved in his professional service?

Dr. Wharf: I would say that the vast majority of his time is taken up in doing what in the U.S. is referred to as DOCE—determination of continuing eligibility. It is routine, administrative work, checking on certain financial circumstances. It is not the whole thing, but by far the majority of the time is consumed in this area.

Senator Carter: Yes. So the people in the department are not getting the benefit of the professional training of these social workers?

Dr. Wharf: That is correct.

Senator Carter: In paragraph 1 on page 4 you state that:

Public attitudes set limits to what can be done.

Can you tell me what The Canadian Association of Social Workers has done to influence public attitudes?

Dr. Wharf: This is a rather embarrassing question. I would make a personal observation and then urge my fellow social workers to add their comments here.

As a national association—and there are provincial associations in each of the provinces—I would think we have not done nearly as much as we should. I think individually, and on the provincial level, we have done more; but as a national association there has not been as much as many of us would have liked to see.

Mr. Kenneth E. Calmain, Staff Secretary, Committee on Poverty, Canadian Association of Social Workers: I think the association has tried very steadily, through the years, to present issues of all kinds to the public. I do not say that they have been markedly successful, but there have been policy statements that have received publicity on a wide variety of subjects, including income maintenance.

There have been attempts in other fields related indirectly to the problems of poverty—corrections and this kind of thing. The association, of course, has presented many briefs to committees of government—the Carter Commission, and so on—that related directly to income maintenance.

I can only say that these efforts have been duplicated by many of the provincial associations of social work, and the provincial associations have sometimes differed in their emphasis on certain points that do have national implications, but the efforts of social work generally have been, I think, pretty consistent, considering their numbers, at least.

Senator Carter: People in poverty sometimes complain about social workers being cold and impersonal people who do not understand the problems of the poor. They look upon social workers as part of the middle class and probably more devoted to the Establishment and the status quo than to their particular problems. Will you comment on that?

Mr. E. Levine, Board Member, Canadian Association of Social Workers: I wonder if I may make a few comments in that regard because that is something one tends to hear a great deal about.

I think many of our difficulties in the whole social milieu is historical in terms of limited perspectives. I think part of the difficulty has arisen due to a particular approach or ethos that tended not to include people who were directly involved in aspects of decision-making, in providing adequate feed-back mechanisms whereby the particular impact of a regulation or procedure is communicated in terms of its effect on people.

Also, and perhaps not too surprisingly and quite legitimately, one tends to hear of the abuses and difficulties, although the manning and the provision of services, not only in terms of public assistance but also social services in which there are many people involved, do provide a great deal of help and support to a great number of people across the country.

In considering some of the limitations of numbers, of qualification, of training, the steering between, at times, rather local, limited response because of local, limited situations to people in poverty and various attitudes, as have been discussed in the brief, compared to, at times, rather enlightened legislation or an enlightened desire to perform differently, very often the provider of the service has to stick to the letter of the law or feels he must.

I think we have gone into some aspects in the brief as to seeing how sometimes the bureaucratic structure and administrative complexity will tend to limit the more human aspect.

I think too in this connection we want to stress that sometimes the separation between the provision of income maintenance and the provision of other kinds of services, is not a denial of any other kinds of services, but it is a way of providing this in a more humane or more people-oriented approach.

The other thing that has been found in the variety of the different pieces of legislation is that the more the provision is universal, the better it is manned; that when a special program is available to the poor, then it is handled as if it is for the poor and it is treated in a different way. When there is a comprehensive health service or a comprehensive service such as family allowance, then you do not have quite the abuses because it is available to the total community rather than to a special group.

The history of all social and health welfare has tended increasingly to assume the universality of social problems and difficulties, whereas historically they have always been partialized with the provision of special institutions or special services. These have never effectively worked.

Senator Carter: If you were advising the Federal Government and you had $1 billion suddenly at your disposal, what would be the first thing that you would advise the Government to do, the most urgent thing that needed doing?

The Chairman: I am sure you expected that question too.

Mr. Levine: That is a very fair question.

Dr. Wharf: We probably have a variety of answers on this.

My off-the-cuff answer would be to put it in the direction of increased family allowances and to make family allowances taxable so that you get away from family allowances going to the middle- or upper-income groups. You get that portion back in the taxes. But I think, consistent with what Mr. Levine is saying, I would opt for the universal services rather than selective services, so the extension of family allowances, the upgrading of family allowances and the recoupment of some of this through tax provisions would be one approach that I would favour.

Senator Carter: You would put family allowances ahead of the guaranteed annual income?

Dr. Wharf: I would say family allowances; one of the ways of achieving a guaranteed annual income, at least to the families with children I think one of the causes of poverty; that the more children one has, particularly in the low income groups, the more difficulty one has getting along.

I think the other kind of universal service I would see would be the extension and improvement of the Old Age Security program, and I think through these two mechanisms or provisions you would introduce many of the components of the guaranteed annual income.

The Chairman: In talking about family allowances you covered it a little but not quite. What troubles us is that we have to cover the old people, the people without children and the single people. That is our difficulty: if you are going to have a guaranteed income, you have to cover everybody somehow.

Senator Carter: What disturbs me about it is that the professional people come before us and opt for the family allowance instead of a guaranteed annual income, and it seems to me they do not envisage a guaranteed annual income as being geared to the size of the family, because the family allowance is geared to the size of the family.

My concept of a guaranteed annual income would be a basic income to adults, and if there were another group, there would be an increment and so forth, but apparently you do not like that concept because you would substitute the family allowance for the guaranteed annual income.

The Chairman: I think they are going to say that you have misunderstood them.

Mr. Levine: We consider the family allowance as being part of a total program of guaranteed annual income. We think it needs some scrutiny and improvement, but it has to be seen in that context for exactly the categories of people you have mentioned. I have the feeling that any kind of guaranteed annual income plan must be comprehensive in terms of the people for which it is provided. That is, it must be for all, and not just for people with families.

Dr. Wharf: My approach was based on the assumption that you asked me to state my priorities.

Senator Carter: Yes.

Dr. Wharf: If I could do only a very limited thing...

Senator Carter: No, if you had $1 billion you could do a lot of things.

Dr. Wharf: I would use the demogrant approach to cover families of two, and family allowances for families with children. I think the evidence is that one of the points of real stress is the birth of the first child, when the two incomes usually cease. If both have been employed, then one income ceases at that time. For a period of time when the children are at school and growing up there is a continued period of stress with respect to income. At the point when the children leave the home there arise opportunities for the wife to go back to work, and there is a lessened outgo in terms of expenditure and that sort of thing.

Senator Carter: I have many more questions, but I think some other members of the committee should have a chance.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): First of all I should like to ask whether this is a national, regional, or provincial organization.

Dr. Wharf: It is a national organization.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): How is it that we have only Ontario people in this group this morning?

Mr. Levine: That is a very fair question. We are representing a national association, and we have been asked to be witnesses at this hearing this morning. The committee which prepared the brief included a variety of people from other provinces. How we operate nationally is that we appoint a committee for a brief the members of which are geographically close together, and through the mechanisms of the board, which has representatives in all provinces, briefs are submitted to the board and then to the executive which has representation too from all areas of the country. This brief is not just a study of the committee. It is the result of the committee's preliminary distribution, and also of submissions made originally to the board and revised by the executive, which has a total representation. It was pointed out to you that on the last page of the brief is a list of the entire membership.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): Yes, I saw it.

Mr. Levine: That tends to cover the country.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): As a former politician I should like to follow up this question that was asked by Senator Carter about your recommendation of spending more money. Senator Carter asked Question No. 2, but I am going to ask Question No. 1, which is: If you need $1 billion, then from where are you going to get it? I can imagine myself on a platform in my riding telling the people that they are going to have a minimum income, that everybody is going to be paid, and ending up by saying: "You are the ones who are going to pay for it." It is very easy to say this, and we have had this attitude for a number of years. Everybody says: The Government can take care of it; what's a few millions of dollars? And the Government can take care of it. $30 million is not really a problem when you have a budget running into the billions. But, this may run up to $1 billion, and nobody yet has ever come out with a recommendation of how we are going to get that money. Will we get it through taxation, or will we ask Mr. Caouette to make it in his little mill? How will we get the money? I know that you have not the answer to that.

Mr. Levine: We have proceeded in a direction towards an answer—at least, we hope we have.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): However, this is not the question intended to ask. I have gone astray here. You mentioned basic need, which is another thing that many committees have never been able to establish. What actually is basic need? Have you an answer to that?

Dr. Wharf: I would say that the Economic Council has answered that one.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): No, they did not. I want to know what basic need is. Is it one telephone or two telephones? Is it one car or two cars? Is it a black and white television set, or a colour television set? What is a basic need?

Dr. Wharf: These things get into the matter of personal choice. Some families might opt for two telephones at the expense of a television set, or vice versa. We would not want to get into saying that everybody has to have, and everybody needs to have, these kinds of things.

Miss Pauline VanLammers, Eastern Branch Ontario Association of Professional Social Workers: We do a great deal of budgeting in our work with people, and we look at basic need as being very simply food, clothing, shelter, health care, and education, which include things like transportation, et cetera. We do not go into the business of telephone and TV's, although all of our families have TV's, but that is their choice. From our point of view we have to state what we see as basic needs. How they take it from there is their choice and their business because we cannot decide whether somebody should have one telephone or two.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): You do not make much difference between the basic need and the living standard. Another question is: "What is the living standard? I imagine that Senator Croxall's living standard, for example, is much higher than mine. I do not doubt that at all, but he is talking about the poor people.

Dr. Wharf: This is one of the things we were trying to convey in the brief. These things are relative, and it really depends partly upon how we interpret them. If we are to determine what should be the standard for the poor then this is exactly the kind of thing that we cannot do. One of the reasons why so much of our work with people has not sufficiently met the needs is because we may have interpreted needs—whether from the middle class standard or any other standard—in a way which may not reflect the true aspirations, desires, and needs of any other group of people.

As we proceed to better mechanisms of feedback, review boards and implementation of our concepts as they relate to people who are experienced in the reality of their existence we find that this is the way to determine his question. I might do it according to my own standards, but this would reflect a particular group or family in society. We have been providing health services in a variety of other dimensions based on an assumption of limited feedback and data as to the true implications of a particular approach which may sound extremely humane and appropriate, but is not relevant to particular groups or persons.

The Chairman: Dr. Wharf, you are professional people. If there is anyone who knows anything about this problem, you ought to know. I think you do. We have been involved in this for almost 40 years. Why have we not achieved a program to indicate a family budget that fits a family of two or four persons? The knowledge must exist somewhere, where is it?

Dr. Wharf: Living standard budgets are reduced in numerous places. The Toronto Social Planning Council developed a set of standards which has been made use of in many centres. The important lesson is that wherever this has been done, particularly in the terms indicated by Miss VanLammers, it has been higher than that allotted under present standards for income maintenance by provincial legislation.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): I am glad to hear that something is being done about it. This committee has received close to 100 briefs, nearly all with a long list of recommendations, but none has specified exactly what should be done. We have to ask these questions as to what should be done. We do not have the answers, but you and the public do. We need guidelines. That is why we ask some foolish questions.

Dr. Wharf: The chairman has reminded me that the brief of the Department of National Health and Welfare contained some of this information.

The Chairman: Yes; it contained two budgets one on Montreal and one on Toronto, yet no one pays attention to them. However, it was submitted as something of value.

Senator Fergusson: I found this brief most interesting and, like Senator Carter, I consider the documentation to be invaluable. I do not think we have ever had as helpful documentation in any other brief. We were discussing family allowances and you mentioned that with universality you do not have as much abuse as you do with other systems. Is it the opinion of your association that there is little abuse of family allowance in Canada because it is universal?

Mr. Levine: There is little abuse in terms of its implementation, availability and accessibility. In fact, the people are neither demeaned nor humiliated. This relates to Senator Carter's question with regard to people who apply for help. It is true in terms of the universal and comprehensive health service where the very fact of its universality tends to place it on a more accepted total basis.

Senator Fergusson: What is your opinion of the use made of family allowances by the recipients?

Miss VanLammers: It depends on the family. Unfortunately, the poor have had to use family allowances in ways for which they were not intended, such as supplementing rent. This easily comes out of family allowances.

Senator Fergusson: That is really not abuse.

Miss VanLammers: No, I do not think there is any specific abuse of family allowances.

Senator Fergusson: We read of people criticizing the system and saying the allowances are used for certain purposes.

Miss VanLammers: How do those people relate that particular $8 to the family allowance? They cannot fault family allowances at all.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): I will not pursue this point, but I spend too much time around the liquor stores hearing from the supervisors how welfare recipients spend their money.

Senator Fergusson: You mentioned the New Jersey guaranteed income experiment. Do you think this would be applicable in Canada?

Dr. Wharf: Yes, many of its aspects would be applicable to Canada. For instance, I can think of two: one is that this experiment so far seems to have shown that the people involved can complete the required documentation forms and eligibility checks on their own, obviating the necessity for an investigating social worker to make rounds. That is an important aspect. The second and perhaps more important part is that the experiment has shown that the provision of a guaranteed floor does not reduce incentive to work. In fact, the reverse occurs. People who are assured of this are spurred to further efforts on their own. These two lessons are applicable to Canada.

Senator Fergusson: Witnesses before this committee have many times referred to the female head of a family and her great problems. This is not mentioned in your brief, but I am sure you must be aware of it.

Mr. Calmain: We are very much aware of it. The only reason that it is not specifically mentioned in the brief is that it is implied in the broad terms of the previous references to persons who have financial difficulty. We are concerned with all the poor, including the single female heads of families. Obviously their problems are magnified and of more concern than other groups.

Senator Fergusson: There being so many of them, should they have special consideration?

Dr. Wharf: This is one of the reasons we recommend a separation of income and services. The female head of the household needs many services apart from income maintenance. If the whole service has to be obtained in one package, we feel, for the reasons we advance in the brief, that it can be self-defeating. Senator Carter referred to the fact that welfare investigators do not have time to devote to social aspects of problems. This was very much in our minds when we advocated the separation of the two so that the woman with children would be able to obtain income and have social services available at the same time to assist her with other problems in terms of raising children on her own.

Senator Fergusson: I presume that through your various groups in all parts of Canada you have some experience of the appeal procedure under the Canada Assistance Act. Could you tell us if you think the Appeal Board procedure now set up under the Canada Assistance Act is effective?

Dr. Wharf: I think the provisions for setting up the Appeal Board are excellent, and it is one of the most progressive steps yet developed. My personal experience is that the Appeal Board procedure is not working as well as was the intent of the plan. For example, there is a great time lag between the point of appeal and the decision. I recognize that one swallow does not make a summer, but in one case the applicant was denied assistance and had no recourse from the Welfare Department until the appeal was decided, which was some six weeks later. During that time he had to exist on his own resources. The appeal decision was in effect split. They said he was not entitled to regular assistance on an ongoing basis, but at the point he applied he was eligible for emergency assistance. That is really a contradiction. How is a person eligible for emergency assistance in November when he applies expected to survive until January when the Appeal Board decision is handed down?

Senator Fergusson: You speak of a special case, of how somebody is to exist if on emergency assistance in November and not able to get any until January.

Dr. Wharf: This is exactly the point. This person managed through loans from friends. Because he was attending university he received a special loan; he was already in debt to the university but he got another loan to cover this.

The Chairman: I should like to read honourable senators something very pertinent on this very question:

The U.S. Supreme Court yesterday gave more than 9,000,000 Americans or welfare the right to a formal hearing before their benefits can be suspended.

The 5- to 3- decision requires welfare officials to allow any individual threatened with a cutoff to appear in person and to challenge and cross-examine witnesses, including the caseworker. Meanwhile, the welfare payments would be continued.

This is the first time the United States Supreme Court has dealt with a welfare case. There has been only one case in this country dealing with a welfare appeal to Ontario courts, which was turned down. Is that right?

Dr. Wharf: Yes.

The Chairman: This, of course, is of great importance. A declaration by the Americans of welfare rights, which we have emphasized one and again. It must lead to only one thing, that we will have the hearings. There must be the right to be heard, and assistance allowance must continue until such time as that appeal is disposed of. Inevitably the committee must deal with this.

Senator Fergusson: What is that clipping?

The Chairman: It is from the Globe and Mail this morning.

Dr. Wharf: Perhaps I could make one further point on Senator Fergusson's question. In the case to which I referred the individual was refused the right to apply. In other words, he was not given the right to make an application. When advised that he should appeal, he returned to the welfare office and asked for a Form 6, which he has to fill in for the Appeal Review Board in Ontario. The department did not know that such a form existed, and asked what a Form 6 was. They did not have any on hand, and we subsequently got them some from Queens Park.

Senator Pearson: I would like to know from the witnesses what they mean by a guaranteed annual income, and how it would be integrated with the present welfare system. In other words, what part of the welfare system could be dropped, both federal, provincial and municipal, if there were the guaranteed annual income?

Dr. Wharf: The guaranteed annual income is an umbrella term, an omnibus term, that includes a number of ways of implementation. It depends which method is chosen to implement the guaranteed annual income. If it is done through a negative income tax and benefits are low, probably some form of provincial assistance as presently instituted will be needed. To make the point clear, the negative income tax might very well assist a family with employment but below the subsistence level. However, we manage to define that in our ingenuity. It would not assist a family not employed with no income. In other words, the amount of income obtained through a negative income tax might be less than the present entitlement through existing legislation, in which case that kind of provision would be needed to make up the difference.

I think there is a variety of ways in which it can be implemented. Some advocates have said that we need to shore up the provisions we now have through the Canada Assistance Plan, the Canada Pension Plan and the family allowances, and make up a "floor". Really the guaranteed income talks about a "floor" income, as I understand it, under which nobody would be allowed to go, and this would be guaranteed as a right. As I say, there is a variety of ways of achieving this minimum income floor. I think it depends which method is chosen.

Senator Pearson: Is it not possible through the guaranteed annual income eventually to get away from all the different groups of welfare agencies that we now have?

Dr. Wharf: One of the real advantages is that it would simplify this. I think inherent within all the schemes I have seen has been a reduction of eligibility determination and eligibility requirements as they presently exist. To some people's minds, as for example a very conservative economist like Freedman in the United States, this is one of the main preferences, for a guaranteed annual income, that it would do away with a lot of the administrative machinery presently set up.

The Chairman: Of course, Freedman goes further than that and says we should do away with all of them. That is the objection to Freedman.

Dr. Wharf: The return to the market place.

The Chairman: Yes.

Senator Pearson: It would save a great deal of money on doing away with all these different agencies, and that is where the guaranteed annual income plan would work a little easier.

Dr. Wharf: Another point arising from the New Jersey experience mentioned in the brief is that the costs of administration declined.

Senator Pearson: On page 8 you talk about the program in Sweden, and how they almost got rid of their poverty. Can you give us some thoughts on how Sweden accomplished their projects?

Mr. Calmain: That is dealt with on the pages before and after page 8, because the issue is fundamentally one of values and the intent of public policy. If there is a determination to eliminate or minimize poverty it can be done. Anything short of that obviously fails.

The Chairman: For your information, this morning we are determined. What do we do?

Mr. Calmain: We would have to allocate all kinds of resources, as Sweden has done in accomplishing this purpose. There is no other route; there is no other golden way. It has to cost money. The history of this in Sweden shows consistent dedication to this purpose. Fifty years ago Sweden was known as "the poor man of Europe". Since that time they have reached the point where they can brag about their position. I regret to say that in my brief holidays in Sweden they have shown this to be one of their least desirable qualities, that they do brag a great deal. However salutary the accomplishment, it is sometimes less than attractive as a national feature. I do think they desire all kinds of credit.

Dr. Wharf: This was in our minds when we made the earliest suggestion. One of the real lacks in the study of social issues has been the comparative study between various countries to see what has happened and what will work here and what are the unique situations that allowed it to work in one country and not in another. This is really only the beginning of an attempt to develop a serious area of study in the whole social policy field. For instance, it is much less developed in international law, where this has been a subject of inquiry and where there is documentation and evidence available.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): I believe this is what you mean in paragraph 49 when you mention:

... effective level will require a major input of resources and the co-operation of all levels of government.

Mr. Calmain: Exactly.

The Chairman: It is not that we are without knowledge in regard to the Swedish situation. I think we should try desperately to find out what it is Sweden has. Sweden has an equality that we do not have, one which they attained over a long period of time as a result of a collective bargaining process that covers 90 per cent of their people. There are some but few who are not subject to collective bargaining. If you take a look at our country and not what the Prime Minister said yesterday—regard to the labour force, which is 8,000,000—you will see that 2,000,000 belong to labour organizations. The suggestion was that wages and salaries take 72 per cent of the pie. That would leave only 28 per cent for 6,000,000 other people. That is one of the answers to your problem.

Senator Carter: Mr. Chairman, when I was in Sweden last September, I did what I could to dig into this problem. You have mentioned collective bargaining where all the employees bargain as one unit and all the unions bargain as one unit. That is simplified and it is fine for a small country such as Sweden, but it is not something you could impose on Canada. It would be ludicrous.

Another point in the brief deals with the values between the public sector and the private sector. It is pointed out that Sweden has transferred much more of its production and wealth—revenue—to the public sector. Douglas Fullerton mentioned in his brief that the percentage of population of producers was very small in Sweden and diminished with regard to people too young to get into the labour market, and the number of old people getting welfare benefits is increasing. I found that the young people, in particular, were worried that Sweden was rapidly approaching the point where it would not have enough producers to carry the burden of supporting those drawing benefits.

Sweden is a free enterprise country. The officials went out of their way to stress that and to tell us that they are not a social state. There is no doubt about this. I found it difficult, however, to figure out whether the Government or the engineers were running the country. Certainly the engineers are a very strong fraternal body; they exert tremendous influence. In Sweden everybody knows everyone else, whereas in Canada that is not the case. They are able to get together over the dinner table or at a cocktail party. You do not have that sort of thing in Canada and cannot have. It is very easy to stand back and say that this is what they have done in Sweden and that we should do the same in Canada. These are two absolutely different situations, and it just cannot be done.

Senator Pearson: On page 8, paragraph 13, you say:

The association believes that Canada may have relied too exclusively upon what has been termed "the three pillars of liberal doctrine, namely, political democracy, high productivity and universal education".

You proceed in the next few paragraphs to criticize those attitudes quite severely. I sort of agree with you, but I would like you to enlarge on it if you would.

Mr. Calmain: We are not fully criticizing any of those points. We are very much in favour of political democracy and productivity, as well as commercial education. We are criticizing that each one in some degree has been misapplied or insufficiently applied or that the supporting factors to make them realities have not been either understood or practised. If you take the illustration of universal education as an important pillar, who could quarrel with it?—yet in practice we have failed very severely to develop this in our way of life.

Senator Pearson: We have failed to benefit the country with the educational program we have.

Mr. Calmain: This is so. I think we state it in the brief, and we do this quite fully in order to show the extraordinary waste of certain talents in this country, as has been shown by almost every study undertaken on the subject. All we can say about high productivity is that by itself it is something of a sacred thing and requires an apportionment of the results of productivity to have any real extensive social value. There is no point at all in a small number of people reaping the exclusive rewards of that high productivity. We are against the misapplication of the hypothesis on which this doctrine is based. In political democracy, we have demonstrated again and again quite conclusively within the brief that the poor, in the signal instance, are prevented for a variety of reasons from participating effectively in this great doctrine. It is fine, but it just does not apply to them.

Senator Pearson: Our educational program is tending towards developing an elite in Canada and leaving a great mass of people outside all together—do you think there is anything in that?

Mr. Calmain: I would say there is certainly a great mass left outside.

We should include all those people to the full limit of their capacities.

Obviously, not everybody can reach the same level of educational attainment—I do not mean exclusively in academic terms, but in all sorts of ways. I doubt if I myself could ever become an electrical engineer. It is well beyond my capacity and I would never reach it. But that is not beyond the capacities of other people. So I am not trying to delimit this point of everyone reaching the maximum to which they can develop in purely an academic sense. It is a broad spectrum and a goal, of each person reaching the point he can, as the ultimate idea of education for this purpose.

Dr. Wharf: As a further supplement to Mr. Calmain's point, the reliance on these three doctrines has failed to achieve any substantial change in the distribution of income, despite the fact that we have made advances in social welfare legislation, the distribution of income remains substantially unchanged over the last ten or fifteen years.

Senator Pearson: Thank you.

Senator McGrand: On page 4 of your brief, in point 3, you say there are many of the poor who have to pay union dues. Are there many people who are now in poverty who are union people, who work, who belong to a union; and if there are, in what trades do you find those people?

Mr. Calmain: If I may answer, I think the inclusion of the trade point there was agreed upon primarily, senator, not in any way to reflect upon unions, because we are strongly in favour of the union idea. I think the chairman, Senator Croll, has said that they walk the picket line in order not to have to walk the bread line.

The Chairman: Yes, but that is not the question.

Mr. Calmain: However decent the wages may be, and they may be substantial, they are not reflected right through into the family. A person may have a very large family and be pretty poor, and still may have a reasonable income, above the median.

Senator McGrand: In what trades do you find them?

Mr. Calmain: I do not know the relationship between large families and trades, senator, I am sorry.

Miss VanLammers: I think it has been our experience that they are more in the service trades.

The Chairman: But there again, the service trades in the main are not organized. Some of them are just beginning.

Miss VanLammers: Yes, some are beginning to organize.

The Chairman: But that is not Senator McGrand's question. The Senator is 30 years in political life and knows what he is asking about. That is not quite the answer.

Senator McGrand: It is not the answer, but I will let it go.

Dr. Wharf: I think the point is well taken.

Senator McGrand: On page 8 you say that children do not go to school because of poverty. Do you know of cases where poverty stops children from going to school? I can understand this, and we get the story that they have not got proper clothes, that the children are laughed at because they are not well dressed, and so on. But is it really a lack of money that stops children from attending school?

Mr. A. Campbell McCallum, Supervisor, Children's Aid Society, Ottawa: I believe that this has to do with the climate in which children are raised in our society. Speaking about poverty, certainly in my experience, when you talk about the availability of education for all children—which we recognize we do not have—in order to try and implement that, this runs back into the points made in the brief about the importance of a guaranteed income or a guaranteed level of living for these people. The psychological factors these children suffer, in living in poverty ridden areas, are immense and complicated. Many of these children, as I think we have tried to point out, have great latent talents. You cannot bring up those talents unless you change the climate, so that they can begin to fit into the educational system. The important point would be that there are a great number of children at the poverty level who never get the opportunity for education because of the very complicated factors in our environment.

Senator McGrand: These are complicated factors that make up the environment, but it is not always an actual lack of money. There are children going to school from very poor families with very little money, but they go. The lack of money contributes to the environment, but it is not the essential thing in the question of their going to school.

Mr. Levine: If I may add, on this very important point, one of the difficulties about the provision of social services is that generally it is difficult to particularize. It is true that the additional money may not alone deal with this, it may not help, but this is something we cannot do. This is something much greater than our power to provide.

I would like to have the opportunity to make a point generally, that one of the things we are increasingly finding, whether in the end of providing services or in legislation, or in some other sector, is that we cannot isolate problems as conveniently as we would hope. It would be more fitting if we could maintain this kind of partialization. That is why there has to be an emphasis on comprehensiveness of service. In this brief we are concentrating on things within our capacity in the immediate future. We would hope for some changes that might improve the total fabric of life.

The Chairman: I would remind honourable senators that at one of the meetings—Senator Cook, Senator Inman, Senator Fergusson and Senator Everett will remember this—we had a woman in Toronto who told us she left the centre of the city with her children and moved to the outskirts and then found she could not dress the children for school in the way the other children in the suburbs were dressed, so finally she moved back again into the city centre.

Senator McGrand: That was one thing that I wanted to stress.

The Chairman: Yes, I am sorry, senator.

Senator McGrand: It leads right into my next question. It has been said here several times that if we changed the system and got away from all the organizations all over the country handling welfare, that less people would be required. Do you think that regardless of whether it is a guaranteed annual income or what it is, that is going to put more money into the hands where it is needed? Do you not think that the very things which contribute to the environment will still be present, and that there will be just about as many people to investigate the people and their environment as we have today?

Mr. McCallum: I think, senator, there would be a transfer from the process of investigating to that of supporting the individual.

Senator McGrand: You have to investigate the cause of these things and help people make decisions. The woman I referred to moved from one place to another and moved back again. Somebody helped her and gave her a little guidance, and that is all that would be necessary.

Dr. Wharf: We struggled with this point in the brief. We did not in any way want to minimize the contribution of social services, and we felt that, in saying we wanted them split, it might in fact do this. But we would want to emphasize that we see the social services being very important. We would feel, however, that they could be better utilized if they were not operated in the same way as the public assistance system is operated.

Senator McGrand: On page 13 of the brief you refer to something Douglas Fullerton says concerning Sweden. You quote him as saying, "Have we North Americans maybe overemphasized higher pay as an incentive in our economic system?", and in respect of that quote you give your opinion that you believe this may very well be the case.

Do you really feel that this emphasis on incentive—to get ahead, to get more money, to get more work out of people by giving them more money—has really contributed to the welfare of the general people? The fact that you say it may well be the case would seem to so indicate.

Dr. Wharf: Yes. I feel that in our society we have over-emphasized material success as being the key to status. There are other ways people can achieve and can contribute.

Senator McGrand: That is all right. Several of the other senators have already asked where this billion dollars is to come from. I too feel that question must be answered by the people who present us with suggestions. The people who appear before us have many suggestions, but their suggestions never include where the money is to come from. Reference was made this morning to New Zealand, Sweden and Holland and the elimination in these places of dire poverty. Admittedly, they still have the working poor, but apparently they have no dire poverty. And yet, despite Sweden's excellent steel industry, these three countries are not giants of industry but are, rather, basically agricultural economies. That is true especially of New Zealand. But we in this country in the last two generations, especially in the maritime provinces, have followed a philosophy of getting off the land and going to the big cities. We have been telling the young people that there is no opportunity for them on the land and that they should go to the large centres like Toronto. Well, if a country like New Zealand, on a strictly agricultural economy, can find that billion dollars, then I must ask where they get it?

Dr. Wharf: It is true, as you say, that New Zealand is an agricultural country. An important point to observe, however, is that the distribution of income in New Zealand is far less extreme at either end than it is here. There are not the gaps between the very affluent and the very poor. The median income is more likely to reflect the income range than are the two ends. So I would see the distribution of income as being the key in New Zealand.

Senator McGrand: There are more one-car garages than three-car garages, I suppose.

Senator Cook: Mr. Chairman, I agree with all my colleagues that this is an excellent brief. I found it very interesting reading and most persuasive. I believe I knew a little more when I finished reading it than I did before. However, it does suggest that we recommend that we paint with a fairly large brush. As all the other senators indicated, the question is where are we going to get the paint.

The brief takes a few sideswipes at the White Paper, and, without saying that I am for or against the White Paper in any way, I have read that a number of taxpayers seem to say that the White Paper is merely increasing taxation under the word "reform". If there was a reasonable blueprint procedure for social improvement, I wonder whether the taxpayers would not be more agreeable to paying increased taxation. In any journey that we take we have to start with first steps, but what troubles me about all the briefs so far is that they seem to end up at the end of the journey without those first steps. Would it be possible to get more detailed proposals than simply the generalities we have heard so far? Would it be possible for your provincial organizations to produce suggestions for a more detailed blueprint of social improvement? Instead of suggesting a guaranteed annual income, could they suggest how much and what would be achieved from it? Could they suggest why they favour, for example, increased family allowances? I understand you favour them not in lieu of guaranteed annual income but merely because there is not enough money to go around, but could you tell us whether the social benefits from increasing the family allowances would be greater than immediately increasing the old age security?

In summary, could you give us some more detailed recommendations for improving the system?

Dr. Wharf: I acknowledged this point right at the beginning, senator. I realize that you are at the point where you need more specifics. I can say that we do suggest some changes that would lead to or would serve as antecedents of the guaranteed annual income. We do talk of some ways of improving the present social services program. And I can say that if the provinces would only agree to live up to the provisions of the Canada Assistance Plan that in itself would be a further contribution. We do talk of the social services in neighbourhood locations, and the like, as being the sort of thing we can do; and there are some figures available estimating the cost of various kinds of guaranteed incomes.

Professor Thur of the Economic Council prepared a statement in reply to the Canadian Welfare Council statement, in which he estimates the cost of negative income tax at certain rates, giving a rate of an income of $1,200 for a single person and $2,000 for a family, and estimating what this would cost, what would be saved and what would be the total. He then raises the level somewhat and again goes through the same procedure. That is only one example, and I am sure such figures are available.

But, despite the most sophisticated sort of cost-benefit analysis schemes that would list the benefits and costs in terms of economic costs and benefits, and would list the costs in figures, nevertheless, the best of these are likely only to be best guesses, particularly where there are difficulties that can only hint at problems involved in administration and their effect upon the families themselves.

One of the ideas I have toyed with at times is whether there would be some way in which Canada, with its regional discrepancies and differences, could institute some experiments along the lines of the New Jersey experiment, but using different ways of introducing the guaranteed annual income, for example, so that in one area you would use the demogrant approach and in another area you would use the negative income tax approach and then at the end of a certain period see which approach has the greatest effect on the family itself. We can forecast in fairly precise ways the monetary costs, but what we cannot foresee are some of the other problems involved particularly with these families and the effect on the families themselves.

Senator Fergusson: That would take a long time to do. It would even take years.

Dr. Wharf: That is the trouble with experiments. They postpone decisions.

The Chairman: But the one thing that is emphasized is that we do not have the time. Everybody thinks they have been studying poverty for years but they do not realize that we are the very first to have been doing it.

Senator Quart: I am coming back to the social workers because I know there is a tremendous amount of frustration in trying to help the applicants. On the other hand, I believe that frequently some of the social workers give applicants the brushoff. We have had that explained to us here by many witnesses. Now can the Canadian Association of Social Workers on a national or provincial level, when you receive complaints of this kind, take any disciplinary action? If you have been listening to television recently, you will have heard from some of these poorer people about suggestions made to them that have not been at all nice, relating to morals and so forth. There have been cases where the officer's name has been mentioned by two or three people who were willing to come even before this committee and testify. So my question is, have you any authority to take action in a situation like this?

Dr. Wharf: We might have a variety of responses to this, but I would like to say first of all that social workers are the employees of agencies. And I think that one of the things we have neglected, and this is brought out in the brief, is ways of bringing accountability to the people served rather than being only accountable to what we have called the input constituency, the taxpayer or the municipal level of government. I think the two suggestions we have made, and there are probably many others, for improvement in appeal procedures and for development of client groups do offer some way of providing accountability to the agency or to the organizational structure so there would be a way for an individual not simply on his own but through an organization or through a recognized appeal procedure to complain about the practice of an individual worker.

I think this is one instance which has been neglected. It was pointed out even in a discussion last night that although social workers are much criticized, and I would not want to whitewash ourselves entirely, one of the things we did do and still continue to do is to protect the clients receiving public assistance from having their names published in the local newspaper or posted on a bulletin board for all to see. I think social workers have fought against this practice because they feel it is their duty to protect the client. I think maybe what we have done is to have over-protected and now we are accused of paternalism and of not recognizing the contribution that the clients themselves can make.

Mr. Levine: About this question of the Association, we do have disciplinary functions. Part of the difficulty is the fact that this is true of our membership. But very often people may not be members of the professional group per se which is not again related to Dr. Wharf's point. Are we content only with that? I think it is related to the question of accountability to the particular structure or agency and to the whole question as to how they are accountable and what can we as a professional group do, and I think we are very much committed to doing things around this nature of the protection of people and the mechanisms whereby they will have their rights preserved. I would like to emphasize Dr. Wharf's point. You see, historically we seem to have different perspectives. Our concern and the thrust has been the protection of the client. This may have been seen or is now emerging as perhaps too partial a view and the client may require the protection of assistance or protection from abuse. This was never the intent or never the thrust, but is again part of our increasing understanding of the fact that we have not been as responsive as society—not only as social workers—to the kind of problems that people are experiencing when they have to accept service.

Senator Quart: Just one further question. Is it necessary to have all the questions that a social worker asks of the average applicant?

Mr. Levine: We are saying no.

Dr. Wharf: Absolutely not.

Senator Quart: Maybe some guidelines could be set so that so many questions are not asked, because it seems dreadful and humiliating to the person who is applying for assistance.

Mr. Levine: These questions are due to legislation quite frequently, and this is where the bind comes in. In part these questions have been part of the procedures that have been established but I think again I prefer to go back to one of the recommendations where we recommended the separation of the receiving of benefits that are financial from the kind of questions that may be relevant in other contexts.

Senator Carter: On this question of accountability, you refer to your brief and Dr. Wharf referred again this morning to the underutilization of the Canada Assistance Plan and the discrepancies and variations as between provinces. Has your organization done anything to bring these discrepancies and deficiencies, underutilization, etc. to the various provinces and what have you done to try to get these things remedied as an organization?

Mr. Levine: I think there have been a variety of specific things related both to the national association and to the various provincial groups in terms of the interpretation and the programming. I think there are also vast differences in the country where this is done. I think you can point with a certain amount of pride to the fact that where social workers have been in a position of power and authority there have been some vast differences in terms of the implementation of the Canada Assistance Plan.

Senator Carter: Have you made formal representations to a provincial government or to a municipal government as well as the federal?

Mr. Levine: Yes, indeed.

Dr. Wharf: On a provincial basis?

Senator Carter: Yes, on a provincial basis.

Dr. Wharf: Yes. Also—this may be a side point, but I would like to bring it out—I think the Canada Assistance Plan has been recognized as a piece of progressive legislation, and social workers were very heavily involved in the preparation of that plan. At the federal level social workers have made a contribution towards the development of progressive social policies.

Senator Carter: You refer in your brief to the weak political position of the poor as a group. Whereas worry will stir up people who are wealthier and more affluent to protest, it works the other way with the poor and it inhibits them from taking any action or exerting any pressure. Can you give us instances where social workers have helped these people to organize and exert pressure and to remedy that situation?

Dr. Wharf: Yes. I would admit that this is a fairly recent phenomenon in terms of assisting specific groups of clients to organize and to protest, but nevertheless it is happening. You can cite some instances. In Toronto the Family Service Association and the Toronto Planning Council have detached staff members to public housing projects, one of the duties of which has been to encourage the formation of tenant councils that would do this kind of thing.

Senator McGrand: Is not that what the Company of Young Canadians got into trouble over, because they went out to do this type of work?

Mr. Levine: I think it may lead to some troubles, but I would say that you would not be having these hearings if there was not some preparation for attempting new ways and doing things new ways. I think there have been very positive experiences whereby there have been many social workers involved in tenant groups, in client groups, in trying to develop more indigenous responsiveness and responsibility to particular local problems.

This, again, will extend beyond just income maintenance, but again I speak from the point of view of the provision of health services or comprehensive social services. The accessibility of a service is a problem too—Where is it located? What are the provisions whereby people can obtain it?

We suggest the more involvement of people who are the recipients, the consumer, in fact, the more likely will be the relevance of the particular procedures and the particular concentration of services.

Senator Carter: Coming back to these formal representations, can you give us a little more detail on them—when, how many they have made, and what has resulted from them? Did they do any good?

Dr. Wharf: The examples I could most readily cite right now—and perhaps we could supplement this later on—would be examples of social workers who are working out of agencies' auspices in this...

Senator Carter: I am talking of your association as a national organization, or as a provincial branch—I do not care which.

Dr. Wharf: One example I was involved some years ago was the development of a brief which criticized the General Welfare Assistance Act in Ontario, which was presented to the provincial government. At that point I left the country to go back to school, so I am not aware of the immediate follow-ups that were given. That is one example that comes to my mind.

In British Columbia the association has been involved in criticizing many of the policies of the provincial government there. But to give you the chapter and verse would require some digging and a later supplement.

Senator Carter: Perhaps you could furnish that?

Dr. Wharf: Yes.

Mr. Levine: We would be very pleased to send a listing of the kinds of appeals and briefs that were prepared related to these areas.

Senator Carter: What happens when there is a conflict between the needs of the poor, the needs of a single individual in poverty and the interest of the agency? Where does the social worker take his stand? Can you give us cases where they have stood up and fought on behalf of the client...

Dr. Wharf: Yes, many.

Senator Carter: ...or have they just sat on the fence and sided with the agency? What happens in cases like that?

Dr. Wharf: I do not suppose there is any general rule. I think one of the facts of life we have to consider is that there may in fact be a conflict between what is deemed as necessary for the organization and what the client sees as being necessary. I feel that because of this inherent conflict there may very well be a case for having social workers fighting social workers, for having some social workers employed with neighbourhood groups, tenant groups and clients' rights groups, and actively criticizing the practices of other social workers. I think that out of this kind of conflict can come some improvements, rather than too much of an emphasis on consensus and smoothing things over.

Senator Carter: Is there much of that?

Dr. Wharf: Yes, it is developing very much right now.

The Chairman: Miss VanLammers, you are an active social worker. Now, you tell us.

Miss VanLammers: I just wanted to mention somebody on the Senate committee's staff, Joe Dufour, who went through the same type of conflict and resolved it, I think, in a most extraordinary way for us perhaps. I think one of our problems has been, as social workers as a group, that we have not taken the stands we should take, and we are beginning to do so now. I am all for it, and I think the association is all for it and is backing up the individual members who take these stands.

I think there is much more support from the group of social workers, and certainly this has gone on in British Columbia and Saskatchewan, where people have really put their careers in some jeopardy in terms of future employment.

Dr. Wharf: It is going on in Toronto right now.

Miss VanLammers: And in Toronto, yes.

Senator Carter: Mr. Chairman, I would like to pursue a different line of questioning. We have professional people here this morning, and this is a unique opportunity I have.

The Chairman: We have lots of time, you go ahead.

Senator Carter: We have this unique opportunity to get the information we want from them that we sometimes have not been able to get from others.

I assume that all of you people have at some time worked in the field. If you have not worked in the field, you have had access to information, reports, and so forth.

In your personal experience, either in the field or from information you see coming from reports, would you say that broken homes are more prevalent among the poor than among the public at large?

Miss VanLammers: I would. I have not any figures to back it up, but I think it would certainly seem that financial pressures, for me, too, can lead to the break-up of homes, and I have seen many cases of deserting fathers where this is part of the problem, that this man sees no way out of his financial dilemma and pressures on him to meet the needs of his family and he just takes off and leaves the family, hoping that someone else will have the answer that he has not got. I think family courts find that this is a common factor. I think the other thing is that perhaps among the upper groups there is a tendency to maintain the image of the family. In other words, people will stay in situations because of what the neighbours will say, or because of other things, and perhaps the family should be broken up. There is a difference, I think, in the attitude among the poor. There is not this much feeling about the stigma if they do decide to break up the family. They do not maintain it for the sake of appearances.

Senator Carter: That is what I wanted to get at. You agree, from your experience, that the incidence is higher.

Miss VanLammers: This is my own experience, but I have no figures to back it up.

Senator Carter: Has anybody else formed that opinion?

Dr. Wharf: We tend to lump the poor in one category, and I think that there are many poor families with the kind of familial strength that enables them to hang together despite the odds that face them. There are other families where there may be some strain in the relationships already, and the added pressure of finances is such that the strain rises above the toleration point. There are some families in which both of these things happen, where the strain is already existing and the financial pressure is already existing. So, there are these differences within the poverty group that make it difficult to generalize.

Senator Carter: Yes, I agree with that. You refer in your brief to the outlook of the poor, and you say that their whole attitude is different from that of a person who tries to live on the same income. You give the example of a reporter who tried to find out what it was like to be poor, and you say that while he was doing that he had the knowledge that he could escape from it the very next day if he wished to, whereas the real poor person has no such escape; he is doomed to that for life. Would you say that something like that applies to the marriage of young people who are in this poverty group—that they do not expect their marriage to last? Their parents' marriage did not last, and their grandparents' marriage did not last, and so they do not have the same expectations as people in other groups?

Mr. Levine: This again is a very difficult thing to answer because of the vast differences in individuals. I think the point that is made in the brief about a different climate of opinion and experience would apply also to this whole question of expectation. I think a point is that very often people in this situation do not have expectations, either in terms of increased finances or a rising standard of living, or even in terms of relationships. This is one of the things that we have experienced, that people tend to be in a morass of confusion and hopelessness where they do not see any hope for improvement or development. So, I think this would apply, from what I understand, in terms of people who are often caught up in relationships or situations where their usual terms of reference of experience is that things go wrong, and they have no control over improving them. This is true even in respect of a problem that may not be financial. There is a sense of lack of self-worth. Obviously a marriage cannot work in this situation, and they cannot really deal with their children, because all of their experience has been against it.

Senator Carter: Would you say that that is transmitted to the children from one generation to another?

Dr. Wharf: I think that we mention this general point you are raising, Senator Carter, in our brief when we talk about universal social service. I have not the page in front of me, Mr. Chairman, but we say that typically social services have been organized around problems such as those of child care, child protection, marital counselling, and that kind of thing. We have not extended them to the level where we can see what are points of stress in respect of which most people, even those in the middle class and upper class, experience some difficulty. In other words, there are some points in life where most families experience difficulty. I think we are seeing some development of this kind of thinking in social welfare. There are points at which many people experience difficulty, so it makes sense to organize your services around these points. We mention adolescence, premarital counselling, marriage, the birth of the first child, and retirement as points where many people experience problems. If social services are organized around these principles and made readily available then people at least would have an opportunity of availing themselves of these services.

The Chairman: Yes. Yesterday's Gallup poll indicated that 27 per cent did not quite know what their troubles were. That leaves roughly 73 per cent who did know, and 47 per cent of those said that their trouble was money.

Dr. Wharf: Yes.

The Chairman: Let us not get away from that. That was the public answering. 47 per cent said that their trouble was money. How do you see that?

Dr. Wharf: I would say that income maintenance is the first priority. That social services are important, but not the first priority.

The Chairman: But if you have read our record—and it is obvious that you have because you have been quoting it back to us this morning—you will know that we have said from the time we started that we think maintenance income itself is not the answer: That we need services with it. We have always said that, and we have always had that in our minds. What are we saying that is wrong? How is our thinking wrong, or are you just supporting what we have been saying?

Mr. Levine: We are supporting it, but we are saying that if there is a choice in terms of priority then the maintenance is something that we can and should be doing something about immediately. We are not suggesting that there needs to be a polarization between a variety of different positions. We are suggesting that social services may be a need, but maintenance is a very clear cut and very specific need, and in the perception of most people it is a concern of absolutely immediate priority. This is something that could be a base or a beginning point. The elimination of this could be a common base, and the social services, as Dr. Wharf said, could be directed at the problem areas among the poor, at the single mother and persons like her.

Senator Carter: I have one last question. The children born in this group have generally the expectation that the marriage will not last, and so forth, but are those children handicapped with respect to access to moral and spiritual influences? Can they get to Sunday School, as most children can? How do they stand in relationship to the moral and spiritual influences?

Dr. Wharf: If you define "moral and spiritual" very widely...

Senator Carter: I am thinking of Sunday School and youth organizations like the Girl Guides and Boy Scouts, and other organizations that are character building. I am thinking even of religious services.

Dr. Wharf: I would think that they are handicapped if the organization demands a uniform or a price for joining, or the other participants in the program are at a higher economic level. There are disadvantages here from which the poor children suffer. I think there are disadvantages in terms of things like access to reading material in the home. You know, the average poor home is not likely to be well equipped with reading material. There are public libraries, of course, and these are utilized. There is an interesting experiment starting in London where the neighbourhood social service office is being based in a library. It is thought that this would be a way to promote the library and to increase the use of the library. I would say that in these areas those children are restricted.

Miss VanLammers: I would like to say that another thing is that putting housing projects for poor families 20 miles out of town is not helping with respect to their access to the things you mentioned. I think that there is a big problem here.

Senator Quart: You mentioned organizations which require a uniform. I should like to mention that I have been a Divisional Commissioner of Guides, and a member of the National Council, and I can assure you that in most cases arrangements are made without publicity for a girl to be supplied with the uniform. One of the reasons for adopting uniforms for Scouts and Guides is that there will not be great competition in dress such as exists in schools. Many children drop out from school because of dress.

Dr. Wharf: I acknowledge your point, which is well taken. The discrimination arises from the necessity to make the special arrangements.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): In answer to Senator Cook, reference was made by Dr. Wharf to the fact that the province would only agree to live up to the agreement. Can they? We are back in the old duck-passing business where the provincial government blames the federal government and the municipal government blames the provincial government. There seems to be no answer.

The Chairman: There is an answer to that. These witnesses are all from the Province of Ontario, which is the province that can afford it and the one that is doing the least about it. Let us get it on the record and be honest about it. Is that true?

Mr. Calmain: That is correct.

Dr. Wharf: There may be other problems, but the Chairman's answer is very appropriate. It is not only a question of being able, but being willing.

The Chairman: There are problems which do not apply to these witnesses, who are here not as citizens of one province but representing all. They know this is true.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): Your brief refers to "the cruel pressure of advertising". That is well put and I agree with it. What has been your experience in consumer training for poor people?

Miss VanLammers: The family agencies have certainly been involved in this, working also with credit unions. We have been involved in training credit union personnel to give some type of realistic consumer training. However, it starts with children being taught the value of money and goods by their parents and should be part of living and family life education in the school.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): Who is going to teach the parent? Do you ever follow a welfare recipient on her shopping?

Miss VanLammers: Yes, this is done through the Welfare Department and their teaching homemakers. They take them out and shop with them, teaching them to make out a shopping list and decide what is a good buy. They also train them to use the co-operative which is being developed in lower town.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): Is that done on a large scale or is it just beginning?

Mr. Levine: Yes, it is increasing. There is a neighbourhood program in Hamilton which instructs parents not only in child rearing but in home management, including budget planning and shopping trips. It is an increasing effort among social workers in which the whole area of family life is broadly interpreted.

Dr. Wharf: Good shopping depends upon having sufficient income to take advantage of sales and buying in bulk. Some of the most economically managed homes are those with freezers where meat can be bought in quantity, vegetables in season and stored. This is not available to those on assistance, no matter how astute they may be in devising meals to fit their income.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): Again you have points for argument. What is your philosophy with regard to buying now and paying later, which is so appealing to the poor people who cannot afford it?

Mr. Levine: This is referred to in the comments on advertising. It is not a helpful or productive aspect. It affects not only the poor, but other people in terms of the climate in which we find ourselves. There are so many pressures such as "fly now, buy now." It is not a question of whether it is necessary or within one's capacity.

Miss VanLammers: We conducted a survey in Ottawa which revealed that poor people are not so much in debt as are the middle and upper income groups.

The Chairman: Define middle income, roughly?

Miss VanLammers: Between $5,000 and $8,000.

The Chairman: Those in the middle of that bracket are in greater debt. That is the record.

Senator Pearson: The same situation prevailed in the rural areas of Saskatchewan where the land was not productive and farmers were poor. They were in less debt than those whose crops were bountiful. The latter were continually buying more expensive machinery.

Senator Fergusson: People and their children are bombarded with reasons why they should buy certain articles. This is sometimes hard to resist. Do you think the advertisers should have responsibility in this area?

Miss VanLammers: Definitely.

Dr. Wharf: The responsibility seems to be more in relation to selling their product than safeguarding public interest.

Miss VanLammers: They are directing their advertising to children, who maybe use the products but do not pay for them.

Mr. Calmain: Galbraith makes a good point with respect to that. He says it is simple psychological exploitation. You induce need and form your corporation around it.

The Chairman: The economy of the country just demands more and more of the same thing. It is unfortunate, but there it is.

Senator Fergusson: Perhaps there should be some education of the advertisers.

Senator McGrand: We have just been speaking about accommodation for the poor. Is there any way of building into housing projects at the time they are erected storage for vegetables in bulk, such as bags of potatoes or carrots, or frozen meat?

Dr. Wharf: Sure.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): Very cheaply.

Senator McGrand: But it is not done. Why is it not done? Apparently everybody agrees, so I will pass to another question. The matter of broken homes has been mentioned several times and discussed, and Senator Carter asked about the number of broken homes among the poor compared with those of the better off. What is the comparison in Sweden or New Zealand, where dire poverty has been eliminated? Have you any idea? I understand that in Sweden divorces are quite common, and a divorce must mean a broken home, to some extent, unless there is an immediate replacement.

Mr. Calmain: We do not have the actual figures, but I think the one basic difference in those countries is that the net of security, if I can term it that, is so much more fine, the mesh is more fine. When these unfortunate events occur, at least the disasters to the children or the people themselves are not so extreme, because of the much wider mesh net of social services. I think that is one of the crucial differences. I would not want to guess about the kind of society they have, whether that has a bearing on the rate of divorce or families breaking up.

Dr. Wharf: We would agree that a social problem such as the whole phenomenon of drug use among adolescents is not by any means restricted to the lower class. In fact, it may be more a middle class phenomenon. We argue that social problems reside only with the poor, but we say, as Mr. Calmain pointed out, that one is not an argument for the other, hat even if there are going to be social problems there is no reason why we should not take care of the income problem.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): Judy LaMarsh has the answer to that. Get married five years and have a broken home.

Senator Fergusson: In footnote No. 9, on page (ii), reference is made to Professor Kagan:

(He is quoted as saying, "We should think of changing the behaviour of the mothers of poor children during the first two years of the child's life.")

How in practice will you do that?

Mr. Levine: We made very brief allusions to some of the thrust around family life education, and Walter has done a variety of things in this particular community. This is one potential aspect of again trying to develop neighbourhood based programs, where young mothers have the opportunity of both preparation for having their children and then, as was said earlier, dealing with some of the stresses of first experiences.

Senator Fergusson: Will they accept this opportunity?

Mr. Levine: We have found that again it is a question of accessibility. It depends where it is. If it is to be a downtown centre or a suburban area, then of course not. Again using the limited experience we have had of the family service agency in Hamilton, where they have developed neighbourhood based programs in a church basement or a local shopping centre, they have waiting lists of young mothers who want to attend and participate.

Senator Fergusson: This is very interesting. I want to know whether these young mothers are willing to take this on.

Mr. McCallum: I think I can add to that from some experience we had last year in a program. Preschool children went three days a week in the mornings, and the mothers also attended. The mothers were involved in a family life education program. Unquestionably they are very responsive to it, and can with help carry out the suggestions made to them.

Senator Fergusson: That is very interesting. I should like to say something else that has nothing to do with the questions. On the back page of the brief there is a list of the board of directors of the Canadian Association of Social Workers. We have here this morning the president-elect, Mr. Levine, who has contributed a great deal to this discussion, but I do not know if it is realized that we also have here the president, Mr. Stubbins. I should also like to draw attention to fact that the executive secretary, Miss Florence Philpott, is with him. Miss Philpott is the sister of Elmer Philpott, who was a member of the House of Commons, and most of us knew him.

The Chairman: I am delighted that you have said that. You and I assumed that everybody knew this, but I am glad you have brought it to the attention of the committee.

Senator Fergusson: I do not think everybody did know it.

The Chairman: Mr. McCallum mentioned the ladies being willing to go to classes with the children. You will remember the Ottawa group who were before us, I think he was referring to the Ottawa group who were doing that kind of work.

Mr. McCallum: There are a number of groups in Ottawa involved in that. I am speaking of our own program with the Children's Aid Society.

The Chairman: This was not the Children's Aid. This was another group.

Mrs. VanLammers: The Family Service Centre.

The Chairman: The Family Service Centre. One of the members of our staff works amongst them, I remember that very well. We were talking about the demogrant and the negative income tax. Can you tell the committee why on balance the Americans, who entered into a new program, took the negative income tax rather than the demogrant? Secondly, even more important do you think that Canadian public opinion would stand for a cheque to any two millionaires in Canada—I will name a couple, Taylor and Roman who say they are millionaires—of, say, $3,000 a piece sent to them with the hope that we would retrieve it? Do you think public opinion would accept that?

Dr. Wharf: On the first question, my guess would be that the reason the United States have opted for the negative income tax is that the history of their programs has been in a selective rather than a universal area. I think that is consistent with their whole development. On the second question, I think an important part of any demogrant approach has to be tied in with taxation. Anything that sees demogrant going on a universal basis to very affluent people has to be, I feel, taxed back in order to recoup this. The basic advantage of the demogrant, as I see it, is that it does not differentiate at the point of application between the poor.

The Chairman: Do you think that people believe you tax back?

Mr. Levine: If we do they will.

The Chairman: Have we taxed back the money on Old Age Security? We said at that time that we would tax back that money, but have we done it? Of course we haven't, and you know that as well as I do.

Mr. Calmain: I do not think we have on any demogrant.

The Chairman: We did not suggest that, but we did say that on Old Age Security we would pay it to everybody and retrieve it you know as well as I do that we have not.

Mr. Calmain: I think this is borne out more emphatically and more demonstratively by the hearings before the United States Senate last year which was investigating the fact that innumerable millionaires paid no taxes at all.

The Chairman: Various senators have indicated to you the extent of appreciation which they have for the excellent brief you have presented to us. We expected excellence from you, because you are concerned with this problem. My own view is that in the days ahead, with appeal becoming more and more important and the rights of poor people being more recognized, the work and the importance of the social worker will grow. They will have to do social work rather than clerical work in order to justify being there at all. That is, of course, exactly what we want them to do. On behalf of the committee, I express my thanks to all of you.

The committee adjourned.

I. INTRODUCTION

The Canadian Association of Social Workers is a professional association of more than 3,500 social workers, with members in all provinces, the Yukon and the Northwest Territories. One of its purposes is to provide a means whereby social workers may take action on issues of social welfare.

Members of the Association have had close contact with the conditions of the poor and the consequences of poverty through employment in a wide range of social welfare agencies and government departments. A few of these are: Children's Aid Societies, Family Service Centres, Housing Authorities, vocational counselling agencies, various residential and correctional institutions, Day Care Centres, rehabilitation organizations and Community Planning Councils.

Many members have appeared before the Senate Committee, usually as representatives of employing agencies. They have presented, among other things, detailed information about welfare rate schedules and practices in their particular localities.

This Brief represents the views of the national professional association of social workers.

II. SUMMARY OF MAIN CONCLUSIONS AND RECOMMENDATIONS

A.

1. Not only the poor but all Canadians are a target for anti-poverty efforts; the attitudes of the majority set limits upon what can be done about poverty. (Paragraph 1, References 1 and 2).

2. Relative poverty is an important determinant of a sense of discontent. (Paragraphs 5 and 6).

3. The worst effects of long term poverty are on children. (Paragraph 10, Reference 9).

4. Despite all odds, many poor people are able to survive and to persevere because of unusual personal strengths and special talents. (Paragraph 11, Reference 10).

5. Canada, in comparison with some other countries, has done less than she should have done to reduce or eliminate poverty. (Paragraph 12, Reference 11).

6. The doctrine of "political democracy, high productivity and universal education" is insufficient to deal with poverty. (Paragraphs 3, 14, 15, 16, 17 References 12 and 13).

7. The too-exclusive emphasis upon economic incentives, as reflected in the welfare system and in the proposed tax reform, operates to limit assistance benefits to the poor and to limit taxes of the affluent. (Paragraphs 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 32).

8. Canada draws a sizeable amount of revenue from the poor through direct and indirect taxation. (Paragraphs 31, 32).

9. While awaiting a plan of guaranteed income improvements should be made in the present public assistance system. (Paragraphs 35, 36).

B. Recommendations

1. Income maintenance should be provided to those in need without conditions and administered with minimum investigation and the use of centralized computer procedures. (Paragraphs 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42).

2. Social services should be broadly expanded, extended to all, and well publicized. (Paragraphs 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49).

3. The provision of social services should be separated from the administration of financial aid. (Paragraphs 44, 45, 46, 47, 48).

4. Appeal procedures should be improved. (Paragraphs 53, 54, 55, 56, 57).

5. Development of a set of living standards adjusted regularly to keep pace with changing needs. (Paragraph 30).

6. Immediate upward adjustment of all benefits to low income groups (minimum wage, public assistance benefits, payments to aged, Family and Youth Allowances) to compensate for loss of purchasing power due to inflation. (In the five years ending 1969 there has been a 16.5% loss of purchasing power).

7. Regular adjustment of all benefits to low income groups to reflect changes in purchasing power and of living standards.

8. Reform of tax structure to reduce regressive elements and to follow more closely the principle of ability to pay.

9. Reduce financial barriers to education.

10. Early introduction of a program of Guaranteed Annual Income.

III. DEFINITION

1. Many worthwhile definitions of what constitutes poverty have been advanced by groups across Canada. Two concepts seem to us to be of special importance. The first,

"psychic poverty" emphasizes that we must not limit our concern exclusively to those with insufficient income, but that the broader public also constitutes a "target population" if we are to materially reduce or eliminate poverty³. Public attitudes set limits to what can be done. The second is the concept of a "poverty band" referred to in the submission of the Canadian Welfare Council. This idea, which extends the notion of specific levels of poverty, has great value because it focuses not only upon those with incomes below some particular limit, but also upon those close to it who must be kept in mind from a preventive point of view. It also provides some flexibility in thinking about such factors as family characteristics and geographic location.

2. We would like to develop three further points that should be made in reference to a definition of poverty.

3. First, although it is still popularly unrecognized, many of the poor are employed.³ They pay for various costs of employment such as work clothes, transportation, union dues, pensions, and contribute to unemployment insurance, various taxes and premiums. Therefore, the point to consider is their net, rather than gross incomes.

4. Second, any definition of poverty or description of poverty must be recognized as an abstraction from poverty as it is experienced. Poverty is a closed book to most people who have not experienced it. We cannot even "go and live with the poor" and thereby get the real gist of it. From time to time, newspaper reporters experiment with what it is like to try to live on an Old Age Pension or some similar allowance, for a month or so, and describe poverty out of their experiences. The trouble is that, however little money the reporter takes with him, however poor the clothes he wears or the food he eats, he knows that he can escape from the situation whenever he wishes. He simply has to go back to his office or to his home and call the whole thing off. Part of the vital difference of the fact of poverty is that the poor cannot call it off. They are in it, and for many of them there is no foreseeable way out. Not only do they lack "things" but they know that they will go on lacking them and for many of them their lives are, at best, tenuously held above disaster by the slenderest of threads. We mention this, not to deter anyone from learning as much as he can about poverty through first-hand contacts with the poor, but as a reminder that there are limits to what can be gained from that approach.

5. Third, we want to emphasize the concept of relative poverty and related psychological factors. For example, a few years ago an advertisement was current showing a picture of Caesar in his tent, writing his despatches by the light of a candle. The text explained that Caesar, for all his Legions, could command no more than feeble candle-light when night fell. This was contrasted with the cheap and effective light that most people could now afford. This illustrates an important point in our view—that in many respects the privation experienced by today's poor is less extreme in absolute terms than it was for yesterday's poor. Unhappily, this is hardly a source of joy for the now poor; they can get only limited happiness from turning on a light bulb. By the same token, the absence of this minimum convenience would be resented by today's poor. W. G. Runciman⁴ developed this theme that social discontent was based less on actual deprivation than on relative deprivation. The important factor is the degree to which those at the bottom of the pyramid feel that they are being treated unequally and that such treatment is undeserved. The way in which this is measured depends on the range of comparison with "reference groups". A starving man whose reference group is exclusively that of other starving men may have few complaints against the society that permits starvation. The wealthy man whose reference group is exclusively men more affluent than he is may be discontented. We may be reasonably satisfied that neither Caesar nor anyone else in his time felt unfairly treated by the absence of electric light. We are probably all agreed that now it would be regarded as a deprivation, as wholly undeserved, and the cause of considerable discontent. Similarly, other material advantages—television, cars, washing machines, toasters—have come to be expected as part of an accepted standard of life.

6. Obviously, poverty hurts when physical privation is extreme, but it also hurts when there is a clear gulf between "haves" and "have nots", when there is forced attention to this gulf and when the disparity is thought to be unjust and/or avoidable. Since poverty is relative, it inevitably raises the issue of equity. This is referred to in a later part of this Brief.

7. Allowing for these points, then, we find it useful to accept as a common reference point the (revised) levels of poverty proposed by the Economic Council of Canada.⁵

IV. THE EFFECTS OF POVERTY UPON THE POOR

8. In our changing society, some things do not change. Bernard Shaw, writing in 1905 (Preface to Major Barbara), refers to the "silly levity with which we tolerate poverty" and continues:

... If a man is indolent, let him be poor. If he is a drunkard, let him be poor. If he is addicted to the fine arts or to pure science instead of to trade and finance, let him be poor. If he chooses to spend his wages on his beer and his family instead of saving it up for his old age, let him be poor. Let nothing be done for the "undeserving"; let him be poor. Serve him right!

Now what does this Let Him Be Poor mean? It means let him be weak. Let him be ignorant. Let him become a nucleus of disease. Let him be a standing exhibition and example of ugliness and dirt. Let him have rickety children. Let him be cheap, and drag his fellows down to his own price by selling himself to do their work. Let his habitations turn our cities into poisonous congeries of slums. ... Let "the undeserving" become still less deserving; and let the deserving lay up for himself not treasures in heaven, but horrors in hell upon earth...

The crying need of the nation is not for better morals, cheaper bread, temperance, liberty, culture, redemption of fallen sisters and erring brothers, nor the grace, love and fellowship of the Trinity, but simply for enough money. And the evil to be attacked is not sin, suffering, greed, priestcraft, kingcraft, demagoguery, monopoly, ignorance, drink, war, pestilence, nor any of the other consequences of poverty, but just poverty itself.

9. It would be impossible to list all of the effects of poverty upon the people who endure it. For the most desperately poor, those caught in a cycle of poverty, there is virtually no aspect of their lives or the lives of their families that is unaffected. Each consequence becomes in part a new cause, with the final result that the individual feels overwhelmed with a sense of utter powerlessness and worthlessness. "We are born poor and will stay poor, ain't nothing we can do to change it,"⁶ as one welfare recipient put it.

For people in that position, the entire structure of society seems to conspire to keep them there. As D. Caplovitz⁷ established (in his study of the same title), the poor pay more; very often substantially more. "The low income person often lacks self confidence and has a low level of self esteem, characteristics which make him vulnerable to the blandishments of salesmen who induce him to buy by flattering his ego. He is prone to impulse buying and vulnerable to fraud and deception." Social workers are familiar with some of the predicaments of the poor in the marketplace: the gouging slum landlords; the debt-riddled installment-buying poor putting off the day of reckoning by "consolidating their debts"; the cruel pressure of advertising⁸, creating the desire, especially pronounced in children, for goods that should not be bought; inflation that reduces the purchasing power of the poor who are usually on fixed incomes if they are employed, or fixed pensions or welfare benefits if they are not.

10. The barriers that poverty presents in terms of housing, neighbourhood, post-secondary education and hence well-paying jobs, have all been documented in numerous reports and demographic studies and we believe there is little to add to that pool of information. We believe it is less popularly recognized that prolonged poverty, with its anxiety and worry, may have destructive psychological consequences upon the adult poor and to an even greater degree upon their children.⁹

11. Of course, it is very important to note that large numbers of the poor have at least retained the dignity of employment, even though it may be sporadic or part-time and at deplorable wages. Moreover, social workers know from their experience that many of the poor have strengths and capacities that have helped them to face odds that would surely have crushed many of those who have never had to face them.¹⁰

V. THE VALUE ISSUES

12. Canada, with one of the highest per capita standards of living in the world, is in an economic position to eliminate poverty—at least in terms of the levels of the Economic Council. It appears to us that there is no doubt that the basic issue is one of values and whether the Canadian public wishes to remove poverty from our national life. There are many indications that it does not. Several countries, some with far less in the way of natural resources than Canada, have directed much more effort toward their poverty problems. Some—Sweden is an example—have to all intents and purposes eliminated poverty.¹¹

13. The Association believes that Canada may have relied too exclusively upon what has been termed "the three pillars of liberal doctrine, namely, political democracy, high productivity and universal education". The limitations of this doctrine and at least some of the reasons for its failure are clear. First, high productivity as a goal in itself is almost meaningless without reference to the form of distribution of that productivity. It is entirely possible that every year could see higher records of GNP and worse poverty. If we distribute income inequitably, then the concept of universal education also tends to be less meaningful, particularly as the demands for increased levels of education are constantly raised, along with the time and money consumed in its attainment.

"Families earning less than $6,000 cannot ordinarily handle the expenses associated with university education and families earning less than $3,000. cannot always handle the expenses associated with a complete high school education. The high cost of specialized education together with the existing high degree of income inequality perpetuates the great gap of earnings by restricting the supply of highly paid specialists and maintaining the excess numbers of unskilled and poorly educated who compete for low paying jobs in primary, manufacturing and service industries."¹²

14. As we might expect, the other pillar, political democracy, is vastly compromised by the facts of poverty. The comment has been made at earlier meetings of this Committee that more submissions by or representations of the poor would be desirable. We agree entirely. Considering the large numbers of poor people in Canada, and how great their stake in the matter, it has been a relatively small, though very valuable, showing. For most of the poor, however, the Chairman has put it well: "poverty is a full-time job". It drains off time and energy and people are necessarily preoccupied with the problems of the moment. As a result, governments have attended to the interests of more politically active elements of the community.

15. A typical case in point is the public discussion we have heard about the White Paper for Tax Reform. To date the vocal groups have been middle and upper income classes who have a particular advantage to seek or to preserve. Because they are often highly trained and can devote time to this "problem" or hire specialists to do so for them, their position has been strongly presented and defended. By contrast, the interests of the poor, though the issues vitally concern them, have not been advanced. The poor are in roughly the same position to the political system as they are to the marketplace and for roughly the same reasons. Thus while it may be debated that there has been some improvement, it still appears to be true that the political system responds very feebly to the needs of the large numbers of poor simply because they are less able to raise their interests to positions of priority in competition with the interests of others.¹³

16. In the opinion of the Association, the three-part doctrine is highly incompatible with the premise that people are of value just because they are human beings. The emphasis upon productivity inevitably means that less productive people are penalized, and for this there is only the shakiest justification. Raymond Williams has put the point very neatly: "It is not an argument against women's suffrage that women are physically weaker than men, nor an argument for slavery that men differ in intelligence... nor finally, is it an argument for inequality that it is supported by "economic law"; these "laws are relative to circumstances and institutions and these are determined by the values, preferences, interests and ideals which rule a any moment in a given society".¹⁴ It is obvious that the vast bulk of the poor are not poor voluntarily. It should not be a basis for exacting the penalty of poverty that this one has an IQ of 80 rather than 120, or that one has skills that have been made obsolete by advancing technology, or that others are single parents with dependent children. Despite research evidence to the contrary¹⁵, it has become part of our folk-lore to talk glibly of people squandering welfare benefits; we scarcely notice how readily we squander human potential. But even if there were no economic returns from refusing to waste such potential, even if the Economic Council had not estimated a "lost output" of something ranging from "just below $1 billion to something in the order of $2 to $2½ billion"¹⁶ it would still be grossly wrong to do so. This understandably, causes people to lose faith in their system of government or become hostile or alienated towards it.

17. Another closely related doctrine that prevails in our society is the theme of the ladder of opportunity. This ladder is more a promise than a reality for many of the poor, educational and other costs are often prohibitive and there seems to be little recognition of the help that many people need to get started. Nonetheless, it is a part of common doctrine and, in fact, does provide an exit from poverty for some. Sometimes special advantages of good fortune, good health, vigour, unique personal contacts and fortuitous opportunities can protect individuals from the worst consequences of long-term poverty and prepare them for the escape from it, despite all the odds. Unhappily, the ascent up the ladder is usually a solitary one for an individual and perhaps his immediate family. Nobody would quarrel with the good fortune of such individuals who are able to make use of such ladders as, for example, the increasing opportunity of student loans. But it is futile to pretend that the existence of the means of escape for these people is sufficient to justify the neglect or scapegoating of the group as a whole. The scapegoating that does, in fact, occur merely serves to emphasize the feelings of worthlessness of the poor towards themselves and intensify the isolation and loss of "sense of community".

18. The domestic unrest that has convulsed the U.S.A. in the past five years and which has involved many poor people, may be prompting some re-appraisal of the values of their culture. Among the many studies that have been recently made is a President's Commission Report on the Causes of Violence. Among the things it found was strong tradition of violence in the U.S.A. which has been popularly paraphrased in the expression "violence is as American as apple pie". While we are thankful that Canada has not yet had cause to establish similar Commissions, we are discovering that economic and social injustice is as Canadian as the maple leaf. For example, while reports such as those of the Economic Council of Canada describe the fact of widespread poverty in Canada so clearly, we have not even been able to take sufficient measures to protect low incomes from the effects of inflation.

19. Financial Expressions of our Value System as Raymond Williams observes in our earlier quotation, economic circumstances are determined in large measure by the values, preferences, interests and ideals which rule at any moment in a given society. We believe that this is generally so, and have made references where different value systems elsewhere have resulted in large applications of the national effort toward the reduction and/or elimination of poverty.

20. In this context, we believe it is necessary to refer to some of the values and assumptions in our society that underlie two financial activities—providing public welfare benefits and collecting taxes.

21. One of the implicit assumptions appears to be that economic incentives are a sufficient determinant of behaviour to guide policy. In the field of public welfare it has been traditionally assumed that if people could receive from welfare benefits any approximation of what they could earn if they were employed, they would refuse to work. In order to maintain an "incentive" to get off welfare, benefits were kept very low indeed and severe constraints were applied to any extra income the poor might gain for themselves.

22. This interpretation of motivation conflicts with the experience of social workers who know that most people struggle to stay off welfare even, in some cases, when the need is extreme. Peitchinis' research in Calgary¹⁷ showed that fewer than 5 per cent of those on welfare were employable. His study also showed that a common response of many people eligible for welfare seemed to be "no thank you, we will manage somehow". A more recent illustration can be drawn from the partial reports of the New Jersey experiment.¹⁸ Tentative results show that, for better or worse, low-income American families are gripped by the familiar puritan work ethic; that grants or supplements to incomes are not squandered and that far from becoming loafers, the former poor become more productive than ever when measured against control groups. Furthermore, "job stability" was designated as twice as important as any other aspect of a desired job by the recipient group, and 60 per cent indicated they would work at two jobs to improve their status.

23. In the collection of taxes we again see a reliance upon the incentive concept, only now it serves to limit taxation rates of the wealthy. It is assumed, for example, in the recent tax proposals¹⁹ that if marginal income tax rates exceed 50 per cent (plus proposed capital gains tax), "incentive" and productivity will fall off:

"Taxes, by their nature, cannot always promote all our economic goals, but they should interfere as little as possible with incentives to work and invest and with the directions our economy follows in meeting demands of consumers and foreign markets. Some proposals in this paper are intended to ensure that the incentive to work and invest is not unduly inhibited, that investments needed for productivity and public purposes are not rejected in favour of less desirable alternatives just because of their tax consequences."²⁰

"One economic issue is the influence of the proposed tax changes on the efforts men and women put into their work. Will they work as much of the year, or work as hard, if taxes change? Here there are many individual observations, opinions and experience and some fairly evident arguments. The higher a man's income the less he needs additional income and therefore the less he needs to work harder. On the other hand, he is likely to be a person who will work hard anyway. The higher the total tax a man pays, the more he needs to work or get a better job to support himself and his family, and to attain his other material objectives. The higher the tax he must pay on anything extra he earns—his marginal rate of tax—the less inducement there is to work longer or harder to earn more."²¹

24. These are doubtful propositions judging from experience elsewhere. For example, Douglas Fullerton reports of Sweden:

"By North American standards the rates of tax are brutal. Progressivity is steep, and has been accentuated over the past decade by inflation. . . . On income alone, national and local combined, a single man earning $10,000 pays $4,500 in taxes; his marginal rate is 55 per cent. A married man earning $20,000 pays half his income in taxes; his marginal rate is 63 per cent. Capital gains are taxed (100 per cent on securities held under two years) on a scale reducing with length of time the asset is held. On top of this are special "net wealth" taxes—a capital levy—ranging up to 1.8 per cent per annum on assets in excess of $200,000."²²

25. Speculating on why these rates of taxation has not led to a brain drain of professional people, Fullerton attributed it to the roots that a person has in his own country and with his friends, the high status that the professions are accorded in Sweden and the rapidity with which bright young people can reach positions of authority. He asks "with higher monetary rewards almost taxed away in Sweden, what provides the incentives to better performance? Have we North Americans maybe overemphasized higher pay as an incentive in our economic system?" We believe this may very well be the case.

26. There is even more support for a complex interpretation of human motivation in the studies and writings of social scientists. The reputable British industrial psychologist, J. A. C. Brown,²³ lists five points of broad current acceptance:

"Concerning incentives in general, the following facts are significant:

(1) There is no one ideal incentive. Incentives vary from one culture, from one firm to another, from one individual to another, (e.g., one man may value money while another may find greater leisure or opportunity for promotion a more powerful stimulus).

(2) The law of diminishing returns applies to all material incentives—that is to say, as reward increases the desire for further reward decreases until it reaches vanishing point (e.g., as G. R. Taylor points out, the miners, on getting higher rates of pay, increased their rate of absence because the point had been reached at which the need for more money had become secondary to the need for more leisure).

(3) Incentives may conflict with other motives.

(4) Without exception, all industrial psychologists are agreed that money is of much less significance than has hitherto been supposed. Except under conditions when wages are very low or during periods of inflation, money is one of the least powerful incentives.

(5) On the other hand, we must remember that in our own culture, as Taylor has noted, motives tend to become "monetized". "People have been taught that money is the key to satisfaction, so when they feel that something is wrong with their lives, they naturally ask for more money. A demand for money undoubtedly indicates that they want something, but it does not tell us what."

27. Other submissions to this Committee have made the point that little can be done about poverty without a price tag being attached to the efforts. This is notably true of the recommendations we make later in this Brief. They will certainly cost money. The raising of this money, the determination of priorities for its allocation and the necessity (which the Chairman has repeatedly observed) for greater income redistribution to the poor, are all cardinal issues.

28. As social workers, we agree wholeheartedly with such stated aims of tax reform as "a fair distribution of the tax burden based upon ability to pay; steady economic growth and continuing prosperity; the recognition of modern social needs..."²⁴; the acknowledgment that "many of the wealthy in our society have benefited unduly"²⁵; the indication that 750,000 lower income people would be removed from the tax rolls and that there would be tax reductions for others; that there would be tax allowances for child care and employment expense; that new revenues would be raised from taxes on capital gains and, generally, new levels of taxation from those able to pay.

29. At the same time as social workers generally welcome these principles and urge that revenues will be used for attacking our serious social problems, questions arise about how far the proposals will go to meet the need; that is, how serious we really are. For example, even if the proposed exemption levels of $1,500 for a single person and $2,900 for a married couple is enacted in the future, it must be noted that the poverty levels of the Economic Council are even now above these exemptions. Is it really wise to tax the incomes of the poor at all? And is it really wise to tax the near-poor—those who do not quite fall below the poverty line but who are close to it and give substance to the "poverty band" concept?

30. In relation to this issue the Association notes and endorses the recommendation in the Fifth Annual Report of the Economic Council of Canada that a set of differential living standards be developed as early as possible. For example, the U. S. Bureau of Labor Statistics developed three standards of living, described as moderate, lower and higher, for an urban family of four persons. In the spring of 1967 the national average cost of the moderate budget was $9,076. per year and the lower was $5,915. per year. Such standards are very useful if we are to help those most in need. They could provide a basis of comparison of income needs between regions and between urban and rural locations, and while it is clear that these basic living standards would have to be kept under constant review to reflect changing needs, this effort would be well repaid in terms of guiding the application of tax exemptions or a system of tax credits. Further, they could be used to derive the size of a basic demogrant or the upper and lower limits of a negative income tax scheme of guaranteed annual income. Applying the point to the present issue of income tax, it is our view that income taxes should at least not be imposed on the "lower" standard of living, whatever that might prove to be.

31. Those who are concerned with poverty in Canada must, of necessity, be concerned with the host of regressive taxes such as sales taxes and premiums, that bear so heavily upon the poor relative to their resources and, in effect, operate to keep them poor. It is obvious that reform of this system of taxation, perhaps by tax credits of some sort, would help the poor a great deal. It is distressing to learn that

"general sales taxes are employed extensively by both Federal and provincial governments and now yield approximately $4 billion. For most Canadians they are equivalent to a combined retail rate ranging from about 13 per cent to over 16 per cent and applied to nearly all purchases except foods. They have been increased in recent years..."²⁶ and that despite this heavy burden on the poor "reform of the sales tax is less urgent and can be undertaken after action on the proposals in this paper".²⁷

32. We have chosen just a few illustrations to demonstrate that first, Canada has a significant reliance upon low income groups for the provision of tax revenues. (It may also be noted that the taxes paid by the poor and near-poor help to finance items that they are seldom able to use—items as diverse as universities or the National Arts Centre—because of the entrance costs.) Second, some policies seem to be guided by oversimplified interpretations of incentive and motivation which operate against redistribution by keeping both welfare rates of the poor and taxes of the wealthy low. Further, Canada has not embraced the idea of empirical testing to determine at just what levels of taxation certain suspected consequences will occur. For example, experiments designed to improve our knowledge of the effect on work incentives of various combinations of a basic income guarantee seem notably absent. Also, there seems to be no inclination to investigate more carefully the effects of higher rates of taxation on motivations and incentives of upper income groups.

33. Finally, the Association believes that it is necessary to question the wisdom of focusing tax comparisons primarily upon American practice. While there are many things we can continue to learn from the United States, they have failed to solve distributional problems and have continued to suffer for it in many ways. The choices they could have made as opposed to the ones they are making are outlined in a striking feature editorial of the Christian Science Monitor, January 9, 1970. (The Economic Story, R. L. Strout). Relying in part upon references to Arthur M. Okum, former member of the Council of Economic Advisers, the editorial states that:

"The United States tends to 'spend' its prosperity for tax cuts instead of for social programs for the cities and such like. This is fine for middle and upper classes, but hard on the poor, at least by European standards. The money ends up in the private sector (cars, night clubs, chewing gum) instead of the public sector (mass transport, slum clearance, police). For 1966, United States taxes (and this includes federal, state and local) were about 28.1 percent of national product (GNP). What is the story in Europe?

For Italy the comparable figure was 29.1 percent; for the United Kingdom, 31.3 percent; for West Germany, 34.9 percent; for France, 38.6 percent.

In other words, if total undistributed national product is thought of as a pie, the slice cut out from it for overall taxes in these four European countries averages just about one-third (33.5 per cent). This is 5.4 percentage points above the United States. The difference isn't large? Well, it amounts to $50 billion applied to total United States 1969 production. That is a man-sized chunk of money in anybody's reckoning. Apply it, for example, to poverty. If it were possible to identify all Americans below the statistical poverty line today, and simply hand them enough dollars to raise their incomes up to the line, 'it would take only $10 billion to eliminate poverty' says Mr. Okum. That would be the annual theoretical cost—$10 billion.

And having done that there would still be $40 billion left."

34. If we are to be influenced in our tax policies by comparisons with other nations we submit that it should be with flourishing countries such as Sweden who have used taxation to provide a base for the establishment of a high quality of social legislation and the discharge of social responsibilities to human beings.

VI. THE CURRENT PUBLIC ASSISTANCE SYSTEM—SUGGESTIONS FOR IMPROVEMENT

25. We want to emphasize that current levels of public assistance do not provide an adequate standard of living. Moreover, the provisions of the Canada Assistance Plan are under utilized by provinces and municipalities.

36. The Association favours a guaranteed annual income in principle. However, in the expectation that Canada's decision on the subject may take some time, the Association also wishes to suggest a number of improvements and targets for the present public assistance system. They could be useful antecedents of a guaranteed annual income plan and progress need not await all the decisions about choice of method and mechanism that would be involved in such a plan.

37. First, on the subject of income maintenance, the Association believes that it should be made available to those in need. Acceptance of such assistance should not be made conditional upon accepting counselling, day care for children, job training or other social services. While asserting this right to assistance, the Association recognizes that the expectation that individuals assume responsibility for their support is valid and appropriate provided that opportunity for self-support is available. Income maintenance programs should be administered with a minimum of investigation with regard to both initial and continuing eligibility. It should also be administered through centralized operations, utilizing electronic data processing methods. Second, on the subject of social services (counselling, day care, homemaker services, recreational programs), the Association believes that they should be available to all on request, regardless of income and place of residence, though they should be adapted to the needs and requirements of local communities. The availability of these services should be well publicized.

38. The Right to Income One of the cardinal principles of social work practice is that of self-determination; the belief that all people have a right to determine the course of their lives within the laws laid down by society. To require that persons receiving financial assistance accept some form of social service violates this principle and may infringe on the civil liberties of welfare recipients. Canada has endorsed Articles 22 and 25 of the 1948 United Nations' Universal Declaration of Human Rights. In these terms, assistance is a matter of right regardless of the applicant's personal circumstances and attitudes, not a matter of grudging assent with strings attached.

39. At a more practical level, requiring that a recipient receive counselling or job training or report regularly at Manpower offices, as a condition of receiving public assistance, may carry the implication that the person is not interested or capable of sorting out his own affairs or becoming self-sufficient. Such an implication can result in a self-fulfilling prophecy in that the recipient, recognizing that he is viewed as being irresponsible, accepts the judgment and behaves accordingly. This is not meant to argue against social services (as described later). Our point is that making the most effective use of such programs largely depends on personal initiative and involvement. It cannot be legislated or required by fiat. Furthermore, the expectation that all citizens can find work at adequate salary levels at a time when a high level of unemployment is apparently either beyond federal control or a policy choice, is ludicrous. The attempt to enforce this expectation is often wasteful of workers' time and destructive of recipients.²⁸

40. Reduction of Investigation Procedures The popular image of the welfare chiselers, both those who could work but don't and those who live royally on welfare by exploiting the system, is, in fact, just a myth. It is well established that the vast majority receiving assistance cannot work because of age, disability, sickness, death or desertion of the bread-winner, or because of child care responsibilities.²⁹

41. We should also point to the high costs of maintaining the investigatory function of income maintenance programs. Welfare department personnel spend the greater part of their time determining initial and continuing eligibility. Since all known studies have reported that only a small percentage of recipients falsify information, the emphasis on detailed investigations appears to be very costly—in terms of both time and money—as well as unnecessarily demeaning to the recipients. Reports of the New Jersey experiment in guaranteed annual income indicate that recipients can and do manage to complete fairly detailed reporting forms on their own without the customary eligibility checks by welfare department personnel, and the tentative results indicate that "cost of administration per family ranges from $72. to $96. compared with $200. to $300. per family under the present composite welfare program".³⁰

42. In view of this, the Association takes the position that detailed investigations be discontinued. Self declaration procedures should be instituted and only where language or health factors make self declaration impossible would public welfare staff complete the required forms. Continuing eligibility could be maintained in the same fashion with recipients mailing reports on a regular basis to report on their circumstances. A procedure of random checking, along the lines of the Income Tax system, might be instituted. A precedent for this exists in the present Guaranteed Income Supplement. Such a system would lend itself to centralized and computerized operations. There would appear to be some need for continuing public assistance departments to provide emergency aid and during the period required for processing.

43. Social Services. The Association believes that social services should also be available to all who request such services. In order for this goal to be achieved it is necessary that the services be readily available from a geographic point of view, that their existence be broadly known, that they be attuned to the distinctive needs of the neighbourhoods in which they are located and that there be a degree of local control. While this is not the place to give an extensive outline regarding the delivery of social services, we generally support Martin Rein's position that services be organized around transition points in life—i.e., times at which most people experience difficulties in adjusting to changes in roles—adolescence, marriage, old age.³¹ One of the most promising programs of the Office of Economic Opportunity in the U.S.A. was the establishment of multi-service centres in low income neighbourhoods where social services were woefully inadequate. These centres provided a variety of services ranging from job placement to day care programs to legal aid. Some applications of the same approach to the provision of service through such multi-service centres have shown promise in Canada as well. It must not be overlooked, however, that one of the major requirements of any service delivery system is that it have sufficient staff with sufficient training. This has been one of the major shortcomings of most public assistance departments where, as a consequence, social services have been rather nominal.

44. The Association considers that the provision of social services should be clearly separated from the administration of financial aid. There are four main arguments to support this.

45. As we have noted earlier, it seems most logical to administer financial aid programs through a centralized office to take advantage of computer procedures and the mail as the delivery system. By contrast, social services should, desirably, be located within "pram-pushing distance" of consumers. Thus two separate administrative structures are desirable.

46. Second, even where local public assistance departments might be necessary to provide emergency aid it is desirable to keep the two functions separated since the provision of financial aid tends to overwhelm the provision of social services.

47. Third, the relationship between a recipient of welfare assistance and a representative of the public assistance department may incline toward authority in control on the one hand, and dependency on the other. Where present, these elements are not conducive to establishing a helping relationship of mutual trust, respect and freedom to discuss personal problems.

48. Finally, social services and financial assistance programs do not always serve the same populations. Some people require material aid but do not need social services, and vice versa.

49. The Association recognizes that to bring the standard of social services to an effective level will require a major input of resources and the co-operation of all levels of government.

50. Accountability in Public Assistance. Social policy objectives are established by a political process that tends to respond to the value system of the more articulate middle and upper income groups. It is in the context of the objectives so established that the welfare system and the necessary bureaucratic structures (in the governmental and non-governmental sectors) have emerged.

51. It has been argued that "the problem with changing the welfare system is not that the present system does not work but rather that it does".⁸² It works to the advantage of the "input" constituency—the taxpayers—by ensuring that only the most economically deprived qualify for financial assistance, thus keeping expenditures at the lowest possible level. A system which rigorously scrutinizes applications and provides inadequate allowance for those who qualify, cannot be considered to be accountable to the "output" constituency—the clients or recipients of public assistance. Hence it is hardly surprising that those administering the system are regarded with hostility.

52. It is often a characteristic of bureaucratic structure that innovation is difficult to achieve and inflexibility may tend to become deep-rooted. A capacity to innovate needs to be consciously built into the administrative structure of the welfare system if it is to become more responsive and accountable to the needs of those who require service. Specific provision should be made within the structure for functions such as research and planning and for the participation by users of service in the determination of policy.

53. Appeal Review Boards and Organizations of Welfare Recipients. With the present limited accountability to recipients, it is especially important to provide as many protections as possible. Two such mechanisms—Appeal Review Boards and organizations of welfare recipients appear to hold promise for improving accountability.

54. The requirement of the Canada Assistance Plan that Appeal Boards be established is a very important principle though its implementation has been slow and is still incomplete. The Association believes that another very important principle is that Appeal Boards should include besides citizen knowledgeable in social welfare activities some representation of the consumers of service.

55. The Association recommends that records of the proceedings be taken, and that the results of appeals be distributed—with the name of the recipient being withheld. It is vital that decisions of precedents established by Review Boards be made known to all welfare departments, to members of the social work and legal professions and to the general public. Perhaps most important of all arrangements must be devised for the feedback of appeal decisions into the administrative and legislative processes. Otherwise Board decisions would affect only the particular case under review, whereas it is apparent that some decisions will have wide applicability; for example, decisions affecting male boarders, and the provision of emergency assistance.

56. One of the problems that can occur in appeals is the need for sustenance during the course of an appeal. The Association would recommend that, in the event of an appeal based on the reduction or termination of benefits, the benefit period be extended until the hearing is completed.

57. It is necessary to extend the right of appeal not only to situations where an applicant has been refused consideration or improperly rejected, or awarded an allowance at too low a level, but also to include such situations as delay in providing benefits or improper treatment by staff. Since a right to appeal is meaningless if it is not known to the users of service, information on the grounds for appeal should be widely publicized.

58. Experience both in Canada and the United States indicates that organized client groups can effectively pressure public welfare authorities into making needed changes in application processing and reducing discriminatory practices. In addition, there appear to be psychological gains for participants of such organizations. A study of welfare recipients in Wisconsin showed that "organizational affiliation plays an important role in reducing feelings of powerlessness among the welfare poor".⁸³ Specifically, the members of organized client groups had a less fatalistic attitude towards life, expressed more sense of control over their lives and participated more actively in politics than other welfare recipients who did not belong to organized groups. The Association believes that client groups may achieve considerable results in stimulating much needed involvement and participation by welfare recipients in their own and community affairs.

59. The Association believes that funds should be made available to such groups through provincial legislation, in the expectation that welfare service provision of Canada Assistance Plan would be available for cost-sharing.

60. Just as governments need opposition parties to serve as a check and a balancing force, so do public institutions require countervailing forces to ensure accountability.

¹Brief of Mr. David Critchley, social worker with the Maritime School of Social Work, to the Special Senate Committee on Poverty, No. 2, November 4, 1969. This Brief expressed concern for the psychic health of the entire nation, noting the indifference displayed towards the suffering of others.

²C.A.S.W. acknowledges the problem posed in several of the hearings by the Chairman and other Senators, namely, how to get the public to share our perceptions of the problem of poverty so that we can do something about it. This appears to be fundamental. Often it is obscured by the use of the terms "we" (the respectables) and "they" (the poor) about which Bernard Beck states:

"The consensus implied by WE is rarely borne out by the facts. It is misleading to make plans that WE can use in dealing with THEM, because the major problems for poverty warriors are not negotiating with the poor, but negotiating with various sectors of the respectable society which are supposedly our teammates in WE... In truth, the only WE we belong to is the relatively small and powerless (though somewhat influential) one containing those who are professionally or culturally involved in the social progress ideology. ... A good deal of the attention devoted to helping the poor and planning for them should be diverted to helping respectable people so that they discover the benefits of allowing the poor to re-enter society." Bedbugs, Stench, Dampness and Immorality: A Review Essay on Recent Literature About Poverty, Bernard Beck, Journal of the Society for the Study of Social Problems, Volume 15, No. 1.

If we may borrow a succinct phrase from the comic-strip character, Pogo, "We have met the enemy and he is us". The target population must not be limited to the poor.

⁸⁴"Two other especially important points were that 76% of poor families at the time of the 1961 census had one or more earners in the family, and that 66% of poor families obtained most of their income from wages, salaries and self-employment. These two percentages must be rammed home again and again to the Canadian public. They identify the phenomenon of the working poor, who together with those others who are in the labour force but unemployed and take jobs when they can find them, turn out to be most of our poor family heads."—from a speech by D. L. McQueen, Professor of Economics, York University, to the Provincial Council of Women; The Ontario Welfare Reporter, Winter 1969.

⁵The revised "poverty lines" of the Economic Council in dollars of 1968 purchasing power are: $1,800. per year per single person; $3,000. for a family of two; $3,600. for a family of three; $4,200. for a family of four; and $4,800. for a family of five. Allowing for 5% reduction in purchasing power due to inflation in 1969, the new levels would be: $1,890., $3,150., $3,780., $4,410., $5,040., just to stay even.

⁸J. K. Galbraith is one of those economists who emphasize the role of advertising in the fundamental structuring of our society. Another is C. W. Gonick, M.L.A. (Manitoba) who describes some of the social consequences in his article Poverty, Canadian Dimension, Volume VI, No. 6, October-November 1969, page 32:

"Morning-to-night day-in and day-out advertising so influences our values as to create a craze for private consumer goods and a hostility toward public consumer goods. More funds allocated to schools, parks, recreation centres, low-cost housing are thus looked upon as burdens because they take income away from the things we have learned to crave. Within this social climate, the politician who advocates more public spending is a wastrel, while the politician who advocates balanced budgets and cut-backs in the public sphere is sound and responsible."

⁹One of the more influential authors on the subject of early deprivation, Dr. John Bowlby, writes in Child Care and the Growth of Love (Penguin Books) that "the difficulty for deprived children to become successful parents is perhaps the most damaging of all effects of deprivation".

More recently research on this subject of early deprivation has been conducted by Professor Jerome Kagan of Harvard University Department of Social Relations. His and many other studies indicate the not-too-surprising necessity of very early environmental change if handicaps associated with poverty are to be avoided. (He is quoted as saying "We should think of changing the behavior of the mothers of poor children during the first two years of the child's life"; Globe & Mail, July 10, 1969). The celebrated Head Start program are seen as too little and too late and the direction the research points toward is either intensive and supportive child-rearing education or else highly trained teachers operating with very young children in Kibbutz-like day care centres.

All the findings on the long-term consequences of early neglect, psychological and physical, suggest the fundamental economy in social and economic terms of investment in early preventive measures.

¹⁰There are many sources of confirmation for these points:

"In all societies—if present psychological testing may be extrapolated—there are more talented, in absolute numbers, born into the lower social strata than into the upper; every detailed study of a class system describes how the upper strata prevent the lower from acquiring the skills appropriate for higher level jobs. This effort alone is a good indicator that the upper strata include many who are less talented. For example, the Southerner as well as the Northerner would not even need to discriminate against the Negro child or man if in fact he were always untalented; performance alone would demonstrate his inferiority. The same proposition holds for the poor generally, for Jews (as in banking or heavy industry), for women, and (in some circles) for Catholics." W. J. Goode, The Protection of the Inept, American Sociological Review, Volume 32, Feb. 1967, pages 5-19.

As the title implies, the same article explores how upper-class inept are protected and "insulated" from competition on merit, with members of lower classes. We refer to this, not necessarily objecting to the protection of the inept, but focusing on its differential application and its denial, as far as the poor are concerned, to both the inept and the talented.

¹¹Douglas Fullerton, Chairman of the National Capital Commission, returned from a visit to Sweden in the summer of 1969 to write a series of articles for the Ottawa Citizen. He observed in the final article: "The similarities between our two countries are great: same average income, much the same cold climate, geography and topography, equivalent importance of primary industry such as pulp and paper, and mining, and reliance on export trade. Both of us are located on the northern flank of a powerful neighbor (in their case, the Common Market)" and suggested that one of the things we could learn from the Swedish example was that "greater equality in incomes is possible without affecting incentives—but we need not (and should not) go as far as the Swedes in using the income tax as an equalizing weapon. But extremes of income are rare in Sweden—and poverty almost non-existent."

A further point is that many of the differences that do exist between the two countries are in Canada's favour. Our natural resources are greater, for example, and the proportion of aged Swedes is much higher than in Canada. (1964 rates of adults age 70 and over, per 1000 of population, show Sweden with 82, Canada with 50 and U.S.A. with 61.)

Also, it is instructive to observe the practical concern for the welfare of people which contrasts with so much (though not all) of our own legislation. "An innovation in the Public Welfare Act that after July 1, 1968, the local public welfare board must search out persons who are in need, even if they do not themselves apply for help; anyone, not necessarily an official, can report need to the social agency." Social Welfare in Sweden, Kirstin Lindholm; International Social Work, Volume XII, No. 4, 1969.

"There is no absolute or precise measurement of standards of living. Quality of public transportation and wealth of museums are part of it, just as much as wage levels. The United States still has the highest wage levels. But public health is far ahead in all the European countries—East or West.

"Taking everything into account, the standard of living of the average individual is highest in the Scandinavian countries, Switzerland and the Netherlands—even though the individual wage level is lower than in the United States. These countries all have eliminated poverty and unnecessary misery. There simply are no slums comparable with those which disgrace many of America's great cities and some of its more backward rural areas." (Harsch, Joseph C., Special Correspondent, Christian Science Monitor, January 5, 1970).

Further evidence of the barriers presented by the high cost of education is developed in Chapter 6, Social Class and Educational Opportunity, The Vertical Mosaic, by John Porter, University of Toronto Press, 1965. Reference is made not only to obvious factors such as the size of families which requires early employment of youths ("drop-outs" of a sort) to help with the costs of child rearing, but to more complex barriers which are important enough to be quoted at some length:

"Economic and social factors set the boundaries within which, at the psychological level, values and attitudes are formed. These values and attitudes become transmitted from generation to generation and help preserve the various social milieux of class. Where parents have high occupational status, they will also have more education, higher incomes, and smaller families. Their children will have a greater chance to complete their education and inherit parental status than children with parents of lower occupational status will have to improve their position. The lower class family does not value education so highly because, in part, it is a privilege beyond their horizon of opportunity, and at the same time, lacking education themselves, they fail to appreciate its value and encourage their children... The removal of financial barriers still leaves formidable psychological barriers of class and family tradition."

Porter goes on to quote the study of R. W. D. Jackson and W. G. Fleming, Who Goes to University—English Canada: "We seem to be doing an admirable job of squandering the priceless human resources available to us. In fact, it can be argued on the basis of the fragments of information at hand that we are utilizing to the full the talents of no more than a third of our academically gifted young men and women." Of another study (by Oswald Hall and Bruce MacFarlane, Transition from School to Work, Queen's Printer, Ottawa, 1963) Porter observes that: "The records of students born in one year indicated that there were 56 with IQs of over 120 but of these, only twelve reached university. The authors of this study were led to conclude that two-thirds of the students who went to university were less than brilliant and that only one-fifth of those who were brilliant reached university."

It is extremely difficult to analyze all the effects and consequences of the complex interweaving of the social and the psychological that we call social class. Despite this, it seems fair to conclude, with Porter, first, that "the principle of equality and the principle of the rational use of economic resources, thus have a mutually reinforcing function. Now, more than ever, education means opportunity. A system which does not provide equal opportunity is also inefficient." And second, that "class traditions and sentiments being what they are, it would probably take a generation of completely free higher education, including perhaps a living allowance, before higher education would become a perceived and valued choice for lower income families."

¹³In a review of the literature on the subject as well as a contribution of surveys of his own, Maurice Pinard of McGill University drew these conclusions about the participation of poor people in political movements. "Short of a very severe crisis, however, the poor will refrain from participation"... "worry enhances one's tendency to protest in higher income groups, while it hampers it in the lower income group. This suggests that worry means something different among the poor than among the other groups: for the poor, a state of worry seems to be a permanent psychological state, while for people of the middle and high income groups, worry apparently stimulates them to protest, rather than restrains them. Worry—and presumably worry of a permanent type—seems to be at least one of the reasons for the poor's low ability to protest." ¹⁵A number of studies have been conducted in the U.S. to determine the incidence of fraud among welfare recipients. For example, Greenleigh Associates found the reporting of undisclosed income and presence of deserted fathers at under 2 per cent in their study conducted in Chicago in 1960. A nation-wide study conducted by the Department of Health, Education and Welfare discovered that the incidence of fraud was less than 2 per cent in 34 states.

THE SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON POVERTY

EVIDENCE

Ottawa, Tuesday, April 14, 1970

The Special Senate Committee on Poverty met this day at 9.30 a.m.

Senator David A. Croll (Chairman) in the Chair.

The Chairman: I call the meeting to order. On my right is Dr. W. Clarke MacDonald, Chairman of the Board of Evangelism and Social Service of the United Church of Canada. He will introduce his delegation. You have the biographical data in your files.

Dr. W. Clarke MacDonald, Chairman, Board of Evangelism and Social Service, United Church of Canada: Mr. Chairman and ladies and gentlemen, on behalf of the Board of Evangelism and Social Service I want to thank you for this opportunity to present our brief to you. I should like to introduce the members of the delegation. On my far right is Miss Eileen Jackson, a member of the Executive and of the Board of Evangelism and Social Service. In her position she is Executive Director of the Family Service Agency in Hamilton, Ontario.

Next to Miss Jackson is Mr. Donald Secord, who is the Secretary Treasurer of the Canadian Brotherhood of Railway Transport and General Workers Union, and who is also a member of the Executive and of the Board of Evangelism and Social Service.

On my immediate right is Dr. Charles Forsyth, who is the Secretary of the Board of Evangelism and Social Service, which is his full-time occupation.

Dr. Forsyth will present our brief to you.

Dr. Charles H. Forsyth, Secretary, Board of Evangelism and Social Service, United Church of Canada: Mr. Chairman and honourable senators, we appreciate the opportunity to place our concerns before you. At the outset I apologize for the fact that we were not able to complete in time the translation of our submission, and the summary of the submission, into French. As you know, the date of our hearing was advanced somewhat, and the translation work was not completed in time for this session.

It is our view that this Committee has rendered a notable service in keeping the issue of poverty on the agenda of the nation, and in providing the kind of forum that will move us past superficialities and "pat" solutions to grapple with the very complex human, social and economic issues involved.

We believe that the work of your committee can help re-order the goals of our society, renew our institutions, and move us to eliminate poverty. As a result of your deliberations, certain salient facts have emerged clearly. Poverty is not confined to a few regions but is present in the total society. Poverty is not the due penalty of those who will not try. In truth, the majority of its victims are those who work without escape. Poverty weakens our cities, even as it blights rural Canada. It harries the old. It degrades parents and forecloses the future of children.

In our submission, Mr. Chairman, we have three stresses:

First, we believe that immediate actions are required—and possible—to stop deterioration in the position of those who depend on demogrant payments, compensation payments or social allowance benefits.

We propose that immediate legislative action is appropriate to remove the 2 per cent ceiling on increases in old age security payments, and in the guaranteed annual income supplement. In our view it is intolerable that older persons in our society should actually have to endure a diminution of their resources at a time when there is a continuing escalation of costs. We are aware that some provinces are attempting to provide a measure of assistance through programs that are cost-shared under CAP; other provinces are providing some measure of real property tax relief. While we welcome such initiatives by the provinces, we feel that the priority task is to adjust the basic program structure to ensure adequate levels of benefits. We do not regard such program adjustments as inflationary.

Similarly, we propose action to improve benefits and programs under federal Unemployment Insurance legislation and provincial Workmen's Compensation programs. It seems to us that adjustments in benefits are overdue and that legislative changes should be made that would allow such programs to respond more or less automatically to cost-of-living changes. Moreover, we feel that it is time to re-work such programs so that they will in fact prevent individuals and families from experiencing crisis poverty, which in not a few cases might be the opening of the way to long-term, hurtful dependency.

We urge that federal-provincial action be taken to increase benefits under social assistance programs, under the umbrella of the Canada Assistance Plan. We believe that more needs to be done to include the "working poor" within the range of benefits under CAP. This is clearly the intent, or at least the opportunity, under the federal statute. In our view, while we are vigorous proponents of improved wage levels under minimum wage legislation, we know that some family groups will not be helped out of poverty unless we are prepared to provide supplements in income and benefits to earnings that are inadequate in themselves. In like fashion, we would like to see greater emphasis placed on Day Care Services, with more provinces funding such services on a cost-sharing basis under CAP.

In the first group of recommendations, Mr. Chairman, we also call for a review of the current anti-inflationary emphasis of the Government of Canada.

We are not prepared to accept the justice or the adequacy of a strategy that places disproportionate burdens on the poor and economically weak. We are not persuaded that current inflation is adequately explained as a "demand-pull" situation, and that the deliberate braking of the economy and the consequent increases in unemployment are justified either in the short term, to say nothing of the long term good of the country.

A good deal of our inflation is imported—would that there were anti-dumping procedures that would check that type of importation.

We concede that it is a difficult and urgent problem. But we are not prepared to accept as solutions, measures that have the effect of forcing many thousands into poverty, and pushing others who are now poor more deeply into deprivation.

Such concerns, Mr. Chairman, led us to urge that the Special Senate Committee on Poverty issue an interim report.

We believe that there are matters that require attention now; that should be spoken to at this time so that appropriate remedial legislative action is possible prior to 1971. We are content to await your over all statement of findings and recommendations in the fall. But we would urge that you use the moral authority of this committee to seek now those changes in program, those improvements in benefits that will prevent, as our brief puts it "further deterioration in the economic and social position of the poor, and forestall increases in the numbers of persons in poverty".

The second main section of our submission outlines recommendations that, in our view, ought to be part of a comprehensive attack on poverty in Canada.

We feel very strongly that greater policy co-ordination needs to be achieved if we are going to make miles against poverty in this country. Policy co-ordination within a level of government; policy co-ordination among various levels of government; and also policy co-ordination of the specific instruments and programs themselves.

In this connection it is obvious that some way has to be found to co-ordinate our social policies with our tax policies. If existing tax processes and programs fall most severely on the economically weak—and they do!—then it is clear that regressive tax pressures can nullify, or seriously undermine, the effectiveness of social policies.

We suggest therefore, as a priority matter that we seek to harmonize total tax policy and our total social policy objectives. This means that a real look must be taken at the effect of tax policies as implemented by all levels of government. It means too that we must look at the expenditure side and see what the real social, spending, priorities of our society are.

We then recommend that income maintenance and redistribution measures should be primarily a federal responsibility to make possible a radical shift in the design and services of provincial welfare systems; and also to permit provinces to de-emphasize tax types that have a regressive effect on the poor.

We propose that en route to a guaranteed annual income program for Canada, family and youth allowances be increased. We have suggested that benefits be tripled, and that youth allowances continue beyond age 17. We suggest also that such benefits be considered taxable income, and that consideration be given to reducing or eliminating tax exemptions for children and youth, thus maximizing the benefit of increased allowances for the poor and near-poor, while maximizing recovery of the demogrants from those who do not need them.

In this way we see a lateral movement toward the guaranteed income system, which we support as a social policy objective for this country.

We urge that 'on stream' with such a change in federal income maintenance programs, provinces shift their welfare systems away from administering relief and re-design them to offer more effective human and community development services. In our view, this is the real provincial role in the welfare field. A shift in income maintenance funding to the federal side where faster-growth tax revenues can be available, would also enable provinces to ease up on their slower-growth tax sources, which tend to be more punishing to lower income groups.

Then, Mr. Chairman, we have proposed:

(a) improvements in Occupational Training and Up-Grading programs;

(b) an attack on illiteracy in Canada;

(c) more training opportunities in a work context;

(d) encouragement to the organizing and community development efforts of trades unions;

(e) improved housing programs that will give more Canadians access to adequate housing;

(f) public initiatives in land assembly and community design; and

(g) "people programs" in such fields as:

—law reform and the administration of justice

—family planning

—nursing home care as part of overall health care

—community supportive services

—encouragement of citizen groups of all kinds as partners in policy development and community renewal —compensatory education programs as part of a new commitment to the education of children.

In our view, important issues are at stake in all these areas and there can be no credible Canadian attack on poverty unless these matters are dealt with in the range, the thrust, and the linkages of our policies—public and private.

The final section of our brief, Mr. Chairman, attempts to suggest the role of the church in the struggle against poverty. We have set forth our conviction that "the church is her true self only when she exists for humanity" and that concern for persons requires the Church to be engaged in the social, political, human struggles of our country and world.

We find it instructive that the church today is required to make the same kinds of shift in policy, in style and emphasis, that we are recommending to your committee as appropriate in the governmental and public sector.

It is a time for new partnerships, new kinds of service, the co-ordination of public and private efforts; a working alongside persons for the mutual benefit of all, rather than a giving of service to persons who are thereby diminished in selfhood and dignity.

We have tried to give specific examples of the new styles in action, and the hopeful and creative partnerships that are building.

We believe that the important themes of society and of the Church really do come to the 'moment of truth' when we confront the issue of poverty.

Poverty can be eradicated, if we will to eradicate it.

We believe that the thrust of our public policies and the actions of our institutions and agencies, including the churches, will show whether we have that will.

We believe that certain remedial actions are required right now to assist the most vulnerable groups in our society.

We believe that the response we make to poverty in our midst is a fundamental challenge to our humanity, and tests the integrity of Canada as a nation.

Senator Carter: I would like to start with the last section of your brief, in which you talk about the role of the church. We see these terms and hear them used in pulpits and in the press, I for one am not quite clear what it means when you say "the role of the church". Are you thinking about the role of the clergy, the role of the church administration, synods, conferences and so on, or the role of the body of the church, including the laymen? Do you distinguish between any of these when you think about the role of the church?

Dr. MacDonald: In the main it would be the last interpretation, the role of the body, not just the laymen but the total community of the church, including clergy and laity, including its hierarchy, its governing bodies at every level and on the part of every person.

Senator Carter: That is another way of saying the public of Canada.

Dr. MacDonald: Well, would that it were, but I am not sure.

Senator Carter: We belong to one creed or another. Is that not to diffuse a definition to focus in any meaningful way?

Dr. MacDonald: The role of these people is pinpointed in the announcements that are made and the stances taken by those who represent them at various levels—synod, diocesan, general council, conference, presbytery and so forth. So it does become pinpointed in that way. It is the responsibility of this Board to be one of the focuses of this concern; it is stated in the manual of our procedure that this is our responsibility.

Senator Carter: You are familiar with this little pamphlet setting out the strategy for the seventies and the goals for 1969?

Dr. MacDonald: Yes.

Senator Carter: Can you tell the committee to what extent the 1969 goals were achieved?

Dr. MacDonald: I will ask Dr. Forsyth, who works on this committee, to elaborate on this.

Dr. Forsyth: Part of the goal for 1969 and the strategy for 1969 involved an assessment of where the church was at, or where the church groups were, in the various denominations and communities of faith. This kind of thing is being done and was done throughout 1969, from the time that report was issued. We know, for example, that in places like Halifax, in provinces like Alberta, inter-church and interfaith coalitions began to emerge. We know that a Roman Catholic diocese, for example did an analysis of the assets and resources of the church in their area to determine whether in fact substantial sums could be made available, or were being made available, for "people programs" and the relief of need at home and abroad.

In the judgment of those of us who have been associated with that particular effort, a very significant shift in emphasis and style was achieved through 1969 and on into 1970. We make clear in our own submission here that there are lots of places that can be identified where parishes or congregations are apparently unaware of these realities. But on the other side I think there has been a growing awareness by groups of their responsibility in this area, assessing their priorities, whether they really do need to put that red carpet down in the chancel or whether it is more significant to use the dollars released for the provision of day care services or something of that sort. This kind of process really has begun to take place across the country, and coalitions have begun to take shape in various parts of Canada to take concerted action alongside the needy and poor in the community.

Senator Carter: I realize that a start has been made, but you have specific goals for the particular year, and I was wondering whether you could make a quantitative assessment of whether you have achieved 75 per cent, 30 per cent or 20 per cent. Is it possible to make any sort of judgment of that nature?

Dr. Forsyth: We have not been able to make a quantitative assessment, simply because we lack the reporting and retrieval systems to get that kind of data back. But we have taken the concerns for that set of objectives to the various denominations, and I know that certain denominations are attempting to make a qualitative assessment at this time, as to whether in fact the projects and programs for '69 were pretty well carried out in their denomination.

Senator Carter: I would like to ask this specific question about the role of the church. We have visited some poor families in poor neighbourhoods, here in Ottawa and in other cities, and had discussions with social service officials who are in contact with them, trying to serve them. They have told us that the people who find themselves in localities living in those circumstances have a totally different outlook on life from people who are better off. For example, they have a different home life; they have a different expectation of home life. They get married and they do not expect the same result of marriage that people normally do. Their children do not have the clothing to join organizations such as scouts and girl guides. They miss out in many ways like that. I could not find out from them what the church was doing to bring some sort of spiritual influence, moral influence, to bear on these people in those circumstances. I was wondering if you could tell us something about that.

Dr. MacDonald: I would like to make a personal reply to this. This is the area where I work, in a downtown church in Toronto. However, Miss Jackson I am sure will have something to contribute at this point from her experience in family services, and as a churchman too.

Miss Eileen Jackson, Board of Evangelism and Social Service, The United Church of Canada: Mr. Chairman, honourable senators, I would like to pick up the point about the difference in family life. Essentially I agree with what you said. I think, however, there are some families whose tradition goes back, who are connected with their individual churches, and they do feel some degree of comfort within the existing structures. They find it difficult, as you say, to buy the uniforms to keep up the organizational life, and I think this is where there needs to be increasing dialogue. I was present at a meeting the other day—in fact, I was responsible, together with two other members of my staff, for it—where three welfare recipients were part of a panel, with a group of about 100 members of women's auxiliaries and United Church women. At that point dialogue began, which I was delighted to find out yesterday is continuing with the Reverend Lois Wilson. I think it is in these kinds of conversations that we will get at some of the things about which you are talking. I agree there is a gap.

Senator Carter: Many of these families living in poverty do not seem to have any very close church affiliations; the children do not have the influence of Sunday school. Is the church going in there and doing something about it? That is what I would like to find out.

Dr. MacDonald: If I may pick it up at this point, I speak from the area of which I am best informed, where I work, which is St. Luke's Church in downtown Toronto. It is also the concern of the churches of the community in the West Don parish, which is inter-denominational now, as well as being an inter-United Church grouping. We have groups of youth meeting at the church almost daily, and they are, for want of a better expression, off-the-street youngsters. Uniforms are no obstacle here; we do not bother about these phylacteries of the religious life at this point at all. There is no point in getting these youngsters in and starting a study of the creed when they could not care less. But we are starting at the point where they are and working with them. We have recognized, for example, the almost failure of the Sunday school to reach these youngsters. Therefore, we have started what we call a "Super Saturday." This brings together the youngsters of the community in a program that is social and spiritual. It also responds to some of their physical needs in as much as we provide them with a lunch at noon time. This program has had a ready response. We have between 60 and 80 youngsters on a Saturday, where as on a Sunday morning we might only have 20 or less from the community.

Senator Carter: What ages would these run?

Dr. MacDonald: They range from kindergarten right through to the younger teens.

Senator Carter: Is there any follow-up in the home to see that the influence resulting from what you have done has not been destroyed in the home.

Dr. MacDonald: I am sure that some of it is destroyed. There is follow-up to the degree that staff volunteers are available, but this is of a limited quantity.

Dr. Forsyth: Part of the problems is that the network to sustain the human is pretty frail. A lot of things become destroyed in a lot of home settings. The point is that in many situations and various kinds of milieux it is obvious that the economic and physical situations are quite grinding and erosive in themselves. Consequently, I feel that one of the great contributions that the church makes, not because of any special virtue which perhaps attaches to it, is simply that it is there. Churches of various denominations spin off services that are supportive of persons in the community and maintain the lateral contacts with the family. Thank heaven churches are beginning to work more and more with other agencies. The solo operation which meant that you went to "do your thing", worked out your own set of statistics, got your own achievements on the record, has pretty well disappeared to the point where you must realize that if you are going to do support work for persons in a community it has to be a partnership venture with other agencies and services, as well as with the people themselves.

I think back to own experience in urban communities and in rural areas to the ways in which the churches contributed to that kind of process as partners in the enterprise. One of the things that concerns me now, as an individual, are the rural areas in certain remote pockets of Canada where the traditional services have pretty well disintegrated. One of the most recent studies which I recently read was done by the Centre for Community Studies, which looked at the process of in-migration to Saskatoon and how the persons who came in adjusted to their environment. Part of the study dealt with those who were left in the rural hinterland and the greater incidence of mental stress and psychological damage and the way the support network had declined. There was depopulation of the rural areas. There are very few institutional networks left in that area—churches among them. It puts a real pressure on the churches to work in partnership with the school systems and other systems that may exist and to look at the problem seriously and to realize how tenuous and frail the human is in this area.

Senator Carter: I thought that was part of the strategy referred to in this book "Coalition for Development". Can you make an assessment as to how effective your effort is in proportion to the need.

Dr. MacDonald: The senator is referring to the sort of thing I have been speaking about, the local community. This kind of assessment is not possible today because we do not have the staff resources in order to make the assessments which would be considerable.

Senator Carter: Are you making any meaningful impact at all on the problems?

Dr. MacDonald: Yes, an equivocal yes.

Dr. Forsyth: The institution of the church is "turning around" in this area. We have a lot of hard work to do in the rural areas, and a very difficult job in turning around further in the urban areas in order to spin off the kind of new styles of services and networks which Dr. MacDonald is speaking about. But there is an impact which is being made. In proportion to the need there is an enormous amount which must be done, not just by churches working solo, but a whole new kind of inter-connection with other kinds of services. This is the critical area, whether we can see the need for partnerships and bring the coalitions into existence. That is why that Coalition Document deliberately attempted to avoid just being an in-church thing. Alone it is impossible.

The Chairman: I have Senators Fergusson, Fournier, McGrand, Pearson and Inman.

Senator Fergusson: The delegation said that they appreciated the opportunity to appear before us. I am sure that we are most grateful to have them, because I think what they have given us in this excellent brief is going to be extremely helpful. We certainly realize that you must have put a great deal of thought and time into it and we thank you.

I have a number of questions, but I am going to start with this one. On page 16 of the brief you refer to the fact that the provinces have not made as much use of the Canada Assistance Plan as they might have. When that was passed we thought it was going to revolutionize things in Canada but it has not done that as we all know. What do you think is the reason that more provinces have not made the sort of use of this plan that Alberta has? I should like to mention, as referred to in the brief, that New Brunswick is thinking of this. It came out in their White Paper the other day. I was fortunate enough to be in Fredericton when this was announced. Why didn't they all pick it up right away, because it was a wonderful opportunity?

Dr. Forsyth: This would be a good time to take advantage of a chance for a commercial for New Brunswick!

I think the reason is two-fold, first of all because I still feel that the "dole" or relief philosophy dies hard. I think that when it comes to the crunch, people get really up tight by wanting to preserve the so-called incentives. Therefore, you cannot pitch the levels of assistance to the point where you might possibly be destroying somebody's incentive work. You do an analysis of what the "getting-by" line is economically and you pitch your levels just below that. Therefore, despite the fact that you have created a legislative instrument you haven't changed the psychology of the persons who are using it.

I think the second reason is that 50-50 sharing under CAP seems generous, and it is. But it is not easy for some provinces to find their 50 per cent and use the full range of possibilities inherent in the program.

When they have to set those welfare priorities and expenditures against other kinds of expenditures, which they must make in the field of education and in other fields of their constitutional responsibility, I think the interconnection of those two, the philosophy, with the pragmatic realities, the practical realities of expenditures, with limited provincial revenues, has tended to cut into the effectiveness of the program.

It is only places like Alberta, which has resources, in New Brunswick which has imagination, that are able to take hold of the possibilities and spin-off new responses under CAP.

The Chairman: Except that you did not finish the sentence and say "and Ontario with money which they will not use."

Dr. Forsyth: I was in danger of making a political speech.

The Chairman: Go ahead.

Dr. Forsyth: For example, in Ontario—and this applies to many other provinces—it is tragic that, for whatever reason, the possibilities under CAP for the development and support of day care and other related services that can inter-connect with family agencies and various other support networks in the communities—that this kind of response was not developed as quickly as those who framed the CAP thought it would be. However, Miss Jackson is far more competent to deal with that than I am and I will not try to develop it.

The Chairman: What do you think, Miss Jackson? Would you develop that?

Miss Jackson: Mr. Chairman, I think that it is attitudes and philosophy, plus the economic factor that lies behind the fact that the Province of Ontario will not help.

Of course, working in the private sector, I have sensed real reluctance of the public sector to co-operate in efforts and programs of private agencies.

Other than some small payments under the Day Nurseries Act, as a voluntary agency in Ontario we get no public funds.

The Chairman: Thank you.

Senator Fergusson: This would come down to the fact of what governments consider their priorities. If they think that spending their money on something else is better, they decide to do it that way.

Dr. Forsyth: This is why we raised the question.

Unless we look at the relationship of social policies to actual spending, we get nowhere.

There is something screwy in the kind of system that can go for terrific commitments to educational spending, for example by locating two library buildings cheek by jowl with each other; two independent educational networks that lead into two separate high school or college systems.

If you deploy the dollars in that way—then you have no dollars for other purposes, because of that decision. You have no dollars for compensatory education at the bottom, which might give some liberation service to children who will otherwise become shunted through what euphemistically we call "opportunity classes"—really a dead-end process for those who will not make it through high school.

You say we are going to change that, but not just now, because there are no dollars left.

We are trying to make the point in several places that the concern surely ought to be to look at what actually happens in our expenditure flows for education, or for other services, and see who is being served.

We do not necessarily have a commitment to educate all children. If we begin to distort our spending patterns in the ways I have mentioned we do not have dollars left over which could be used for fundamental educational work that is not now being done.

We do not have money to do the educational task in the modern society in fragmented and wasteful fashion. This involves us designing new kinds of network in the community, new kinds of interconnections.

This need refers not only to the school system but also the private sector, the agencies and all kinds of groups and systems who have a role to play.

That is why I suggested the example. They probably could have regrouped those libraries in that particular instance, and have had some dollars left. Those saved dollars would make it possible to deploy trailers like the ones used by George Brown College, into various kinds of communities which require special programs or some kind of day care services.

It is this policy—spending issue that one needs to look at.

Senator Fergusson: Referring to aids to education, I would like also to say that the appendices which you have given, referring to education, are wonderful. You have given some information about experience in educational television, some particulars which had not come to my attention. I think we probably would be very glad to study them. It is terrific what you have accomplished.

Dr. Forsyth: Again, if you look at the total policy and take seriously what the CRTC seems to be about, it gives you all kinds of leads. CRTC seems to be saying: "Look, we have a stake in binding this country together and developing ourselves as a people, through what we do with media." If our media and institutions really could interact, and interconnect, what could happen?

People are already raising their heads in horror. They are asking "How can we get enough content to utilize the media"? There is all manner of content waiting to be tapped and there are Canadians available to do it.

There are programs needing to be carried on the television system, the cable system, and in other ways.

I feel strongly, personally, that here is one area where the policy interconnections have not been looked at as carefully as they might be.

I think, for example, there are enormous opportunities for us to deal with one particular human problem in Canada. We refer to that in one of those appendices, dealing with illiteracy.

Surely it is tragic in this country that we have such a degree of illiteracy, when we find that we have all the technological means to assist us in overcoming this problem. There are various public and private bodies that can be brought on stream and we have such agencies as Frontier College and the public school systems, and so on. And yet there is no coordinated attack mounted on illiteracy in Canada.

This is a situation that is ridiculous where we consider that the human and media resources available are enormous—quite enough to meet the problem.

Senator Fergusson: People have been saying that if you do make this sort of effort there are people who need it and they will not bother with it. Yet the results that have been documented in one of the appendices show how many people finished and how many people actually wrote and completed the course. It is wonderful information for us to have.

Dr. Forsyth: The great advantage of television is that it is "impersonal". There are certain kinds of depersonal or impersonal functions in our total social system—functions like computerization. Instead of being considered a threat to the personal, we need to use their impersonal characteristics for human purposes.

For example, if we could get the income maintenance and support programs to the place where the cheque comes out issued by a glorious computer; where it just comes to the person in a way that does not demean the person by questions, interviews, line-ups and so on, but that it just happens in somewhat the same way as the family allowance cheques come at present, this would be a wonderful humanizing use of the "depersonal" computer.

In the same way, the thing about television is that it can get at somebody, it can reach the person who wants to participate in a program and yet does not want to be put in the embarrassing position of having to go to a group and say "I cannot read, I cannot write". But the "box" brings the signal into the living room and that man can get inside the program without any human diminution. We are crazy if we do not use the humanizing possibilities of media and technical instruments in that fashion.

We were concerned to say that when you look at the interconnections we need, when you look at the linkages that are possible and necessary—in Canada we have them! We have them right now. We have enormously sophisticated apparatus sitting there, waiting and constitutionally we can use it to do what we want to do.

Senator Fergusson: I have one other question. I have quite a number of other questions that I would want to ask you, but I will put his one now. On page 37 of your brief, you say, in regard to family planning, that you assist that the Government, in certain of its own programs and through support granted to independent agencies, ought to make real options known and available to Canadians. How do you want them to do it?

Miss Jackson: Through a network of community services, it seems to me that we could train individuals, no matter what discipline they belong to, to be alerted to and to respond to the situation. Within my own limited experience, I know, for instance, that the disadvantaged families for the most part not only lack information about family planning, they lack information about themselves. For us, that is where you start.

Again, I think it is using the whole network of services in an imaginative and creative way, to begin where people are, and to respond to their needs there and to be sympathetic.

I do not frankly see setting up a whole new system or organization. I think it is using what we have.

The Chairman: Miss Jackson, as a government, we spend many thousands of dollars to each family planning to the people of India and other parts of the world. What do we do here that is different?

Miss Jackson: Mr. Chairman, that we do it here is quite right, and it is equally true that we have not done it here even using the opportunities we have. It just has not happened.

Dr. MacDonald: According to the moderator of the United Church, who has had long experience in India, this is done in just the same way as any agency would promote a program for a vacation in Florida, for example. You would use billboards and posters and that sort of thing.

Senator Fergusson: I did wonder what sort of publicity would be involved.

Dr. Forsyth: Do we make available to agencies the dollars and systems that will allow them to mount a program and provide the services? I think that is where the crunch comes. If we want to use the private network and make options at least known, if not used, then are we prepared to provide to agencies dollars to in fact do this work on behalf of the community?

Senator Pearson: Are these efforts effective? For instance, the teaching in India? Do you gain anything by it?

Dr. MacDonald: I cannot give you the figures, but once again quoting our moderator from memory, they are effective, yes.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): Mr. Chairman, I think it is time someone introduced some argument into this meeting in order to make it a little bit more lively. I am not one to throw flowers when they are not due. I throw flowers, though, when they are due.

This brief has nothing new in it, so far as I am concerned. It presents recommendations we have heard many times. It opens a lot of places for argument. In Dr. Forsyth's words, it is a brief of imagination.

On page 6 of the brief you have a page which says, "What shall we do?". That is all there is on the page and I don't know why the space was left. However, I am going to fill that space by reference to the witness. What shall we do and how are we going to do it? And my question is, if all the recommendations that are in this brief were implemented, what would it cost the country?

Dr. MacDonald: I think Dr. Forsyth has some figures to bring before you on that matter, Mr. Chairman. The filling in of page 6 does, of course, follow on pages 7, 8, 9 and 10.

Dr. Forsyth: Mr. Chairman, I could not pretend to suggest what all the matters that are recommended here would cost. I have no way of estimating too well what it would cost, for example, to improve the old age security benefits to an adequate level. I have a sneaking suspicion, though, that the cost is not excessive and would be pretty well gathered up within the total economic system in expenditures anyhow, because of the pressing needs of the people who would receive it. I have a fairly rough estimate that suggests to me anyway, for the purposes of just exploring the matter, that the family allowance program that we are suggesting would cost in the neighbourhood of $1.8 billion, which is what we now commit ourselves to spend on defence. I suspect that it would be a more productive expenditure in the long run and certainly would have better returns. I would suspect, too, that of that $1.8 billion you could recover approximately 40 or 50 per cent through the kind of tax changes we are talking of, which means the net increase would be something in the neighbourhood of $300 or $400 million. I may be considerably out on this kind of estimate, because we don't have the research apparatus to allow us to really explore some of the implications. However, I think we are talking of those orders of dollars.

Nevertheless, there are some off-setting gains there as well. Because I think what our proposals would begin to do is to shift balances. We find it difficult to do the estimating because it is hard for us to estimate what kind of shift this would create in terms of programs now aimed at the working poor; expenditures by provinces directed to those in receipt of some kind of welfare assistance, and so on. We just don't have the apparatus to allow us to estimate such shifts in expenditure flows. But I think the thing that I would really suggest is that we are making a lot of expenditures now that should be looked at carefully.

What we are really asking is that we look at the expenditure flows that we are making and examine present priorities. I think dollars are being spent in the wrong places. We make various kinds of expenditures, for example, in the educational field. Without diminishing the effectiveness of the total program in provinces we could in fact release dollars if we utilized buildings more effectively—de-emphasized the creation of new buildings and used old ones the year round. We would have dollars released for other uses in education thereby.

I cannot offer a clear-cut estimate of the costs of our programs because with respect to some of them the impact is hidden. In others, the off-setting costs are not great, simply because it means a shift in the priorities of what we are now spending to put the money to better use in more creative ways.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): I quite agree with what you have said. There is a lot of truth in what you have said about off-setting the expenses. But who is going to do it? Before this committee can make any concrete recommendations, don't you think we have to find out where we are going? That is the problem we have before us. We see in brief after brief these same recommendations. It would be nice to do that and it would be nice to do that. It is an old question for me. Don't think I am just getting tough with you people. I have been trying to get a proper answer right from the beginning but it always comes down to the same thing.

Dr. Forsyth: If I may respond briefly to that, Mr. Chairman, there are certain things that can be done now and ought to be done now. The nation has the resources to provide adequate benefits under the old age security program. There are surpluses kicking around and that would be a good place to use some of those surpluses. The best estimate I have seen is that there was some $600 million net tax revenue to be generated under the White Paper proposals. That would be new federal revenue. Well, we have got some good places to use that money.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): May I say something to you, Dr. Forsyth. You must be aware of the impact the White Paper has had across this country.

Dr. Forsyth: It made a good impact on us.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): There is no surety that the White Paper is going to be implemented. It has not received a favourable reaction from the people across Canada. Apart from that, as a result of the opinion that more taxation should be imposed on the Canadian people in order to provide the services that you are recommending?

Dr. Forsyth: In respect of the White Paper we have gone on record saying that we believe the tax system is at least part of the way to reach social and economic equality. We have made it clear in our statement, and we have circulated that statement widely, that we believe certain groups, institutions and corporations ought to be taxed more heavily in order to reach a greater degree of equity for the average Canadian person. We are also of the opinion, as we have stated here, that we should utilize the faster growth tax areas of the federal sector in order to provide for income maintenance payments and in order to take some of the pressure off the provinces which have to use the slower growth tax areas, the more regressive tax fields which have a more punishing effect on the poor. S we think there are tax methods that could be used to advantage to achieve greater social equity and to achieve a better degree of distribution of the burden of taxation in the Canadian society. We feel that those things can be moved ahead with at this time.

We also believe that there are certain actions that need to be taken now if we are not going to increase the scale of the problem which your committee is so effectively exploring now. Surely we should not now increase the number of poor. If we wait two or three years before doing the just thing in terms of the old, the economically weak and vulnerable, then all we will have done, while you are exploring the poverty problem, is to increase the problem! Not only is that intolerable. It is unnecessary. Action ought to be taken now to keep the situation in balance while you begin to put together the over-all strategy to meet the problem.

Dr. MacDonald: May I express my slight reaction to Senator Fournier's (Madawaska-Restigouche) expressed fear or concern about the White Paper not being implemented owing to the reaction of the Canadian public? The reaction which has been received has been in large part, (with the exception, for example, of the brief from this board, statements from this board and a few other groups), the reaction has been in large measure from those who have been in a position to immediately grasp some of the implications of the White Paper as it affected them, and these groups have been in a position where they could mount a public campaign defending the position which they take in objection to certain aspects of the White Paper. Whereas people such as those in the "Just Society" movement around the Toronto area...

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): Where did you say that was, sir?

Dr. MacDonald: ...and other of that economic bracket have not been able to do this sort of thing and have not even been able to master some of the elementary principles of it as it affects them. This is probably why. May I ask if Mr. Secord, who moves in the area, could comment on this?

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): I quite agree with you on that point, sir.

Dr. MacDonald: Thank you.

The Chairman: Mr. Secord, would you like to add to this?

21893-2½

Dr. MacDonald: This is as to what can be done.

Mr. Donald Secord, Executive Member, Board of Evangelism and Social Service: Certainly, the trade union movement generally supports the White Paper on Taxation. It has some criticisms to offer but, in principle, it does support it fully. Certainly, my own organization does—which, I am happy to say, has been socially oriented since its inception some 62 years ago—but we can do much more than we have done. Unfortunately, there has been a reaction and, I might say, a reaction from some trade union people to the White Paper which perhaps is to be expected since they are human and see themselves in the middle income group. Some of the more fortunate see themselves adversely affected, but that does not alter the fact that the trade union movement generally does support it and feels a great deal more can be done in producing social equity than has been done in the past.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): I would like to go back to the brief. On page 19, in the last line, you mention "1 per cent or less welfare 'cheating'". Where do you get that 1 per cent?

Dr. Forsyth: I am glad you asked me that. It comes from a study that was actually done in Calgary which revealed, after really careful analysis, as I understood the nature of the study, that you had about a 1 per cent level where the question would be raised that "cheating" took place. I think this would be generally true.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): Is that moneywise or individually? Is that 1 per cent in dollar values or individual values?

Dr. Forsyth: This would be 1 per cent of cases, of numbers, not dollars.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): I have a different opinion on that, but I do not think I will open up an argument.

I would like to take the education issue, and then I will pass to somebody else, because I am dissatisfied with our program on education, for many reasons, especially at the working level. There are many places where I think we are working in the dark, and it is very expensive and we are not getting anywhere. But you have a statement on page 28, the third paragraph, where you say that 1,500 of 18,000 juvenile delinquents who had been in court were functionally illiterate. I do not think that is a very bad figure, if those are the uneducated boys.

Dr. Forsyth: They are functionally illiterate. In Canada, where I presume most of us tend to pride ourselves on the fact that this is a country with universal education and everybody goes to school, we are in fact talking about the fact that in 1967, 8.32 per cent of juvenile offenders were persons who had Grade IV, V or less of an education. Which means that in terms of work opportunities of our society they are functionally illiterate.

This is the information that was given to the House of Commons. Certainly, in our judgment, this is just another signal that is going up to suggest that we have a critical problem in the field of illiteracy that nobody is tackling.

Dr. MacDonald: It is a situation that they do not accept in Japan.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): The education problem could be open for a long discussion, and I will not touch on it.

You have made a remark here which I do not quite agree with. You suggest that the streets of Harlem should be left to the city.

The Chairman: On what page?

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): Page 39. I think that is quite a radical statement to make.

The Chairman: What is the statement?

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): This is page 39, the politics of poverty in Harlem. I lived in Harlem on two different occasions, going to a school there in 1949 and 1958. I lived on 158th Street, which is the main street of Harlem. I lived with coloured people. I think the whole thing about the City of Harlem, the cleanness of the streets and the conduct of the people, is a problem of education. I do not believe you can blame these people too much for what they are doing and the way they behave. They have to live in the streets on these hot summer days in Harlem and New York City. Although there has been a lot of improvement and some of these ghettos are being torn down, I think it is a very strong statement to throw at these people.

Dr. Forsyth: Fortunately, it is Mr. Clark's statement and not ours. The point is, of course, that you are dealing with an area, you well know, with 10,000 people living in a single block. What he is trying to point out is that while it is a very worthwhile thing for a citizen group to go out and clean the street yet, in the long haul, this is the wrong move because what they really should be doing is to pressure the authorities to provide a better clean-up service for the streets of the area.

In the part of Toronto where I live, the chaps come around to pick up the garbage twice a week and then they come around in the middle of the week to pick up the rubbish from raking up your back lawn, and so on.

It is a fact of life in American cities, and perhaps elsewhere, in this country too, that in the poor urban area the pressures are not on from the citizens to provide that kind of service and, consequently, the garbage does not get picked up in west-side Chicago or south-side Chicago. It just does not get picked up and you have to exert terrific public pressure to get it picked up.

What Mr. Clark is suggesting is that the real task of the citizen group is the political kind of activity that begins to get responses from the Civic administrative structures to provide the services they provide to other elements of the community. We are using this reference merely to agree that this is a desirable effort on the part of citizen groups, and that their task is not just to go around doing happy little projects down the back alley. We have to get a more basic kind of citizen response.

Senator Fergusson: Do we have the same problem in Canadian cities? Is there a difference between the way the garbage is picked up in the slums and the way it is picked up in places where the middle-class people live?

Dr. MacDonald: In as much as I work in not a slum area, but an area that has been run down for some time, I think we see at least part of the difference Dr. Forsyth has pointed to. In Forest Hill in Toronto, for example, the people are away on the weekend. Their children are away, and they are away on vacations in the summer. The children are not, as a rule, playing on the street and there are parks where they can play.

In downtown Toronto the children do not have this opportunity to get away to the summer cottage, the vacation resorts and the conservation parks unless an organization such as the church or Central Neighbourhood House provides a bus and takes them. So they do play on the streets and this sort of thing happens. I would not say the collections are any less frequent in that area, but certainly the results are not the same.

Senator Inman: But does it not boil down to the matter of education and people being taught not to litter up the streets?

Dr. MacDonald: I suppose it is a problem, but when the children have no place else to play, they play on the streets. This is their backyard to play in and they cannot be expected to do the impossible because they are children with no supervision.

Dr. Forsyth: There is also the fact that garbage is a function or a consequence of density. When you have tremendously high density in a city core area, then you have an escalation of the garbage problem. And we must remember that in Canada many cities do not have recreation facilities in the core, they are mostly on the outside. I worked in the core area of Winnipeg in a parish which sponsored community service programs. We just could not get a pool in the area. They were all out in suburbia and not in the core of the city. Now this was not the result of any malicious plot. It was simply that the public there did not have any political clout. The situation is the same in many other places, and this is why citizens' groups are beginning to create pressure time and again to have this rectified.

Dr. MacDonald: I think we have to remember that while it is all right to say about people in this situation that the children should be taught to do this and to do that, we must keep in mind the facts of the situation. What is a mother to do who is living on welfare in a ramshackle house where all she can do is to provide the bare necessities and so keep body and soul together. She is not going to take time nor does she have the willpower or inclination to encourage the children to pick up paper off the streets. This may be part of the crux of the problem and again has to do with the density of which Dr. Forsyth was speaking.

Senator McGrand: On page 2 of your brief you refer to inflation and you say that it is a difficult and urgent problem and that you are not prepared to accept as solutions measures that have the effect of forcing many thousands into poverty and pushing others who are now poor more deeply into deprivation. I am not clear what you had in mind in this. What conditions were you thinking of?

Dr. Forsyth: Well, if you carry out a braking of the economy to the extent that you create rising unemployment, then you will be forcing people who are on a marginal income and those who are unemployed and do not have an adequate income, more deeply into poverty.

Senator McGrand: I agree with you. Now let us take a province with about 600,000 people and 10 per cent of that population, 60,000 people, are on welfare. Now this involves burdens on both the social and economic structures. Now if you were asked to design a program for the eradication of poverty and low incomes, how would you proceed? What would be the steps you would take? In my opinion, poverty and low incomes come from the lack of natural resources within a province or within an area or from the inadequate development in use of resources. Can you give me some idea as to how you would attack the question of poverty in low income areas in a part of Canada such as I have described?

Dr. Forsyth: Well, first of all, I do not think you can isolate that segment of the community from the rest of the national network, so to speak. Therefore you have to deal with the realities of the situation and take into account a large number of people who are in need. So perhaps the first solution would be basic income assistance, and it seems to me that here we can use, if we want to do so, the instruments of our federalism and put the responsibility for basic income maintenance services where I think they belong. In my view that is on the federal side, through whatever techniques we can use. We should also make use of existing programs and greatly increase the benefits and this in turn would be helpful to thousands of families who are in need. This in turn would lead to a very important development, in my view, and that would be to strengthen the economic base for these thousands of families and thus help to stabilize their situation.

This would help that province or community to shift its priorities into two important areas. First, economic development services and secondly, the field of community development and education. By using the possibilities of our federalism to supply income maintenance from the federal level we are also providing a basic stabilizing factor in our society. There is no great virtue in arranging these schemes so that we encourage people to move who have no capacity within themselves for moving. What I think we need to do is to stabilize people in the community and provide real mobility opportunities for their children. If we are thinking of just moving people from the Maritimes or from the rural hinterland anywhere into metropolitan areas where they are very likely to go under, we are making a bad mistake. We should provide some basic income in such a fashion as to stabilize the community base and then work on the educational aspect where the children are concerned so that the children in turn will be more genuinely mobile.

By this I do not mean the random mobility of people moving from place to place aimlessly because they cannot do anything.

Senator McGrand: In other words, the maximum development of resources within an area so as not to have people travelling like gypsies from one city to another.

Dr. Forsyth: Yes. So often at the present time what is involved is a sort of aimless shifting of our population. But if we could provide the kind of income security that will allow the family to have economic stability, then in turn you could almost literally program the mobility of the children along total economic and social development lines. There are areas in various provinces where there are no basic resource possibilities available and other areas where there has been faulty development. Now I think we can stabilize it, but we have to look at the situation within the entire Canadian context.

Dr. MacDonald: I think we must also remember that we have to include our people as one of our greatest natural resources.

The Chairman: Senator McGrand does. There is no doubt about that.

Senator McGrand: I could go on all morning, but I shall not do that. What I was going to say is this, that we are both familiar with the Province of New Brunswick, and we know of rural areas that have stood up over the time, and we know of other rural areas, with equal natural resources, that have simply disappeared and eroded, as you say. The services have eroded; the population has eroded; and now there is nothing there. Unless something is done to keep the spark of life and development alive in the areas that are standing up then the whole thing is going to eventually collapse.

The Chairman: Let me see if I understand what the Church is saying. Its representatives have been saying important things all morning, but I think something very important was said just a few minutes ago. The Church is talking about income from the federal Government, services from the provincial Government, and the delivery of services under the Canada Assistance Act.

We have been talking about that, and we think that has much merit. It is an excellent idea. What you are saying is very important. It is that income maintenance—whatever we decide as a matter of income maintenance—as it goes to the man in the rural area, as it goes to the man in the urban area, as it goes to the man in the very large city, is to be the same. It has that stabilizing effect. You are saying something very vital and important, as I understand it. That is your contribution.

Dr. Forsyth: Yes. It seems to me that one of the prerequisites of really dealing with the problems of poverty is to stop looking at poverty as a one generation phenomenon, and to look at it across a time stream.

Then it seems to me the next thing you want to ask is: What kind of policy shapes or thrusts can you create that will stabilize the human situation enough to give you a chance to win the battle? I cannot for the life of me see how you are going to stabilize the human situation if all you are doing is condemning whole areas and the people who live in them to a frantic kind of mobility that gets nowhere and accomplishes nothing.

At page 23 of our submission we use a rather curious term. We say:

If our rural programs continue to deal in piecemeal fashion with economic and product crises while we ignore the need for viable 'rurapolitan' models...

This is a kind of "in" term with us at the moment. We had a gentleman speak to us recently about "rurapolitan" networks. The point is that we do have metropolitan networks, then there is the interface to that, there is the rurapolitan network. I think the and of thing that Senator McGrand is talking about is precisely the kind of thing that is part of a ruralopolitan network. It is not just enough to go in and do a specific kind of program in isolation. What you really want to do is look at a big enough chunk of a rural system and say: What kind of total schematic network can you develop here that will be supportive of people as human beings, and that will use such resources and possibilities as there are for economic and social development purposes?

I think we need to look at that type of model.

If we did look at it we would realize that there are some alternatives to just going on and on, always thinking about problems of the cities. If we allow this gross erosion of all our rural systems in Canada I think we will be making a terrible mistake. Because there are people left who do not migrate to Saskatchewan; there are people who do not move to Athabasca or Saint John; there are people who are going to be in the rural areas of Cape Breton or the hinterland of British Columbia. The question is: How can we provide enough income maintenance to stabilize the human situation so that we can begin to put together, as much as we can, some effective networks and programs for socio-economic development.

The Chairman: There is some failure in what you are saying, but you are certainly talking the truth this morning—as you always do, anyway. What you are saying, in effect, is that to some extent we have lost the battle for the older people, and we might as well admit it. We can stabilize them and give them an income that will let them carry on within their community, but if we provide education and other facilities for the children, we can win with them.

Dr. Forsyth: Sir, I would have to put it in a different way. I would say that we have not lost the battle with the old people. We have not even tried to fight it. The point is that the thing you want to do surely has to be appropriate to the group that you are trying to serve. I think that if you want to win the battle with the older people you have to realize that it will not be fought on the same terms on which you are required to fight it to win with the kids. To win with the kids means to give them a different kind of mobility for a new kind of twenty-first century society. To win it for the adults means to provide them with some kind of dignity and economic stability as human beings. I do not think we are winning either battle.

The Chairman: What I said was that we can stabilize the communities that we were talking about with income maintenance for the old, and at the same time we can provide educational training and other facilities for the young to give them that mobility that they may require.

Dr. Forsyth: That is right.

The Chairman: I do not mind telling you that is the present thinking of this committee. The committee is thinking in those broad terms. How we get there, of course, is another matter.

Dr. Forsyth: It seems to me that there is another matter that begins to intrude at that point, because this is really the case for winning the battle in appropriate ways for each group.

The Chairman: Yes.

Dr. Forsyth: To us this means that if you look realistically at the tax possibilities and the revenue possibilities for the various levels of government, then the only way by which you can really seriously expect to generate the amount of dollars needed for income maintenance purposes is by locating the priority or the paramountcy on the federal side.

But this does not intrude upon or erode provincial dignity. On the contrary it means that the provinces have a chance to begin to move in new ways in the community. It is not just enough to provide a source of stabilized income for the older folk in a community. What really matters is what you do in terms of human development and community development that make that place where they live a meaningful place to live, and what kinds of services go in—adult education, supportive services, and everything else.

Many provinces are hard pressed to find the resources to provide precisely those services, and they never will unless we shift the burden of income maintenance off their shoulders, and allow them to move in their more restricted tax fields to provide support services in new ways.

The Chairman: You are confirming the views that have already been expressed around this table.

Dr. MacDonald: I do not want to sound the least bit flippant here, but I lived in New Brunswick, in the Miramichi, for three years, and at that particular juncture of history it seemed to me that their greatest natural resource was Yvon Durelle. What I am saying there is that you could get busloads of people to go some place to see Yvon Durelle fight, but you could not get busloads of people to go some place to discuss the problems of the fishermen or the farmers. This is the point.

Senator Pearson: You say at page 17:

We recommend that the Special Senate Committee on Poverty issue an interim report at the earliest practicable date this spring.

What position do you think this committee is in now to be able to make an interim report that will be of any value to anybody?

Dr. Forsyth: Sir, we think that it is pretty obvious from a perusal of the testimony you have received, and the comments that the members of your committee have made, that this committee has a real concern that we try in Canada to arrest the problem of poverty. Therefore, we are specific in our suggestion that the interim report should appeal for immediate action in areas where we think that immediate action is, first of all, possible, and secondly, where it is urgent—that is to say, in terms of improving the situation for old age security recipients, those receiving the guaranteed income supplement or benefits under unemployment insurance; plus an appeal to the provinces to effect a similar upgrading of benefits under workmen's compensation, et cetera. An appeal also should be made to both federal and provincial governments for action in the field of social assistance, because the squeeze is on in various areas to keep these costs down. We feel that it would not improperly prejudice or shape your ultimate findings and recommendations if you were to say "Surely to goodness, while we reach for that we do not want to permit the situation of thousands of Canadians to become worse." There is a responsibility confronting Canadian society and a real moral authority residing in this committee. That interim report would be an appeal to the nation, using that authority. You are better judges than we as to the risks and pressures.

Senator Pearson: If we made a suggestion that the federal and provincial governments should up their ante on all welfare programs at this time, it would be a real battle as to where to get this money. Where do these governments get the money all of a sudden?

Dr. Forsyth: The federal Government is declaring a surplus in the budget papers have.

Senator Pearson: Most of the programs are provincial.

Dr. Forsyth: The federal Government is paying 50 per cent of it. They can pump money into the unemployment insurance fund and provide the guaranteed income supplement. The surplus is there as an anti-inflationary instrument. We do not regard the using of that surplus to provide for the basic needs and minimum income of the poor of our society as inflationary. Therefore we regard it as properly related to the purposes for which the surplus was set aside. As far as the provinces are concerned, several of them have declared a modest surplus, and we suggest that they look at some of their own spending, erect fewer educational monuments and use the buildings year round instead of letting the faculty go off for the whole summer for five months.

The Chairman: While we are on this subject, first let me assure you that we considered the possibility of an interim report some time ago. We decided that it was not the part of wisdom or good judgment for us to run in hurriedly with a report, even though it had basis, facts and justice. The difficulty, and you and your colleagues know it as well as anyone, is that in looking at the poor we study the hospitalization aspect one day, the medical and housing aspect the next day, income the next day. We get quick solutions to this, quick solutions to that, and in the end we get nothing. We have dissatisfied people. We decided—the chairman has repeated it many times—that we are going to look at this problem of poverty in its totality. We know and you know, gentlemen, that the Government said it would have a white paper in February. Problems have arisen and it has been delayed until June. The white paper will deal with welfare and unemployment insurance matters. It may deal with priorities and many other concerns far more effectively than anything we can do on a short term. For us to walk in with a bit of patchwork, piecemeal, and try to fix priorities would be a fatal mistake at this time for this committee. We must do a total job and make complete recommendations covering every aspect of poverty in this country. We have this responsibility and time is not our enemy. We have to take our time and consider this in every possible aspect.

The chairman has already talked out of turn once in the presence of others with respect to old age security. The Government will have its own views and if we have views we will have to express them at a later date by way of recommendations.

Dr. MacDonald: There is a sense, Mr. Chairman, in which time is your enemy, if I may put it as bluntly as that in apposition to what you said. There is a growing body of people in Canada whose eyes are focused on this committee. They are disenchanted, not from the point of view of casting their vote, but from having any say in what their destiny is to be and just what the result may be in the long, hot summer, if it is long and hot. One cannot say. There is a sense in which there is a great deal of urgency about this. We would not suggest for a moment that you should make statements which would tie your hands eventually for the final product of the committee, but certain aspects which appear to be clear now as to direction ought to be made public.

The Chairman: You are asking us to fix priorities. Everyone around this table is in favour of doing something along the lines you suggest. I do not think it is our business to fix priorities at this stage. We agree there is a great danger with respect to the elderly, who may not be here. We have been out to the public with open meetings. If they have something to say, we are listening.

We have a full month in April, holding hearings every Tuesday and Thursday. We have all of May to hear the provinces, who must be heard. We are adjourning on June 25. This afternoon we shall be discussing our movements in July and August when we will be travelling to provinces. Forty-three new organizations have just asked to be heard. They are all important and we are going to have to close the door at some time. There is just so much we can do. We cannot rush this. It would be folly on our part if we did not hear everyone who wishes to be heard. Whether or not they have anything to contribute does not make any difference. If participatory democracy is to work, they have to be heard. Much as we wish to do so, the making of precipitous decisions at this time would not be helpful to the overall view the committee will have to take in the final analysis.

Dr. Forsyth: Obviously the committee has to be the judge of its appropriate procedure. In defence of our suggestion, we were not unaware of the dilemma you face in trying to hear those who wish to be heard and trying to respond to the concerns of many groups and to devise with your own research group the proposals you would recommend at the end of your work.

If you look at the specific things we are suggesting as part of an interim report you will discover, I think, that with one exception they are merely obviously ad hoc improvements in existing programs to keep the situation stabilized so that it will not get worse in view of the fact that there are increasing numbers of persons who will be up against need in the coming months. The one exception concerns a query we had about the anti-inflationary policies that are currently being used, and there we felt there might be a little fellow feeling in this group with the approach Senator Lamontagne advocated.

All the specific suggestions are in relation to existing programs, which in our judgment are artificially held down in a situation where there needs to be some adjustment. So we did try to be fairly careful not to pre-judge, or try to suggest that you pre-judge, the directions you wanted to go in terms of total policy. Rather the interim report we were suggesting would merely be an ad hoc response that you might make to the Government, using existing program mechanisms creatively so as to make the situation more stable economically for needy persons. At the same time such a report would not pre-judge the directions in which you as a committee might properly want to go only after you had heard all those who want to be heard and had the fruits of your own research.

Senator Pearson: I think this committee is very cognizant of the urgency that you put into your brief. We have run across this same urgency at our meetings in the cities we have been to across Canada. Poverty has gone on for centuries. It is not something new. It is a very disastrous situation today, and we recognize that fact. At the same time, we have to come up with a program that is different and will do some good, not just a piecemeal affair that we have always had—all sorts of welfare programs, with one group after another suggesting different cures. We have to come up with something definite. At least, we are hoping to come up with something definite. That is why we have to take our time over it, and I cannot see the value of this idea of an interim report at all.

The Chairman: My own feeling is that if we started piecemeal we would jeopardize the income maintenance portion that is so important to the whole concept of tackling poverty. That would be my great fear. We have to come up with one concept and work from there. If we began diffusing it we would get no place.

Senator Pearson: On page 3 of the brief you talk about the Economic Council of Canada and their recommendations for a guaranteed income, and the figures they put forward as necessary under this guaranteed income plan. Would you as a body think that the guaranteed annual income would overtake or replace all the other different welfare programs? Would it overtake, for instance, medicare or take the place of the Red Cross or the Institute for the Blind etc.?

Dr. Forsyth: I would not think so. Our assumption is that there will probably be created a mechanism that would finally break welfare loose from its relationship to income provision and allow it to take the form of human and social development. Therefore you will probably open the way to a greater diversity, and I think a more creative development of support service networks in the community, using such programs as medicare and hospitalization programs as part of that basic network in our society.

The Chairman: The question Senator Pearson asked you specifically was: if we have maintenance income, what need is there for the blind allowance?

Dr. Forsyth: I am sorry, I was thinking of the Institute for the Blind.

The Chairman: No, the blind allowance or for the crippled, or any of those.

Dr. Forsyth: Categorical programs, yes.

The Chairman: Did you see the interesting article in the Toronto Star by two young fellows from Queen's University?

Dr. Forsyth: Yes.

The Chairman: They had made some study of this, and we know something about it.

They indicated that there would be a saving of $4.66 billion as against the $6.5 billion that is now spent. They were two young men who had been highly recommended and made a study of it. It appeared in the Toronto Star the other day, in which they said one could do away with so many programs that there would be a great saving.

Dr. Forsyth: There would be a terrific recovery.

The Chairman: They used the figure $4.66 billion as against over $6 billion otherwise spent.

Dr. Forsyth: Yes, I would think that categorical programs of that type would go. I thought reference was being made to the agency of CNIB as such, the provision of support service to the blind and so on.

Senator Pearson: I was thinking that each individual would become self-supporting and able to look after himself to some extent, although he would have to have CNIB assistance. He would support himself within the CNIB program.

Dr. MacDonald: I think that what would happen with the introduction of the guaranteed annual income is that some of us who are now spending time trying to devise ways of supplementing an inadequate living allowance for people would be free to do the job we are supposed to be doing, such as helping and counselling these people.

Senator Inman: On page 44 of the brief you say:

We are very conscious that there are parishes and congregations that do not sense any obligation to risk themselves and their resources in actions in support of the weak or the poor.

Is this not a very unusual attitude in churches?

Dr. Forsyth: I think we have to be frank and concede that there are congregations that regard themselves as ecclesiastical service stations, comfort stations for themselves. They are dedicated to the principle of stroking themselves so that they can go away and feel better.

Senator Inman: I come from the Maritimes, and I think we take our religion more seriously.

Dr. Forsyth: You do not have that problem there! Dr. MacDonald has been down there long enough to keep them more alive than that.

Senator Inman: On page 3 of appendix C you remark about the problems of poverty and of putting men and women in jail for relatively minor offences. For many years I was in the position where I saw many great hardships that came to the families of these men and women.

In the case of women with families and no husbands, very often the child welfare societies took care of the children, but in the case of men I have seen families go through great hardships. What alternative would you suggest to putting a man in jail. Have you had any suggestions with regard to what might be done? These families, by the way, did not have access to government aid because the husbands were in jail.

Dr. Forsyth: There are a lot of fellows in jail because we do not use instalment plan fines. A lot of them are in jail because we do not use a system of suspended sentences as creatively as perhaps we might. There are many families in which break-ups occur because we do not use the system where fellows can go out to work and spend a period of time in the evenings in jail as an alternative to the usual kind of incarceration. Frankly, I think sometimes people are in jail when they would be far better off in situations of group therapy which deal with the real problems. They may be in jail for drinking offences. When you get affluent enough your alcoholism assumes a different character and you have other kinds of institutions available.

Senator Inman: Of course, if they are affluent to that extent the families are not suffering.

Dr. Forsyth: When you are poor and drunk, you go to jail and it is really the most inappropriate place to put someone. When you were in Prince Edward Island, for example, you saw the consequences of utilizing already inadequate jails as havens for persons there for drinking offences. They would be far better off in half-way houses.

Senator Inman: I know that some go to jail because it is the easiest way to spend the winter.

Dr. Forsyth: It would have to be a tough winter for it to be a reasonable alternative.

Senator Inman: There was an old chap from Nova Scotia who committed some little fault. My husband said to him, "Jim, how is it that every year I have to sentence you and put you in jail?" He said, "I am well fed and I am warm and I don't have to work."

Dr. Forsyth: You know, there is another famous story of the fellow who showed up Monday mornings in Hoboken, New Jersey before the magistrate on a drunk and disorderly charge. Finally the magistrate said to him, "Look, Sam, why do you always come up before me Monday mornings and why do you always get drunk Friday night or Saturday night?" So the fellow said, "How does a poor man leave Hoboken, New Jersey unless he gets drunk?"

Part of the dilemma in some of these situations is that you have an awful lot of human frustration and human damage and it seems stupid to me to compound this through the use of the jail, as the place where you locate such people, rather than to really grapple with the human problem. Of course, part of the problem is that various communities do not have supportive services to deal with these people.

Senator Inman: I quite agree that there should be some change made with regard to the fines and sentences. On page 14 would you like to comment with regard to your last paragraph:

Long-term strategies to eliminate poverty seem lacking in credibility, in our view, if in the present crisis and stress we revert to the traditional method of asking the poor to bear the heaviest human and economic costs to keep the "system" working!

Would you comment on what you mean by that?

Dr. Forsyth: This is why we feel that some remedial action is necessary now in a situation where we are presumably dedicated to the cause of combatting inflation. The people who are really being asked to bear the great burden are the economically vulnerable—the poor, the unemployed and the ones who are going to be unemployed. This is the price we are paying when a poor chap has to be out of work and go down to the unemployment insurance and get an inadequate benefit. This is what we have to pay to keep the system working. We do not find this credible any longer and we do not think, with the resources available in Canada, that it is necessary that we only have this option. If it is indeed necessary that a man, because of economic shifts, be out of work, we do not think it is necessary that that man should receive benefits inadequate to keep himself and family at some decent level. For that reason we are not prepared to accept that it is inflationary or improper to expect that our society will take the remedial action to cushion the effect of our fiscal policies on the vulnerable and the weak. We do not see that there is any sense for this happening at the present time. Our concern, as Dr. MacDonald expressed it earlier, is that there is a great credibility gap beginning to show up in various parts of this country, indeed, throughout our Canadian society. If we use the "tried and true" method which bears on the weak, the credibility of our long term commitment to deal with poverty is going to be pretty frail.

Senator Inman: On page 15 of the brief you say:

As the work of your committee has shown, a fundamental re-statement of policy must take place and new styles of service must be developed. Axioms have to be challenged; assumptions examined.

What new styles of service must be developed?

Dr. Forsyth: Mr. Chairman, maybe Miss Jackson would be the most appropriate one to respond to that question.

Miss Jackson: Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that in the new style of service I would hope that we could move towards a partnership. I have been in direct service now for a number of years and we have been very used to doing things for people. We have been less used to listening and less used to working with them in any kind of a partnership. I think this is something we are beginning to learn and it is something that is going to change the styles of service. The styles of service will change when we separate income maintenance from service. We have become confused as to our attitudes.

I go back to the point that the poor must come into partnership with us and we must respond to their needs. We already have considerable evidence that there is much that they can do for themselves and will do for themselves. In fact, in many instances they will become the helpers.

Senator Inman: I quite agree with that. We did come across some of the briefs which were presented to us when we were out and they showed that people really try to help themselves and I think that could probably be fostered.

Dr. Forsyth: One example is that you have the trade union movement becoming involved in organizing small-scale industries and enterprises, and so on. In a sense, this is the traditional role for the trade union movement, to keep pushing away, organizing, at the vulnerable centre.

But what happens in the trade union movement at the present time is that they are also prepared to put a different kind of organizer into the field to work along with Indian people, to provide some kind of development thrust with them as partners in the field, and this is the whole development process.

That is a new style, but it is a very appropriate one for the trade union movement to move into.

Senator Inman: Has not there recently been something like that started among the Metis?

Dr. MacDonald: Some weeks ago, senator, in the Toronto Star there was a report about a community in the United States, I have forgotten which one. They selected this community and for a period of a year they gave it a guaranteed annual income which was above the welfare allowance which other communities received. They discovered that once some of these families received this sum of money, they developed a certain respect for themselves, that they go out and buy things for themselves. Then they started to look for employment to supplement their income, and they were allowed to do this in the terms of the experiment—to supplement the income so that they really would be able to live like the others.

The Chairman: You are talking about Trenton, New Jersey—that is our gospel. As a matter of fact there have been quite a number of American experiments.

Now, I have a question. Miss Jackson is a social worker of considerable prestige and renown. She has been in the business for some time. Dr. Forsyth has been around for some time and knows the social background.

But why has not this partnership been brought about a little sooner in the church that we are now talking about? What has been holding it back all this time? I will go one step further, and understand what I am saying, please. We have had a minimum of spiritual leaning in our briefs here that we have had before us. That is surprisingly so. It surprises us and surprises other persons. We do not quite know why. I do not know, anyway. There you are. You tell us.

Dr. MacDonald: If I may come back to that. I am sure the others will have something to say about this. I don't know Mr. Secord's reading of the history of trade unionism but my reading of the history of trade unionism in Great Britain, for example, is that the trade union movement grew up out of the Methodist class meeting. The Tolpuddle martyrs were all lay readers in the Methodist church. George Lovelace, who is buried in Fanshawe here within the Province of Ontario was one of them.

The history of the labour movement in its inception was the lay Methodist class meeting reader getting alongside of the people. This was the history in Great Britain. There was a different kind of history in the United States, but a lot of this spirit still holds.

Your second point, about the paucity of spirituality, is it, in the briefs which have come to you. This is probably partly the "new theology," that says that the thing we are doing here today is spiritual, that what we are standing for here is spiritual, that the whole fabric of life is infused with the spirit, that the Christ is where people are, and that God can be just as present here in this Senate room chamber as he is at our meeting of session or at a revival campaign.

Dr. Forsyth: I was regarding this whole enterprise this morning as a midrash on Isaiah!

Mr. Chairman, you talk about the partnership. The theological school that I have my roots in happens to be one of the centres in Canada of the social gospel, in Winnipeg. And out of that school came Woodsworth.

I think the connections were pretty clear between the social gospel movement that came up through Europe, through the United States into our area, and that kind of spill over into social and political concerns and activism—I think that the partnership that you are talking about has been pretty slow in coming in many quarters.

What we have all been frustrated by—some of us in different community situations for years—is the fact that hitherto we have lived, in a simpler kind of society. There were individual tracks and systems that had their separate identity. You had an educational track; you had the church system; you had the social welfare system. There were nice connections between them from time to time. But there was a certain tidiness about it. You worked your own area.

Now all that tidiness is all blown to pieces.

I think that some of us who have been in community situations—certainly, Dr. MacDonald has been, for a great many years before he came to Toronto—have realized that separateness had to break down.

It is only gradually dawning on people that we have that troublesome and ineffective kind of separateness of the delivery of service—the separateness, for example, of the Government agency as against the private agency. It is hard to get partnerships. One of the reasons you do not get day care use of CAP money is because the governments have a real sense of resistance to letting those moneys go out of their hands into the hands of a private agency that is able to provide ancillary services. It is that hard.

It is much the same with the churches. But that kind of thing just will not do any longer. It is a slow business breaking it down. You have had enough testimony before this committee to know how darn difficult it is to get people past it, seeing things only from their own narrow perspectives. If they are in the Department of Labour, for example, or sometimes in agencies they look at things only from that point of view. That is the whole problem.

The Chairman: We are trying to look beyond the old age security system.

Dr. Forsyth: Oh, we thought you were balking at our interim report proposal, and those recommendations!

Senator Cook: With my other colleagues, I would like to thank the delegation for the excellent brief. It tells a great deal and we have learned a lot from it. The witnesses have demonstrated their concern and their knowledge of the problem.

Having said that, I want to say one little word about the Young White Paper on taxation. I had known a little about taxation from the other side of the fence. Bearing in mind we are in North America and not in Sweden or Japan, but in North America—and it is not only the ability to pay which counts, it is the fact that there are certain economic limits to the amount of taxation that can be extracted from the Canadian people and Canadian business and industries. I get the impression that there are some very astute and well informed people in the Department of Finance who have turned the screws as tightly as they possibly can turn them and any taxation which can be extracted they are going to extract. I think that we are going to be disappointed, in the reaction of the Canadian people to the White Paper. I doubt if there is very much additional taxation going to come from it, simply because of the fact, as I say, there are economic limits on the amount of taxation you can extract.

Having said that, I turn to page 24 and there you say:

The costs of such a transformation of benefits would not be excessive, if benefits became taxable income, and if tax exemptions for children and youth were reduced or eliminated...

I understood Dr. Forsyth to say that the gross cost would be $1.8 billion.

Dr. Forsyth: Yes, that is my estimate. That is trebling the amount we are now paying.

Senator Cook: And then you said the recovery would be about 40 per cent.

An hon. Senator: 50 per cent?

Senator Cook: Taking it as 50 per cent. The 50 per cent of $1.8 billion is $900 million. But then do I understand you to say that the total cost is going to be $300 million. I am trying to find out the difference.

Dr. Forsyth: The difference is $300 million. We are now spending over $600 million. We have half of that, because you are talking about $300 or $400 million that you will require of new money.

Senator Cook: The extra will cost $1.8 billion, do you say?

Dr. Forsyth: The total program will cost that. The new money would be $300 or $400 million. The estimate of the federal revenue increases under the White Paper proposals is $600 million. So it fits inside that, it seems to me.

Senator Cook: Come again?

Dr. Forsyth: The total cost of the program is $1.8 billion. We are now spending $600 million. We would recover 40 to 50 per cent maybe. That means that the new money required in addition to the $600 million we are now spending would be $300 million, to bring it up to about $900 million, because you would recover the rest through the tax system. So new money that you would have to find would be $300 million.

Senator Pearson: Plus $600 million.

Dr. Forsyth: No, that is in the tax system now. In new money we are talking about $300 million. The estimates of the generation of new money as a result of implementing the White Paper proposals is $600 million. It seems to us, on those rough calculations, and admittedly they are rough, it can fit inside federal spending capabilities as well as the improvement to the old age benefits and so on.

So far as we can make some crude estimates, the things that we are proposing are not irresponsible, in terms of the capacity of the tax system to generate the necessary revenues.

Senator Cook: I think probably there is a difference of opinion between us, but leaving that aside for the moment, agreeing with the over-all thrust and assuming that there is not enough money to carry out all that you would like, and that we would like, too, and that you have suggested in the brief, what would be your absolute top priority to have put into effect immediately supposing it could be done?

Dr. Forsyth: Maybe we should poll our group. My absolute top priority would be income maintenance, because I think the whole thing sits on that. I think it is essential.

The Chairman: A guaranteed minimum.

Dr. Forsyth: Either we have to move latterly through existing programs or we have to move some other way, but we have to move to income maintenance. It is essential. We have some apparatus to do that now.

The Chairman: We are doing it now, Dr. Forsyth.

Dr. Forsyth: To a degree, yes.

Senator Cook: You mean universal income maintenance?

Dr. Forsyth: We have to move to an adequate income maintenance program in Canada. It would have to be phased, and we have tried to suggest that the way in which this could be done would be to take one small region and see how that applied to the rest of Canada. We are not competent to judge on what base you would devise a really full-blown guaranteed income program for Canada; whether you would use the negative income tax technique or some other technique; but we have suggested that we should move into a region like Prince Edward Island and design some system and see what happens in Canadian terms, looking at our social security system, Medicare and so on. I really think this is absolutely essential.

Senator McGrand: Why choose Prince Edward Island? I should think you would want to select a place like Newfoundland, or the northern part of Newfoundland where you have the poor fisherman.

The Chairman: What do you say, Senator Cook?

Senator Cook: The matter of top priority was the question, and that has been answered. Perhaps it is not entirely fair to ask what estimate the witnesses have for the cost of that top priority.

Dr. Forsyth: Not really, because the best that we could come up with was to work out the route we would choose, using rough estimates. And so we used the family allowance system and moved latterly to the guaranteed income system. We wanted to suggest a trial reign—Prince Edward Island, northern Newfoundland or anywhere else you would choose—in order to get a definable area from which we could determine what shape the program would take for the whole of Canada. Admittedly, your research facilities are far greater than ours. We are not competent in that area. Nevertheless, we certainly felt that as we developed our approach we had to tackle the income maintenance problem, and we felt that we could use existing programs and move sideways to get where we wanted to in principle without prejudging the style of it.

The Chairman: Dr. Forsyth, reference has been made to the tremendous program underway in New Jersey at the present time, one of the very important programs in this generation costing billions of dollars.

Dr. Forsyth: Yes, that is right.

The Chairman: Fifty-two of the most competent people available in the United States were picked to work on that program. We have the benefit of seeing their work. Our people have been there. As they produce results we see them. If you take away the aspect of colour, the type of poverty situation under study there is the same as here. Is there any use in our going around and making tests, when such information is available to us in the most sophisticated terms? Thus we are using that as a basis, and if we decide to plunge, well, we will just have to plunge. That is all. If there are some bugs that have to be cleared up, they will have to be cleared up. There will always be bugs.

Dr. Forsyth: Our suggestion is pretty tentative, but it was simply to say all right, there is tremendous data to be learned and extrapolated from the New Jersey experiment and to be applied to Canada. However, the mix in policies is somewhat different here because of the kinds of patterns, Medicare and so on, that are involved, and these things have to readjusted to meet the situation in Canada. We have to go back to Professor Kelly's comment and to the reference on page 22 of our brief which says that if we really want to deal with this problem we can't look at the social security system in isolation, or anything else, for that matter. We have to scrutinize the taxation and expenditure patterns. And if we take Professor Kelly's comment about the needs for coordinated policy seriously, then we have to start somewhere in the Canadian context and determine what we have in Canadian policy, what are the tax patterns and the constitutional differences and the tax fields used constitutionally in Canada as against, for example, New Jersey; and what is the impact therefore of the mix of these policies and how do we adjust these to the Canadian situation? We would hope that we could learn from the New Jersey experiment.

We say that there is a lot of adjusting to do, but we do not suggest the style of it. The best we can come up with is that it is a desirable objective, it is basic and we think we can move laterally through the family allowance, youth allowance system and old age security system toward that point.

The Chairman: Dr. Forsyth, since you are here we are going to take advantage of discussing this with you. We are not without knowledge in this country. Our family allowance is that sort of program. Old age security is. We have more experience in the guaranteed income field than any other country in the world. We are the only people practicing it. If you have read Willard's brief, you will see that he devoted pages to saying that if we are going to go into that sort of scheme he is the person who knows more about it than anybody else. I asked him that question, as a matter of fact, and he said that is what it meant. So we are not without knowledge.

Nevertheless, people in this country are asking us, "Don't you know everything there is to know about poverty by now?" and we have carefully to tell them, "No, we don't know everything because this is the first time in the history of this country that such a study has been done." So we have to go back to the people and say that there must be experimentation here and there. We have to make up our minds and say that in our view this is it. If people don't agree with it, that is another matter, but we hope the Canadian people will.

We have passed the point of too much experimentation. Nobody is trying to talk lightly on these matters, but the maintenance income is going to cost money and the only way to get the money is to tax. It is as simple as that. The Canadian people will have to be prepared to pay that tax, whatever it may be. Let us hope it will be reasonable. I think it will be reasonable. I am satisfied and I think many people are satisfied that it will not be too great a burden.

What we have to do is to make sure and to indicate that the burden will be carried by the right people and not by people who are unable to carry the burden.

The White Paper may help in that respect.

Dr. Forsyth: Mr. Chairman, there should be no misunderstanding. As far as our submission is concerned and as far as our Board is concerned, we accept the guaranteed income approach as a desirable social objective for this country, and we have merely tried to suggest ways in which you can move laterally towards this. So there is no dispute where the objective is concerned. The only thing we think we would also state is that right now part of the dilemma is that some of the existing tax policies, municipal, federal and otherwise are making some of the existing social programs counter-productive. They destroy them. And we feel that you have to have this kind of policy co-ordination and restatement, because otherwise even the best thing that you propose will be destroyed in its impact. Moreover, the one experience, and the best experience we have of GIS in the old-age security field, has been artificially frozen so that it is not responsive to the changes in cost. And we suggest that that has to be removed if we are going to be realistic. So we go back to the things that you have suggested, and we are not prepared to back off that. We think that this is the one specific experience we have in this country of the guaranteed income approach, and already we have done exactly what we have done historically in all welfare programs, namely, to artificially freeze them because we are really not committed, in my view, to the principle of relating the income of people to the thrust of the economy. Until we are prepared to make that commitment, we are going to start horsing around if we merely move the limit from 2 per cent to 3 per cent.

The Chairman: Just a moment. Let us talk about that for a moment.

Senator Cook: All the doctor is saying is that they have to have a better income too.

Dr. Forsyth: That is exactly what I am saying. We have stated this—and it goes beyond simply tying it to the cost of living.

The Chairman: But it is more than the cost of living. Let us see what your thinking is on this. How do you see the changes that are needed being brought to bear upon the public and the government?

Dr. Forsyth: In the GIS?

The Chairman: Assuming we have a maintenance income and you say we should not freeze it, then how do you see the changes being brought about?

Dr. Forsyth: It seems to me that you are not going to have the program in the first place until there is a commitment through Parliament, and until the Canadian people are prepared to move in this direction, and create a system that is something other than the old welfare system with a new name on it. It seems to me therefore that there are two kinds of ways in which the system as devised has to be responsive. And I think we would learn a lot if we would only to exactly these things in the GIS we provide under the old-age security program, by the way. In the interim we have some time to learn. But I think the two things we have to be responsive to are the cost of living so that payments should move as the actual costs in the economy go up. But the second thing is in my view just as important. The Canadian Welfare Council touches on it, although they don't explore it very far. That is, there really ought to be a way in which we are not only saying "we will keep you in position in the stream of earnings and income in Canada" but we should also see if there is some way in which we can also make the system responsive so that as the economy grows the share of the person is also enlarged. So he has not only a share in terms of living costs but actually a share of new growth, new wealth generated in the society. If we don't do that, if we are just doing the one and not the other; if we are just saying that all we are going to do is to maintain the income level, the position of relative poverty, so to speak—the relative income level in relation to the society, then as the society starts to take off there is really no mechanism we have that allows all to have a share of that take-off.

The Chairman: The Economic Council in Canada gives us a review and a forecast of the economic outlook for the country and it has great effect on the Government and on the people. Can you foresee a social council on a similar sort of basis to review constantly or annually the various matters of income maintenance and continue recommendations and continue pressures. Do you see that?

Dr. Forsyth: Yes.

The Chairman: Can you see anything better than that?

Dr. Forsyth: Well, I think you would have to provide for certain basic increase possibilities in the statute. We come back to this one again and again. But in terms of provincial welfare programs as they presently exist and the old-age security field and so on, it seems to me that there really ought to be some better way through the statute by which you could provide for the increase of benefits beyond the 2 per cent or any other limit you want to impose.

Senator McGrand: In other words a sliding scale.

Dr. Forsyth: Sure, but it should be written into the statute. I really do not think that you need to have a Social Council of Canada pronounce dogmatically at the beginning of the year "really chaps, we ought to have two or 2.5 per cent this year." I mean I really think it is possible with our technology and competence to respond in that area fairly automatically. But I think the social council idea is critical when you are trying to probe this other matter of which I spoke. That is to say, how do we get more people having a share in what this country is producing in its totality? I think this is very important because what worries me, Mr. Chairman, is that we can probably do more fairly easily to stabilize income levels for people. But this is not the only dimension of people's participation in society.

You know, the little announcement in the "Toronto Symphony Bulletin" the other night told the customers that they are going to have to hike up the rates on tickets next year. I suppose that is tough. The Canada Council cannot put more dollar clout into the orchestra. But the fact of the matter is that there are thousands upon thousands of kids and adults who have no chance to participate in that stream of our subsidized society at all. It is ridiculous to say that people of the less affluent class don't really like that sort of music. I think the same percentage in that class would like that sort of music as now like it in other classes of our society. There are those who like rock and there are those who like Bach. I think we need to have access for both. Now it seems to me that a Social Council could begin to explore that problem and ask themselves "to what degree do we begin to open up opportunities for the real participation of all Canadians in the total wealth of opportunity and life style?" I think that is a critical matter. Perhaps we should have explored that more ourselves, but it is hard to get at.

The Chairman: The one thing that bothers Government, you know, and it may be hard to imagine, but the cost of living could drop. It is one of the things that troubled us in various committees. That is the problem of escalating the amounts and not knowing how to deal with it if by chance the cost of living should drop. Of course it has not happened, but conceivably it could.

Dr. Forsyth: In the years since 1939, has there been any significant lurching down of the cost of living?

The Chairman: It may have happened. On two or three committees that we had to deal with where the question arose, it bothered the people who did the research.

Dr. MacDonald: Would you mind spelling out the dynamics of your statement that it bothers Government if the cost of living drops?

The Chairman: No, they would love to have it drop.

Dr. MacDonald: What are the dynamics of dealing with it?

The Chairman: Well, you are used to receiving 2 per cent increase and suddenly it is down and you are only receiving 1 per cent and it really bothers you. The history of social welfare in this country is that you never reduce it. Once it is there, it stays there and you have to go up.

Dr. Forsyth: The history of social services in this country is always that you are trying to push the ceiling to adequate levels. That is the real history. I cannot think of a more unattractive exercise than trying to forecast the probabilities of a decline in the cost of living. It seems to me that the whole Atlantic economy—the economy of the Western world should have a motto over it: "Excelsior" because if it ever hits the plateau, that is the least it does, and it is always going up.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): Mr. Chairman, I said a while ago that I was interested in training, and I would like to take a minute to talk about the training program and the working poor. In this committee we have not talked very much this morning about the poor. The working poor is a class by itself and falls into the category of illiterate people, and they are the type of people who usually have great difficulties. We have with us this morning a union man who has been very quiet. It is always a pleasure to argue with a union man, even if I find that he wins. I am going to make a statement, and I hope that you will have an answer. Why is it that the union makes it so tough for that class of people?

I will illustrate what I mean to say. Throughout this debate on poverty I think we have to accept the concept that we have a generation of illiterate people, married men of the age of 35 or 40, who have been living by means of whatever they have. They are not well trained; they are common labour and some are a little better than Grade IV or Grade V. We have a great number in New Brunswick, with the pulpwood and logging on the rivers and working in the mills. We have a training program. At times we say that we are trying to upgrade these people, and we have been fairly successful. However, this is not the answer. I think we have to accept that we will never upgrade these people to the required Grade XII, which is very often insisted upon by unions. I think we have to make a concession with regard to this generation. I think it is a waste of time and money to try to upgrade these people to Grade XII to meet the requirements. We should try to provide them with occupations which will keep them busy at their earning level capacity. If they have not enough money to support their family, then maybe we should pay the balance, to give them a decent income.

We do not do that at the moment when they apply to go to school. As I say, we go to Grade V, and we have them by the thousands. In 52 weeks we try to grade them up to Grade VIII, which is really ridiculous. If we improve their Grade V, that is about all we do, and they had their Grade V when they were at school 20 years ago. The first year it is just reviewing the first four or five years. When they have done a year, they change schools and go to the training school. They go there and they say: "I want to become a barber." "I want to become a mechanic." "I want to be a mason." "I want to be a tailor." So the school says, "No, you cannot take the course; you have not got your Grade XII." I think this is one of the problems we are facing now. I am not convinced by a long way that we need Grade XII to become a barber. Maybe you do for some classes of barber, and I am making allowances. I am not at all convinced that you have to have Grade XII to be employed by a certain company to cut pulpwood, because these people have been cutting pulpwood for 20 years with what they had, and they are good men at their job.

My question was: Why is it that the unions sometimes insist that you have Grade XII to do this type of job, at this stage of the game. Maybe we can insist on it at a later date, with their children, but we have to help the older man and his family as they are. I say that because we are not going to change them. We have to provide them with employment the way they are. We might subsidize the balance of their income in order to give them a decent standard of living, but to deprive them of an occupation because they have not got Grade XII, which would be impossible to achieve, is ridiculous. What we do in these cases is that we send them home and they become a public charge, from zero up to the full amount of family support. Why are you people so tough on these people?

Mr. Secord: I am not aware that we are. As you were speaking, I was trying to relate this to my knowledge of various organizations. When you mention the cutting of pulpwood, I cannot imagine the International Woodworkers of America demanding Grade XII as an educational level before they would permit pulp cutters in the woods. In fact, the union, as such, has no control over that at all. It is the employer. It is very often the employer, in fact, most often the employer, who demands the educational level.

I can recall the 1930s when Canadian National Railways at one stage, in about 1933, was demanding at least a B.A. before they would hire a man to drive a truck. This had nothing to do with the unions; it simply related to our depression days.

I am not familiar with the craft organizations, only in a very remote sense, because I come from the industrial section of trade unionism. But with regard to the craft unions, yes, in some instances I can understand why a Grade XII would be a minimum requirement to train an electrician, for example, because we simply could not understand the academic end of the training that would be necessary without at least that level, I would say.

No doubt there are certain other crafts which would require it. I agree with you that for a barber I could not imagine a Grade XII being needed, and I do not really know whether the barbers' union really requires it or not.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): I agree with about 75 per cent of what you have said. When you said that the unions have no control, I do not agree with that, because I think that between the employer and the union it is a kind of buck-passing affair, where the union says, "We have no control," and the company says, "It is the unions that do not want to do this sort of thing."

We have asked this question in other places of trade union people. Again, they say it is a buck-passing affair. I remember asking a question in Montreal on another committee, the Immigration Committee. The barbers said it was the Government that insisted on that; that the Government makes the regulations. So, we got after the Government and they said, "We had to make the regulation due to pressure coming from the unions." So the union was passing the buck to the Government, and the Government was passing the buck to the barbers, and it went around in circles like that. However, I will leave it at that. These are the sort of things that happen, and you and I cannot settle that this morning.

Dr. MacDonald: Maybe Grade XII became the requirement when barbers became "men's hair stylists"!

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): Possibly Grade I would be enough for some of these hippies we have.

Mr. Secord: I do not visit the barber too much, senator!

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): I think that today we have many young people in the training schools who are not there to improve their situation at all, but who are just there for the money that is going to be paid to them. I know many who are there to pass the winter because there is a revenue that comes out of it, not because they are interested. We also have great numbers—and I am pointing out some of the failures I see in the system—of young men taking a course of training for which there is no employment in the area. If a man is wise enough, he will go and cry on the shoulders of the selection officers and will get transferred to another course. Some of them are taking a third course of training, and so on.

Coming back to the working people, the working class which I mentioned, why do we not have a certain semi-skilled system or semi-skilled classification? You go to one of these training schools and you need your Grade XII for entrance, and to graduate you have to get your certification for your training. Only a certain class of people can do that in our day and age. There is only a certain group of people who have the education for it. Why do we not have a program for training semi-skilled people? Why cannot we say to a person who has had little education: "You will be a semi-skilled electrician, or an electrician's helper"? Why cannot we have plumber's helpers, and motor mechanic's helpers? Why cannot we have the classification of "helper" in the trades instead of having only fully-fledged tradesmen? We seem to jump from zero to sky-high in respect of training. There is nothing in the middle for the working poor. This is the best they can do in life. They either earn their living with that, or become a charge upon society.

I am referring to the unions in this respect. This should be recommended by the unions because they deal with the working people. Why cannot we have this classification of "helper", instead of classifications that call for high degrees of skill?

Mr. Second: Of course, many of the trades do have helpers in training. For example, on the railways there are machinist's helpers. That is a classification as such. If you do not graduate to the grade of a machinist then you may be a helper for a very long time. There are helpers in the printing trades, for example. Those helpers are in the process of becoming journeymen. So, there is a "helper" class in many of the trades, but it is a part of the training program.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): But these people are training for the classification of the fully-fledged tradesman. While they are helpers they naturally have the hope of becoming certified. The class of people to whom I am referring has no hope of getting the fully-fledged certification. They are limited in their opportunities because of their education, their ability, and the conditions in which they live. They are the working poor.

Dr. Forsyth: I think, senator, that we have tried to touch on several areas in this training field because there are a lot of issues of the sort you have mentioned. There is no question but that one of the characteristics of our society is that it is a "Credentials Society". This can be a very good thing, but it can also be very debilitating. Because it can mean that there are class enclaves that shut out other people, where you try to protect your "piece of turf". Some of this can be as phony as a three dollar bill.

Part of the reason why you have difficulty in getting institutional groups to work with each other in practice is because of this kind of enclave. If you go into the university context you can see that they have a terrible time these days with interdisciplinary committees and institutes. It is very difficult for the economist, for example, to cast his pearls before people who are taking psychology. They say: "Good gracious, this is impossible. They would not understand." Yet, this thinking obviously is preventing decent policy formation that requires that we go across disciplinary lines. Even inside the university milieu itself it is hard to build the bridges and get across traditional "compartments of learning".

I think we have to try to suggest that there are other styles that can be used. We have tried to mention the fact that there is a lot that needs to be learned in Canada yet from the manpower studies of this Senate. There are a lot of things that need to be learned from experience in the United States where corporations have engaged in crash programs of training in the work context. Arthur Pear and Frank Reissman have taken the position—and we quote them at page 29—that we have to recognize that this idea that you take training prior to work, in many, many cases dealing with the lower income groups this notion has got to go out the window. The training has to take place subsequent to the employment opportunity. This is a whole new game.

I think it is ridiculous, for example, that some of the giant corporations that have an American base, and that are represented in this country, are not really being pushed very hard to carry out the kinds of programs for training of the hard core unemployed and on in Canada that they are carrying out with great effect in various parts of the United States. This is one kind of corporate dividend that we should be able to retain in this country without having it go across the border. I think there ought to be pressures put upon them to do very much more in Canada in the way of generating these programs with the dollars they earn from their operations here instead of taking those dollars back across the border and using them to solve American problems. We have got problems of our own.

At the same time, I think that there are other kinds of ancillary educational agencies that need to go to work with people who have imited educational backgrounds, so that they may have the type of "helper level" job that you are talking about. This is why we were very much taken with what the Frontier College people had to say, because they are out in the field, as other agencies are. I think, for example, that family agencies and agencies of that type have different kinds of roles to play in the community as partners in adult education and community education work of a style that we have not had before. These are the things we have tried to comment on.

Dr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, Senator Fournier has brought up an important thing when he referred to the special attention given to the working poor. You said that we are not under a time ban here, so I would like to take just a minute to tell you of something about which I know. I am not betraying a confidence because I asked the woman concerned directly if I could use this as a case history at such a gathering as this, and she gave me her permission. This is not a bleeding heart story, either.

This is the case of a man who has a Grade 2 education. He has a job in the City of Toronto which he is able to do effectively with his education. He will never be able to advance beyond Grade 2. He is in his fifties. He will get no promotion in the job he is in. His take-home pay is $60 a week. He and his wife have a family of three children, and with this amount of take-home pay they were totally unable to make ends meet.

One morning the wife came down to find a note on the table saying that her husband had left home, and giving no forwarding address. I understand, as an annex to this, that she knew very well where he went, but he left no forwarding address. She was then able to apply for welfare. She applied for welfare, and she got it.

She receives in the mail periodically an envelope containing a $20 bill, or a box containing a pair of shoes that happen to fit a certain child. She knows where these things come from. I would suspect that they are able to visit back and forth at the room where he is staying. But, this is the kind of lie into which this man and woman have been driven by their being part of the working poor. This is a factual instance that I could document, but I will go no further because this is the point at which confidentiality would be broken.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): We are all aware of many such cases.

Dr. MacDonald: I am sure you are, but I do not mind having that case written into the record.

Senator Carter: I should like to come to your suggestion that we make an interim report. If we make an interim report surely we must have some idea of where the money is going to come from. We have not had many briefs that give us much help on that point, and your own brief does not help us either.

Dr. Forsyth mentioned that we have a surplus, but a surplus is a one-shot affair. We may not have a surplus next year. He referred to the extra income from the proposals, but we do not know what the proposals are. They are only proposals, and we do not know what the end result will be when they are translated into legislation.

At this point I want to question Dr. Forsyth's mathematical reasoning. If I understood him correctly he stated that we are spending now $600 million on the family allowance, and that for a net expenditure of $300 more, making a total expenditure of $900 million, we could triple the benefits.

Dr. Forsyth: Yes.

Senator Carter: To me that is a mathematical absurdity.

Dr. Forsyth: Perhaps I did not make myself clear. If you triple the benefits that are now running at precisely $618 million—that would be $1.8 billion—then I am suggesting that you could recover through the tax system...

Senator Carter: That is where we part company. You are assuming that we are going to recover $900 million, but you have given us no basis for that assumption.

Dr. Forsyth: No, I am assuming that we are going to recover through the tax system about half of what it costs.

Senator Carter: But you have no basis that your assumption is correct, or even nearly correct.

Dr. Forsyth: Then I would suggest that the obvious way to deal with that one is to test out mathematically my assumptions to see how far wrong I am.

Senator Carter: The family allowances were introduced somewhere around 1947.

Since 1947 inflation has eroded the dollar to about 40 per cent or 50 per cent. All you are doing with $300 million net expenditure is replacing the erosion of the dollar and bringing them back to the parity they had when they were first introduced. The 50 per cent certainly will not multiply the benefits threefold.

Dr. Forsyth: I am happy to concede that I could be far out in the net costs. For instance, if the recoveries are not 50 per cent, but in fact 30 per cent by changes in the tax system to make all family allowance payment taxable income, which they are not at the present time. Our brief suggests that the benefits be tripled and made taxable income. The third point we make is that work should commence on the tax exemptions for children, and so on, because these in fact work to the advantage of the upper income group and not that of the poor at all. There are three recommendations, one of which aims at tripled dollars for the family and youth allowances using the present demogrant system to make payments to all children of Canadian families. My hunch is that you could probably recover 40 per cent of this money.

Senator Carter: If you could recover 25 per cent you would be doing very well.

Dr. Forsyth: One could be far out. On my estimate it was an additional $300 million; on your hunch it is $600 million. I would still point out that that is within the limits of new tax dollars to be generated under the tax system and I think it becomes a reasonable way to proceed.

Senator Carter: Under the present tax system?

Dr. Forsyth: No, under the proposals.

Senator Carter: Yes, but they are still proposals. We do not know how they are going to be modified. We expect they will be to a great extent, but we cannot assume that they are going to be introduced as they are now, holus bolus.

Dr. Forsyth: We had to assume what we could, which was that these are proposals that more or less in their present form would come before Parliament for enactment. Building on that assumption we considered how we would proceed laterally in a responsible way, through existing programs or by other means, to move towards an income support program.

We decided that, given this set of circumstances, we could move through the family allowance system. You may be quite right that in fact these proposals will not emerge in this form or anything like it. In those circumstances, our kind of submission or suggestion would have to be radically recast, but still think that the issue would be the same: how do you move to develop an income maintenance system that would be financed on the federal side?

Senator Carter: You said something earlier which I did not quite catch or understand. Perhaps I did not hear enough of it. You made reference to the committee adopting an approach advocated by Senator Lamontagne. Would you clarify that?

Dr. Forsyth: No, this is the reference in our brief to Senator Lamontagne's remarks about the fact that he disagrees with the analysis that is being made of the causes of the inflationary movement. He favours an analysis on the cost-push side rather than the demand-pull.

Senator Carter: If you had $900 million additional revenue to spend on welfare, and you had a choice of spending it to double family allowances or on a guaranteed annual income, which would be your choice?

Dr. Forsyth: Can we assume that the guaranteed income to which you make reference is one that...

Senator Carter: Based on the size of the family.

Dr. Forsyth: Which would be viable in the Canadian Welfare Council's terms.

Senator Carter: It would be based on the scale somehow.

Dr. Forsyth: We would be using something along the lines of a negative income tax technique to get at it. I would opt for the guaranteed income, because then I could eliminate other programs.

Senator Carter: If government cannot obtain the $900 million or $1.8 billion that is required without cutting expenditures, where would you advocate government should cut expenditures?

Dr. Forsyth: Defence.

The Chairman: I thought he was going to say senators' salaries.

Dr. Forsyth: No, I regard that as an income maintenance program, sir. It is one of the best guaranteed annual income programs we have.

Senator Carter: You mentioned that before. At page 5 of your brief reference is made to the will, not much point having these schemes; it all depends on the will that the Canadian people have to do it. On page 19 you adopt Mr. Baetz's words:

As long as we waffle at the moral and philosophical level, we will waffle at the policy level...

Later on you refer to commitment. I gather that that is what you are referring to, this will being a commitment. In my opinion that should be one of the principal roles of the church, to develop this commitment in the segments of the church and in the body of the church in the wider sense. However, when you come to finding money, you and all the others pounce on defence. You have not said a word about the $1.8 billion Canadians spend on liquor, the $1 billion we spend on tobacco, the $1 billion on horse racing and other forms of gambling, the $500 million spent on candy, dog and cat food, but you pounce on defence. How do you explain this?

Dr. MacDonald: We have made a number of statements in other connections in regard to the issues you raise such as liquor, tobacco and horse racing. In fact, we have said so much about them that we have become earmarked as being a puritanical body that does not think in any other terms.

Senator Carter: If by this commitment you are going change the attitude and hearts of the Canadian people so as to find the money, is that not a better way than to go back and reduce our obligations?

Dr. MacDonald: In my estimation it is not. It is not a case of "either-or", but of "both-and." The defence budget, which is the one we mentioned, is making a contribution, possibly to a large extent, to the defence of our nation, but there are some real questions as to whether or not it is really defending. There seems to be a credibility gap there. Also, there is the concern that the core and youth with whom we work do not get into the rut of poverty. In our present thinking that is the one thing to which they are objecting and protesting in Canadian and North American society. We feel that it is one of the logical places to begin. If it can be obtained from the other sources, that is all right with us.

Senator Carter: That is not the point. You have missed two points. The point is to what extent should we let other people take responsibility for our defence? You have shied away from that. The other is, is there not an obligation on the church to go out and try to get the revenue from these other sources?

Dr. Forsyth: In answer to both elements, first of all I think that it is over-simple to suggest that we are likely to shift $1.8 billion of expenditure on defence totally and completely into other areas. I think there are recoveries and patterns there as you de-emphasize one kind of role and pick up others in human development. At the same time, one of the great ironies of the situation is that there is a fair bit of government revenue, provincial and federal, generated through horse racing, through the liquor traffic and various other things. The point is, it is not a case of going out to get the revenue from these sources. In fact, the Government is rather adept at getting the revenue from these sources. If people were left to their own devices, booze would be a lot cheaper than it is, but the Government is right there and they generate a fair whack of their revenues in Ontario, for example, from such sources.

Senator Carter: I am not speaking in terms of revenue but in terms of the Canadian people and the commitment and attitudes that you have talked about in your brief, and the will to get out and do something about this problem of poverty. We will not make any progress at all if we cannot accomplish something in the hearts of the Canadian people.

Dr. Forsyth: I think you are right. I think that to this extent, if you could get a shift in the Canadian attitudes there would be a disposition to de-emphasize personal expenditures on cigarettes, liquor and so on, which would lead, of course, to a decline in government revenues from those sources, which would have to be offset as we play the tax game a different way, just to make up the money that is lost.

The other part of the problem and the irony is, of course, in the arena of people's own personal choices. Let us be frank about it. One of the things you do if you generate income maintenance programs that are reasonably adequate is to put people in a position where they can go out and buy cigarettes, and go down the street and buy a case of beer. Those may not be my particular choices or Dr. MacDonald's choices, or the choices of any people in this room, but it is their choice.

Senator Carter: The point is that is the whole meaning of the word "commitment". You have to commit yourself to one thing or the other.

Dr. MacDonald: It will happen when the Kingdom of God comes.

Senator Carter: But I want to know what the church is doing to bring it about.

Dr. Forsyth: I think that is a fair question. The fact of the matter is that we can only speak from within the context of our own denomination. I think we are one of the few bodies I know of who suggest that possibly there is something faintly silly about the fact that we smoke more in Canada than we spend on public education, and yet we are terribly alarmed about the expenditure on public education.

Senator Carter: I take a dim view of the fact that whenever anybody wants money the only place they can find it from is defence. I don't see any need to make any reduction in defence expenditures myself. I don't think we are spending any more now than we are required to to assume our proper responsibilities. Apart from that, suppose we wiped out defence and saved $1.8 billion. If you had to choose between spending that on welfare and on pollution, what do you do?

Dr. Forsyth: I think you want some total policy mixes, you see. One of the problems of pollution, for example, one of the things we have done such a bad job of, is really integrating policy that has a bearing on pollution. I can think, for example, of some places where industrial development is possible, but only at the expense of mucking up terrain that I think for the sake of the nation as a whole ought not to be polluted. We seem to be under real pressure, in economically weak areas especially, to take certain kinds of development on any terms that they know darn well is going to lead to pollution of the atmosphere, or of the land areas or waterways. If you want a fast answer to the question of where you make the shift, I would suppose that if you had a decent kind of policy mix in the country you would shift in both directions, you would split it.

Senator Cook: I know we cannot cease to be concerned or cannot cease the pressures, but we are making progress. In dealing with poverty, we are making progress, if you contrast what is happening today with the thirties, when people could starve to death nobody was too concerned. At least today there is a general concern amongst most thinking people. The trouble is to get unanimity of opinion on what should be done. But there is certainly concern and a desire to do something, and something has been done over the years—perhaps not enough, but something has been done.

The Chairman: What is bothering Senator Carter, and I know his thinking, is that he is not so much concerned with the infinite as with the finite, and that is what he is getting at.

Dr. MacDonald: I was not being facetious when I said that what you are suggesting will happen when the Kingdom of God comes. What I was really saying was that we have to make the best possible thing we can of the situation confronting us. It is simply a statement of fact, that whether it is in government or in the church we are probably not doing all that we could do and ought to do about the problem, and there are contradictions in the things we say and the things we achieve. The church is confessing this sin every Sunday and trying to do something about it every week, I hope. The same thing, of course, applies in government, as when Judy LaMarsh had to give up smoking, and John Munroe is trying hard to I understand. When you get committed to a certain line of action, certain things follow from it.

The church is now committed to this line of action, although we are not in there pitching the way we would like to see the church doing. We as a board are not always on the ball in the way we would wish we could be. But we are really not dragging our feet on this issue, so far as the church is concerned.

Senator Carter: You have hit on the key word "commitment". If the people are committed I think the government will darn well get committed. But who is going to develop the commitment?

Dr. Forsyth: Part of the dilemma in some of these areas, which has been touched on again and again, is the fact that it is very difficult to be committed about that which you cannot see. One of the things that concerns some of

is the fact that what is beginning to happen is a "ghetto-ization" of our society, of the rural poor who are invisible because a nice tree grows in front of their place, and the urban poor who are invisible because the expressways carry the rest of us around past where they happen to be.

It becomes very difficult to think of folks who are the working poor or the poor poor in really human terms, and to have a sense of commitment to them as human beings. Even if we see documentaries on television there is a sense in which that box can help de-personalize it, it reduces them to some function on the screen and we do not sense the human dynamics. I think one of the great contributions of your committee has been to provide a forum for the actual appearance of such folks in your presence before the nation, so to speak. They have stated the case as they see it as human beings. This is part of the process, surely, by which we generate the kind of commitment that you quite rightly think is important.

Senator Carter: I have one last question on housing.

The Chairman: Just before you go to that, you have hit upon something very important, and Dr. Forsyth has indicated his thinking. Do you not think the commitment that has to be made is ours to recommend?

Senator Carter: Sure.

The Chairman: Is that not our responsibility, to put it in such a way that it is a commitment on the part of the Canadian people?

Senator Carter: Yes, we can recommend it.

The Chairman: No, it is more than recommending, Senator Carter, and that is what I am trying to get at.

Senator Carter: How do we bring it into existence?

The Chairman: By putting it in a way that it becomes a commitment. It is all right to say that a man is poor, but it is another thing to describe him, in living terms, the hovel in which he lives, the shoes the children haven't got, the inability to obtain an education and the perpetuation of poverty generation after generation. There was something in the local paper last night about the people who were burned out. They had been fourteen years on relief and that is a very long time.

Senator Cook: What you are saying is that the witness gives us the bullets and we fire them.

The Chairman: They have done pretty well this morning.

Dr. MacDonald: In regard to this matter of commitment and generating public opinion sometimes the church addresses the state on ethical and other kinds of issues. You could quite properly address the church and say, "You people had better put up or shut up. You have been talking about these things for generations in the church. Now, you have the chance to educate the body of committed Christian people and nominal Christian people in Canada." If you brought out a report which required an increase of taxation, let us say, in order to provide maintenance income for people in Canada so we would educate poverty and you could not get the solid backing of the churches then the churches have failed.

The Chairman: There is no criticism of the churches. We are having a frank and open discussion.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): The problem is how to reach the people who do not attend church.

Senator Carter: I was going to ask about this housing program which is referred to on pages 33 and 34. I would like you to elaborate a bit to more or less get some details of one of the demonstration projects that is referred to on page 32. You said that you could not develop a project that would reach the lowest group. Why are you unable to do this?

Dr. MacDonald: So far as that particular point goes it is because of the need to supplement rental payments on the part of the people who would live in any project which we would create. We can generate the 10 per cent of the equity required in order to start a cooperative housing project provided we can get an interpretation of section 16. This would permit cooperative housing to be built under that section and we would hope that it can be done. Once this has been accomplished the lowest possible rental we could come up with—these figures are open to correction—was in the nature of $105 or up to $135. This would be in a cooperative venture which would make it about 25 per cent below the regular housing costs.

The only people who would be able to get into that kind of housing are those whose rentals are supplemented by the Ontario Housing Corporation in this province. We do not have the kind of capital in order to make an investment that would allow us to supplement their rentals in order to provide housing for them. That is the explanation of that statement.

You ask about the projects. Under the Committee of Housing of the National Board of our church we have got to the stage now where we have publicized for people to present plans and projects to the National Housing Committee. They have been in the process of doing this during the past ten days. We hope that out of one of these proposals submitted by a variety of interested concerns that we will be able to select one that would be viable in terms of the kinds of social mix and in terms of the kind of accommodation which we hope people who are living in the cooperative housing eventually would be able to afford and we would be able to provide.

Along with our United Church project there is a citizens housing committee project being promoted to the city of Toronto at the present time which is an inter-faith project. We hope that both of these will benefit somewhat from the $200 million for experimental housing that is provided by the minister responsible for housing. We have also a number of other projects, which Dr. Forsyth knows more about than I, and which are sort of in the wings and waiting for attention. One which we have already acted upon is in Halifax and there we gave a grant of $45,000.

Dr. Forsyth: One of the things we are concerned about doing in many places with regard to the housing problems of lower income Canadians is to rehabilitate existing neighbourhoods. Sometimes this runs afoul of not being able to meet the standards of C.M.H.C., which are unrealistic in some places.

We provided $45,000 joined with $90,000 of Nova Scotia money to do something in the North Preston area on housing rehabilitation using a "revolving fund" kind of technique. This kind of stimulus is possible.

One of the most interesting and frustrating proposed projects is a project in one Ontario city. They had a most imaginative design for a housing project that would combine a lot of income and family types, as well as senior citizens, plus an inter-connected service centre kind of operation which would relate to the church. This project would involve a bit of land assembly and demolition of a couple of houses. They are running into frustration, because there are no grant supplement programs available. They are unable to force the construction costs down to a place where the rents that would be charged are in fact lower than the area. The "area" is interpreted to be that immediate sector of the city. This is unfortunate because it is an older area where the rents on existing housing are lower than for the city as a whole. Because they can't get them below those levels they cannot qualify for assistance.

We would like to think that there are perhaps some alternative styles by which rent supplement programs or interest subsidy programs could be developed which would get results in the housing field and in addition to that move generally into the whole area of land assembly, which is a critical factor in housing costs.

Senator Fergusson: I want to comment on the fact that you have done such a great deal in the senior citizen housing area and I was wondering if you were continuing this or if you were going into a more mixed area.

Dr. MacDonald: First of all, we have declared a ceiling in the number of senior citizen housing units that we can generate. We are more concerned now for services for senior citizens in order to keep them mobile in a viable livable environment. I do not mean that our homes are ghettos but as long as we can keep them mobile in the community this is the way we would like it to be.

Out of our senior citizens home we provide services for senior citizens and in the homes we provide programs for them in which senior citizens in the community can participate in them and meals can be brought to the homes. We have a program in the church in which 50 meals are given every day, four or five days a week, to senior citizens and shut-ins in that community. This is a cooperative venture with the local hospital providing the meals at cost. We then prepare and distribute them.

Last week I attended one of the most fascinating and I think a "first of its kind" ceremony in Toronto. This was the tearing out of a cornerstone of a church—the "tearing down of the church to the glory of God", sort of thing! (East Broadview United Church closed a year ago.) The Honourable John Yaremko was there, along with one of the senior citizens of the community who was at the laying of the cornerstone. They tore the cornerstone out and the church was to be demolished and a senior citizen's home, the Broadview Foundation, is to be erected on that site. It is to be designed so that it meets the requirements I am suggesting about services from senior citizens that emanate and take place within the structure.

The Chairman: On behalf of the committee, I want you to know that the United Church did themselves proud this morning. You have presented an excellent brief. You have made a moving presentation. What you said was helpful. It is a valuable addition to our record, because you are thinking in realistic terms and your statements were clear and concise. We knew exactly what you meant. We feel that we are on the same wavelength with you. You said your piece and it is very welcome. Thank you.

Dr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, on behalf of the board, may I thank you and the members of this committee for allowing us to come today and for your very incisive questions and the dialogue we have been able to have. Senator Inman asked earlier what are some of the new styles. Well, this is one of the new styles. Thank you.

The committee adjourned.

INTRODUCTION

The Board of Evangelism and Social Service warmly commends the Chairman and members of the Special Senate Committee on Poverty for the diligence and vigour with which you are enquiring into the nature and extent of poverty in Canada.

In passionate language, and with cutting statistics, the Economic Council of Canada (Fifth Annual Review) forced affluent Canada to acknowledge the reality of "the other Canada"—the 'separated society' of the non-participants, the inarticulate, the humiliated, the eroded.

But the Economic Council rightly observed that when the television Poverty 'special' was over, when the Saturday newsmagazine article had done its job of week-end titillation, the issue would tend to fade from the consciousness of Canadians. Poverty would be filed away "under the heading of certain other long-standing national problems" and in that way it would be lost to sight—or regarded as an unfortunate but apparently intractable characteristic of society in the Atlantic Provinces, Eastern Quebec, and in Indian and Eskimo communities.

The establishment of the Special Senate Committee on Poverty has kept this urgent issue before Canadians. You have created a forum, a national 'town meeting', that has been used not only by bureaucrats, 'expert', professionals, leaders of 'establishment' institutions (like the churches!), but also—forthrightly, movingly, often devastatingly—by the poor. We believe that the work of this Committee can help engender a national commitment to re-order the goals of our society, seek the renewal of our institutions, and eliminate poverty.

The forum of your Committee has made it clear that poverty is not confined to a few regions but is present in the total society. Poverty is not the due penalty of those who will not try; overwhelmingly its victims are those who work without escape. You have shown that poverty weakens our cities, even as it blights rural Canada. That it harries the old; and brutalizes administrators even as it degrades welfare recipients.

"We can no longer shut out the screaming that leaks through the ventilation system,"...

of our efficient, 'cool', technological society.

CANADA'S POVERTY SCAR

For purposes of this submission, the Board of Evangelism and Social Service has surveyed the definitions and analyses of the Economic Council of Canada, the Bureau of Statistics and the Special Planning Secretariat. We have noted the new dimensions and insights that have emerged from testimony before your Committee, and from the writings of others who are also struggling with this problem in Canada, in the United States and elsewhere.

Any individual (or family) is in the low-income group if more than 70 per cent of income is spent for the necessities of life—food, clothing, shelter. The discretionary area of income is so slight as to make the family (individual) impoverished. The 1961 census indicated that 916,000 non-farm families and 416,000 individuals—some 4,200,000 persons, including 1,700,000 children under 16 year of age—are thus in the environment of poverty. (Incomes of Canadians, Census Monograph, 1968).

Using another scale of measurement, the economic poverty line in dollars of 1968 purchasing power shapes as follows:

single person	$1,800
family of 2 persons	$3,000
family of 3 persons	$3,600
family of 4 persons	$4,200
family of 5 persons	$4,800

Allowing for the inflationary erosion of 5 per cent during 1969, current levels—just to "stand still"—would have to be adjusted as follows:

single person	$1,890
family of 2 persons	$3,150
family of 3 persons	$3,780
family of 4 persons	$4,410
family of 5 persons	$5,040

But poverty is not simply low-income. Again and again, spokesmen for the poor (welfare recipients, the 'working poor', the disabled) in their testimony before this Committee, have underlined the truth of the Economic Council's statement that poverty is "to feel oneself an unwilling outsider, a virtual non-participant in the society in which one lives". It is not a "sheer lack of essentials to sustain life" but an insufficient access to the goods, services, conditions of life which have come to be accepted as basic to a minimum standard of living. Poverty thus carries with it a sense of entrapment and hopelessness; it issues in defeat, alienation and despair.

The poor are not victims of the social system in the sense that harried "organization men" are victims. Rather, they are 'outsiders' to the major society.

The sign of their separation is seen in the fact that the relationship of government, departments, committees, agencies to the poor is not structured as a relationship of partnership, of peers; but as a relationship of clients, statistical samples, cases or delinquents.

In Canada today "20-20" is a symbol of the distortion of our society rather than an indicator of the clarity of our societal vision. For 20 per cent of non-farm families receive 4.6 per cent of total income, while the top 20 per cent receive 41.1 per cent of total income. (DBS 1965).

It has been said that mere biological humanity without wonder, without expectation, without real future, "is a torso". The real tragedy of poverty, then, is that it liquidates the human, forecloses hope, erodes expectation. Poverty is a form of dying; a suffocation of the human.

The persistence of poverty in Canada is a disgrace. That Canada, which ranks 4th in per capita income, should rank 17th in the "honours list" of infant mortality statistics, suggests need for drastic policy transplants in our society. The poverty "misery-go-round" of bad housing, marginal opportunities, malnutrition, disease, humiliation and social exclusion is an indictment of our policies and institutions.

We completely agree with the assertion of the Sixth Annual Review of the Economic Council of Canada (p. 108) that:

"To the degree that poverty contributes to the exclusion of individuals and families from the mainstream of society, it contributes to potential social tension and unrest. To the degree that poverty places an economic burden on society, it acts as a brake on Canada's economic growth and detracts from the well-being of all Canadians".

Even more, we believe that we dare not ignore any longer the inter-dependence that is a 'given' of life. We must heed the reality of our human 'ecology'! The shattering of any person through poverty diminishes us all. Our data of 'success' and growth conceal damaged individuals. Our "seasonally adjusted" averages hide the particulars of joblessness and misery.

Traditionally we have stressed the civil and political rights given us in our heritage.

The complex dynamics of this technotronic age require that social and economic rights must be inter-connected with civil rights if the latter are to have credibility and substance.

It is our conviction that we must now "deliver" as rights in Canadian society, Articles 22 and 25 of the United Nations Universal Declaration of Human Rights:

Article 22—Everyone, as a member of society, has the right to social security, and is entitled to realization, through national effort and international co-operation, and in accordance with the organization and resources of each State, of the economic, social and cultural rights indispensable for his dignity and the free developments of his personality.

Article 25—Everyone has the right to a standard of living adequate for the health and well-being of himself and of his family, including food, clothing, housing and medical care and necessary social services, and the right to security in the event of unemployment, sickness, disability, widowhood, old age, or other lack of livelihood in circumstances beyond his control.

WHAT SHALL WE DO...

PART ONE

Recommendations For Immediate Action

I

Payments to old age security beneficiaries should be increased

The statutory provision that limits increases in benefits to 2 per cent in any year is clearly unjust and should be changed. The Minister of Health and Welfare has suggested that adjustments in pension legislation must wait in presentation of a White Paper on social policy. He has recently added that legislation arising from the White Paper will not be presented prior to the next session of Parliament. Indeed, he suggested it may possibly be two sessions away.

To delay action until then is intolerable. We therefore urge remedial action at this time.

The basic old age security benefit was at a level of $76.50 per month January 1, 1968. It rose to $79.58 effective January 1, 1970. The 3.08 increase in basic benefits was far behind the escalation of prices in the same period. Indeed the buying power of the pension is some 7.8 per cent less than it was three years ago.

The Guaranteed Income Supplement suffers from the same deficiency. The net result has been that the more than 1,663,000 old age security recipients are worse off year by year a time in life when they can expect additional expense pressures (for special foods, medicines, hearing devices, etc.). The situation is, of course, most serious for the 785,000 Canadians who receive the g.i.s., approximately 62 per cent of whom require the full supplement.

Some provinces are attempting to meet the needs of such persons in various ways. British Columbia uses provisions of the Canada Assistance Plan to provide a $150 monthly income to those who meet 'needs' qualifications. The additional costs are shared 50-50 with the federal government. The Ontario Government has announced a $100 tax rebate program to assist home owners and tenants of self-contained housing units. Such programs are of undoubted value in meeting the needs of some thousands of older citizens.

At the same time, we would stress that there are provinces that cannot provide an adequate guaranteed income level for older persons—either through cost-sharing under

CAP, or in any other effective way. There are too many pressures on their revenues. This is particularly true for those provinces in Canada embarked on a costly "catch-up" drive to reach fully Canadian standards of education, health and community services.

In any event, many older persons requiring assistance do not and will not take advantage of CAP-related programs because they "do not want to go on welfare".

The only appropriate response is to amend the Old Age Security Act and remove the 2 per cent limitation, permitting the level of increase to correspond to actual cost of living changes.

Indeed, given the increasing numbers of persons who must make use of the g.i.s. provision (including 62 per cent or more who require the full g.i.s. benefit), we urge that consideration be given to adjust the level of the basic $79.58 benefit upwards, in the light of the actual experience of the last four or five years.

We agree with the position of the Canadian Welfare Council, that "retired beneficiaries should be enabled to keep pace, relatively at least, with the income-earning population... beneficiaries (should) have their purchasing power protected and (should) share appropriately in the improved standards resulting from economic expansion".

(Since members in "the other place"* have acknowledged the uncertainties and vicissitudes of political life and adjusted pension benefits accordingly, presumably simple justice would encourage prompt acknowledgement of the income pressures and living stresses of the aged

II

The Unemployment Insurance program should be more total in coverage and benefits should be increased to represent a greater percentage of lost earnings.

At the present time, increasing unemployment is being permitted as a weapon against inflation. We comment on that policy below, but at this time we would stress that the rapid increase in the numbers of unemployed persons is revealing the inadequacies of the range of coverage and the scale of benefits of the present plan.

In testimony before your Committee, the Department of Labour noted that "unemployment insurance does not lift a poor man out of his poverty". Given the present level of benefits, few would quarrel with so self-evident a proposition!

We do challenge, however, the Department of Labour statement that follows: "(unemployment insurance) only helps to keep him from dropping below the level where he was—before he lost his job". Not so! A claimant with a dependent receives about 50 per cent of his normal weekly earnings; a claimant without a dependent receives about 40 per cent of weekly earnings. Since the benefits are in proportion to previous earnings, those in the lowest paid (most vulnerable) sector of the labour force receive relatively little although their costs will probably be as great on the average as another person's. The net effect is to nudge the person (and his family) toward poverty and welfare dependency, especially in an inflationary period.

It should be noted that maximum weekly benefits are (since June 30, 1968) $53.00 per week for a person with one or more dependents, and $42.00 for a person with no dependents. Given the cost changes in the period since June 1968, these levels are already "softer" by some 6-7 per cent.

If unemployment remains for some time at a level of 6 per cent or more, (and in some regions—usually vulnerable ones, anyway, the rates will be 10 per cent or worse), this means that some 1,000,000 Canadians have been edged into poverty. They will endure serious economic hardship, psychological stress and the possible loss of assets hard-won over the years.

We regard this as an intolerable situation, requiring immediate remedial action by the Government of Canada.

Specifically, we propose:

- (i) increase of benefits to a level that will represent at least three-quarters of previous average earnings. Our concern is to ensure a base that is above the poverty line. As the range of coverage is extended it may be necessary to move away from the suggested level of "three-quarters of previous earnings"—but this should only apply at the upper end of the earnings scale. We do not specifically touch on the question of sickness insurance, but obviously Canada would avoid much 'crisis poverty' if we were to build such protection as an ancillary operation to unemployment insurance...or perhaps as a form of compensation under Workmen's Compensation programs of the provinces.)

(ii) supplementary benefits that will cover (on behalf of the claimant and family) premium costs for related federal-provincial insurance programs—e.g. medicare and hospital care. We stress this because of the relatively high premium for such services in at least half the Canadian provinces, meaning in effect that either coverage lapses or the household squeezes expenditures on necessities to meet such costs.

(iii) enlargement of the range of the program to include most, if not all, salaried, professional and other members of the labour force not now covered, including those working for charitable and religious institutions and foundations. Such enlargement of the program range will enlarge the fund available for benefits. At the same time it will begin to cover those persons once thought relatively immune from unemployment, but now becoming vulnerable as a result of shifts in personnel and technology patterns in business and industry (e.g. middle income range and upper income range technicians, professionals, etc.)

III

Workmen's Compensation benefits should be reviewed by the provinces and brought closer into line with the claimant's previous earnings level and the current living costs for the region.

We believe that the argument we have advanced concerning improved benefits for old age security and unemployment insurance applies also to workmen's compensation benefits.

Surely if Workmen's Compensation programs, (as income maintenance scheme with medical-rehabilitative provisions) are to sustain individuals and families in non-income-earning periods, benefits levels must be adjusted to provide a realistic percentage of previous earnings and relate to actual living costs. Such adjustments ought to be automatic annually—in accordance with cost-of-living index changes.

IV

The Government of Canada ought to review and modify current programs to combat inflation in view of the disproportionate impact of the "Remedies" on the poor.

At the present time, the lowest income groups are hit by high prices. At the same time the programs of economic slow-down have resulted in one-half million Canadians becoming unemployed, with punishing effects on at least another one-half million persons who constitute their dependents.

The strongest elements in the society—both business and labour—can still act to advance, or at least stabilize, their positions.

The Economic Council of Canada warned in the Sixth Annual Review) of the possibilities of over-reaction and/or inappropriate reaction to the general inflationary situation.

More recently, one of your colleagues, Senator Maurice Lamontagne has called on the Government to recognize the "cost-push" character of the current inflationary process and to de-emphasize programs and remedies that are more appropriate to a "demand-pull" situation.

Current inflation in Canada, and in the Western world, said Senator Lamontagne is 'structural, not cyclical in character...it is quite possible to have at the same time cost-push inflation and deficient aggregate demand; rising prices and recession...Yet most governments persist in fighting price increases as if they originated from a temporary excessive demand'.

We urge that the Government review present policies in the light of that argument.

We cannot accept greater and greater pressure on the economically weak; a deliberate escalation of poverty at a time when we ought to be seeking to eliminate it.

We would argue for firmer pressures on the economically powerful—a firm limiting of price increases; and a concurrent restraint on upper wage levels. Such action, combined with selective improvements in the economic position of the weaker economic groups of society (at least to a level that will prevent absolute decline in economic strength and provide for some genuine measure of economic enhancement) will be a more effective strategy, both short-term and long-term. If present policies remain unchanged, the most vulnerable groups in society (the disabled, the aged, the injured, the unemployed, the low-income wage-earner, and the welfare recipient) will be weaker than ever before, and the gap between the affluent and the deprived will have widened dangerously. (There is potential for great social turbulence in such a development).

Moreover, the same (weakest) groups will be precisely the ones hardest hit by increases in real property taxes (which are of course passed on in rents) and by indirect taxes on purchase items, since tax increases automatically in response to rising prices. (The 1970 Ontario Budget is frank in its reliance on what we might call the "inflation increment".)

We are convinced, therefore, that modification of present fiscal and monetary strategy must accompany the kinds of immediate program benefit improvements we have recommended above. We are deeply aware of the importance of controlling inflation. We, nonetheless, question the effectiveness and the justice of current remedies.

Long-term strategies to eliminate poverty seem lacking in credibility, in our view, if in the present crisis and stress we revert to the traditional method of asking the poor to bear the heaviest human and economic costs to keep the "system" working!

Poverty in Canada will not be eliminated merely by making adjustments in existing programs, or even through the introduction of new programs.

As the work of your Committee has shown, a fundamental re-statement of policy must take place and new styles of service must be developed. Axioms have to be challenged; assumptions examined.

We submit that fiscal and monetary axioms are also in need of examination to determine their present appropriateness. (Presumably Keynesian orthodoxy can be as damaging as the economic orthodoxies that preceded it!)

V

We urge immediate federal-provincial action to review grants and allowance levels of public assistance programs under the Canada Assistance Plan (and Quebec Plan) and to improve the range of programs that are cost-shared under the Canada Assistance Plan (with tax point trade-off modifications in the case of Quebec).

Specifically, we ask:

(i) that assistance rates be reviewed and increased as necessary to reflect price changes. (We were concerned to note in testimony before your Committee, for example, that Ontario rates have not been significantly revised since 1967. We have confirmed that similar 'lags' have occurred in other Provinces.)

(ii) that provinces bring into their general program of assistance some of the items or services that are now regarded as "special assistance" or discretionary...e.g. provision of drugs, prosthetic appliances, dental services, etc.

(iii) that provinces extend the reach of assistance programs to meet some of the urgent needs of the 'working poor'. This provision of CAP is used with considerable effectiveness in Alberta (See Appendix 'A') and need not involve demeaning "investigative procedures". (We were delighted to note that New Brunswick plans to proceed in this way.) It is tragic for example, that corrective health procedures may be stalled because essential drugs or devices cannot be provided under public auspices to those who are working (or to their dependents) and who therefore are adjudged to be "not in need".

(iv) that provinces not now doing so begin to assist Day Care Services through the provisions of CAP. Here again we stress the importance of the "prevention" possibilities of the CAP. It is our belief that if the benefits of federal income maintenance programs can be raised to realistic levels, the provinces should be able to shift resources to improve the adequacy of public assistance (welfare payments and at the same time undertake support and preventive programs that will encourage new styles of services, new forms of public-private partnerships, renew traditional 'establishment' institutions and thereby benefit the working poor, those in receipt of public assistance; indeed, the total community.

VI

We recommend that the special Senate Committee on poverty issue an interim report at the earliest practicable date this spring.

We urge that the interim report propose such immediate actions by both federal and provincial governments as will prevent further deterioration in the economic and social position of the poor, and forestall increases in the numbers of persons in poverty.

We are convinced that remedial actions are possible now, in spite of inflationary pressure. We are convinced also that such actions can prepare the way for more comprehensive anti-poverty, human development programs based on the federal White Paper on social policy and from the continuing work of the Special Senate Committee on poverty.

Among the recommendations of such an interim report, we urge:

(i) increased old age security benefits including the guaranteed income supplement

(ii) improved unemployment insurance benefits and coverage

(iii) reforms and improvements in provincial Workmen's Compensation programs

(iv) review and modification of current federal anti-inflationary monetary and fiscal policies

(v) federal-provincial action to improve social assistance benefits and to develop more preventive programs under provisions of the Canada Assistance Plan, (and the Quebec Social Assistance program)

PART TWO

Some "Specifics" in a Comprehensive Attack on Poverty in Canada

The Special Committee has received a wealth of testimony from varied sources and competencies. To review that testimony, and the studies of the Committee itself, is to be aware that the war on poverty will not be won unless it is fought on many fronts.

Moreover:

(a) The evidence shows that poverty will not be eradicated in this country until we collectively will that it be eradicated. What is required of us in a response profounder than enlightened self-interest". We emphatically agree with Mr. Reuben Baetz: "If Canadians are not offended at having some of their fellow citizens existing on an inadequate income while others live in varying degrees of affluence, very little will be done to change the situation. As long as we waffle at the moral and philosophical level, we will waffle at the policy level..."

(b) On all sides it is said that the "welfare system has failed". If so, it is because it is still a "dole" system, with elements of a punishment attitude at work. With this undoubted benefits, the Canada Assistance Plan has not been able to dispel such attitudes and approaches. Obviously we must break open federal and Provincial programs and build policy and services in new ways. This is not likely to happen if we continue to make all kinds of grants to the "haves"—and call them incentive payments"; while scolding and nagging over having to give "handouts" to the poor. Artful tax evasion or "loophole-ducking" by the 'haves' costs Canada far more each year than the 1 per cent or less welfare cheating" that takes place!

(c) The evidence also suggests that there is no simple (inexpensive) panacea for the eradication of poverty. Comprehensive policy experimentation is required over a period of years. Federal-provincial jurisdictional 'gamesmanship, and buck-passing are destructive. Coordination of policy and program is essential. We believe that there are 'rhythms' and patterns in our Canadian federalism that can be used to advance policy development in this country and work for the benefit of all citizens. In this connection we would commend to your Committee the words of Dr. L.A. Kelly, Queen's University (1969):

"Problems of coordination can be traced generally to the piecemeal development of social security programmes over the years, each one reflecting the priorities and principles of the time it was introduced; to the division of administrative responsibility for related programmes between different levels and departments of government; and to the failure to harmonize tax policy with social security objectives." (emphasis added)

(d) The evidence clearly suggests that much experimentation is required to help us find appropriate models for programs and delivery of services. New styles of federal-provincial partnerships; the integration and coordination of departments or agencies to give clarity and accountability; public-private partnerships to obtain a more relevant 'people-orientation' to programs, and to achieve a degree of community 'control' and direction. In addition, there is need for a much more imaginative use of modern communications possibilities—print media, radio-TV and cable systems, to disseminate information, secure citizen feedback, and indeed, to carry out critically needed training/human development services (we shall explore an instance of this below).

In the context of the above, we would propose some "specifics" to be included in any comprehensive attack on poverty in Canada.

We do not advance these policy suggestions dogmatically.

We believe they have a real measure of validity and relevance to the needs of Canada's poor. But they are "probes", suggesting the style of policy required. They do not pretend to completeness.

I

Harmonize tax policy—(total tax policy!)—and social policy objectives.

Again we return to Dr. Kelly's observations on policy coordination:

"...the tax structure in general fails to give adequate recognition to social security objectives. Thus, on the one hand, we are talking about extending social security programmes to aid the poor; at the same time we have a situation where, because of the low level of exemptions given under the tax system, many of the poor are being taxed.

The problem is compounded by the fact that the sales taxes imposed by federal and provincial governments hit hardest at the poor.. many of the poor do pay income and other taxes; it is one of the causes of their poverty.

...All of this seems to point to the need for closer and continuing consultation between governments and between departments of government to see how the various pieces fit together and to consider whether greater efforts cannot be made to ensure coordination of principles and objectives."

As economist Thomas Wilson has pointed out, it is a fact that Canada's poorest people pay a higher proportion of income in taxes than anyone else. Taking into account the effect of all forms of direct and indirect taxation, some lowest income Canadians pay in taxes some 60 per cent of income.

The Board of Evangelism and Social Service has already indicated its support for current tax reform proposals insofar as these would effect greater equity in taxation.

But we would lay special stress on this issue because it really does strike to the heart of the policy choices—(the basic value and goal system)—of our society. We will merely tinker with poverty problems unless we relate the processes and structures of the total tax system to the total expenditure pattern of our society.

This matter has been effectively stated by A. J. Robinson ("The Concept of Equity in the Carter Report"—Public Finance in Canada-Selected Readings, Toronto, Methuen Publications—p. 30) (emphasis added):

"To achieve equity in the sense of a reduction in income inequality is one of the major objectives of modern government. The two principle instruments are taxation and expenditures, and it is the combination of the two that determines the net effect on equity. For example, a steeply progressive tax schedule combined with expenditures that benefit the well-to-do (highways, power boat facilities, airport construction, subsidies to cultural activities) could be less equitable than a moderately progressive tax schedule with expenditures that benefit lower-income groups (public hospital, low rent housing, services to the aged and indigent)".

If the thrust of education expenditures continues to benefit the rich more than the poor.

If health care institutions continue to develop along traditional lines without turning toward a new kind of practice that stresses "prevention";

If urban transportation networks are basically 'access and escape' routes for the affluent, without priority and dollars being devoted to the design of alternative transportation networks that will serve the total population of a Canadian urban region;

If we become more and more a "credential society" with numerous enclaves protecting their 'turf' against 'outsiders'—and that at a time when the multi-disciplinary approach is the only way through to viable policy;

If our rural programs continue to deal in piecemeal fashion with economic and production crises while we ignore the need for viable 'rurapolitan' models;....then modest victories for equity in the income tax system will not be of much accounts. Justice must inform both the tax system and the expenditure flows if we are to have equity—and eradicate poverty.

II

Income Maintenance and Redistribution Measures should be primarily a Federal Responsibility to make possible radical re-design of Provincial "welfare" systems and a de-emphasis on tax types that have a regressive effect on the poor.

(a) We believe that the Federal Government is the appropriate jurisdiction for Canadian income maintenance programs. We suggest that federal priority in this area would permit the most effective coordination of present policies and the development of more equitable ones in the future.

We have already suggested that increase in old age security payments, unemployment insurance payments, would lift many Canadians above the poverty line.

We would now suggest that en route to a guaranteed income program for Canada, the federal government should consider a major improvement in family and youth allowance benefits. We would propose that the benefits be tripled (going from $6, $8 and $10 as at present to $18, $24 and $30). We suggest that youth allowances should be available beyond the age of 17 when, by simple declaration, it is shown that the person is not attached to the labour force and is involved in some form of training program.

The costs of such a transformation of benefits would not be excessive, if benefits became taxable income, and if tax exemptions for children and youth were reduced or eliminated, in coordination with appropriate revisions of the current White Paper tax reform proposals. (By the time the proposals, or amended versions, go into effect, the basic exemption system may require upward revision to secure the equity sought in the current proposals).

The effect of these changes would be to maximize the benefit to the poor and the near-poor (the underemployed, the unemployed and the low-income wage earners), while also maximizing recovery (through the tax system) of demogrants from those who do not need them. The federal borrowing costs need not be excessive since adjustments in the tax deduction procedures would keep the recoveries "on stream".

The changes proposed would move Canada laterally in the direction of more comprehensive guaranteed income arrangements, and would in effect achieve such a result for the most vulnerable segments of society.

At the same time, policy design for a guaranteed income program could be going on. We suggest that consideration might be given to introducing such a program in one region; for example, Prince Edward Island. It is a relatively small, "manageable" jurisdiction (at least it is "manageable" for purposes of program design!) and it might be possible to test here the procedures that would permit a nation-wide re-working of income maintenance programs to achieve a guaranteed income system. In principle, we support the concept of a guaranteed income program as a "social right" objective for Canada.

At the same time, however, the current rigidities of the g.i.s. in the old age security program suggests that a premature launch of such a scheme would be undesirable. Obviously, unless care is taken, the guaranteed annual income mechanism can "lock" the poor in their poverty, rather than free them.

(In any event, as the Committee knows, there are prodigious technical and conceptual problems to be overcome—for example, how much erosion of adequate income levels can be tolerated as a "trade off" for probably necessary "work incentives".)

(b) The fundamental shift we propose in federal income maintenance policy, in our judgment, does not threaten or diminish provincial constitutional responsibility in the field of "welfare".

On the contrary, we believe that it will make possible the radical, essential re-orientation of provincial welfare systems away from the administration of relief (!) in the direction of human and community development processes.

Moreover, if the "faster-growth" tax fields of the federal authority were used to finance income maintenance programs for all Canadians, the provinces would be able to shift the use of their more restricted, slower-growth tax fields:

(a) toward community development and human development programs (education, health, neighbourhood (community) design, organization and support services and

(b) ease the pressures on real poverty taxation, which is "punishing" more and more segments of the provincial society.

It is in this way that we see new federal revenues, generated through tax reform changes (estimated at $630 millions a year), being used to achieve greater balance and equity in the total tax system.

III

Occupational Training and Up-grading programs must be improved in range and duration; and major grant funds should be available to private agencies in the adult education field.

Given the statistics on adult Canadians with very limited education or no formal education at all, present federal training programs are not adequate, and the program duration time is too short.

We have followed with great interest and concern the evidence your Committee has brought out concerning this matter. Since a 52 week program can at best achieve about 3-years upgrading educationally, the existing programs fall far short of what is required to upgrade the education levels of thousands of Canadians. The Basic Training for Skills Development program must be extended in its coverage period to be of maximum use in overcoming the very considerable education deficiencies of many persons, and also to take account of the slower level of functioning of some adults who enter the program.

At the same time, we believe that major support should be given to organizations (public or private) who are on the front line of adult education work, especially in more remote areas, or who join adult education programs to processes of community animation.

We were greatly impressed with the Frontier College, (Toronto) submission to your Committee. We trust that the Department of Manpower and Immigration will lift grant assistance to the $50,000 level proposed. Certainly we feel that such organizations should be encouraged; their skills and dedication used as widely and intensively as possible. Better grant support for such work is essential if we mean to build human development concepts into our anti-poverty programs.

IV

Canada should act now to end the blight of illiteracy in our country.

There are Canadians at work today (some of them church representatives) in many parts of the world, "making gains" against illiteracy.

What's the situation at home?

In response to a question raised in the House of Commons, March 9, 1970, Mr. Yves Forest replying for the President of the Privy Council, said that:

"In Canada's adult population (20 years and over) according to the 1961 census, there were 169,904 illiterates with no schooling...and 828,597 who were functionally illiterate, with one to four years of schooling.

According to the 1961 Census 13.4 per cent of the unemployed aged 15 to 19, and 10.4 per cent of those aged 20 to 24 were functionally illiterate, with less than five years of elementary education.

In 1967, 8.32 per cent of juvenile offenders were functionally illiterate (1,499 of 18,000 juvenile delinquents who had been to court). Of those who entered Training Schools in 1967, 12.83 per cent were functionally illiterate."

The Atlantic Development Board study Profiles of Education in the Atlantic Provinces, notes that 10.8 per cent of Canadians are illiterate or functionally illiterate. In some regions and communities of Canada the rate rises to 44 per cent, including levels of 6 per cent, 10 per cent and even 17 per cent total illiteracy. Such statistics are evidence of deep human deprivation. They also should help us sense how such deprivation will spill over to affect the milieu of the next generation.

Surely, as part of a comprehensive strategy against poverty, Canada will mobilize expertise, develop programs and adapt others, and through a coalition of public and volunteer effort, overcome illiteracy in our own nation.

In this connection we would refer the Committee to Appendix "B". This document is drawn from an Adult Education information newsletter, and suggests how modern communication systems can be used as aides in the effort to overcome illiteracy.

The document includes the names of some who are working actively in this field. We trust that the Committee will engage in study of this issue if you have not already done so. Moreover, we feel that it would be entirely appropriate to appeal to the Canadian Radio-Television Commission to consider methods by which TV and Cable systems in particular could be utilized in a campaign against illiteracy in Canada.

We urge that more be done to create training programs in a work context.

Too much training is prior to employment; we need more apprenticeship opportunities, skills development programs, in the context of employment. We rightly value competence and standards. Yet we can become a "credentials society" where many are excluded from motivating opportunities through a most cruel credentials case system. We believe that a partnership of industry, government, the trades unions and private agencies (e.g. Frontier College) can open up such opportunities. Industry in Canada needs to be as active in this field as American industry. Indeed, many Canadian branch plants of U.S. concerns should be investing in the kinds of programs the U.S. plants of these firms are now sponsoring! It is perhaps time to work through again the special Manpower study of the Canadian Senate, and find there material that bears precisely on this point.

Arthur Pearl and Frank Riessman take this position: "Training cannot (now) be considered a prerequisite for employment... There can be no end to poverty unless it is fully appreciated that, for the most part, training or the poor must take place after employment is secured... A consequence of unimpeded and unplanned growth is lack of continuity and linkage between institutions, organizations and agencies. This deficiency in connection is felt most strongly by the poor since they lack resources of their own. There is often no passageway for the poor from education to employment... If there is to be a path from poverty, not only must there be change within structures, but there also must be integration between structures."

VI

The Board of Evangelism and Social Service supports vigorous efforts on the part of Canadian unions to organize the 60 per cent of Canadian employees still outside worker organizations.

To be sure, unions, like all other institutions in our society, must discard outmoded styles, develop new procedures and accept job changes due to technological shifts.

But the poor—especially the working poor—need unions that are actively and effectively engaged in their historic struggle to lift men and women out of conditions of depressed wages, dangerous conditions of work, and inadequate security.

And the poor can benefit immeasurably from union ventures in the field of community development. Indeed, the splendid union-sponsored project in the Kenora (Ontario) region suggests something of the contribution that Canadian unions can make to the economic and social liberation of Indian and Metis people.

We believe that unions in Canada have a very critical "advocacy" role in this age of international corporations. Policy decisions of such corporations may show scant concern for government economic policy in the host country of one of their units; and even less concern for the human and community issues (e.g. the Dunlop shut-down, Toronto). Obviously, narrow protectionism is not an adequate response. But unions do have leverage in the 'new industrial scene' and such leverage is important.

The continued strength and growth of unions is also important at a time when smaller-scale manufacturing and service industries are springing into existence in great numbers. For example, since the post-war wave of immigration hit the Toronto region, it is estimated that 1,000 separate metal-working concerns have been established.

(Mr. Murray Coterill).

Some 40.9 per cent of Canada's poor, and 66.5 per cent of the 'unattached' persons live in Canada's cities. As they obtain employment they are very vulnerable, and can easily be held to low wage levels in an industrial 'ghetto'. Union organizing activity, therefore, is important as a remedial force seeking to overcome depressed working conditions. It is to be hoped that Canadian trade unionists will continue efforts to supply organizers to the unemployed poor and the working poor, as a countervailing pressure on the side of social justice.

VII

There is need for housing and land development policies that are truly 'on stream' with other elements of anti-poverty strategy.

For many months, our Board has been concerned with the growing crisis in housing for lower-income Canadians, a crisis that persists despite government policies to direct more funds toward housing for lower income groups. Indeed, as a Board, we have tried to undertake a demonstration project in multi-income-level housing and found that there was no way we could achieve a project that would reach the lowest group.

In 1965, about 97 per cent of N.H.A. loans went to the income group representing about 60 per cent of Canadians.

Today, many housing markets in Canada are available only to the upper third of the population.

In 1969, 205,000 housing starts were achieved—and yet the "filter down" process works less and less adequately. Thus the real issue, as President H. Hignett of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation said, is "not the numbers, but the mix".

We were greatly interested in the CMHC brief to your Committee, which stressed how "much of the population has no access to areas of new buildings and the choice of access among those who can afford new housing is narrowly restricted by the level of their income..." Mr. Hignett brought clearly before us all the fact of "territorial separation" taking place, especially in metropolitan communities; a separation between rich and poor.

We support the main recommendations advanced in the CMHC presentation. In particular:

- (i) dispersion of public housing units in smaller groupings
- (ii) preservation and rehabilitation of neighbourhoods
- (iii) involvement of citizens in community design processes
- (iv) housing allowance programs to assist lower income families

We believe that other improvements are required in Canada's housing/land development programs:

(a) We believe that despite the Economic Council's strictures (in 1967) that housing had tended to bear too large a proportion of the burden of cyclical adjustment, Canadian housing policy is still too tied to fiscal and monetary policy considerations.

(b) We suggest that Canadian housing legislation needs to provide some of the interest-supported, rent supplement and non-profit program possibilities available under U.S. housing law.

For example, "221 (d) (3)" housing is a program of below-market rate of interest which enables non-profit groups, cooperatives, and other agencies to provide housing for families of moderate income.

Under certain categories of U.S. rent supplement program, 95 per cent to 100 per cent borrowing is possible, enabling non-profit, cooperative, groups to venture into the housing field. This type of scheme has particular relevance for churches, since in many instances land is available, owned by the churches, and in effective locations.

(c) We feel strongly that Canada must take seriously the enormous influence of land costs on the costs of shelter.

In their splendid brief to your Committee, the Social Planning and Research Council of Hamilton and District, (at paragraphs 3.84, 3.85) argued that "since the cost of land is such a large part of the cost of housing, and since land costs have been rising so markedly" we must consider the common European practice of municipal (governmental) ownership of land. We would strongly support new initiatives and experiments in this direction even as we would affirm that land-tax policies (as part of the total network of taxation) should be re-examined to see what they might contribute to more rational use of existing serviced land and the avoidance of gross inflation of land values through speculative holdings.

Walter Stewart (writing in Maclean's Magazine, February, 1970) has shown dramatically (stunningly!) how even a public program to ease the problems of home ownership (there is not a little irony in the designation: H.O.M.E.) can have the effect of boosting land costs, even though it can probably be argued that without HOME intervention the land costs would have been much greater still. (4,602 lots at $4,000 per lot; 18 to the acre on land that originally sold for $1,100 per acre. Assuming $20,000 per acre for servicing costs, the author projects gains of some $50,000 per acre—see pages 23ff.)

Obviously, public intervention (as in Saskatoon) at the level of land acquisition and servicing can work to ease the cost of housing. Moreover, such intervention can also serve to guide the development of Canadian communities—counteracting "sprawl"; providing for natural amenities; linking such developments with other networks and systems of schools, roads, transportation.

If to this point we have concentrated on matters of income, provision of shelter and access to economic and personal development opportunities, it is because these matters are fundamental to a truly comprehensive, co-ordinated and effective attack on poverty in Canada.

The Economic Council of Canada has put it very well:

"In absolute dollar terms—the difference in amounts spent—the poor are most deprived of sufficient food, clothing, shelter and transportation. However, viewing the expenditures of the poor as a percentage of the expenditures of the non-poor, those living in poverty are most deprived, in a relative sense, of transportation, of recreation, of furnishings and equipment, of reading material, of medical care, of personal care, of clothing and of items to complement the formal education system.

One of the most important consequences of poverty is that it affects the ability of the poor to invest in themselves and thereby to lead more productive lives... (This) is likely to have particularly serious consequences on young children whose potential abilities are largely shaped in the years of early childhood... Even the possibility of significant child nutrition problems, seemingly so improbable in this country, must be taken seriously."

VIII

We would conclude this section with a series of concerns which we call:

POLICIES THAT AFFIRM PERSONS!

If that seems dramatic, it is because we need to dramatize the damage that has been done to human dignity; how again and again the result of all the assaults on selfhood can be summed up in Joseph Lyford's statement: 'In my neighbourhood an adult is a dead child.'

(i) Justice for the poor

The Honourable John Turner said it plainly? "It is the poor who suffer most from society masked in the trappings of the law. For it is they who are victimized when urban renewal arbitrarily disrupts a neighbourhood; it is the poor who are hurt when creditors garnishee wages or repossess furniture; it is the poor who are deprived when welfare agencies deny, reduce or terminate, welfare benefits on vague, unarticulated or clearly illegal grounds; it is the poor who are penalized when... landlords... withhold repairs or capriciously evict them into the street; it is the poor who are hit by bail procedures linked to financial means; it is the poor whose privacy is invaded and whose dignity is denied... Too often the poor see the law not as a friend but as an enemy, not as an aid but as an adversary, not as a remedy but as an obstacle".

Appendix "C" is a statement issued by the Canadian Council of Churches during the course of its 1969 Triennial Assembly.

We support the findings of that statement, and its call to action in the field of law reform.

We support the efforts of the Canadian Civil Liberties Association to secure "due process" for welfare recipients when they deal with "the system". We urge prompt action in all Canadian jurisdictions to reform the law and regulations in respect of Landlord and Tenant Expropriation Law; and Family Law. We are delighted to note the way in which law students and faculty have begun to offer legal aid services, especially in the "preventive-advisory" field. We urge that all appropriate steps be taken to stop the demeaning of the poor through "hassling" bureaucratic procedures and invasions of privacy. We urge that effective way be found to inform program recipients of their rights, details as to levels of aid, and appeal procedures. We strongly urge the abandonment of procedures whereby administrators of programs are members of appeal tribunals judging the adequacy of service given. We urge the naming of recipients of service, or their representatives, to membership on appeal bodies.

(ii) Family Planning

The repeal of provisions of the Criminal Code making it an offence to sell or distribute information about birth control or contraceptive materials, has resulted in little government action to ensure that such services are available to Canadian citizens.

We endorse the submission of the Family Planning Association on this matter. Terrible damage is being done to individuals and families because information and counselling services are not generally available. We are aware of the convictions of some regarding permissible forms of family planning. We respect such views even though we cannot concur with them.

We do insist that the Government, in certain of its own programs and through support granted to independent agencies, ought to make real "options" known and available to Canadians.

(iii) Nursing Home Care

Older persons, and sometimes their children, often face bankrupting costs and hopelessness because nursing home service does not fall within the framework of allowable health care costs.

Other basic forms of care and treatment are also excluded.

We believe that ways must be found to bring at least the major portion of such costs within the health insurance program.

(iv) Community 'Supportive' Services

We believe that the various levels of government ought to stimulate experimentation in programs and delivery of services. Family agencies, Homemaker services, Hospital outpatient departments, church agencies and others should be encouraged to develop new networks of service, seize new opportunities to be supporting of persons and families in their neighbourhoods; and assume "advocacy" roles on behalf of the poor.

Many agencies and institutions need to be "turned on" again. Combinations of public and private funding may result in more diversified, "open" services, less bureaucratic and closer to the streets...for example:

—the "Family Doctor" Service being offered by the Children's Hospital (Winnipeg) outpatient department, an attempt to bring 'family practice' preventive health service to families in a core-city neighbourhood;

—the Day Centre and Clinic Services that can be operated out of homes for the aged for the benefit of a much wider community than the "community of the institution" itself;

—the Meals Programs or Drop-in-Centre programs which improve the eating patterns of older persons through providing the nourishment of companionship;

—Day Care Services and Head Start Nursery programs that can be "plugged in" to homes, neighbourhood and school, and will do much to release the potential of thousands of youngsters;

—Family Development and Community Involvement Programs related to Day Care Services bring parents new understanding of their role in "turning on" the potential in their children. In this way they are not 'given' service; rather they are routed into the mainstream as partners, decision-makers, and helpers.

We are calling for community Human Development Centres—a thrust toward prevention; building into our communities a focal point for new styles of service, 'mixes', coalitions—all leading to the renewal of institutions serving families and children.

Beyond such services there are the Citizen Organizations themselves. The encouragement and support of such indigenous action groups is a "must". Michael Harrington observes ("The Politics of Poverty") that the point of such community organization is not "uplift". "In Harlem", (writes Harrington), "Kenneth Clark points out in his Dark Ghetto, people on a block organized to clean up the street. That, Clark says, was the wrong thing to do, for it implied acceptance of the theory that the street was litter-strewn because (they) were at fault. In point of fact the real culprit was the city administration...And the real demand should have been political organization to force the city to give the street its due."

That process of becoming visible, vocal, asking for consideration and actions that are their due—such group activity has a real and positive role to play in breaking the helplessness and dehumanizing effects of poverty.

Appendix "D" is an interesting account of how "Challenge for Change" filming techniques have shifted balances in favour of the weak, (even to the point of getting news and media representatives uptight!).

(v) Commitment to the Education of All Children

At the present time, we have laws that compel the attendance of children at school. This does not necessarily mean that our society, thereby, has made a commitment to the education of all children.

Indeed, there is mounting evidence of the need for deep renewal in the processes and 'systems' of education. Very often, the children of the poor are severely injured by the present education processes...often receiving inadequate programs in worn-out buildings. Little is expected from "those" children, and predictably, little is often achieved. This is a critical matter that should force every jurisdiction to examine priorities—the actual priorities as reflected in expenditure flows. In a variety of ways, university education is 'weighted' in favour of the more affluent, and is heavily subsidized. Minimal resources are available for vital compensatory education in lower income areas—rural as well as urban. Are we making the best use of the millions spent on school and university buildings? Must we not consider moving to tri-mester patterns to maximize use of university centres; and regard school facilities as community resource centres and not simply education centres, thus breaking the part-day, part-year utilization of expensive facilities?

Should we not do more to enlist the involvement of the community in the total education process, and develop cadres of parents, indigenous support staff to stimulate lagging children of less affluent neighbourhoods? We must find ways past the "score-oriented" admission policies of universities to permit the entry of students whose ability far exceeds their "score achievements". Moreover, we must break the "stream" sorting process that beyond question tends to shunt the children of the "have-nots" toward dead-end vocational choices, or limited career possibilities. (See Appendix 'E' for material on this point).

THE ROLE OF THE CHURCH

The Board of Evangelism and Social Service is committed to the belief that the worlds of politics, social policy, and community action are appropriate areas—indeed, necessary arenas—for Christian "presence" and service.

With Bonhoeffer we are convinced that "the Church is her true self only when she exists for humanity."

One of the great new facts of these years is the partnership that has developed among Christians and with those of other faiths.

In 1969, in company with Catholic and Protestant church bodies in Canada, our denomination committed itself to a unified strategy, a strategy we believe to be required of us by the human need of our time and the constraints of our faith:

1. Review Resources and Revise Priorities...ministry of penance

Take stock of existing manpower, revenues, investments, and buildings in the light of human needs.

Examine consciences. What changes in priorities are required?

2. Commit More Resources to Development ...ministry of sharing

Reassign church personnel to give priority time to human development, such as service with self-help projects.

De-emphasize new building and stress community uses of existing properties.

Commit more financial resources. Some possibilities:

Earmark an increasing percentage of annual congregational/parish income for development programs.

Sponsor youth and adults in leadership training and development programs.

Provide "seed money" for lower-income housing.

Organize interchurch campaigns to support self-help projects.

3. Animate People...ministry of hope

Give priority to the education of Christians' social conscience, at all ages. Show the relationship between worship and social action.

Help organize public forums for the free debate of key issues.

Support programs of social animation to release "people power."

4. Initiate Political Action...ministry of justice

Assist the deprived and minority groups to organize. Join them in putting their problems before the public and elected authorities.

Present interchurch briefs on critical development issues to federal, provincial, and municipal governments.

Issue informed statements and comments on key public issues when they are 'hot'.

Support research into the "human consequences" of public policies in such fields as science, defence, education and family life.

We are very conscious that there are parishes and congregations that do not sense any obligation to risk themselves and their resources in actions in support of the weak or the poor.

But we do report a stirring across Canada, a new disposition to place ministries to persons ahead of erecting buildings, a new willingness to use existing properties imaginatively in the service of community, and an orientation to action-political and social involvement.

—in Montreal the Roman Catholic diocese committed $100,000 to a project of animation and community organization in a seriously blighted area;

—in Saskatchewan, a small rural congregation raised $1,000 as a development loan to permit an Indian-Metis organization to develop a leather-craft industry;

—an urban congregation in Vancouver sparked a truly liberating care service for severely retarded children; and followed that up with the organization of a group that will provide one-to-one probation service under supervision;

—an ecumenical partnership of churches formed a corporation to develop social ministry projects in downtown Edmonton;

—a minister helped put together a Citizen's Committee on Corrections which has championed legal aid reforms and secured the renovation of a detention centre;

—a suburban congregation funded a lively Resource Centre for community organization and human development.

We could multiply the examples. But our purpose is not to show "how right and relevant we are". It is to suggest a significant shift in style.

The Board of Evangelism and Social Service is active itself in a variety of community, animation and experimental projects (in concert with other Boards and agencies of our denomination).

We believe there can be no separation of "spiritual" and "secular"; that all the 'worlds' of man inter-connect; that our complex society requires multitrack, inter-disciplinary partnerships of action and service, if the human is to be preserved and fulfilled.

In our Church-in-Society operations we are ourselves making the kinds of policy shifts we are commending to your Committee in the area of public policy.

We intend to move away from building "institutions for the aged" to develop instead, service networks and facilities for older persons in the wider community (often using our Homes as a base):

We are asking that our Homes change their By-Laws to provide that residents of the Homes are represented on Boards of Management;

We granted $45,000 to a housing neighbourhood rehabilitation fund in the Halifax area. Our resources teamed up with a $90,000 Provincial grant to launch the kind of community self-help housing scheme that we believe to be essential in many parts of Canada;

We have helped support community organization projects in Vancouver, Toronto and Winnipeg;

We intend to aim more of our resources in support of youth-directed clinic services and "hostel" projects;

We have provided grant support to a citizen's newspaper group in Montreal (your Special Committee has heard from them already!), and we will attempt to place more resources behind such indigenous action groups;

We have helped finance the launching of Information Services; a Day Care Centre; a Home for Emotionally Disturbed Children; a Residence for Young (Transient) Women; and Half-Way Houses for young offenders—and we intend to enlarge this sector of our work;

Some members of our Board, in association with representatives of other denominations, are engaged in a study of the Churches' Role in the Field of Corrections. Out of that study will come new initiatives and partnerships of action and service.

Once again, these matters are noted, not to elicit commendation, but to indicate what we believe to be required of the Church at this time by the very nature of the Christian message. We believe such are the ways the Church must be "present" in our society—as a "human partner", as an agent of change, as an ally of those who are poor, or weak, or preyed upon.

Moreover, almost all the ventures, programs and partnerships we have mentioned are not "church-dominated;" some are ecumenical; many are not church-related at all. We believe this "crossing of the borders" is what must happen if positive accomplishments are to occur.

But we have no cause to be complacent.

Truth to tell, we have a long way to go to be as 'real' as the times demand we should be!

CONCLUSION

All the really important themes of society (and of church) come to the "moment of truth" when we confront the issue of poverty.

Poverty can be eradicated, if we will to eradicate it.

The thrust of our public policies, the actions and concerns of institutions (such as the churches) will show whether we have that will.

As John Gardner has said, we had better understand "that the moral order is not static

...or stowed away like the family silver. It is an attribute of a functioning social system. As such it is a living, changing thing, liable to decay and disintegration as well as to revitalizing and reinforcement, and never any better than the generation that holds it in trust."

Our society is being continuously re-created, for good or for ill.

The response we make to poverty in our midst is a fundamental challenge to our humanity, and tests the integrity of Canada as a nation.

APPENDIX 'B'

"ROLE OF TV IN REACHING ILLITERATE ADULTS"

(Excerpt from Mass Media Adult Education—No. 22, October 1969 Ohio State University, Columbus, Ohio)

The extent of illiteracy in the United States today, and the consequent size of the potential Adult Basic Education task, is explored by Angelica Watson Cass in an Ed. D. dissertation MM/AE has just received. Entitled The Role of Television in Reaching Illiterate Adults With a Literacy Program Series, Dr. Cass' study offers valuable insights to Adult Educators; we present some highlights here.

In the 1960 census, failure to complete the third grade was taken as indication of illiteracy. Over nine million Americans over 25 years of age were so classified. A 1963 HEW study shows this problem to be not a regional, but a nationwide, one. The percentage of illiterates in the population varies from 3% in Utah, to 8% in New York, to 21% in Louisiana, says Dr. Cass, but the largest number of illiterates live in New York, California, and Texas.

Nine million would represent around 9% of the 1960 adult population, but there is reason to believe that some proportion of census respondents did not entirely level with the interviewer regarding educational attainment. At any rate, less than two decades earlier, when the armed forces used not formal educational attainment but reading ability at fourth grade level as a criterion of literacy, 13.5% of American males of military age were found to be illiterate. Given the somewhat lesser valuation placed upon female education in our society, and the fact that older Americans were more likely to be illiterate than men of military age, the presumed then level of illiteracy by fourth grade reading standard would probably have been well above the 13.5% level.

Today, according to a 1964 NAPSAE study (Brice and Huyck), "functional illiterates," adults who cannot read and write well enough to use these skills on the job, and are thus barred from more than marginal function in a technological society, comprise twenty-two per cent of the adult population. This in a society where education at least to functional literacy has been a major article of public faith for two centuries and a major call upon an enormous GNP.

Nor have our traditional public school and private agency efforts to eradicate illiteracy had much impact thus far. Comparison of AGE registration figures with census illiteracy figures indicate that we are at present reaching between one and three per cent of adult illiterates with literacy programs. In a careful 1962-63 New York State Department of Education analysis of AGE programs in six upstate cities, precise figures became available; 667 persons were enrolled in public school classes for illiterates out of a census-determined illiterate adult population of 101,000 in those six cities, two-thirds of 1%. According to a 1963 study cited by Dr. Cass, in over half of U.S. communities, and in 48% of a large sample of schools checked, no literacy classes existed, and where they did exist, an enrollment fee often formed a substantial deterrent to potential students. Even in communities blessed by active literacy programs, says Dr. Cass, "classes were usually held in locations not frequented by those in need of this instruction, the classes were poorly publicized, and there was no effective recruitment of illiterate adults."

Not until 1966 did even one college (City College of New York) offer a course in materials and methods in adult basic education. ABE programs have overwhelmingly been taught (and are still taught) either by elementary school teachers, trained in patterns appropriate to child-teaching or by "lay volunteers and 'moonlighters'."

The eruption of television into a central position in American life seemed, and seems, to offer unique opportunities for basic education. By 1960 TV was present in 91 per cent of American homes, a 1963 study showed TV present in 95 per cent of lowest income homes, and several studies confirmed that the less education possessed by the viewer, the more importance (and authority) attached by that person to TV. Moreover, television meets the viewer in the privacy of his own home, obviating the problem of 'confessing' poor education by attending public classes. It makes possible the use of the most skilled teachers and the most advanced techniques, and—given a large potential audience—is superior to any other teaching method known in cost-per-student.

Between 1958 and 1961 several television literacy series had been developed and aired. The first of these was Streamlined Reading, followed by Learn for Living, P.S. No. 4, Learning to Read, and Operation Alphabet. It is this latter series which Dr. Cass focusses upon in her study, from its inception in Philadelphia in 1958 through its utilization in New York City beginning in 1963.

The series consisted of 100 half-hour presentations, each of which presented a three or four sentence story based upon an everyday practical situation. Opportunity was made for practice of the words used in the story and for cursive writing practice. Coordinated with each program was an 8½ x 11 sheet displaying the words and the story of one program. Line illustrations and lined practice sheets for writing were also included in the supplementary materials kit sent to registrants. The series consisted of four days of new material presentation and a day of review for 20 weeks. It was intended that a conscientious adult learner could approximate third grade level in reading and writing by the time he reached the one hundredth lesson. During the final week of the series, viewers were invited to make use of a special lined page included in the fourth unit of materials to write a letter of comment about Operation Alphabet to the Board of Education. 2500 letters were received, corrected, and returned. During the next year, 1962, the series was rerun twice, to increasing enrollment, and increased enrollment characterized each succeeding year of operation up to 1964-65, where Dr. Cass' data end.

In 1962 NAPSAE was given the copyright and booking rights for the television series and the supplementary materials, so great had the interest in the series become in other cities, and a grant was obtained from 3M to provide an additional set of a hundred videotapes to ease booking problems. By 1963 about 100 cities, including nearly all of the largest, had shown Operation Alphabet once or three times through, largely on commercial stations. "At any one time television stations in twenty cities around the country were showing the series."

In 1963, Dr. Cass in her then-capacity as Supervisor of Adult Elementary Education in the New York State Education Department, proposed that Operation Alphabet be used in the four largest areas of illiteracy concentration, of which New York City with over three quarters of a million illiterates was the largest, in the State. Three NYC stations used the tapes, 'bicycling' them on for same day presentation, and then sending each week's set on to Albany which was one week later in the utilization of the cycle. The series was widely promoted by pamphlets, street car broadsides, newspaper publicity, etc. A second screening on the three stations commenced as soon as the 100th program had been shown. 2500 participants received certificates as a result of passing the terminal test for the first showing.

On the basis of experimental findings in the basic education and related fields, and on the basis of the observations of experienced literacy workers, Dr. Cass develops a schema of thirty-six 'standards of excellence' in eight major areas by which literacy programs in general and television literacy programs in particular can be evaluated. These standards of excellence form a new contribution to the field, and are not subject to summarization. Those evaluating television literacy programs or planning to present such a program should be aware of Dr. Cass' work here, and would find perusal of the original document of value. In evaluating the New York presentation of Operation Alphabet, Dr. Cass finds that 16 of the thirty-six standards were met very adequately; 17 were met partially, with minor 'gaps', many of which were unavoidable in the circumstances; and three of the standards were not met: (1) Provision of widespread publicity and the development of machinery to recruit viewers, (2) provision for frequent and varied repetition of content, and (3) response of the larger society to the new literates in the form of a significant recognition as a reward for the effort involved in completing the lesson series (particularly recognition in the form of advantage in securing better employment). It might be noted, parenthetically, that as John Ohliger observed in his study of tele-discussion groups, reported in MM/AE's last issue, the development of publicity and machinery to recruit participants has long been one of the most significant weaknesses of programs developed for 'listening' or 'viewing' groups of all kinds.

Dr. Cass makes a number of significant recommendations which should be of interest to planners of such programs in the future. Among these are that considerable time (two or three years) be budgeted in advance for building community awareness of the magnitude of the problem—nearly one adult in four functionally illiterate; one in twelve totally illiterate—and in securing both broad community support, moral and financial, for the program, and broad community commitment to 'reward' those who complete the course by considering them for job-advancement or for initial employment in the light of new-skill acquirement; and that research on the effectiveness of the series must accompany and follow presentation both to increase effectiveness of subsequent series and to provide data to support further presentations. Additional, more basic, research is also needed on learning characteristics of adult illiterates (and thus on teaching methods) and on techniques of motivation applicable to a population group which has suffered repeated rebuff and failure in attempts to move into the mainstream affluent society.

Says Dr. Cass, in a concluding remark: "television is no panacea for adult illiteracy...when utilized, it should be considered as only a part of a total community campaign against illiteracy."

This new study, coming as it does not only from a perceptive researcher and thoughtful analyst, but also from one who has had significant responsibility for the planning and implementation of literacy programming for the state of New York, is one to be noted by all basic education people and in particular by those contemplating the use of television in the struggle against illiteracy. MM/AE does not have information on the availability of the Dissertation at this time, and therefore refers inquirers directly to Dr. Cass, Program Head/Asst. Professor, Adult and Community Education, City College of New York, 414 East 52nd St., New York, N.Y. 10022.

POVERTY IN CANADA

(Report of Section II of the Assembly of the Canadian Council of Churches which met in Montreal, November 24-28, 1969. As the first paragraph of the report notes, the Section included, in addition to delegates from the denominations, representatives of citizen groups, the National Work Council, the National Indian Brotherhood and other "peoples organizations".)

In the spirit of our Christian faith we have met for two days with persons who have suffered hurt and injustice from the social, political and economic realities of Canadian life and we have, to a limited but definite degree, experienced their hurt. We have become more deeply aware, consequently, of the forces operating in Canadian life that affront and destroy human dignity. We have gained some understanding of the meaning of poverty to the poor. We have heard that our society at the moment merely offers to those it hurts palliative measures. It but applies salve for the sores. Those trapped in poverty, we have come to understand, comprise the deprived, mentally and physically; the welfare recipients, the low income worker, the sick; the handicapped; the less brilliant; the timid; the needy mothers; and the old; and their number keeps growing. The sores suffered by the poor arise we have learned from the operation of our society and, more fundamentally, from the dominant motive from which it acts, namely to value profits more than people.

We have become more deeply aware that the Church itself to a large extent accepts the assumptions of the society and helps to perpetrate and perpetuate the hurts suffered by the poor. Too frequently our helping others exacts from them the price of accepting their depressed condition.

We are also aware of the appalling apathy and ignorance in this area on the part of a great number of Church people. We call upon the Canadian Council of Churches in co-operation with the Canadian Catholic Conference and all their member bodies to launch a massive campaign to break down these areas of unconcern and lack of knowledge. We are also aware that the organized Church still has a voice which can be heard and it is our duty to speak for those who have the least opportunity to speak for themselves. We observe a tendency on the part of churches to assume that they can do almost anything better than anyone else. This leads to denominational programs receiving priority in time and finance without a true recognition of the contribution that can be made by some of the newer organizations; opportunities for new involvement outside our traditional structures. We must see beyond the "protest" in these groups the constructive programs for a better and more just society with which we are in whole-hearted agreement.

Our values need honestly to be reexamined so that people can be given control of their lives and destiny. We need to understand that society is for people rather than people for society.

We have learned specifically that the poor have been deprived of such rights as:

1. Free assembly in certain instances.
2. The right of public assembly in certain instances.
3. Personal dignity in the administration of welfare.
4. Ready and accurate information as to their rights under existing law.
5. Fair and equal treatment as to allowances made under the law. (which in any case are below the poverty level set by the Economic Council of Canada).

In order to give the poor a voice so as to make possible the redress of these grievances we urge the Churches to recognize and support the validity, and advocate the establishment, of "citizens rights committees", welfare rights unions and tenants associations as collective bargaining units.

We urge the establishment and promotion of community development approach to programs among the poor to enable them to identify their needs and to decide the methods to meet those needs.

Funds for these programs should be provided by government, business and churches. We urge, therefore, that the Canadian Council of Churches:

(a) Through the Canadian Affairs Commission ask its member communions and their parishes and congregations to examine the role that the Canadian Council of Churches can play in their name in involving them in bringing to bear their resources on the social policies of federal and provincial governments in conjunction with their own efforts in local areas and regions; and to urge the communions and/or parishes and congregations to provide the resources (funds, personnel and authority) necessary to perform this role; and to make their information concerning the federal and provincial social policies available to the public. We further suggest that the Canadian Catholic Conference be requested to take similar action appropriate to their structures.

(b) Make available a national fund (or funds for organization of people's committees in a wide range of problems at the local level. These committees should operate autonomously as to policy. The Churches should provide staff or money to hire staff, and subsidize other Church committees may be organized ecumenically on a local or regional basis to recommend an allocation of funds. Members may participate in policy committees but must be careful not to run them.

In addition, clergy and laity in their respective roles should become actively involved in assisting the disadvantaged people of the community in dealing with their problems particularly in matters of employment, welfare and housing.

The congregations or parishes should become involved in working with other community groups as advocates of reform in the law:—

(1) Law of Landlord and Tenant—in respect of a human standard of accommodation and reasonable security of tenure, and further, to afford protection against unjust rents;

(2) Family Law:

(a) to afford better protection for separated spouses and children —to provide maintenance from public funds without placing the onus of prosecuting the deserter upon the deserted partner;

—to protect better the rights of children born out of wedlock by removing the requirements of the mother taking proceedings against a putative father;

—proceedings (in each case in which proceedings are justified) should be taken by the province where public assistance has been given, or on request by the mother or deserted partner

(b) to permit supplementing from public funds the income of disadvantaged families to bring their income to a level necessary for adequate support of the family as a unit;

(c) and to ensure that these things are done without prejudice or affront to the dignity of the poor as human beings.

We believe that the Council ought to concern itself with those people in our society who have been victimized by our attitudes to offenders against the laws of our land. We are concerned that our governments must direct more efforts towards rehabilitation and that we should stop the practice of breaking up families and thus contributing to the problems of poverty by putting men and women in jail for relatively minor offenses.

In the light of authoritative projections that the technological society will radically reduce the number of persons involved in the traditional ways of the production and distribution of goods and services we urge that a high priority be given to the development of viable alternatives to the present means by which wealth and power are distributed through the work ethic to the end that all might know dignity and worth no matter what their work and social situation.

To establish a reasonable basis of rights for all citizens the Canadian Council of Churches should advocate the work for the ratification by the federal and provincial governments of the United Nations conventions on political and economic and social rights and for the establishing of an adequate guaranteed annual income though we are aware that this is not in itself a solution to poverty.

"CHALLENGE FOR CHANGE"

(Excerpt from Mass Media-Adult Education—No. 22 October 1969)

Ohio State University, Columbus, Ohio)

The Canadian National Film Board's newsletter Challenge for Change is a three or four times a year short magazine which offers news of the uses to which film and other media are being put, in Canada, in the social change-social action area.

In the Spring-Summer issue, four such reports appear; all of them of potential interest to Mass Media concerned educators. One report is on the Lakehead (Port Arthur-Fort William, Ontario) Town Talk project, which MM-AE told you about a couple of issues ago; another reports on the experiences of Fron-tier College teachers in an Indian community, using almost every sort of medium from slide projector to videotape in a year-long adult education project; a third report consists of a dialog between a young black citizen of Halifax whose group was filmed for a documentary, and who objects strongly to the way in which the film was edited, and a reply from the filmmaker. The fourth report, which is the issues's lead item, is entitled In the Hands of Citizens: A Video Report, and deserves careful attention from all Mass Media theorists.

What the Film Board put In the Hands of Citizens was a $\frac{1}{2}$ " videotape camera, microphones including a directional mike, a shoulderbag battery-operated videocorder with recharger, and an 8" monitor and playback unit. The Citizens were members of a Montreal slum neighborhood committee founded in March of 1968. The question being experimented with was that of what ways (and with what effect) television equipment would be and could be used in the context of a community organization-citizens' action situation.

Working with the equipment initially were six interested committee members and two Film Board people. At the beginning, the equipment (VTR) sat in the office and nobody used it. Then members of the VTR group began to take the equipment home for an evening and photograph their children for playback on the monitor; "playing" with it. The effect of this experience was that members of the VTR group got over their diffidence about the equipment, found out how easy it was to use, and started using it in all sorts of ways.

They taped a citizens' meeting and then played the tape back at a student meeting as students were approached to integrate into the committee. The students could see graphically the problems the people of the neighborhood, Saint-Jacques, were confronting. Then they taped the subsequent student meeting, and went with the VTR to classrooms to solicit support and donations. "The whole operation was surrounded by all the aura of glamor and gadgetry of this new technology," report the NFB members of the VTR group. "It was fun."

The first 'big project' followed: the preparation of a half hour presentation focusing on the problems of the people of the area. This presentation was edited down from some four hours of interviews in a restaurant, on the street, outside a hospital, a welfare office, a Manpower office; early footage being shot inside a hospital waiting room distressed the director of the hospital so much that the cameramen were hauled into his office, their tape confiscated, and its erasure demanded. After discussion with other members of the committee, the VTR group decided to comply with this demand, since they had chosen neither the subject nor the terrain for a confrontation in their filming, "But we fully measured the effect this simple recording device could have on an authority that did not have faith in free information."

The half hour presentation was prepared for showing at a series of five neighborhood meetings on successive nights, and was kicked off with a press conference. At the press conference the VTR group found out that "journalists, who talked loudly of freedom of the press, consider themselves immune from interviews or cameras: they became angry when they became subjects for the citizens' cameras... they were unwilling to be recorded as individuals, and became even more hostile to the citizens." In several ways the committee was learning that VTR gave them an 'edge' over powerful agencies which had heretofore ignored them.

The day before each meeting the VTR unit was out in the streets of Saint-Jacques, interviewing citizens. All were invited to attend and see themselves on television. These interviews were run during the half-hour preceding the meeting proper; VTR served as a recruiting device. The presentation itself served as a 'kick-off' for discussion...attendees were ready to begin to air deep feelings because the mood for such revealment had been set by the common experience of seeing other citizens like themselves talk about what was wrong in Saint-Jacques.

In many different ways (and we have not recounted them all) the VTR equipment was an enabling and an empowering tool in Saint-Jacques. "Could we have stopped people in the street and questioned them, the same way, if we had not had the camera and microphone?" asked one group member, "I don't think so. It's a good pretext for talking to them." Conclude the NFB writers of the report: "The Comité des Citoyens de Saint-Jacques could have accomplished any of their actions without the video equipment. We could not say that at any time it made the difference between success and failure. But it made good things better, and helped people to grow. It is a useful tool."

APPENDIX "E"

"THE CHILDREN OF THE POOR ARE NOT BEING EDUCATED"

(Excerpt from a Paper prepared by Mr. Timothy Reid, M.P.P. (Ontario) November, 1969)

THE HARD EVIDENCE

The documentation on the comparative survival rates of the children of the poor and the children of the well-to-do is conclusive. It need not be repeated here in detail. In summary it is this, in Canada today, if you happen to be born into poverty, you have only between a third-to-a-half the chance of getting into post-secondary school education that another person of equal ability has who is born into a middle income home. And that ratio, or "educational participation gap", has not changed for the better over the decade of the 1960's despite the massive infusion of public funds into educational institutions in Canada during those 10 years.* A stark way of describing the "educational participation gap" is to say that whereas one third of the brightest children of the poor in Canada do not survive to the final years of high school, one-third of the stupidest children of the rich clutter up our universities.

Reasons for the Failure to Educate the Children of the Poor

The basic reason why our educational institutions remain the preserve of the well-to-do half of our population is that the priorities in educational concern, research and expenditures for the last decade have been on post-secondary school education rather than on 'education at the beginning'. Another way of putting this is to say simply that the basic concern has been with widening and deepening educational opportunities for those young people who survive to the end of high school. The basic concern has not been with the question "Who survives to the end of high school?"—the basic concern has not been with educational programs in pre-primary and primary school designed to change the socio-economic mix of students who survive to the end of high school.

It is for this reason, for example, that the expansion of student aid programs for university and college students in Canada over the past five years has really amounted to no more than a transfer of disposable income within the well-to-do half of the Canadian population.

Let me quote from a study done this summer in Ontario entitled "Student Aid and Access to Higher Education". The study consisted of administering a questionnaire to 8,700 representative students in 25 high schools across Ontario, (the so-called Province of Opportunity).

"The Ontario Student Awards Program was initiated 'to ensure equality of educational opportunity at the post-secondary level'. If this phrase is to be meaningful, it must imply that any student who is capable and wants to have a post-secondary education, is financially able to do so. Yet many young people, because of economic and social factors, never seriously consider going to university. Large numbers of students never reach the level where they are able to enter university, and thus be eligible for student aid, because they give up before then".

The Authors went on to note that only "the very brightest, highly motivated lower class student" gets to the stage where he is "able to obtain a post-secondary education". Therefore, conclude the authors, if the objective of the Ontario Student Awards Program is to be really meaningful, the socio-economic mix of the students reaching the final year of high school "should not be very much different from those who started in the educational system". In short, present student award programs have very little to do with educating the children of the poor in our society.

Little can be done to change the socio-economic mix of young Canadians reaching the final years of high school by a continuation of the massive infusion of public funds into universities, community colleges or, indeed, into the high schools themselves. Some semblance of equity in that mix in the final years of high school depends primarily on such equity in Grade 8 which, in turn, depends on preferential educational programs for the children

*For the hard documentation see: Timothy E. Reid, "Priorities in Educational Expenditure: The Essential Basis", Dalhousie Review, Autumn, 1968 Vol. 48, No. 3 pp. 333-346; Timothy E. of the working and "public-assistance" poor when they are 3, 4 and 5 years old.

The rationale behind this argument is two fold.

First, it must be emphasized that one essential aspect of the "poverty syndrome" is that "poverty homes" produce too many children without adequate words at the age of 3,4 and 5. Such children have not had the opportunity of the encouragement to pick up the basic skills of communication and understanding of language that are largely a pre-requisite for success in senior kindergarten and Grade 1.

All later learning will be influenced by this lack of basic learning—having names for things is essential in the learning process. The average child from such a background will have difficulty and constant frustration from the demand of a typical primary school programme. He cannot cope with the change and with the expectations about what he should achieve, and he is baffled and feels inadequate. No wonder the desire grows to escape from the virtual imprisonment which school comes to represent as he experiences failure year after year. Instead of eight or ten years of primary school curing the basic handicap of such a child, he has either left school for good or if he lasts through secondary school is probably reading at a level approximately three and one half years below the expected grade average. Since he literally cannot read the secondary school arts and sciences text books of Grade 9, it is probable that he will shift into truncated occupational streams. In too many cases, the choice is simply to get out of the tough reading courses of the arts and science programmes which are geared to post-secondary education. A great many gifted children from poverty homes end up in courses below the level of their actual intelligence because they appear to lack the ability. Most simply do not get into the streams leading to university and many other kinds of post-secondary school education.

A much deeper aspect of the communication alienation between these children and the schools they go to—in terms of what they expect to happen to them—was put this way by a youth streetworker (Y.M.C.A.) in Toronto's Cabbagetown.

"You see these kids at thirteen and you know what might happen and there's nothing you can do about it. Anything we can do is really only putting a bandaid on. People say these kids just live on a day-to-day basis and don't plan ahead, but they've got nothing to plan for. There's no talk about having careers."

The second part of the rationale behind the argument for the government sector identifying the pre-primary school level of education as having the first call on public funds in education has been summarized by two experts on learning in this way.

"Our present knowledge of the development of learning abilities indicates that the pre-school years are the most important years of learning in the child's life. A tremendous amount of learning takes place during these years; and this learning is the foundation for all further learning." (A.R. Jenson)

A further statement by Jerome Bruner supports this concept.

"It is not surprising in the light of this that early opportunities for development have loomed so large in our recent understanding of human mental growth. The importance of early experience is only dimly sensed today. The evidence from animal studies indicates that virtually irreversible deficits can be produced in mammals by depriving them of opportunities that challenge their nascent capacities."

The children who will be in their early twenties in 1985 are already born. The vast majority of the 30 per cent of the more than 530,000 5 year olds in Canada who are not attending school are from poverty and low-income families—children who were born behind the eight ball of disadvantage, children who need preferential pre-primary school education if they are to have a meaningful chance to develop the abilities with which they were born and have an equal chance in competition in school against the children from more affluent and advantaged homes. In the world of 1985 it is doubtful that very many of these children will feel like worthwhile citizens and independent members of society; their process of alienation started the day they were born and there is still no basic commitment to them by the government sector before they are 6 years old to help them lift themselves up. Nothing is being done for them when they are 4 years old (our nursery schools have children who are mainly from well-to-homes where the opposite ought to be the case). And 4 years old is an age which learning experts state is much more potentially productive than 5 years old.

Those with power in our society have not yet decided that the children of the poor are going to be educated. It's as simple as that. If, at the beginning of the 1960's, there had been a commitment that the children of the poor were going to be educated there would now be a fundamentally different educational system in Canada. A much, much larger proportion of the educational expenditures pie would not be spent on pre-primary and primary education. For one thing, almost every three and four year old especially from the "inner city" would now be in school for at least four hours a day. The best and the highest paid teachers at any level of education would be teaching the four year olds who happened to be born into poverty. The best teachers would be teaching the children of the poor; they would have the smallest classes; they would have the largest budgets for out-of-school education programs; they would have first call on education research funds; they would only "teach" the children five hours a day thereby giving them plenty of time to work with the parents both in the school and at home to teach the parents to be "parent-teachers". These teachers would have undergone a kind of teacher-training program that virtually doesn't exist in Canada—a program that would develop in them the sensitivity and skill to work with young children who are already, at the age of three and four beginning to destroy themselves. In short, the kind of training that develops a person into a first-rate streetworker in Toronto's Cabbagetown. It would be an educational program for three and four year olds that would have the backing of their parents because they would have been consulted and would be active participants themselves.

But this isn't the educational picture in Canada today. Today everything still conspires against the children of the poor.

THE SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON POVERTY

EVIDENCE

Ottawa, Thursday, April 16, 1970

The Special Senate Committee on Poverty met this day at 9.30 a.m.

Senator David A. Croll (Chairman) in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, the delegation this morning represents the Canadian Civil Liberties Association. Mr. Alan Borovoy, the General Counsel of the Association, will introduce the members with him.

Mr. A. Alan Borovoy, General Counsel, Canadian Civil Liberties Association: Thank you Mr. Chairman. On my immediate right is Mr. Robert Cooper, Director of the Community Legal Services, Point St. Charles, Montreal. He is a lecturer on law and poverty at McGill University. To his immediate right is Mr. Michael Posluns, Director of the National Capital Area Chapter of the Canadian Civil Liberties Association.

A word about the Canadian Civil Liberties Association, which is not in the brief. I had planned to add an introductory note, and I will supply that orally at the moment. We are an organization that was established essentially to protect the freedom and dignity of the individual citizen against unreasonable invasion by society. To this extent we have right now in Canada, and this is on the basis of a couple of years' growth, over 1,000 members. We have chapters now in Nova Scotia, Fredericton, the National Capital Area here, Toronto, London, and in Manitoba, and we are in the process of negotiating for further chapters in other cities in other provinces across the country.

Our president is the Honourable J. Keiler McKay, former Lieutenant Governor of Ontario. Our Board of Directors includes a wide variety of trades, callings and interests from television performers like Pierre Berton, actors like Bruno Gerussi, writers like June Collwood to experts in finance like Walter Gordon, political leaders like Dalton Camp, trade unionists like Eamon Park of the United Steel Workers and Dennis McDermott of the United Auto Workers' Union. We have the President of the Union of Ontario Indians, the Jamaican Canadian Association, the Japanese Canadian Citizens' Association. We have a number of lawyers, of course, including the Dean of the Faculty of Law at the University of Toronto, and the Associate Dean of the Osgoode Hall Law School at York University. That gives some idea as to the composition, background, nature and interests of the Canadian Civil Liberties Association.

If I may, sir, I will begin with some comments on the submission itself. Our submission begins with the observation that the fulfillment and extension of civil liberties quite clearly is not going to resolve the problem of poverty in this country. As an organization our primary thrust is directed not to the substance of economic policy, which ultimately contains the solutions to the questions of poverty, but rather to the method by which existing policy is administered and the processes by which existing policy is changed. Those are the essential civil liberties interests in the poverty question. To that end our concern will be to minimize the disadvantages of poverty in the administration of existing law and policy and to minimize the disadvantages of poverty in the processes that are necessary to change existing policy and law.

The brief is divided into two parts: the first part, Poverty and the Procedural Protections of Existing Law. Here we are dealing with the first component of our interest and subsumed in that area, the first sub-topic, legal rights and legal service. Here, of course, we make the point that an opportunity for proper and competent legal advice is necessary to equal legal rights. Assuming, as we do, that all are entitled to equality before the law, we then go on to make the point that there cannot be equality so long as poverty reduces the ability to call upon competent legal service. It is quite clear from a glance at the state of affairs across the country that those living in poverty and near poverty levels do not have a proper call on the legal talents that are otherwise available to protect the legal rights of citizens in this country.

Although we point out in our brief that we have not been able to make anywhere near what we would call an exhaustive analysis of this problem, what we have been able to do is take some random samplings which we suggest, if they do not lead to conclusive observations, they at least lead to highly suggestive observations. Now, for example, we had some people doing some research work in Halifax, Montreal and Winnipeg. They were conducting a survey of the criminal courts—magistrate's courts. Now, you will notice from our statistics on page 3 of the brief, take Winnipeg for example, and we just took some of this material at random because we have not yet been able to complete all of our findings and we have not subjected them all to the proper analysis. But just taking five randomly chosen days in Winnipeg during the month of January, 1970, of 37 accused persons whose cases were disposed of in those days, only 6 were represented by counsel. Significantly, 36 people were convicted; 36 people pleaded guilty and 10 of them were sentenced to various terms of penal incarceration.

Senator Pearson: May I ask a question? What class of crime had these people committed? You talk of 36, were they all drunks or what were they?

Mr. Borovoy: I doubt very much if they would all be drunks. Unfortunately, those are the statistics that we haven't yet been able to...

Senator Pearson: They don't mean very much.

Mr. Borovoy: Well, I would suggest, sir, that it is significant that that many people find their way into gaol and have their freedom lost without competent legal counsel. I would submit, with respect, that that is a meaningful statistic. Whether or not the offences were what one might call serious as opposed to something one might say is not serious, surely, if one ends up in gaol that is some indictment on the state of legal aid service. Now, significantly, the Province of Manitoba now is spending more than it ever has as of the year ending March 31st, 1969, $160,000.00, which in a province of a million people, is not very much money.

Now there are similar, as I suggest, suggestive material from Nova Scotia and from Montreal. You will notice in Nova Scotia three days were chosen. 51 persons were convicted on the basis of 47 pleas of guilty. Only 7 were represented by counsel. We have some similar information for the Province of Quebec from some work in Montreal. I am hoping, in a little while, to have a much more refined breakdown of some of this information that I unfortunately am not able to give you today.

The Province of New Brunswick, as I understand it, has committed itself to the principle of enacting a legal aid plan but at the moment it does little more than pay the defense of poor prisoners who are indicted or committed for trial in a restricted number of criminal offenses. That, again, once one is indicted, of course, that implies, at least, that it has gone beyond the magistrate's court level and, as you are well aware, the overwhelming number of cases in the criminal courts are processed in magistrates court. This would suggest that very few people, indeed, who are caught up in the criminal processes in that Province get proper legal representation; at least of those who are poor.

In Saskatchewan eligibility for government subsidized legal aid requires an annual income amounting to less than $2,000 for unmarried persons and $2,500 for married persons. You can imagine what quantity of legal aid is available at those near starvation eligibility requirements. In addition to that, if one examines the fee schedule that Legal Aid does provide in the Province of Saskatchewan in the greatest number of Magistrate's Court hearings, senior counsel are entitled to $40 for a half day and $20 on a plea of guilty; junior counsel to $40 and $15 on a plea of guilty. As we observe, on the private market, such a schedule of fees could purchase little more than the introductory salutations at the beginning of the hearing.

Senator Fournier: How many cases a day? You say $40 per case?

Mr. Borovoy: Yes.

Senator Fournier: How many cases a day do you process?

Mr. Borovoy: Do the Magistrates' Courts process?

Senator Fournier: No. You say you are paid $40 a day for the legal counsel?

Mr. Borovoy: No. The Province of Saskatchewan will reimburse those lawyers who acted in Legal Aid matters to the tune of $40 for a half a day's appearance in Magistrate's Court.

Senator Fournier: Suppose he appears only half an hour? It doesn't take half a day in all cases. Does he get the $40?

Mr. Borovoy: I would assume he would on those Legal Aid cases. However, I would suggest to you that a fee of $40 for up to a half a day's appearance would not command very much attention on the private market. If someone were asking a lawyer to act on a case I would suggest he would be charged something in excess of $40 for that appearance.

Senator Fournier: I quite agree with you.

Mr. Borovoy: What we are suggesting is that the concept of regional disparities, when we are concerning ourselves with equality before the law, is a most repugnant idea. To this extent we are asking, as our first major recommendation, that the state of Legal Aid service be equalized around the country and that it is the role of the federal Government to take the initiative in providing some sort of equity among the Provinces insofar as Legal Aid is concerned. To that extent we suggest that it apply, of course, not only in criminal cases but also in civil matters. That is the first recommendation and that leads directly to our second recommendation where we ask that we go even beyond the provision of legal aid in litigation, as Ontario now does to a much more substantial degree than most of the other provinces, and provide some funds for preventive legal services, as well. Bearing in mind that most of us who go to lawyers seek legal advice in order to avoid the court room, the problem is that for those in poverty, the legal aid they usually get under most legal aid plans in this country arises only at the level of litigation. We submit that we should devise a system of providing preventive legal aid advice to people so that they would not find themselves in that position and so that their position would be made somewhat more the equal of other people in the community who can command legal resources with their own money. In this area we have suggested the concept of the legal aid clinic operating in the indigent area where its function would be not only to sit there and wait for cases to come to them, but also to go out and to aggressively attract the patronage of the poor on the basis that great numbers of poor people are not aware of these services, are not aware that many of their problems can be characterized as legal problems and that what is required is not only an available service but an educational programme in order to inform people that such services are available. To this end we are recommending that the federal government and the provinces investigate ways and means of setting up all-purpose legal aid storefront clinics in poor areas where lawyers would be working on salary paid for by government and paid to go out and give preventive legal assistance to indigents.

Senator Fergusson: May I interrupt there and ask if this has been tried anywhere and, if so, with what success?

Mr. Borovoy: I understand that there are a number of rather successful experiments of this kind in the United States under the OEO programmes. This is one of the reasons I have asked Mr. Cooper to join us this morning. He is the Director of one such operation in the City of Montreal that is now getting off the ground and that, unfortunately, is not subsidized by any arm of government. They were able to get some money from the private sector. Perhaps he would care to explain something about the way they operate.

Mr. Robert Cooper, Director of Community Legal Services, Pointe St. Charles, Quebec: I will give you an idea of our composition which will help you in understanding how our policy is or how we are evolving. We are an incorporated body comprised of 13 directors. The directors, these 13, are formed as follows: 2 are from the Junior Bar Association, in addition there is the full-time attorney, the attorney and director of this project. That makes 3 attorneys. Then there are 2 law students at both McGill University and University of Montreal. This includes the President of the Law Faculties and the student in charge of legal aid at both universities. As well, we have 6 residents of the Pointe St. Charles area on our Board. In other words, this legal aid service is composed of 13 people of which only 3 are lawyers. I believe we have the advantage of a strong people participation and at least 10 of these 13 who are not lawyers and might help lawyers in broadening their, perhaps, traditionally restricted view of the law.

Our functions are essentially three-fold. We are now trying to work out our priorities. Firstly, the service orientation. We will, for that area, attempt to give legal advice and handle the litigation for those people in the area faced with a legal problem. If that is all we can do then we are an obvious failure because, firstly, this is in a sense what the actual Legal Aid Service is doing in Montreal and I don't think a community legal clinic should stop at that. That is why our second function is much more important and that is the law reform function or test case function. The taking of a case that may not help the individual party but rather help the group as a whole. Then our third function is the educative one in which we are actively attempting to instill a legal awareness and involvement among the residents of the area. We are starting to do this by very simple means: colourful brochures, "Are You a Tenant? Did You Know That You Can..." and listing very few simple basic rights. We have prepared little stickers that go onto telephones, just as you might have for emergencies, for ambulance, for fire, for police, in addition, we have this for day and night calls at all hours to obtain our services for these emergencies. We are spending approximately four months just establishing links in the community. We will not take a legal case until September 1st. We believe that right now we have a far more important task and that is to establish a basis of trust and to hopefully change the image of the lawyer as we have already met, it hasn't been easy. The fact that we are lawyers has not enabled us to be greeted with open arms at this point. We hope, through our Board of Directors, through the liaison men we have in the area, that this will be overcome.

Senator Fergusson: Where do you get the money to carry this on?

Mr. Cooper: Originally we approached the Bar and the Government and were refused. Two students at McGill University vigorously approached various foundations who have privately and anonymously funded us. There is not a penny coming from any government source.

Senator Fournier: How much free time do you give to your service?

Mr. Cooper: I, myself, am on there on a fulltime basis and will be the fulltime attorney of the clinic.

Senator Fournier: You didn't answer my question. How much free time do you give? How much free time do you put in the organization yourself? Do you sometimes work free for your organization?

Mr. Cooper: No. I'm being paid by this corporation.

Senator Fournier: I am not just asking about you. The group. How much free time do you put in your own organization?

The Chairman: How many paid people have you on the staff?

Mr. Cooper: Our staff right now is, admittedly, rather small. There is one full time attorney.

Senator Fournier: That's you?

Mr. Cooper: Right. There is one articling student and two legal secretaries. In addition, lawyers have volunteered on a regularized basis at nights. This is very important to us because we are anticipating and we have already met with the fact that our greatest amount of service and time involved will be at night when the people of the area are most free to see us. We have therefore prepared, through active work with lawyers in Montreal, lists of people available on various nights to work with us. We are, in a sense, perhaps beggars because we can't pay these people. We are very fussy beggars when we approach any lawyer. Any lawyer that says to us that he will give to us his time when he has a chance is automatically refused. We will only take someone who will guarantee us that every Tuesday night at 6 to 10 he will be there.

Senator Fournier: At what cost? You haven't answered my question. I regret to tell you that. You have evaded my question very smartly.

The Chairman: These lawyers that you have working there at night, do you pay them?

Mr. Cooper: No.

Senator Fournier: That is what I want to know.

Mr. Cooper: The only ones being paid then are myself, the articling student, the legal secretaries. Everyone else is free.

The Chairman: Continue Mr. Borovoy. We will get back to the questions.

Mr. Borovoy: We also recommended, of course, in order to iron out many of the inevitable problems, some demonstration projects at the federal level to begin with in order that we could get some idea of how these things would function. We have recommended some additional protections in the criminal law. This grows, again, out of the experience that I suppose one could have from walking into a gaol. In many places in this country you will probably find people who have been sitting there for great periods of time waiting for their cases to come up and who have not been convicted of anything. We took, just at random, the August Court Calendar for the City of Toronto and began to examine it. We found, for example, that an aggregate total of 232 days were spent in goal by approximately 6 people against whom all charges were withdrawn during the month of August, 1968. A most interesting case was a charge which was withdrawn against a man who had been arrested on March 23rd, deprived of his freedom for 131 days and then the prosecution decided that it was not going to press on for prosecution. That sort of experience, of course, we all know about and has taken place all too often in this country. To that extent we have recommended that the bail laws be changed. Our position is that most of these people who are incarcerated owe their incarceration before trial less to the quality of the act they have performed than to the size of the income which they earn. They are being gaoled essentially because of poverty. To that extent we think that the Minister of Justice ought to be supported as vigorously as possible when he says that the bail laws should be reformed.

Our recommendation is, that as a matter of course in the greatest number of cases, financial bail be completely eliminated and that all accused persons be entitled prima facie to their freedom unless the Crown, and the onus would be on the Crown, can satisfy the Court that the accused is not likely to show up for his trial or that he poses some substantial danger to the community by being allowed to go free and subject to those conditions it is our recommendation that they ought to go free following arrest or summons or whatever way we involve them in the legal processes.

Senator Fournier: I think you opened the door for long discussions, which I am not going to get to, but I think the effect of the counsel is the answer to your questions. The ability of the counsel.

Mr. Borovoy: We have suggested, also, that another problem with the criminal law and the poor is the question of fines. To this extent we are recommending a mandatory system of reasonable installments. Too many people go to gaol because they cannot pay their fines immediately and our suggestion is that the courts be required to give reasonable periods of time before they can impose gaol penalties for failure to pay monetary fines.

Then we go into the long question of the welfare law. Now, this is what we call the special protections of the welfare law. The welfare law is the special poor law in this country; the laws dealing especially with poor people. It has been the experience of our organization, after having been involved in a number of cases on behalf of welfare recipients and having had some experience with this, that the poor law, the law we have designed especially for poor people, contains some of the most flagrant violations of the most basic canons of procedural fairness that are available in most other legislation and, certainly, in the common law that is applicable to all people. Some examples of this, and we have recommended changes here as well. We know in many municipalities in Ontario when a person applies for welfare he is required to sign a form giving the welfare office a continuing right of access to his home, they say, at reasonable hours. Now, of course, you can appreciate the homes of most of us are inviolate and the only time even the police can enter the home of the most dangerous criminal is in hot pursuit or with a warrant, after satisfying a disinterested judicial officer that there are reasonable and probable grounds for the belief that an investigation will disclose the fruits or implements of a criminal offense. But in the case of the innocent indigent on welfare, he finds that he has fewer legal rights than some of the most dangerous criminals in society.

Now, following on that, there is what we call the right to a hearing. We have always believed that before a person's rights are determined he should have a reasonable opportunity to persuade the decision maker of his case. We have run across situations where women on welfare have received a letter one morning and have been advised that as of a few days earlier their welfare benefits were being cancelled. They are told that, in fact I can almost give it to you, "From information on file it appears that..." and, of course, what "information" they are not told. They are not told who their accusers are and they are not given the opportunity to make representations at the point of decision. We have also argued that the appeal provisions are not enough because the appeal won't take place for weeks and in the meantime what is the welfare recipients supposed to do when they are cut off.

Following upon that, of course, is the whole question of the way this appeal machinery operates. The Canada Assistance Plan, properly, has provided a condition on the use of federal money for welfare purposes that there be appeal machinery. We know in Canada, as of this day, that not every province has even proclaimed the legislation for appeals that are required by the Canada Assistance Plan. Mr. Cooper from Montreal advises me, for example, that the Province of Quebec has not yet proclaimed its legislation. My understanding is that they are still receiving welfare money. On top of that the question also is to what extent does the welfare appeal machinery function like an appellate tribunal. We take a look at the Province of Ontario, for example, we will find that many Members of the Board of Review are former welfare administrators and we have the interesting situation where they are sitting on appeal from the very policies that they formulated when they were in the Welfare Department. You can appreciate that that is somewhat of a departure from the maxim that the law must not only be just but also appear to be just.

Now, the interesting thing in the Province of Ontario is that the Board of Review, on a number of occasions, when faced with the problem of evaluating some person's case has justified its decision, and this is almost a quote, it has always been the practice of the Family Benefits Branch to do such and so. What they're doing is basing their decision on the policy of the tribunal that they are supposed to be reviewing which, as I suggest, is a most novel form of appellate jurisprudence.

I have one example here of the Province of Nova Scotia where a person who had applied for appeal received a letter dismissing his appeal. The letter was sent on the stationery of the Welfare Department and signed by one of the Welfare administrators. Many of these Welfare Appeal Boards do not have provision for independent legal counsel. We know that they have to get legal advice. Where are they getting it from? The appearance, at least, is that they would be getting their legal advice from the government service; the very government from which they are supposed to be sitting as an appeal tribunal.

Now, we have a number of recommendations to make, as you can see from our brief, about making the boards of review and boards of appeal function as independent proper appellant tribunals. It is not enough for the Canada Assistance Plan simply to provide that there ought to be appeal machinery. The appeal machinery must function like appeal machinery.

Now, of course, one of the most important recommendations we make in the welfare area is the problem of informing the welfare recipient as to his legal rights. As far as we know there is a veritable dearth of information given to welfare recipients regarding their rights and particularly is it important when there is a conflict of interest, as so often there is, between the welfare office and the welfare recipient. The recipient should have some opportunity to know what his rights are when he comes into conflict with the welfare office. To this extent we have quite frankly recommended that there be proper distributions of literature, advertising, if need be, in the press, radio, television, tramways, taxis, subways in order that this service be properly communicated to people, as many other government services are, to the more affluent sections of the community.

That would finish the first part of the brief where we talk about the procedural protections of existing law. The second part is Poverty and the Democratic Right to Change the Law. Here what we are concerned about is the extent to which people living in poverty can effectively influence legislative change.

If we bear in mind that pressure is the chief instrument of persuasion, then what we must recognize is the terrific disadvantage the poor suffer in participating in the democratic processes for change. The rich man can use his financial resources as an additional instrument of pressure. The poor man has only his body. His ability to speak. His ability to demonstrate; to picket or demonstrate non-violently. The problem is, we have learned in the past year, that the effective right of non-violent dissent in this country is not nearly as securely based as it ought to be in a democratic society. Where most of our experience thus far has concerned the middle class dissenter, who has been trying to get into the act and challenging government policy, our feeling now is that the lower class dissenters who are now beginning to organize much more than ever before, of course, are governed by the same laws but they are even more helpless and more vulnerable than those middle class dissenters have been. If we just take one year, the past year in Canada, we have following a little bit of pressure and this is what concerns our organization that when there has been some pressure, some upheaval, some tension or disruption in the community. Going across Canada out west you have a young person charged with and convicted of criminal libel for writing in an off-beat journal that a certain judge behaved like Pontius Pilate he finds himself now with a criminal record for that. Another one in the Maritimes found guilty for contempt of court for writing in his newspaper column that the courts are tools of the corporate elite. In Toronto we have young people shouting at a noisy picnic nasty slogans at the Prime Minister. They are set upon by others. They are charged with causing a disturbance. In Montreal when there is some violence in the streets we find all demonstrations are prohibited except, of course, the Grey Cup Parade. An interesting example of selective demonstrations.

It is our view that in order that the poor people who are now beginning to involve themselves much more vigorously in the democratic processes than they ever have before, it is now important for us to shore up the law respecting non-violent dissent in this country. We look at the by-laws of many cities across this country and we see the power to determine the parade routes—the route and the time of parades and demonstrations exist totally with the police authority who we argue are one of the parties to the dispute. It puts them in the position of umpiring their own ball game because they can effectively, instead of banning demonstrations, reroute them. We find with something like labour picketing that people are often entitled to picket but often only in such small numbers that they won't be effective. That tenants do not have some of the bargaining machinery that would put them on a more equitable bargaining basis with land lords.

Senator Fournier: Could I ask a question on this? You are covering a lot of material my dear friend. You are taking all the time.

Mr. Borovoy: Well, since we are assuming it's read, I really think there ought to be more time for discussion.

Senator Fournier: You are covering a lot of material and talking about the low class dissenters and so on. In my mind and the example which I have laid in Canada, not in the United States, it doesn't matter what you do, if you belong to a certain class of society and you do certain things against the law, you can curse the law and you can damn the justice, you can damn freedom, you can do anything and there is never any problem for some lawyers to defend these type of guys. To my knowledge, I don't think there has ever been one who has been left in gaol because he couldn't get assistance. This is a very serious matter.

Mr. Borovoy: I'm not sure to what you are addressing yourself to Senator?

Senator Fournier: I am addressing myself to the things you read in the paper, the things you see on the news, the things that are taking place in Canada today at this moment and in the United States.

I will give you an example: when this affair arised at St. George Williams which everybody felt sorry for, nobody agreed with it, damage of two to three million dollars. None of these boys were deprived of lawyers, in fact on the contrary, there was a flock of lawyers from Montreal trying to defend these boys the next morning. There was no shortage of lawyers because these boys were not wealthy people.

Mr. Borovoy: I take it you are addressing yourself to, the problem we mentioned at the outset, about legal aid.

Senator Fournier: I'm talking of things you implemented in your report.

Mr. Borovoy: I suggest to you where some people will often be able to get lawyers, their ability to do so often depends upon their ability to purchase the legal talent. You will find in many cities in this country large numbers of people going through the magistrate's court who have no legal representation and one of the reasons they have no legal representation is because they cannot afford it. Now, sure in a lot of the sensational cases you are talking about they will usually have lawyers, but there are many non-sensational cases.

Senator Fournier: Let me ask this question: would the same lawyers be willing to defend justice without the money? It is a matter of justice and principle. Would the same lawyer be willing to defend this hippy, these rebels, without being paid?

Mr. Borovoy: Well, if you are asking me now to make a comment on the morality or idealism of the law profession I perhaps would have to beg off and not try to portray myself as a competent spokesman for what lawyers would do.

Senator Fournier: I am satisfied with your answer.

Mr. Borovoy: Be that as it may, I would like to embellish it, as least to this extent, to say that regardless of the state of morality or otherwise in the law profession, I am not sure that any profession has any claim to or any monopoly of idealism or the lack thereof. I would suggest this though, that our concern must be not the morality of lawyers as our primary problem, but the service available to people; that should be our primary problem and to that extent let me suggest whatever one says about lawyers, let us provide the proper service for people who need it and therefore that leads necessarily to some kind of proper level of legal aid service in this country.

Senator Fournier: You have more than answered my question.

The Chairman: You may remember, that the services there were purchased by the governments of the persons who were charged. If they came from some Caribbean country their government made sure that they had the very best legal services that was available. That was a little different from normal. Was that the case in Montreal?

Mr. Cooper: Yes.

The Chairman: You don't know?

Mr. Cooper: No. That I am aware of.

The Chairman: In a number of them, any way, that was the case.

Senator Fournier: When I read this brief last night and this morning, I came to the conclusion that the witnesses here this morning have something to sell. You are a good salesman. You made a very good approach to it. It seems to me that I can see there an open field, an untapped field, for the legal profession to get into for the poor people. I think they can see it. I can see it in this brief. On account of lack of money, and so on, they are trying to organize a scheme whereby they can tap this field and get paid for it. I don't blame them. I don't expect anybody to work for nothing. Every once in a while I like somebody to sacrifice half an hour or more for the good cause like we do. But, you know, there were many things mentioned here: legal rights, legal service, legal talent and so on, promoting legal service. I agree with that, but what is the difference between legal service and justice? Have we taken justice away from the books completely or can you buy justice? I can give you many examples where money is a great influence today and you mention in your brief if you hire a good counsel, that is your answer, he is going to fight your case regardless of justice because he will say, "That's my client. I am working for my client." It has an effect on the uneducated people in Canada, like myself, when we see what is taking place sometimes in justice in Canada and in the United States what money can do. It seems to me that justice is forgotten somewhere or bought. I will leave it at that until I have more.

Mr. Cooper: If I may just make a comment, the word justice is very difficult to define but I would suggest that, perhaps, the poor man does not want justice; he wants help, which is very different, I think, from the traditional conception of justice as our courts have presently evolved.

I might add just one other point, too, and this is quite related. When I think of the relationship between law and poverty I don't just think of legal aid in the sense of getting more lawyers. I think the very court system and court process has to be questioned. The very idea of a court deciding upon extractions, upon precedents and determining a decision that does not go to the poor person. It doesn't say you can do this and you can do that and it goes to the lawyer and it says: plaintiff and defendant and a tremendous amount of jargon. The poor person, firstly, does not understand the decision because it is not written for him. It is written for the lawyers and the legal profession. It renders a decision that is in terms of all or nothing, black or white, rather than attempting to mediate and conciliate the problem. As I said before, it doesn't deal in concrete terms as the poor people would see the problems but in these generalized intellectualized principles.

What we have tried to do, if I may mention, in our clinic is to set up neighborhood courts in Pointe St. Charles. Now, we don't have a compulsory jurisdiction, but what we can do is in a sense provide arbitration by the poor for the poor. We have three judges. Two of them are residents of the area and the third is a lawyer. We have rules of practice; general rules of practice that encourage mediation, the bringing together of two sides and that would encourage not saying that the decision is either the landlord repairs or the tenant leaves, but rather the tenant will pay, peraps, $2 more and the landlord only has to repair this amount until he can afford more.

Senator Fournier: Well, sir, in your long answer to a very short question you said one word that impressed me when you said that the poor are not looking for justice, they are looking for help. I quite agree with you. That is a good statement. I wish it would be used more in your brief. This word justice is almost lost at this very moment.

I pass to somebody else.

The Chairman: Senator Inman.

Senator Inman: Well, I was very interested in this brief all through when I read it. There seemed to be a lot to consider.

On page 5 you were discussing legal aid for the poor and the legal clinics located in poor areas. I am interested to know how would you go about setting those up. You have spoken about store window clinics and that, but to get down to a real business basis, how would you suggest doing that?

Mr. Borovoy: Our submission is, admittedly, short on detail that way. That is why for these purposes we contented ourselves with recommending the provinces and federal government jointly study the problem, set up a couple of demonstration projects because, clearly, a number of problems are involved in it.

Senator Inman: How would you suggest these be set up?

Mr. Borovoy: At least, as a general concept, what we are suggesting is that you take a few lawyers on salary from society and they would have a store front office, an office that tries to attract people to them. They would go out into the community, they would speak at home and school meetings and the church meetings and they would have literature with them and go out and try to promote their service. The would make sure that they knew the leaders in the local community. Probably, also, a board of directors that was drawn, in part, from people who actually live in the community as an advisory committee to the functioning of the project. That, in general terms, is the way we would envision it being set up but beyond that, as I say, there would undoubtedly be problems that would have to be worked out.

Senator Inman: I was just thinking of the point that a great many of those people would not want the public to know that they were seeking aid.

Mr. Borovoy: There might be some people who wouldn't.

Senator Fournier: This is one problem with welfare now; the recipients sometimes don't want to be on the list.

Mr. Borovoy: The welfare office is still a place anybody can walk into and see who else is there, anyway. Our hope would be, also, that it would become an established institution in an area where people would feel some sense of identification with this kind of operation and the operation with the community so that some of those problems might be handled. But, of course, the other thing to bear in mind is that this is one of a number of alternatives. This isn't the only way of offering legal aid service. The present system we have, at least, in Ontario of going and getting a certificate and picking your lawyer you could still have, but this is a concept established in order to provide that preventive service that often, just otherwise, isn't available.

Senator Fournier: I would think there would be just a slight minority that would oppose. My opinion is that if you had such a clinic it would be well patronized.

Mr. Borovoy: I would think so.

Senator Inman: Another thing I was interested in was on page 7, speaking of bail. What alternative have you to offer instead of bail. It is all very well to say these people would not be incarcerated, but there are cases you wouldn't call them hardened criminals but there is a pocket of people, I was thinking for instance of robbery. I know of a case, from personal experience, where a young chap was let go and not put in and while he was sworn not to go at it again and waiting until his time came to come up before the courts, he made three other attempts.

Senator Fournier: He had to get money to pay his lawyer.

Senator Inman: May be. I am just wondering, have you any alternative to offer?

Mr. Borovoy: Yes; the alternative we suggest is that if the Crown feels that the man is a potential menace to society, and I mean a substantial menace, or that he is not likely to show up for his trial, then the onus would then be on the Crown to go before the judge and make an application to incarcerate the man pending his trial and only if the Crown can satisfy the court that this is a very dangerous person to have at large or that the offense with which he is charged and his background is such as to create a probability that he won't show up, then he is incarcerated without bail. In other words, what we are suggesting is that there is no rational basis for the payment of money. Make a determination that the man is dangerous or let him go, but don't base it on money. What we do today is decide he might be dangerous or he might not show up and attach a financial price to it. All that means is that the poor criminal can't get out.

Senator Inman: In lieu of money, though, supposing you took away the question of paying money and still didn't want to put him in gaol, is there any other alternative that you have where you can keep the man under surveillance?

Mr. Borovoy: I hadn't worked out a third alternative.

Senator Inman: I am thinking of people who are not, as I said, hardened criminals but still a bit of a menace going around, you know, on the loose.

Mr. Borovoy: Of course, in the greatest number of cases what I would say is, of course, there are lots of people whom you might consider menaces who haven't been charged with anything. We are not prepared to lock them up.

Senator Inman: They are not caught yet.

Mr. Borovoy: That's right; and, we are not prepared to lock them up on the if-come. What I am therefore suggesting to you is that only if the Crown can satisfy the court that there is some reason to believe that this person is a substantial menace or that he won't show up, but apart from that let him go. Naturally there is a risk involved. There are all sorts of risks involved, but our view is that if we balance the risks, bearing in mind the foolishness of making people pay money for it, surely that is a much more sensible risk to take.

Senator Inman: I am interested in having your opinion.

Senator Fournier: I want to finish this. I think we are missing the point here; we are back in the same wagon again. I think the effectiveness of the counsel to convince the Crown that my poor little client, my innocent client, could not have done such a thing and he should deserve mercy has a lot to do with it. I have seen it. I can mention cases that are terrible. I leave it at that.

Mr. Borovoy: I would not want to appear here as the defender of the legal profession. I hope you wouldn't want to appear here as the attacker of the legal profession.

Senator Fournier: I am very sincere, sir.

Mr. Borovoy: I am sure you are, but our point is that, sure some lawyers can be very helpful but you will find, very often, in magistrates courts because of the way things have gone on over the years that bail will be granted at certain sums for certain kinds of offenses and it becomes a practice and what we are saying is that the criteria under which the judges operate have to be changed.

Senator Pearson: Doesn't it become not a practice, but an experience?

Mr. Borovoy: In part, but the experience, as such, the consequence of the experience is to incarcerate poor criminals because the rich man can afford the bail. In other words, the real point of this is why make money the basis upon which a person goes free; make his behavior the basis on which he goes free but not his pocketbook.

Senator Inman: I was just thinking you were speaking of fines. Do you think fines on installment would be a good way to do this?

Mr. Borovoy: I would think it would be much better than not having it on installment. This is really our proposal. It is much better than demanding payment immediately.

Senator Inman: I agree with that. I think that sometimes a man can pay his fines if he were given time to do it whereas right then he mightn't.

The Chairman: Just at that point in fairness, it should to be said, that the judiciary are now, in a great number of instances, giving them the opportunity to pay their fines on the instalment plan.

Mr. Borovoy: That is true. Many judges are very liberal about that.

Senator Inman: I am very glad to know that.

The Chairman: That is done across the country pretty well.

Mr. Borovoy: Unfortunately, there are others who are not. This is what this is designed for.

Senator Inman: At page 18, the second paragraph, you speak of the demonstrations and that sort of thing. I read that, in a way, you are almost in favour to a certain extent, but you wouldn't advocate this way of doing things; would you? Showing strength?

Mr. Borovoy: Would I advocate demonstrations?

Senator Inman: Yes.

Mr. Borovoy: For these purposes I am neither advocating nor attacking. What I am trying to do is to protect what I conceive to be a democratic right. If you were to ask me, I would say that non-violent demonstrations have been a most potent instrument for mobilizing political pressures on behalf of things you happen to believe in. It is not my role here to advise one group or another what tactics they might use to be effective. My view is, though, that it is a perfectly legitimate tactic to use and should claim greater legal protection than it now does.

Senator Inman: Non-violent ones, of course?

Mr. Borovoy: Yes, of course.

Senator Fournier: Where do you draw the line between violent and non-violent?

Mr. Borovoy: I am not sure I could give you a conceptual definition of what violence is, but surely assaults on persons and property one might consider violent and peaceful behaviour, I'm sorry to define the terms in the very words, but I don't know of any better way of doing it. I am not suggesting for one minute that we have to tolerate illegal acts or violent acts.

Senator Inman: I am thinking more of tying up industry by these picket lines. So many of them on a large scale not allowing people to go in and do what they can do. It is against the economy of a country.

Mr. Borovoy: I think we have to make a distinction here, Senator, when we talk about tying up and obstructive picketing. Merely a picket line may not physically obstruct people. It may not physically stop them from going in, but they should have the ability to marshal social pressures at the plant gate. In other words, if you are going to have an equally weighted competition—we have decided that there was the right to strike in a certain situation. If you decide there isn't, that is another question, if in certain industries you think there is an overwhelming public interest to keep the thing going. So long as you say there is the right to strike, then the conflict between the striker and the proprietor must be more equally weighted. Now, the proprietor offers economic benefit to those who will come in. Either a job or his products. In order to compete with that, I suggest, that the picket must have the ability to marshal unpleasant social pressures. By that I mean he should be able to visit unpopularity and social contempt on the picket line interloper. If I can put it in more commonplace language: he should be able to make the picket line interloper feel that he could stand up under a worm every time he walked into the plant.

This, to me, is a more equally weighted conflict. The interloper has the right to go in, the proprietor has the right to attempt to attract him in and, under what I am suggesting, the picketer has a more effective method available to persuade him not to go in. That I suggest is a much more equally weighted conflict.

Senator Pearson: In other words you think that the picket has a right to rough up a man for going in there?

Mr. Borovoy: No, sir.

Senator Pearson: I have seen it done more than once.

Mr. Borovoy: Let me deal with that. There is no reason why an assault committed on a picket line should be treated any differently from an assault anywhere else. If a person commits assault on a picket line he ought to be charged with and convicted of assault. There is no suggestion in what I have said that a picket should enjoy immunity from the criminal law. What I am saying, though, is if X commits assault on a picket line there is no reason to prevent Y from picketing.

Senator Pearson: I am not saying he has not a right to picket. He has a right to picket, but a peaceful picketing is all that he has right to.

Mr. Borovoy: Of course. But the problem that we raised in our brief is that very often the injunctions that are issued in labour disputes by prohibiting the greatest number of the people from picketing are, in effect, punishing Y for the illegal conduct of X. This is what I am suggesting is not proper and loads the conflict in favour of one side against the other, where I am submitting that the Civil Liberties position would be that the conflict ought to be more equitably weighted.

Senator Inman: I have one other question. In speaking of these legal clinics, you have consulted, no doubt, with a great number of lawyers. What was the thinking of the legal profession?

The Chairman: Of what?

Senator Inman: On the setting up of these legal clinics.

Mr. Borovoy: Again, I always feel somewhat remiss in trying to represent somebody else's opinion, Senator. There are some lawyers and, of course, I tend to speak to the more libertarian lawyer. I don't want to discriminate against the others, but that is the way it works out. They are very receptive to this idea. Now, there may be others who are not so receptive. What we suggest is that the government should provide as many creative alternatives as possible so that those who like this method can work this way and others, another way.

Senator Inman: Thank you.

Senator Pearson: I have not very much to say except that I feel that this brief, prepared by this group of Canadian Civil Liberties Association, would be far better if it be prepared five years hence, after you have had considerable experience in building up your associations. To me it seems to be that you are just sort of guessing at things all the way along. You're putting legal thoughts in here which are quite good, but at the same time you lack a tremendous amount of experience in affairs and cities and suchlike. Affairs of the rights of people, etc. Just, for instance, you talk about the police. The inuendo that the police are a bully. That they are not allowing these demonstrations on certain streets and they push them over onto another street. It is the job of the police to be there. They are hired by the City to be there. They are doing the work that the city asks them to do. Their job there is to see that the people do not demonstrate on a highway or a street that is very busy with traffic. They can't have these people demonstrating just because they want to demonstrate and spoil the traffic of everybody else in the city.

I don't see the sense of this. I think your whole brief is based on that same idea. It is something that might be and might not be.

Mr. Borovoy: Well, senator, I am prepared to answer point by point. It is somewhat more difficult to answer the general remark that the brief shows a lack of experience. Apart from cataloguing the experiences of the rather eminent people we have in our organization, I don't know how else I might reply to that. In any event it is not really relevant to the merits of our proposals.

I would suggest this to you, in response to the particular point you raised and I would be happy to respond point by point wherever you think a recommendation or analysis is faulty, but in response to that particular one, quite clearly demonstrators cannot have automatically the right to demonstrate wherever or whenever they please. Our argument, though, is that the police authorities should not have the sole and unilateral power to make that decision because the interests of the police are an orderly flow of traffic; quite properly. The interests of the demonstrator is a conspicuous event. You often find those two interests in conflict with one another.

Senator Pearson: Do not the demonstrators have to have a license?

Mr. Borovoy: That's right. Let me just draw this out. What we are suggesting is that we ought to have a look at the state of affairs that makes the police the judge in their own cause. For example, you take the City of Toronto there is a police bylaw saying that you cannot demonstrate on busy streets unless you have been doing so annually for 10 years prior to October 1st, 1964 or unless the Chief of Police and the Police Commission consider your parade application to have been made under unusual circumstances of municipal, provincial or federal importance.

Now, there are several objections to handling things that way. In the first place, it is certainly my view at any rate, that appointed police commissions should not be enacting legislation. That should be up to elected representatives who are accountable to an electorate.

Senator Pearson: The elected representatives appoint the police to do this work. They delegate the police commission to do this work.

Mr. Borovoy: I am suggesting, Senator, that that is an improper delegation of authority.

Elected representatives should not delegate legislative power in that way to appointed representatives. That is precisely my point, sir. In addition to that, what we are saying is what requires consideration is the concept of having the police making the decision when there is an application for a parade permit because the police are charged with the responsibility of enforcing the point.

Senator Pearson: Is it your belief that the police have got to go back to the commission and the commission have to go back to the city council and ask them for an opinion as to what to do?

Senator Fournier: No, sir. They have legal advisers. In Montreal, though.

Mr. Borovoy: In Toronto the police commission makes that decision and what I am suggesting is that an improper confusion of the enforcement power, with the legislative power, with the adjudicative power and that they ought not all to reside in one authority. I suggest that is not a proper way of handling these things.

Senator Fournier: This is getting to be completed. Let us get to something more actual.

The Chairman: Just a second. Senator McGrand has to come in. I think we ought to make clear that the police commission in Toronto consists of five people or three people?

Mr. Borovoy: I think five.

The Chairman: I think two are elected; are they not?

Mr. Borovoy: Yes.

The Chairman: There are two elected members on the commission and three appointed members. So the group are represented on the police commission.

Now, Senator McGrand.

Senator McGrand: Earlier in the discussion you make some remark about the home of a suspected criminal couldn't be entered without a warrant or something of that nature, but welfare officers did go into the homes of welfare recipients. I want to know what is your objection to a welfare officer checking the home of a welfare recipient to check on the progress the family is making? Maybe I have your remark wrongly?

Mr. Borovoy: The objection is not to visiting per se, Senator. The objection is to a compulsory right of access of the home. The objection is being able to compel entry into the home. That is what I object to. There certainly is nothing wrong with a cooperative relationship existing between the welfare office and the welfare recipient, but the recipient must have the legal right to say get out and not worry about jeopardizing his welfare allowance as a result of that.

Senator McGrand: Well, if there is an objection to a check on the recipient of welfare—going in to check how he is making out with money he is being paid by the taxpayers, then there would be an equal objection to questioning a person who applies for relief.

Mr. Borovoy: No.

Senator McGrand: Well, there certainly is. I'd better explain what I mean. If a person is on welfare and they are receiving a monthly cheque and someone from the Department of Welfare goes down to visit the home to find out how they are making out or whether they need more money or less money, and if that is objectionable then it is equally objectionable to say to a person we will give you money or we will not give you money when they apply for relief, if he has the right to spend his money as he feels he should because he feels he is on relief or needs welfare then it is equally objectionable to say to a person who applies for welfare that we can't give it to you. There has to be an investigation of his—

Mr. Borovoy: Of course.

Senator McGrand: Where is the objection?

Mr. Borovoy: Nobody is suggesting that it is not proper to have an investigation. The objection is to subject a person to a continuing compulsory investigation and thereby continuing invasions of his privacy. In order to be reasonable about it, I wouldn't handicap the state to the point where they are not entitled to investigate initially. What I am suggesting is that it need not follow that the person's home is fair play for the welfare office thereafter.

Senator McGrand: But the home is the only place you could make an investigation. If you said to that person, you come down on Tuesday morning to the office and we want to discuss your problems with you, you don't get as good an appraisal of his problem as you do when you enter his home.

Mr. Borovoy: No. But, Senator, why should this be. Assume, that as most legislation provides, there is a mandatory first visit which we have really never objected to the first time. Why must the welfare recipient's home be a continuing place of investigation when there is no reason, particularly, to suspect that he is doing anything wrong.

Senator McGrand: Well, if there is no suspicion that the things are going poorly then there is no need of them going down and they usually don't.

Mr. Borovoy: They may or they may not. What I am saying to you is why should the welfare recipient, at that point, be in any different position from anyone else? If you suspect that he has done something wrong then get a warrant to compel access to his home. Otherwise leave it between the voluntary relations of the two parties.

Senator McGrand: I think it is on that basis now. There is no use belaboring the point. We disagree.

Michael Posluns, Director of The National Capital Area of The Canadian Civil Liberties Association: Not even the warrant is essential. If you want to investigate simply to update your file, surely you do not require that the person sign a statement that he will give you access to his home as a matter of compulsion. Surely in a normal welfare investigation the social worker ought to be able to go and knock on the door and expect, if he has the kind of reasonable relationship that you are referring to, that he will be let in to carry out his interview.

Senator McGrand: I think in this way: that the welfare officer has the right to go into a house where people are spending monies given to them by the taxpayer. He goes into a house and finds very little food, but the place is cluttered up with beer bottles and he has an idea that things are not going well. I don't see anything wrong with that procedure.

Mr. Borovoy: Alright.

Senator McGrand: I think we have discussed the matter.

Mr. Borovoy: Well, I would like to respond to it though Senator. I say alright, if that is the case then the homes of the rest of us should be equally accessible to see that we are not loading up with beer bottles and depriving our children of food.

Senator McGrand: You are not a recipient of welfare.

Mr. Borovoy: That is precisely the point Senator. I am suggesting what is sauce for the affluent goose should also be sauce for the less affluent gander.

Senator Fournier: You are surely missing the point.

Senator McGrand: If I'm spending money on marijuana or something like that then have the right to come in; don't they?

Mr. Borovoy: Yes. If they get a warrant Senator.

The Chairman: The point made here, as I see it, and I think the Senator see it too, is a condition of receiving welfare he or she must sign a document which says I can enter the house at any time. Now, what is receiving is a matter of right and not a matter of privilege. Once they demand that might go far beyond the bounds of the law. Surely.

Senator McGrand: Here's my point: if you are going to accept a person's word that he is spending his money as he feels it should be spent and that he needs relief and continues to need it, then you must accept his word that he needs relief when he walks down and says I am not making enough money and demands as right, without any further investigation that he be paid so much money a month.

Mr. Borovoy: Most welfare legislations, in that respect, are even more progressive than that. They do not require an accounting of how the person spends the money.

Senator McGrand: I have some other questions I would like to ask. We have not settled that one.

Senator Fournier: Never will.

Mr. Borovoy: I would agree, at least, with that.

Senator McGrand: On page 20 of your brief there is a paragraph I would like you to read yourself. I'll read it to you:

"Why do our courts retain the power to punish scandalizing statements about the courts that are made miles from the courtroom? Would a person who shouted 'Bravo Trudeau' be as guilty of creating a disturbance as the one who shouted 'Traitor Trudeau'? Is it an offence to shout nasty slogans at a noisy picnic?"

Here is the line that I would like to clarify:

"Does the offence arise simply because other people are likely to be provoked? Does this mean that the speaker must be silent because he might be attacked?"

Would you just explain what you mean?

Mr. Borovoy: Yes. What I mean is this: I am trying to understand the basis upon which a person is convicted for shouting nasty slogans at a noisy picnic. Clearly shouting slogans doesn't interfere with the operation of a noisy affair. If I make noise and someone else is making noise that isn't the key to it. I would assume, although I don't know, that the key to it might be that he was shouting unpopular slogans and he was running the risk of being attacked by those who happened to like the prime minister.

What I am suggesting here is that it is a somewhat tenuous position on which to condition the right of dissent to convict the person of a criminal offense for saying something that would make himself the target of a physical attack. What that means is the hooligan becomes the effective censor of freedom of speech if I must confine myself only to saying popular things because otherwise I might be attacked and if I'm attacked I am guilty of causing a disturbance.

Senator McGrand: What I am coming at is that you will get noisy meetings, noisy picnics. You will have 5,000 people going to a meeting to cheer a political leader. The applause they get is noise, of course, but it is not offensive noise. It is noise where they are voicing their approval. When they shout offensive things at him because he says something they don't like and they take over the meeting and they prevent other people from hearing what he has to say, that is a little different.

Mr. Borovoy: You have mixed up a few problems here. Taking over someone else's meeting, of course, I do not for one moment think there ought to be immunity to those who take over someone else's meeting. To those even who behave in such a way that someone else's meeting may not go on, no. What I am talking about is not taking over someone else's meeting. I am talking about shouting slogans at a picnic where whatever slogans are shouted clearly could not prevent the picnic from going on.

Senator McGrand: You are distinguishing between a picnic and a political meeting?

Mr. Borovoy: Yes.

Senator McGrand: I am not. A thousand people at a picnic or a thousand people at a political meeting is much the same thing to me.

Mr. Borovoy: The setting, of course, is always material. If someone came in here and started shouting any kind of slogans, even if they were slogans of brotherhood, they might prevent us from communicating properly with each other and be subject, therefore, to the criminal law.

The test should be whether or not you are effectively preventing the next person from carrying on his lawful activity and if you are not, then it is my submission that no criminal penalty ought to attach itself to your act. In this case, using this example, the offense, as I understand, clearly they couldn't by shouting whatever they were shouting to prevent a picnic from going on. All they were really doing was antagonizing people.

Senator McGrand: If a picnic consists of eating food, I would say yes. If it was an audience who wanted to listen to someone deliver a message, that is a different thing.

Mr. Borovoy: Apart from the normal heckling, of course, that is part of the game.

Senator McGrand: Do you consider the use of personal abusive language directed at a certain person at a public meeting to be offensive or would you consider it to be a breach of the peace? Shouting at a certain man, would you consider that a breach of the peace or offensive?

Mr. Borovoy: I might consider certain types of language very offensive. The question is whether criminal sanctions ought to attach themselves to that offensive language and there it would depend upon the context. Clearly if somebody began to shout in the middle of the night when people were sleeping they might properly...

Senator McGrand: I am not talking of people sleeping in the middle of the night. You are going off the point.

If you were addressing a meeting under the auspices of your organization and I was in the hall and I didn't agree with you and I stood up and I made offensive remarks—I call you certain names and continued to call you names—is that a breach of the peace?

Mr. Borovoy: Well, I would say this to you...

Senator Fournier: Why don't you say yes or no? We don't want a long story about this.

Mr. Borovoy: I think, Senator, unfortunately problems of civil liberties do not lend themselves that easily to yes or no replies. I am sorry that I am not able to blend down an analysis that simply.

The Chairman: Can you still answer the question?

Mr. Borovoy: Yes I can.

What I have suggested is the test is whether or not the conduct effectively prevents the meeting from taking place. If it does, then even if they are shouting lovely slogans but shouting them in such a way that the others cannot carry on their meeting, then in my view the criminal sanction properly attaches. If, however, on the other hand even if they are shouting unpleasant slogans but it comes within our tradition and experience of heckling and it doesn't interfere with the meeting, then I don't think a criminal penalty should attach. Their key point is whether or not it interferes with the ability of others to carry on their lawful activities.

Senator McGrand: Do you object to the use of verbal or obscene language in a court room after a judge and jury delivered a verdict?

Mr. Borovoy: I would object to it even before the judge and jury have delivered a verdict.

Senator McGrand: At any time?

Mr. Borovoy: Yes, at any time. Any time that I am able to conceive of at the moment, anyway. Perhaps if nobody else was there I wouldn't, but so long as the court is in session I would suggest that because of the nature of the functions of a court, different standards have to prevail in a courtroom from those prevailing at picnics or political rallies.

Senator McGrand: Going back to this question of bail, a man comes out and he has no lawyer and he is going before the magistrate to ask for bail, isn't it a practice for the magistrate and Crown prosecutor to discuss the bail on the reliability of the defendant? Isn't that usually what takes place?

Mr. Borovoy: It often does, yes.

Senator McGrand: It should take place every time.

Mr. Borovoy: It should take place every time; it doesn't always, as I think you know.

Senator McGrand: Unfortunately in court where you have a heavy docket with dozens of cases there is a tendency to put them through rather quickly I'm afraid.

Mr. Borovoy: That's right.

Senator McGrand: Going back to this one more question on personal liberties, do you believe that a person, any person, has the right to smoke marijuana or to use LSD as he wishes? Has he the right as an individual? He has the right to smoke tobacco. He has the right to drink a little alcohol. Why can't he smoke a little marijuana?

Mr. Borovoy: In the course of preparing this submission, Senator, I attempted, as much as I could, to address our submissions to the relationship between poverty and civil liberties. I have some difficulty seeing the connection between poverty and marijuana. Most of the experience I am aware of is that marijuana and LSD addicts usually come from the more affluent middle classes than the less affluent lower classes. To that extent we have prepared our submissions accordingly. I must tell you, in frankness, that some of the issues you are now raising are issues that our organization has not yet had the opportunity to deal with. If you want to give us a homework assignment, we are quite prepared to undertake it concerning a submission on that subject.

Senator McGrand: I don't agree with you that LSD and marijuana is something that is used by the upper and middle class. It is in every group. It is because, I think, they are trying to escape something. Trying to escape from a problem. An awful lot of people among the poverty group drink beer, take anything to escape their boredom.

The Chairman: Is drinking beer bad?

Senator McGrand: They drink more than they should sometimes.

The Chairman: That trait certainly doesn't belong to the people who are poor. What you are talking about is people who are much more affluent than they are who would drink more. Usually the poor man has one glass of beer.

Senator McGrand: I have said that a person has a right to drink a little alcohol, a little beer and has the right to smoke tobacco. Has he got the right to smoke marijuana?

The Chairman: Marijuana is illegal; isn't it?

Senator McGrand: This is a brief on civil liberties.

Mr. Borovoy: It contains two components, Senator: civil liberties and poverty. As I suggested, we tried to address our submissions to the relationship between the two. On the surface I think you will agree there is at least a surface relationship. If you would like a submission on marijuana and LSD we would be happy to. If you will forgive my behaving...

The Chairman: We have enough problems that are legal without getting into that.

Let me just ask you a few questions. Senator Pearson raised the point and said that you had been in our midst not too many years. Actually you have been in existence since when? The Civil Liberties group were there when I was a boy.

Mr. Borovoy: Yes, there have been a succession of civil liberties groups.

The Chairman: Having knowledge of what is going on and what has been happening to the people on welfare, and it has been happening to them for a great number of years, both with respect to their civil liberties and rights, why haven't we any case law on the subject? Why haven't you taken a case to the courts dealing with someone who was refused or cut off assistance and had a delegation by the courts on their rights? Theirs is a matter of right and not as a matter of privilege.

Mr. Borovoy: One of the reasons why we haven't done it is because, until recently, the resources of our organization were not available for us to do as much of this sort of thing as we would like to do. We have been involved in some cases in the courts, but certainly not as many as we would like to.

I will just amplify that. In addition to that, throughout the years, our courts have not been as responsive to many Civil Liberties arguments as we would like them to be. There are a number of problems that accompany involvement in civil liberties cases. One of them is the status of amicus curiae in the courts is not a particularly well entrenched one in this country as it is in the United States. The difficulty that a civil liberties organization has is that we must go to court to represent a client, not an issue. The problem with that, of course, is that if you are representing a client then the interest of the client must come first and the civil liberties issue is only one of several issues and it could get bargained away during the give and take between Crown and defence. For that reason we haven't been able to take as many things in the courts as would like to because of the procedures for appearing exclusively on the civil liberties issue haven't been strong enough.

The Chairman: I am not suggesting that. We have had legal aid in this province of Ontario for some three or four years. We are spending in Ontario on legal aid 7 million dollars which is more than is being spent in all the other provinces put together. Why haven't the Legal Aid people taken a case, that you have divided to them, to the courts on behalf of X or Y and tested the law as they have done in the United States.

Mr. Borovoy: Unfortunately, our procedures and our custom has not been particularly hospitable to that sort of test case approach as it has been in the United States.

Let me just go over this. There are a number of things. There is the procedure, there is no amicus curiae. Also, we haven't had a constitutional bill of rights or, up until recently, what we thought was an effective bill of rights—a way of challenging—as maybe the case now. There haven't been a lot of the instruments as readily available to those who wanted to challenge as there have been in the United States. If I may, Senator, even though within that we have been prepared to take cases. Just recently, for example, our organization was instrumental in getting the government to change its policy with respect to what they call the man in the house rule for welfare recipients.

The Chairman: I know about that.

Mr. Borovoy: That arose because we were prepared to go to court.

The Chairman: This was the case that you referred to.

Mr. Borovoy: She had a man in the house and she was cut off welfare.

The Chairman: Yes. It was one of those silly things that the Department did and shouldn't have done.

Mr. Borovoy: It was well entrenched policy.

The Chairman: As civil liberties people you must have a feeling of what is in the air. There has been a new orientation, a new thought and a new concept, as expressed by the Supreme Court of Canada on the bill of rights. That is revolutionary. It's something that is new and different. That came to the Supreme Court of Canada through a case that didn't seem important at the moment but it had a great principle involved.

These abuses under the welfare laws have been going on for years. In all this time we have never taken one case and tested it in the courts. Why? It doesn't involve any great cost particularly. All it involves is some work on behalf of some legalites and you would get many of them who would be delighted to step in and try a case such as that. Why haven't we done it in order to establish for these poor people what they need establishing? It's a matter of right and not as a matter of charity or gift or privilege.

Mr. Borovoy: This is something that our organization is now prepared to undertake. Up until a couple of years ago we didn't employ, for very long, a fulltime staff as we now do. Although it is somewhat unusual for those in political offices to be putting pressure on us, Senator, I gladly accept.

The Chairman: No. As Members of the Committee we have no way of doing it and the legal aid departments are there for purposes of carrying out their function. If we had no Legal Aid in this province, your organization a year ago could have approached the best lawyer in Toronto. All you had to say was we would like you to take this case. He would have taken this case to the Supreme Court of Canada and never asked you for a penny and moreover he would have been delighted to do it. You could have had a dozen to do that. That is so; isn't it?

It has been bothering me why wasn't it done. It could have brought you nothing but credit.

Mr. Borovoy: There are a lot of problems with this Senator. We are going to do it. Do it a lot more, particularly in view of the recent Supreme Court of Canada's decision. But, you know, very often the experience has been that when there have been civil liberties issues in cases the cases very often have been decided on grounds other than the civil liberties arguments.

The difficulty has often been because there hasn't been that sensitivity in society, in the profession, in the courts, to these civil liberties issues. It was very hard to make the civil liberties issue the litigatable issue in the dispute.

The Chairman: I'm not talking about a civil liberties issue at all at the moment. I am talking about the Canada Assistance Act which stated we had to deal with people on a basis of need. It is in the statute. There is the basis for suing. Their rights have been denied to many people across this country for various reasons, as you well know.

What is troubling me is why no one has come forward and tested this right to the Supreme Court of Canada and said there is the law, what does it mean? That is my point.

Mr. Borovoy: We haven't been at it on a fulltime basis long enough and I gladly accept the challenge on behalf of the Organization.

The Chairman: Senator Inman, when you talked about prevention, to place these offices in the area of the poor for the purpose of advising them, I suppose it would be a legal out-patient department in the same way as the medical people would have for the purpose of looking after their needs rather than before they became acute. That is what they have in mind.

Tell us something about this: what is the state of legal aid in Canada?

Mr. Borovoy: Very bad.

The Chairman: That doesn't answer the question. Tell us what it is like. Give us some idea. We have to deal with that problem.

Mr. Borovoy: Would you like to comment on the Quebec situation?

The Chairman: Leave Quebec alone for a minute. Let us hear about the rest of the country.

Mr. Borovoy: In our brief, as I have indicated, I don't have all the information I would like to have on this. We pointed out, for example, in Nova Scotia I don't think they are spending much more than about $25,000 per year. I believe, on legal aid. Most of the civil work is given as a gratuity by the bar and is not compensable through legal aid.

In New Brunswick only the most serious of criminal offenses arising after indictment or committal for trial are handled on a legal aid basis.

Quebec you have heard.

Ontario, at least in litigation, it is working much better. However, as we say, it is not as yet handling adequately the preventive legal problem.

In Manitoba they are spending about $160,000 and that is about four times more than they have ever spent before. That doesn't amount to very much.

Saskatchewan, I have indicated eligibility requirements of $2,000 or $2,500 per year to qualify for legal aid isn't very much.

The Chairman: What about Alberta?

Mr. Borovoy: Unfortunately, as I say, I don't have all the information.

The Chairman: Alberta has some legal aid. I talked to the Deputy Attorney General who told me that they are a considerable amount of legal aid at the moment. They are going to try to improve on it.

British Columbia, do you know anything about it?

Mr. Borovoy: I just can't recall it offhand.

Senator Inman: I know a little of Prince Edward Island. They have it for extreme cases. Crown cases.

Mr. Cooper: In connection with the Quebec experience, I mentioned what we are trying to do but this is the seed which is now just beginning. If I could just mention a word or two about how the legal aid system is now I think it might indicate some of the problems of the legal aid system and of the legal profession.

The legal aid system in Montreal excludes various cases. One, no one may obtain a divorce, only separation. The reason ostensibly is because they are too busy with separations and they cannot do divorces. One can speculate as to what the real reasons are. If I might suggest, it's a general view that the poor do not mind living with other people anyways. They do not mind the moral situation, so we don't have to worry about giving them divorces. That one case is excluded. A Second one, they will not take any case in damages as a plaintiff. If anyone were to come in for, let's say, having been hit in a car accident or not receiving their wages, they could not make any claim through legal aid. The reason, again ostensibly, is that if they do have a valid case they can go to a lawyer and the lawyer will do this case on a contingency fee basis. The realities of the situation are that the lawyers, unless it's such a clearcut case, will demand a retainer fee. Once again one might wonder why this is so and again I would speculate the reason they will not allow this is because legal services can exist for the poor but not to remove them from their poverty situation. You can help the poor, but don't help to give them more money. So no plaintiff actions will be taken in those cases.

No cases in the magistrate's court, other than the Montreal Magistrate's Court, will be handled by Legal Aid. If it is the Montreal Magistrate's Court, the Municipal Court, only the more serious offenses and the vast majority of them will not be handled. Bankruptcy right now is a tenuous matter as to whether or not they will accept it. In general they have not, but they are moving towards accepting bankruptcy cases.

Finally, if I may mention just one other point here, the cases in Montreal, if they are civil ones, and if they will be handled are not handled by the Legal Aid Bureau themselves. They will prepare a form which will be sent to all lawyers or to various lawyers in Montreal which will say that it's your duty to accept this case and it will improve the image of lawyers and for the benevolence of the people in the profession you ought to take this case. Therefore the party is then sent to which ever lawyer the Legal Aid Bureau wants to send them to and the lawyer receives this form and in actual practice this form dwindles down to the bottom line and the first year lawyer or, more so, the articling student will handle the case. This is how the Montreal system works.

The Chairman: Mr. Cooper, all you have said is what Judge Proveau said about the image of the legal profession in the Province of Quebec. He said that the public image of the bar in the Province of Quebec has not a good our. Very unfortunate. I don't think it's any better than many of the other provinces either.

Is there anything any Senator has? Senator Fournier?

Senator Fournier: I do not know whether it is worth extending this much longer. I think that we had a very good debate this morning and I certainly want to thank the witnesses. Usually we get more out of the arguments than we get out of the briefs and this is why we spend more time discussing the briefs and this is a fact. It happens all the time.

There is a lot of points that I disagree with. I am not going into that. There is one point I was going to question, Senator Pearson, the duties of the police against the demonstrators.

Our witness here has given long lectures and free legal advice this morning which has gone way over my head by now.

Mr. Borovoy: It may be worth no more than what you're paying for it.

Senator Fournier: Let me give you a very simple example here and you don't have to answer it. I'm a policeman on one side of the street and you are demonstrator on the other side of the street. You encourage me. You call me everything possible. You have a stick in your hand and you hate me from a long date. I have an order not to let you cross the street. After a while I stand there very quietly and take everything that you tell me for hours. I have a stick and you have a stick. Then you start to cross and you come to my side. What will I do as a policeman?

Mr. Borovoy: You say for some reason there was an order that nobody be allowed to cross?

Senator Fournier: Yes.

Mr. Borovoy: Then you have to stop him.

Senator Fournier: That is the point. Who is going to hit first, you or me?

Mr. Borovoy: When a person has committed an illegal act, some more free legal advice, the policeman has the power to use whatever force is reasonably necessary to prevent the commission of the illegal act.

Senator Fournier: I agree with that. I expected that. This is an organized demonstration. These people have a couple of lawyers on the other side of the street watching him with a camera. Naturally the policeman has got to defend himself. Now, these lawyers are going to get together and they are going to try to murder the poor policeman because he has handled this poor innocent hippy so roughly and so on. We see these things and read these things. This is alarming. Believe me, it's alarming.

Mr. Borovoy: It depends on any given time on the state of the facts. If the policeman was carrying out his duties properly, he certainly is entitled both to defend himself and to use whatever force that is reasonably necessary to prevent the commission of the illegal act. On the other hand, there have been occasions where police officers have gone way beyond what was reasonably necessary and when they do we might even suggest that there be better procedures available for handling that kind of situation.

Senator Fournier: I don't want to get into an argument. I am going to finish now because we have different views on that. The policeman is a human being and after he has been molested and receives a black eye and a couple of broken teeth he is not the same guy that he was a minute ago before that. He loses his temper. He is fighting for his life.

Mr. Borovoy: I hope that there is nothing in our brief that suggests a policeman has to wait until he has two broken teeth before he is entitled to retaliate.

Senator Fournier: Many of them do and don't get any credit for it.

Mr. Borovoy: Many of them do on the one hand and some of them retaliate even before they get provoked on the other hand.

Senator Fournier: Can you blame them?

Mr. Borovoy: If they do it without proper provocation I certainly do blame them.

Senator McGrand: I intended to ask you this before when we were discussing the abuses sometimes handed out to a judge or jury in court rooms. This has nothing to do with our subject, but it is involved. This famous trial in Chicago, would you just say a word or two? It seems to me a person who shouts obscenities at a judge or jury at any time during the trial there is two ways he could be handled. One is to be escorted out and say you haven't committed any offense so just go out or he could be detained for having done this.

I think you get into a lot of trouble if you were to charge a person who simply shouted in a court room an obscenity to a judge. I mean you could get into a lot of trouble, maybe the best way is to escort him out. Would you give me your opinion what happened at that Chicago trial?

The Chairman: Maybe the best way is not to ask that question. He is not an expert. He is a Canadian and his work is in Canada. Lets leave at that.

Senator McGrand: I will let it go.

The Chairman: Do you think you could make any useful contribution?

Mr. Borovoy: Except only insofar as it may suggest something about our discourse this morning, it may not be necessary for me to go into any great elaboration about the situation in Chicago which, you quite rightly say, is not germane to our discussion. What I am concerned about is the possibility what the Senator may be implying is that there may be something in our brief which would tolerate and even suggest that rowdy court room behaviour is within the permissible limits of dissent. Let me assure the Senator that it is not. Certainly, in our view, courts have every business controlling what goes on in court rooms and maintaining an atmosphere of decorum.

I have many qualms about the statutes under which those people were charged in Chicago. I think the statutes may properly be subject to examination from a civil liberties stand point and subject to very serious challenge. Insofar as court room conduct is concerned I have no difficulty to say that those kind of antics cannot be permitted and I hope that nothing in our brief suggested to you that we were in favour of permitting it. The one reference I made to the court, if you will recall Senator, was not the conduct of people in the court house but remarks they made miles from the court house. It is that that I don't think should be subject to the contempt power of the courts.

Senator McGrand: You mentioned that in your brief, yes.

Mr. Borovoy: Now, in our contempt of court concepts, the courts can exercise the power to punish statements made miles from the court house. In my respectful opinion that leaves something to be desired.

Senator McGrand: That's why I mentioned it.

Mr. Borovoy: I would not apply that to inside the court room; certainly not.

Senator Fournier: Let's finish this up.

The Chairman: Yes. Go head.

Senator Fournier: The point the Doctor mentioned, you escort these people from the court. There is a point where they cannot be escorted from the court. They have to be dragged out by the hair. That gives a different picture altogether.

The Chairman: We have never faced that in this country.

Mr. Borovoy: I wouldn't want to write a manual here on the various techniques of ejecting people from rooms. Suffice it to say that the minimal force required to execute the legal obligation and I agree with the present state of the law on that score.

The Chairman: We are dealing with real life problems as they affect the poor. We have had a very interesting morning, ably presented. If you run short of legal briefs we have left you with a brief this morning as to what action you can take in the immediate future which will keep you well employed. I think you should direct yourself in that respect because it is essential.

On behalf of the Committee, Mr. Borovoy, we are aware of the very distinguished service that you are giving to the Civil Liberties Organization and the progress that it has made under your guidance. To you Mr. Cooper and Mr. Posluns we extend our thanks for coming this morning.

The committee adjourned.

APPENDIX "A"

Submissions to:
 Special Senate Committee on Poverty
 Re:
 Poverty and Civil Liberties
 From:
 Canadian Civil Liberties
 Association
 Per: A. Alan Borovoy
 General Counsel
 Ottawa, Thursday, April 16, 1970

PART A—Poverty and Civil Liberties—Some General Observations

Clearly, it will require much more than the extension of civil liberties to abolish poverty in this country. Of necessity, a civil liberties submission will not deal with the various economic solutions which have been recommended in our succession of wars on poverty. Nowhere in this submission will there appear either a favorable or a critical evaluation of fiscal and monetary policy, the nationalization of industry, the white paper on taxation, or the Prices and Incomes Commission.

Civil liberties are concerned less with the substance of government economic policy than with the method by which existing policy is administered and the process by which change in policy is effected. The civil liberties contribution to the problem of poverty lies mainly in overcoming the disadvantages of poverty in the administration of existing law and the processes available to change the law. Our thrust will be essentially twofold.

1. How can we promote greater equality for the poor under existing law?
2. How can we increase participation of the poor in the processes to change the law?

PART B—Poverty and the Procedural Protections of Existing Law

(1) Legal Rights and Legal Service

One of our favorite social doctrines is equality under the law. Every man—black or white, Jew or Gentile, Protestant or Catholic, rich or poor—is entitled to equal treatment under the law—the right to present his evidence, the right to cross examine his adversary's evidence, the right to be presumed innocent until proved guilty.

Of course, there is an uncomfortable dichotomy between possessing and enjoying these legal rights. In our complex society, we cannot enjoy legal rights without legal service. Between the doctrine and the reality of legal equality stands the lawyer trained to navigate through the increasingly murky sea of laws, customs, restrictions, and regulations. But the very complexity of legal training has compounded the costs of legal services.

Thus it is clear how the fact of poverty can subvert the goal of equality. Meagre resources cannot purchase costly services. Yet costly legal services are indispensable to equal legal rights.

The challenge of poverty to the goal of equality is to devise a method for making the voices of the law responsive to the call of the voiceless.

Thus far, Canada has responded to this challenge with a series of publically subsidized legal aid plans in the many jurisdictions of this country. Our problem is to determine whether and to what extent the present state of legal aid can resolve the dichotomy between equality in legal theory and equality in legal practice.

Regrettably, very few comprehensive studies have been undertaken into the state of legal aid service in this country. Thus, whatever material we have will be more suggestive than conclusive. Within these rather severe limitations, we will do the best we can.

Our own organization's survey into the administration of various aspects of criminal justice has already yielded some suggestive information about legal aid service in Winnipeg, Halifax and Montreal. Although we have not yet had the opportunity to subject our findings to proper analysis and indeed even to complete our finding to proper analysis and indeed even to complete our findings, some of the preliminary material is rather revealing.

Of thirty-seven accused persons whose cases were disposed of on the court calendars of five randomly chosen days in Winnipeg, only six were represented by counsel. The magistrates court disposed of criminal charges against thirty-one persons who had no legal representation. Thirty-six persons were convicted; in fact all thirty-six pleaded guilty as charged. Ten of them were sentenced to various terms of penal incarceration. Yet the one hundred and sixty thousand dollars currently allocated for the year ending March 31, 1970 represents a substantial increase in Manitoba's public commitment to legal aid. In the year ending March 31, 1969, there was an allocation of only forty thousand dollars of public funds.

Three randomly chosen court calendars from Halifax during the month of January 1970 depict something of the Nova Scotia pattern. Of fifty-nine disposed of accused, only seven were represented by counsel; fifty-two were unrepresented. During this time, fifty-one persons were convicted on the basis of forty-seven pleas of guilty and four findings of guilt. Six persons went to jail. The Nova Scotia Government is currently spending about twenty-five thousand dollars per year on legal aid.

Of twenty-six disposed of accused in three randomly chosen court calendars from early February in Montreal, only four were represented by counsel and twenty-two were unrepresented.

Although as high a number as thirteen went free because of withdrawals of the charges or acquittals, eight were convicted and five were committed for trial. We have no record yet of incarcerations during this period.

Although the province of New Brunswick has committed itself to the principle of enacting a legal aid plan, at present it does little more than pay the defence of poor prisoners who are indicted or committed for trial in a restricted number of serious offences.

Eligibility for government subsidized legal aid in Saskatchewan requires an annual income amounting to less than two thousand dollars for unmarried persons and twenty-five hundred dollars for married persons. Although we have no evaluations or statistical evidence on the operation of the plan, we can well imagine what quantity of legal service is available for poor people on the basis of these near-starvation eligibility requirements.

The actual fees payable to lawyers under the plan bolsters the picture. In any case tried in the district court judges criminal court, the half day fee for senior counsel is fifty dollars and, on a plea of guilty, twenty dollars. Junior counsel in the same situation are entitled to forty dollars and fifteen dollars. In magistrates court, senior counsel are entitled to forty dollars for a half day and twenty dollars on a plea of guilty and junior counsel to forty dollars and fifteen dollars. On the private market, such a schedule of fees could purchase little more than the introductory salutations at the beginning of the hearing.

By contrast, during the year ending March 31, 1969, the province of Ontario incurred a net cost of over seven million dollars to subsidize legal fees in close to fifty thousand cases. Significantly, these statistics represent assistance both in criminal and in civil cases.

When we are dealing with the fundamental civil liberty of equality before the law, a situation of "regional disparities" is especially repugnant. To this end, our first major objective should be the equalization of legal aid services throughout the country. It is no longer tolerable to perpetuate a state of affairs in which indigent persons who run afoul of the same law in different provinces will owe their legal protections less to the quality of their act than to the place where it occurred.

Accordingly, we recommend a system of federal grants to insure everywhere in Canada at least that state of subsidized legal aid that is available in Ontario. Some adjustments might be made in other federal services in order to promote equity between those provinces that provide these legal services through their own resources and those calling for a greater share of federal assistance. However, because of the resources at its control and the pivotal character of its role, it is the federal government which must take the initiative.

But the goal of equality under the law requires that we go beyond the level of legal aid experience in Ontario. The bulk of Ontario's publically subsidized legal aid has been used in litigation. What this means is that most of the help we have given to the poor has arisen after the damage has been done. But General Motors' battery of lawyers provides assistance in avoiding the courtroom...

In order to promote both greater equality and greater substance in the exercise of legal rights in Canada, we must devise a more effective programme of state-subsidized preventive legal service. In this connection, we associate ourselves with the concept of a community legal clinic physically located in the residential areas of the poor. The concept calls for state-salaried lawyers who operate a store front clinic that aggressively attracts the patronage of the poor.

The lawyers would be encouraged to specialize in the problems of the poor—consumer credit, landlord-tenant, welfare, workman's compensation, unemployment insurance etc. Unlike the traditional law practice that refrains from advertising its services, the state-subsidized clinic would go looking for problems. Because of generations of alienation from the legal world, poor people are often unaware that their problems can be resolved or even characterized on a legal basis. That is why traditional law practice is often irrelevant to their needs. The clinic lawyers would publish and distribute literature, visit homes, speak at community meetings in order to promote a maximum use of their services. The emphasis would be what it is in the corporate world—how to vindicate their clients' interests, as much as possible, without resort to litigation.

Of course, within the context of this submission we are not able to deal adequately with the details of such a proposal. It is not difficult to conceive of a wide variety of problems which would accompany the introduction of such a programme. Suffice it, at this stage, to point up the desirable direction of government effort. To this end, we join the community and legal aid services programme of the Osgoode Hall Law School at York University in recommending "a joint federal—all province study... of probable legal needs of indigent areas under an all-service providing legal aid scheme."

As an additional aid in working out the details of such a proposal, the federal government should undertake much sooner the establishment of some legal aid clinics on a demonstration project basis. They could provide a useful guide to the ultimate development of nation-wide comprehensive program of all-purpose legal services.

The gap between the theory and practice of Canadian legal equality is great indeed. As a whole, legal aid in this country is little more than a ritual gesture on the road to equality. As such, it is more a salve to those who have, than a help to those who need. With respect, it is time we were more serious.

(2) Some Additional Protections in the Criminal Law

At almost any time, we could walk into a Canadian prison and find a number of people who are suffering forced confinement without ever having been found guilty of a criminal offence. Sometimes the incarceration under such circumstances has gone on for days, sometimes for weeks, and sometimes even months.

In a great number of these situations, the imposition of the penalty is attributable more to poverty than to any other factor. Many of these people are languishing in jail because they lack the financial means to pay the bail which has been set in their cases. Great numbers of those charged with criminal offences whose trials are delayed must purchase their freedom with money during the interim period. Thus, the liberty of the subject often depends less on the nature of the impugned conduct than the size of the accused's wallet.

Our legal system contains fewer inequities more offensive to the principle of legal equality than the concept of financial bail. Persons, whom the law presumes innocent, suffer long periods of incarceration essentially because they are too financially poor to purchase their freedom.

This deformity in our legal structure was persuasively brought to our attention a number of years ago in Martin Friedland's classic study "Detention Before Trial". Unfortunately, there has been little significant change since the publication of Professor Friedland's work.

A few random tests undertaken more recently convey the same basic pattern. When our organization examined a Toronto court calendar for August 1968 we found that an aggregate total of two hundred and thirty-two days were spent in jail by approximately six people against whom all charges were withdrawn during the month of August. A sixty-eight year old man was arrested and charged with making a false statement on July 3rd. He sat in custody until August 1st when his charge was withdrawn. The prosecution withdrew charges against other people who had already been in custody for 19 days, 16 days, 33 days, 3 days, and 2 days. Perhaps the most shocking of these cases occurred on August 2nd. A charge of possession of narcotics was withdrawn against a man who had been arrested for this offence on March 23rd. He had been deprived of his freedom for 131 days and, in the final result, the prosecution decided it lacked sufficient evidence to go to trial.

The same court calendar discloses an aggregate total of 235 days of jail time which were served by four people whose ultimate penalty was either probation or suspended sentence. One of these cases involved a seventeen year old boy who was arrested on June 3rd, charged with possession of a dangerous weapon and a breach of the Liquor Control Act. From June 3rd until August 1st, 58 days, this boy sat in custody. On August 1st, the Crown withdrew the serious charge of possessing a dangerous weapon and the court imposed one year probation for the liquor offence.

Recent news stories suggest that a year and a half later, we would probably find similar cases in many jails throughout the country.

Significantly, not even the goal of public safety is adequately protected through the bail system. Often, the wealthy accused who are able to purchase their freedom until trial pose a much greater threat to society than many of the impoverished accused whose financial insolvency keeps them locked up until trial. In the greatest number of cases, we achieve virtually nothing with financial bail except incarceration of the poor.

Fortunately, the Federal Minister of Justice has announced his intention to reform the bail laws. We should give this effort every support. To this end, the Canadian Civil Liberties Association recommends the adoption of a different system for determining the issues of freedom and detention before trial. Consistent with our legal presumption of innocence all accused should be, prima facie, entitled to their freedom before trial, unless the Crown can satisfy the court of one of the following:

1. Because of the nature of the offence with which he is charged and the life style he has been pursuing, the accused is not likely to appear in court for his trial.
2. Because of the accused's propensity to commit dangerous acts against persons and property, it is not safe to set him free.

On the basis of these criteria, the entitlement to freedom would be behavioural rather than financial. By reshaping our law in this way, we could maximize the conditions of freedom and minimize the disadvantages of poverty, without significant jeopardy to the interests of public safety.

Another inequity in the criminal law concerns the imposition of monetary penalties for criminal conduct. Obviously, this punishes the poor man more severely than the rich man. Moreover, when the fine is demanded immediately more poor men than rich men will be forced into prison. Again incarceration is more attributable to financial limitation than to criminal behaviour. Accordingly, we recommend a mandatory system of reasonable instalments for the payment of criminal fines. At least, this would give the poor offender a more equal chance to avoid the jail house.

(3) Some Special Protections in the Welfare Law

The concept of legal equality requires adjustments not only in the general law applicable to everyone but also in the special laws applicable to the poor i.e. welfare law. What about the complex of procedures and rights in the body of the law which deals especially and daily with most impoverished people in our society? Do the laws of special application to the poor provide the procedural fairness that characterize the laws of general application to everyone?

In this regard, we applaud the initiative undertaken by the federal government in the Canada Assistance Plan. In order to promote procedural due process for the impoverished recipients of federal welfare funds, the participating provinces must provide a "procedure for appeals".

Again we regret that such a measure may be more of a ritual gesture than a legal safeguard. An investigation of provincial welfare practices will disclose the violation of some of the most fundamental canons of procedural fairness known to the law. On most of these issues, the Canada Assistance Plan maintains a resonant silence. Moreover, even some of the provincial appeal procedures, notwithstanding the requirements of federal law, contain more verbal bark than legal bite.

Our experience with public welfare administration in the province of Ontario has disclosed a rather questionable practice at the outset of a recipient's relationship with many municipal welfare administrations. The recipient is required to sign a special consent form giving welfare officials a continuing right of access to his home. The affront to the principle of legal equality is clear. The privacy of the home is one of the most sacred doctrines in our legal tradition. This doctrine protects all the rest of us including the most dangerous criminals. Unless there is a situation of hot pursuit, even the police are obliged to secure a judicial warrant before entering the home of a dangerous criminal.

In this way, the innocent indigent on welfare claims fewer legal rights than the suspected robber at large. To effectuate the principle of equality between the general law and the poor law, the Canada Assistance Plan should provide another condition on the use of federal money—no welfare officer should be entitled to compel access to the home of a welfare recipient unless he can secure a warrant upon satisfying a disinterested judicial officer that there are reasonable and probable grounds for the belief that a search of the premises will disclose a violation of the law.

Recently, an Ontario deserted wife on welfare received some shocking news when she opened her mail one morning. A letter from the Director of Family Benefits simply informed her that "because of information on file" she now fell into a disqualifying category, and that, effective a few days earlier, the welfare allowance for herself and four children was cancelled.

Again, the discrepancy between the poor law and the general law is obvious. The common law and statute law of general application invariably require the right to a fair hearing. For example, if one party is sued for a minor debt, he is entitled to advance notice of the claim against him, representation by counsel, an opportunity to cross-examine his adversary's evidence, an opportunity to present his own case and adjudication by a disinterested third party. In the case of our deserted wife on welfare, however, a very major matter, her entire livelihood was taken away without any hearing of any kind. Moreover, the decision-maker, far from being a disinterested third party, is the cost-conscious dispenser of welfare.

No appeal machinery can adequately rectify this violation of fundamental due process. Invariably, the appeal machinery takes time. But any delay could produce irreparable damage to the family dependent on welfare.

Much of the provincial welfare legislation in this country is silent on the issue of a fair hearing before the occasion of the first adverse decision. This situation calls for a cure at the federal level. In order to provide minimum standards of procedural fairness throughout the country, the Canada Assistance Plan should base the use of federal funds in provincial welfare administration on the condition that the provincial legislation require a fair hearing before the first adverse decision is made. If the welfare administrator is intending to deny, adversely vary, suspend or cancel welfare benefits, he should be obliged to give reasonable advance notice of his intention and reasons for so doing. This notice should include a summary of the evidence that is being relied upon. At that stage, the applicant of recipient should be entitled, with or without counsel, to challenge the evidence and present evidence and arguments of his own. This could be done orally or in writing. The hearing need not be formal or lengthy. It could take the form of an interview or discussion. The objective is to give the person affected a reasonable and effective opportunity to persuade the administrator before the decision is made. The right of a fair hearing is so basic to procedural fairness that a federal initiative is crucial.

Having legislated the requirement for appeal machinery as a condition of obtaining federal funds, the federal government has not exhausted its role.

Have all the provinces enjoying federal assistance complied with the requirement? Thus far, in at least one case, the province of Quebec, the Lieutenant Governor-in-Council has failed to proclaim the legislative provisions for appeal machinery. Moreover, is the provincial appeal machinery operating according to the intention of the Canada Assistance Plan?

In some cases we have our doubts.

In the province of Ontario, for example, the welfare board of review contains a number of people who had previously served for long periods of time in provincial or municipal departments. As such, they were intimately involved in the formulation and execution of department policy. Yet, it is this very policy which will so often be under attack at board of review hearings. The problem is to what extent can we anticipate a fresh and independent evaluation of welfare policy under such circumstances.

Indeed, a number of board of review judgments in the province of Ontario have dismissed welfare claims without the slightest attempt to analyze anew or even to examine the statute or regulations. These judgments have upheld the policy of the Family Benefits Branch by simply proclaiming that the disputed policy has been the practice of the Family Benefits Branch. It is rather a novel form of jurisprudence, to say the least, for the appellate tribunal to invoke the authority of the very tribunal whose judgment is under appeal.

Both the reality and the appearance of independent procedures require that the appeal boards be made up predominantly of people from outside the ranks of welfare administration.

Independence also requires a structural separation between the operations of the appeal board and the department. In mid February 1970 an applicant for public welfare in Nova Scotia received the following letter:

"In January you requested an appeal under the provisions of the Social Assistance Act in respect to your application for Municipal Social Assistance... It was the unanimous decision of the Appeal Board that you do not have the budget deficit as defined under the regulations of the Social Assistance Act and, therefore, municipal social assistance to you and your family cannot be granted at this time."

Significantly, this letter was sent on the stationery of the Department of Public Welfare and signed by the Administrator of the Public Assistance Division of the Nova Scotia Department.

The imposition of departmental intermediaries creates the appearance of a dependent relationship between the appeal board and department. Accordingly, another minimum standard which should be required of welfare appeal boards is direct communication between the appeal board and the public.

It appears that very few lawyers have been appointed to serve on the welfare appeal boards. It appears also that appeal boards are often called upon to interpret statutes and regulations. Clearly, legal advice is necessary to competent performance. The present state of affairs in many of the provinces would create the impression that the appeal boards might seek legal advice from within the government service. Again, such an arrangement or even the appearance of such an arrangement would be a negation of the independent role of appeal machinery. Again, the Canada Assistance Plan should require that welfare appeal boards be given the resources to engage independent counsel.

Not all welfare boards publish the judgments they render. Clearly, publication is necessary to due process. Tomorrow's applicant is at an unfair disadvantage unless he has the knowledge of what happened to today's applicant.

Publication is a vital safeguard against arbitrary adjudication. In allowing for public scrutiny and open criticism, publication promotes the objectives of consistency, fairness, and improvement. Again, we have a discrepancy between the procedures provided in the general law and those in the poor law. Society has provided some kind of publication for the decisions of virtually every other tribunal that exercises judicial functions. But the tribunals which are involved in the special problems of the poor appear to operate behind a veil of secrecy.

The Canada Assistance Plan should add the requirement of publication to the minimum standards of performance which would be expected of welfare appeal boards.

It is obvious from the actual experience that the principle of due process of law in the field of public welfare requires much more than a provision for appeal. There are too many other areas where basic procedural fairness is violated and even the right of appeal does not conform to the prevailing standards of appellate jurisprudence. Even though the federal government may wish to avoid intruding on the substance of welfare law, it has a duty, where federal funds are involved, to promote the adoption of proper procedures. The laws which are especially devised for poor Canadians should be administered with the same regard for due process as the law of general application to all Canadians. The federal government is in the pivotal position to make this contribution to legal equality between the poor and the non-poor.

But this requires even more than the adoption of the foregoing legislative recommendations. It also requires a continuing review function. We know now that some provinces which received federal welfare funds were delinquent in setting up appeal machinery. We know of at least one province which hasn't done so yet. When other minimum procedural requirements are written into the federal law, we must develop some machinery to guarantee that the provinces play their part. Again, this is a responsibility of the government that sets the minimum standards—the federal government.

While the federal government, itself, should be involved in the process of review, it might also assist welfare recipients to perform this function. One of the most glaring inadequacies in the administration of welfare law is the wide spread ignorance of the rights and duties created by the law. Too many welfare applicants and recipients don't know their rights and are reluctant to exercise them. Too many welfare administrators don't know their limitations and are eager to exceed them. The federal government could perform the vital service of helping to fill the knowledge gap.

Either by itself, or through grants to the provincial governments and/or the voluntary sector of the community, the federal government should take the initiative in a large scale programme of public education regarding the provisions of welfare law. To this end, advertisements should appear in the press, on radio, television, tramways, taxis, billboards etc. Leaflets and other forms of literature should be especially distributed in low-income areas and public housing developments. Just as we have allocated so many resources in getting needy people off the welfare rolls, so should we spend some resources in putting needy people on the welfare rolls. Moreover, we should make a special effort to inform people of their rights and duties where we can anticipate conflict between the interests of the welfare office and the interests of the welfare recipient. Recipients are not likely to press their rights against officials unless the government has specifically advised them that they may do so. Accordingly, we would urge the federal government to promote the distribution, through the mail and in welfare offices, of leaflets and pamphlets which set out, among other matters, the rights which we have advocated in this submission.

Again, a vigorous educational programme would help to resolve the inequality between the poor law and the general law. Other government services have not been so reluctant. There has been considerable publicity about Medicare, unemployment insurance, workman's compensation, etc. Legal equality between the poor and the non-poor requires a similar effort to promote information in the welfare area. Accordingly, we request a federal government initiative in this direction.

PART C—Poverty and the Democratic right to Change the law

(1) Political Pressures and Legal Restraints

But the better administration of existing law is not good enough. The road out of poverty will have to be paved with changes in law. As we have indicated, civil liberties are concerned less with the substance than with the process of change. To what extent does economic privation undermine political participation? Does our system provide a fair opportunity for the poor as well as the rich to influence legislative policy? Again, we must look behind the formal provisions and examine the substantive reality.

Pressure is the instrument of influence. Where money is an additional source of the rich man's pressure, the human body is the only source of the poor man's pressure. The pressure weapons of the poor flow from the human body—the right to speak and the right to demonstrate. Thus, in order to make the political processes more responsive to the pressures of the poor, we must examine the legal restraints on speaking and demonstrating. The more restrictive the law is of these activities, the less able the poor will be to impress their interests on government policy.

In the current era, our society has faced more challenge from dissenters of the middle class than from those of the lower class. But the experience of to-day's middle class dissenters is highly relevant for tomorrow's lower class dissenters. The law respecting dissenting speech and deed has universal application. What signs are there that the law is receptive or hostile to challenge? What can we expect in the days ahead as the poor intensify their pressures for change?

Thus far, Canada has felt few of the tensions generated elsewhere by those attacking the status quo and the repressions returned by those defending it. But during the past year, we have seen some striking examples of the Canadian capacity for retaliatory repression in the face of unpleasant pressure. Following a series of campus upheavals in the West, a young person was charged with and convicted of criminal libel for having written in an offbeat journal that a certain judge behaved like Pontius Pilate. Following some student upheaval in the Maritimes, a student was found guilty of contempt of court and went to jail for ten days for having written in his campus newspaper that a certain trial was a "mockery of justice" and that the courts were "tools of the corporate elite". In Toronto, some young demonstrators were convicted of creating a disturbance for shouting "traitor Trudeau" at a Liberal Party picnic. In Montreal, several outbreaks of violence in the streets provoked the enactment of a by-law prohibiting all demonstrations in the streets except, of course, the Grey Cup parade.

It is one thing to punish the assaults on persons and property that preceded the foregoing acts. But it is another thing to punish unpleasant words and to prohibit non-violent demonstrations. The fact that all this happened within so short a period of time conveys both the repressive potential of our social character and the fragile basis of our right to dissent. The implications for poor peoples pressure are as obvious as they are ominous.

If the law of dissent is neither fair nor secure, the poor dissenter will be even worse off than his non-poor counterpart. While the middle class dissenter has other resources, the poor class dissenter has only his body. Where restrictions on speaking and demonstrating can handicap middle class dissent, they can obliterate lower class dissent. Moreover, the poor will be more helpless against the pressures of police and prosecution.

Thus it is time for a more thorough evaluation of the right of lawful dissent in this country. Why do our courts retain the power to punish scandalizing statements about the courts that are made miles from the courtroom? Would a person who shouted "bravo Trudeau" be as guilty of creating a disturbance as the one who shouted "traitor Trudeau"? Is it an offence to shout nasty slogans at a noisy picnic? Does the offence arise simply because other people are likely to be provoked? Does this mean that the speaker must be silent because he might be attacked? Can the offence of participation in an unlawful assembly punish those who attract violence to themselves as well as those who incite it against others?

Should the time and route of assemblies in the streets be as subject as they are to-day to the discretion of the police? Should the right to large numbers of pickets in labour disputes be as subject to injunctive restraint as it is to-day? Should the law provide for collective bargaining in landlord-tenant disputes with some kind of protection for rent strikes as it does not to-day? Should the law punish retaliatory evictions of tenants from their homes for membership in tenant unions as it now punishes retaliatory discharges of workers from their jobs for membership in labour unions?

The effective participation by the poor in the democratic processes of changing the law requires a painstaking examination of these issues. As we have indicated, the right to speak, to picket, and to demonstrate are the chief instruments through which poor people can effectively influence legislative policy. Although this is not the place to enter upon an analysis of the legitimate extent and limits of the right of effective dissent, it is the place to request that the job be undertaken. The federal and the provincial jurisdictions are both involved. Accordingly, we recommend that the federal government initiate with the provincial governments a co-operative investigation of the law respecting the right of dissent in this country.

At issue is the confidence of poor people in the non-violent democratic processes and, indeed, the very viability of the democratic processes.

(2) Toward More Viable Pressure Groups of the Poor

To a very great extent, ours is a society of pressure groups. At any given time, government policy will reflect the balance of power among the pressure groups. For too long, those at the bottom of the economic ladder have been left out of the social consensus because they failed to organize self-serving pressure groups.

At last, the situation is beginning to change. Pressure groups of the poor—welfare recipients, public housing tenants, urban slum dwellers, Indians—are beginning to emerge all over the country. However, although the organizational activity is great, the political impact is slight. This is because the problems of internal organization are enormous and the conflict with outside groups is severe. In our complex society, effective citizen organization requires money. There must be money to recruit members; there must be money to hire competent staff. All the major pressure groups in this society have resources to advance their interests. Many of these groups are exerting pressures on the government in direct conflict with the interests of poor people. There is no way that a poor people's organization can survive in this atmosphere of complexity and conflict unless it has an adequate amount of money.

Yet the very poor people whose interests the organization has been designed to advance, don't have the money to support the effort. Such groups will be forced to solicit contributions from beyond their own ranks. Invariably, there are more affluent elements of the population whose generous impulses are propelled in these directions. Unfortunately, however, there are serious impediments to such voluntary donations. Under the law, donations to such organizations are not deductible for income tax purposes. In order to secure tax deductible status, an organization must be totally involved in "charitable" activities. The exertion of political pressures to effect legislative goals falls outside of what the law considers "charitable". This constitutes a major impediment to the fund-raising efforts of the poor people's organizations. Many potential donors and most foundations will not contribute under such circumstances.

We, therefore, recommend that a workable formula be devised to extend tax-deductible status to pressure activities and organizations for and of the poor. Once the formula is developed, the Income Tax Act should be amended accordingly.

One other way for poor peoples organizations to secure money is through the provision of public funds. Indeed, the Department of National Health and Welfare has already begun to extend subsidies to poor people's pressure groups. The problem, of course, is the limits of government's willingness to subsidize pressure upon itself. At the point where the pressure group becomes most effective it may pose a political embarrassment to government.

Even though the Minister of National Health and Welfare has made some admirable statements about his desire to give money without strings and his willingness to risk unpleasant pressures, there is a structural restriction on the autonomy of the poor people's organization. This Minister may very well be good for his word. But what about tomorrow's incumbent? Moreover, to what extent might the recipient organization restrict itself out of anticipation of political interference?

It would, therefore, be desirable to devise a method of providing some public financial assistance to poor people's organizations with a minimum of partisan influence. In this connection, we might give consideration to the establishment by government of a council with an adequate budget and independent statutory power to allocate public funds for organizational activity aimed at the relief of poverty. In making the appointments to the council and in setting the annual budget, the government would retain a degree of control over the operation. But the control would be less direct. Moreover, if the council members, as individuals, enjoyed public respect and, as officials, enjoyed some tenure of office, they could function with a fair degree of independence.

Of course, numerous problems would accompany the attempt to establish such machinery. It is in the hope of precipitating soon a more thorough analysis of these problems, that we recommend now consideration of this concept.

PART D—Summary of Recommendations and Conclusion

The Canadian Civil Liberties Association requests the Special Senate Committee on Poverty to recommend the following:

- (1) a system of federal grants to promote all over Canada a more equal and substantial level of legal aid service in civil and criminal matters.
- (2) a federal-provincial investigation of legal problems of indigent areas under an all-service legal aid scheme and, in the meantime, some federally-funded storefront legal clinics on a demonstration project basis.
- (3) the reform of our bail laws to provide that all accused persons are entitled to their freedom pending trial, unless the Crown can satisfy the court that the accused is not likely to appear for his trial, or that his freedom will endanger public safety.
- (4) a mandatory system of reasonable instalments for the payment of criminal fines.
- (5) more effective federal review of the requirement for welfare appeal procedures in those provinces receiving federal welfare funds.
- (6) an effective federal initiative to promote in those provinces receiving federal welfare funds, the following additional minimum standards of procedural fairness:
 - (a) the payment of a welfare allowance will not enable welfare officers without a proper warrant to compel access to the homes of welfare recipients.
 - (b) no one will suffer a denial, adverse variation, suspension or cancellation of a welfare benefit unless he has a reasonable opportunity to present his case before the decision is made.
 - (c) welfare appeal boards will be composed predominantly of people from outside the present and former ranks of welfare administrations.

- (d) welfare appeal boards and welfare departments will be structurally separate and have separate legal counsel.
- (e) welfare appeal boards will publish their judgments with names deleted.
- (f) a major educational programme will be undertaken to more adequately inform welfare recipients, welfare administrators and the public regarding the rights and duties in the welfare law.
- (7) a federal-provincial investigation of the legal right of effective non-violent dissent in Canada.
- (8) the development of a formula to extend tax-deductible status to pressure activities and organizations for and of the poor.
- (9) consideration of independent grant-giving machinery to provide public funds for organizational activity aimed at the relief of poverty.

The foregoing recommendations neither disparage nor idolize those who live in poverty. We take issue with those who impute all wisdom to the poor and those who impute no wisdom to the poor. As a civil liberties organization our prime concern is the viability of political democracy. The poor must get equal treatment under existing laws and equal access to the processes which change the law. Our one commitment of faith is that more equitable decisions are more likely to flow from more equitable representation. The democratic processes cannot guarantee justice, but all other systems can guarantee injustice. This submission has been designed less for the special interests of those in poverty than for the general interest of all in liberty.

THE SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON POVERTY

EVIDENCE

Ottawa, Tuesday, April 21, 1970

The Special Senate Committee on Poverty met this day at 9.30 a.m.

Senator David A. Croll (Chairman) in the Chair.

The Chairman: I now call the meeting to order. All of you have received a copy of this report entitled "Guaranteed Income or Guaranteed Employment". It is by the Social Policy and Research Department of the United Community Services of the greater Vancouver area. I think it is one that should be on our record.

(For text of report see Appendix "B").

We have before us this morning the Board of Evangelism and Social Action of the Presbyterian Church in Canada. On my right is the Reverend Arthur J. Gowland, Secretary of the Board of Evangelism and Social Action. He is a full-time national staff person. He brought with him some others whom he will introduce to you and then make a statement.

Reverend Arthur J. Gowland, Secretary, Board of Evangelism and Social Action: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. On my right is the Reverend Alexander K. Campbell, the Chairman of the Board of Evangelism and Social Action of the Presbyterian Church in Canada and the Minister of St. Andrew's Presbyterian Church, Thorold, Ontario.

Sitting next to him is the Reverend W. L. Young, Minister of St. Andrew's Presbyterian Church, Hamilton, Ontario, and a former Chairman of the Board of Evangelism and Social Action.

Next to him is the Reverend Thomas Gemmell, Minister of St. Luke's Presbyterian Church, Oshawa, Ontario, and a member of the committee on Economic and Social Justice, a committee of the Board of Evangelism and Social Action.

There is another member of our delegation, the Reverend Alexander Zeidman, the Superintendent of Scott Mission in Toronto who is coming by plane this morning. We hope he will be here shortly.

Mr. Chairman, in introducing our report I am not going to read it because you have copies of it before you. I want to begin by personally, and on behalf of those of us here and all of the members of the Board of Evangelism and Social Action of the Presbyterian Church in Canada, to express our sincere appreciation for the opportunity of being able to present this brief on this very important issue in the life of Canada and the world today.

I would also like to congratulate the Senate on your interest in this very vital issue, both for Canada and the world and on what you are doing to bring the plight of the poor to the attention of the people in Canada and the world. I am sure that this, in many ways, is a unique undertaking and for what you have done we are most appreciative.

With regard to our brief, it is quite short. We made it that way because we feel that in view of the large number of groups that will be appearing before you and that have already appeared before you there is no point in our trying to cover the whole field of poverty and every aspect of it. We feel that what we should do, as a church, is to deal with those things in which we might be considered to have some competence, such as matters dealing with the attitudes of people to poverty and the poor and the impact of poverty on persons, families and society. We also have done this because we feel that the church must accept some responsibility for the elimination of poverty and it is in these areas that the church is able to make its best contribution.

We also want to recognize and express our appreciation for what the Government is doing. In presenting this brief on poverty, we are not doing it as though nothing is being done to alleviate and eliminate poverty today. We recognize the splendid programs that already exist and for these we are really appreciative.

We are also mindful that, as far as Government is concerned, while we accuse Government of not doing certain things, we have to recognize that Government can move only as the people are prepared to stand behind it and as the people of the nation are prepared to make the resources available for programs such as this.

With regard to what is poverty, we have in the appendix of the report indicated what it is. I would like talk about that for a few minutes.

We would say that poverty is more than just being short of money. This is to be found on page 5 in the appendix, in the last paragraph on that page.

We feel that poverty is a state of deprivation that results in people being bowed down and afflicted. We believe that poverty must be looked on as an unmitigated evil.

Poverty deprives people of the opportunity for personal fulfilment and of making the best and full use of their gifts and energies in the service of God and man. We would underline this aspect of the definition of poverty.

We recognize that while money is necessary to help eliminate poverty, it cannot be a fixed sum, because as Professor Galbraith has said, the poor are those who have fallen behind the rest of society. It is necessary, therefore, to have an escalator clause so that, as the cost of living goes up, the amount of money that is made available to the poor also increases. What I am saying is that we have to see poverty as a relative thing.

I would like to say a few words about the causes of poverty. It has been pointed out that we have to be careful lest the war on poverty becomes a war on the poor; lest we think that the really important thing in this war on poverty is to motivate the poor to change their ways and their attitudes to life. There are many people within the church and within society today who have that attitude towards the poor, that if the poor would just change, if they would do something, if they would have a better outlook, the question of poverty would be solved.

I would like to underline what we say in our report, on page 6. We tried to base what we say about poverty on what the scriptures teach. This is found in the second paragraph from the bottom on that page. It shows that the causes of poverty are not just the attitudes of the poor; the causes of poverty are to be found in society itself. If there is anything in our report that should be underlined, it is this, that we must get away from putting the emphasis on the poor as being the cause, and put the emphasis more on society. The statement which is quoted in the brief on that page 6 says:

While in no way seeking to minimize the need for individual initiative and the necessity of doing all within one's power to help oneself, and while recognizing that the poverty of some people is their own fault, the Scriptures speak of a God who loves poor people as well as others, and who is genuinely concerned about their plight. Though poverty may be the result of the sin of the poor, the Scriptures are more inclined to attribute it to the sin of society. They suggest that their plight is due to the greed of the rich (Amos 8:6), to the low wages paid by employers (James 5: 1-4), and the lack of genuine concern on the part of all of us for the total welfare of the people of our communities and the world (St. Matthew 23: (31-46).

That final reference should be corrected to St. Matthew 25.

We feel it is important to emphasize this.

In our brief, we emphasize two things, education and income. We are not saying that there are not many others, but in our brief we feel that these are the things which have to be stressed. I have already indicated some of these things, but we feel that the education that is necessary is not just an education of the poor or providing more education for the poor, but it is to try to change the attitude of many people in our communities, to the poor people. Some of the other delegates will be speaking to this. We have gone to our congregations and have discussed this with them. We brought it to the attention of general assembly, our highest court. In discussing the question of poverty with many people, we have discovered that they have this strange attitude to the poor people, namely, that if they would just work harder, try harder, they could help themselves and take care of their own problem.

We feel that what has to be done is to mount a campaign or a program of education that will change the attitude of the people of Canada to the poor and their situation.

On page 4 of our brief, we have a recommendation with regard to education:

1. That a program of education be mounted to avoid a condescending and sneering attitude towards the poor, e.g. radio and television programming, special releases by the National Film Board, the Queen's Printer, etc., that the situation as to the varying qualities of life existing in Canada be publicized so that the concern of all might be aroused.

The other thing we wish to emphasize is the need of money. We believe that money is required, that it is essential, and the decision of our board with regard to this is to be found on page 5, in appendix 1. The simplest thing to do would be for me to read the recommendation. The other members of the delegation may wish to speak to the recommendation. It reads as follows:

1. That the Ministers of the Crown responsible for welfare be commended for seeking improvement in the Canadian welfare system, and that they be urged to base any changes on principles which include the following:

- (a) The method, whether by means of the guaranteed annual income, or some other, have for its objective giving people necessary support without the dehumanizing effect and the stigma associated with "welfare" as presently understood;
- (b) The level of support should be adequate, perhaps necessitating an increase in the minimum wage, and it should include opportunity for self-improvement so that people might be encouraged to increase the degree of their self-reliance and humanity through training, and part or full-time work without penalty;
- (c) The scheme should be integrated with health departments in ways which would help the emotionally disturbed and mentally incompetent and those otherwise unemployable because of life peculiarities.

These are the things we would like to emphasize.

I think what our brief adds up to is this: that we feel that anything that is done to help the poor financially should not be done in the nature of charity or hand-outs; that it should be given as a right; and to this extent we would agree most heartily with section 25 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, adopted by the United Nations in 1948.

I believe that is all I need to say in introducing the brief. The other members of the delegation are prepared to speak to the brief.

Senator Carter: This brief has emphasized over and over again the key to this problem of poverty, which is the attitude of the rich towards the poor and the attitude of officials, and the attitude of the Canadian public generally. That is the big problem to be tackled. I wonder if you could give us some specific things that your institution is doing to change these attitudes.

Rev. W. L. Young, Pastor, St. Andrew's Presbyterian Church, Hamilton, Ontario: The General Assembly, the highest court of the Presbyterian Church, makes statements of policy and sees its role not just in terms of calling on governments at various levels to do things but calling upon its own people. Some of the recommendations of the General Assembly have been beamed in the direction which this question raises, calling upon our own membership, our own people to adopt different attitudes, more wholesome attitudes, towards the poor people who find themselves in difficult circumstances. I suppose we can scarcely avoid the image of the denomination being sort of middle-class, but we regret it. However, so be it. But this does not mean that we should not identify as much as possible with the people who are poor. And we have called upon our congregations to emphasize with the poor, to avoid the temptation to profiteer in any way as landlords, and, within our congregations within our churches to seek to mount programs or participate in community programs already underway that will help to bridge this great gap between the well-to-do, and I don't mean the rich but the comfortable people, and the people who are really poor.

Senator Carter: In your brief, on page 7, you cite a recommendation adopted by the 1967 General Assembly, and you state in your brief that the General Assembly is the voice of the church. That is a very good recommendation, but it is in very general terms. What has been done to follow up, to see what impact that recommendation has had?

Rev. Mr. Gowland: Mr. Chairman, to reply to that question, you will find in Appendices 2, 3, 4 and 5...

Senator Carter: That is what I am citing now, page 7, Appendix 2.

Rev. Mr. Gowland: That was in 1967. Then in 1968, Appendix 3 goes on to indicate some of the things we were doing in addition to that. In addition, we have sent letters to all the sessions and all the congregations across Canada and we have asked them to study this. We have not only asked them to study it but to meet with the poor people; to visit the poor people in their situation and to take action within the community.

What we are trying to do is not just act as a single denomination. We are endeavouring to work with other Christian communions and other agencies within the nation. A really outstanding illustration of the co-operation of the churches in Canada was the Montreal Conference on Christian Conscience and Poverty.

That Conference was sponsored by all the Christian churches of Canada. The Roman Catholic Church and all the Protestant churches met together and planned it from the very beginning. I was one of the members of the Planning Committee. The way in which it was jointly planned and carried through by all the Christian denominations of Canada is, if I may say so, something worthy of note.

In addition to that, we worked on the study, "Towards a Coalition for Development". So we are working as a church. Our board has been given responsibility by the Presbyterian Church in Canada for following through on this, and we are co-operating in the Canadian coalition for development. The coalition is composed of the churches and other national groups in Canada, and it plans to get information out that will change the attitudes of people and get them to take definite action.

Senator Carter: I understand that, but that is not quite what I asked. I suggested that the recommendation which was adopted by your General Assembly three years ago was couched in very general terms. And I wanted to know if you had gone back and seen what effect that recommendation had had. Has anybody paid any heed to it? Has anything developed from it? Has it brought forth any fruit?

Rev. Alexander K. Campbell, Chairman, Board of Evangelism and Social Action, and Pastor, St. Andrew's Presbyterian Church, Thorold, Ontario: I think yes, because this is being studied throughout the whole church throughout Canada. It is not just that we passed it at the General Assembly, but the presbyteries have taken this up. It is hard to tell the response to this study, but at least, if people are concerned with their communities, eventually there will be a response. And I think this is one thing, as Mr. Gowland has mentioned, where government will get its backing through the education and encouragement that a church gives through its various courts and through its congregations to the people to make them concerned about the needs of poor people. I think there is a response. How much response is hard to say. All you can do really is plant the seed. It is hard to say at the moment how great the response is, or the growth of that seed.

Senator Carter: All right. You say the 1968 recommendation was a specific one. Can you give me any results of that? Apparently your 1967 one was very general, but the 1968 one was specific. You yourself cited that the 1968 one was specific, and that is two years ago. Has anything specific happened as a result of the recommendations in 1968, the specific recommendations?

Rev. Mr. Gowland: I can give you one illustration, namely that of the churches in Calgary, Alberta. This was not done by the Presbyterian Church alone; but as a result of prodding our ministers and people and congregations into action, they got together and developed a plan whereby they are going to erect a building which will be a low-rental housing unit. I would say this is a direct result of the action that was taken by our board and the action taken by the General Assembly.

Another illustration is that in one small town in Ontario where the Presbyterian Church got together with the other churches. What we are trying to do is to not act independently as a denomination, but to work with other denominations. If we are going to achieve any results, really, we have to work with other denominations and other agencies within the community. In this small town, the various churches got together, went out and canvassed the small town and the township around it and raised over $6,000 to help get a program underway as a concrete expression of their concern for poor and the poverty situation in Canada today.

Senator Carter: Has the poverty of any group in any of your congregations been lifted up or been changed by the action of your church? That is what I am really trying to get at.

Rev. Mr. Gowland: You are asking if individual people have helped, is that it?

Senator Carter: Groups or individuals. I suppose individual people, yes, but in terms of the group. There are pockets of poverty in every community in Canada, and I am thinking not so much of the individual person in that pocket but of the pocket itself.

Let me give you an example of what I have in mind. As a committee we have been probing around in the cities and we have found that children who live in ghettos of poverty, places where people have no wealth, are cut off almost completely from any spiritual resources. Such children are, for example, cut off from Sunday School, from being members of children's organizations such as Boy Scouts and Girl Guides, organizations of strong influence that could have the effect of inculcating in such children a strong positive character. So far as we can see, or at least so far as I can see, these poor children are practically abandoned by the church. They don't go to Sunday School. In fact, I don't think that idea even enters their minds. And the church does not go to find them. What does your church say in respect of that kind of problem?

Rev. Mr. Campbell: On the contrary, I say the church does go out to them. But people have to respond. They have to come to these groups. I can cite instances where we go out to these people, yes, and maybe in the larger cities there are pockets as you state, but in smaller communities I am sure the situation is being taken care of. Then again, on the other hand, you can present something, but there must be a response from the children so far as coming into these groups is concerned.

Senator Carter: I do not quite follow what you are saying now. I am asking what you are doing and what is going on. For instance, are you getting those children to go? Are you trying to supply the spiritual influences that will lift them up?

Rev. Mr. Gowland: I will ask Mr. Young to answer that.

Rev. Mr. Young: Yes, I would like to respond to this question because I appreciate your particular emphasis. I would like to explain to this gentleman what is happening in Hamilton where I am Minister. This is happening at two levels; we co-operate with other denominations in the urban renewal area where we are ministering to the children and the young people in the area with specific programs in recreation and spiritual development, not just on Sunday but every day of the week. We have seen some very interesting and very encouraging responses from these children. I know exactly what you mean when you say that children in some of these ghetto areas seem to have been abandoned, and while it is true that some denominations have fled to the suburbs for more comfortable work, some of us have seen our role as living with and identifying with the poor in the centre of the city and ministering to them. My own congregation is one of these, and our ministry as we see it, is to these people and the only reason for us to continue as a congregation in a downtown area is so that we may be able to minister to these people. If we do not do that, then we might as well flee to the suburbs or fold up.

We have programs in the Church going on almost every day to help in this situation. We have moved into the area of co-operative nurseries for children of working mothers, or mothers with psychological problems, nervous problems or health problems. We have begun opportunities for English-language studies for parents—mothers especially—of children, using the volunteers of our congregations plus some experts from the social service organizations in the community to bring small discussion groups for mothers on child-care, nurture and family budgeting and nutrition, and we see these rather specific things as a real justification for our continuing to be a Church in the area we serve. I would like to say that one other thing we have done in the community is to pull together a public meeting on housing, because we discovered one of the real problems of the poor is housing, at least in our area. People are having to pay unreasonably high rents for just deplorable accommodation, and we felt that the public simply had to know about it, and so we pulled together a large meeting with representatives of all levels of government, including our city council and planners for urban renewal development.

Quite a number of poor people themselves also attended and at first they didn't think they would even dare to speak at such a meeting, but eventually they began to get their steam up and to respond, and this is exactly what we wanted, because we wanted people in responsible positions and in the Church to hear the people, the poor people for themselves. Out of this came some rather significant programs in subsidized housing and housing for senior citizens in our city.

Senator Carter: Have you raised any hell about this housing situation? As you know, we get these fellows who buy up substandard housing, charge exorbitant rents, and do not improve them at all and then when the old-age pension goes up, up goes the rent. Have you done anything about that? Have you raised any hell about that?

The Chairman: Senator Carter, do you think that that is their business—to raise hell?

Senator Carter: Yes.

Rev. Mr. Young: Mr. Chairman, in such things as the meeting I referred to and the excellent Press coverage we got at the time, plus the things we are doing all the time—letters to the editor of the local newspaper; I don't know whether that is really raising hell or not, but we sure would like to.

Senator Fergusson: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask Mr. Gowland about the report of the Montreal Conference which he showed us on priorities. Is this available to the public?

Rev. Mr. Gowland: Yes, it is.

The Chairman: We received copies of this.

Senator Fergusson: I am very much interested because of some of the reports that I have heard that came out of some of the discussions at that conference.

Senator Carter: Is that the World Council of Churches?

Rev. Mr. Gowland: No, this is the "Churches of Canada". It followed as a result of the World Conference on Church and Society which was held in Geneva.

Senator Fergusson: I think we are all very grateful to the delegation here today who have gone to a lot of trouble to appear before us. I found the brief most interesting. The two subjects which you have stressed are education, particularly education of the public—and we certainly learned that this is really important from the meetings we have had—and you also stress the subject of income, and that is the one I would like to speak about. On page 5 in Appendix 1(a) you say—"The method, whether by means of the Guaranteed Annual Income, or some other,..." Now we have had a guaranteed annual income recommended to us on many occasions, but what others do you suggest? We have not had any others suggested.

Rev. Mr. Gowland: Well, perhaps what we had in mind was the negative income tax. This was one thing.

The Chairman: The negative income tax is merely a term used to describe the mechanics of a guaranteed annual income.

Senator Fergusson: I thought perhaps you had some other ideas that we could think about.

Rev. Mr. Gowland: I might say that the reason we put it this way was that we felt that we should not be too specific in this area, as a Church, because this is not an area in which we are supposed to have real competence. We thought what we should do would be to bring to the attention of the special committee the fact that there must be something done, but we are not absolutely sure just how it should be done. However, we feel something should be done and we are quite prepared to let others who know more about it do it, and do it in the way it should be done. This is really what we are trying to say.

Senator Fergusson: I thought perhaps you might have some specific suggestions in mind. Also in (b) you say—"The level of support should be adequate." What would you think would be adequate in terms of 1970 dollars? Would you have any ideas?

Rev. Mr. Gowland: For a family?

Senator Fergusson: Yes, the level of support for one person. I suppose you would have to start with that and then go on to a family of two persons and three persons, and so forth.

Rev. Mr. Gowland: Would one of the other members like to comment?

Rev. Mr. Gemmell: The figure that gets kicked around quite a lot is the figure of $3,000 as a kind of mean.

The Chairman: $3,000 for two?

Rev. Mr. Gemmell: Yes, and I think that is pretty mean! The people in Toronto who seem to know people in the welfare business and in the labour field seem to indicate about $3,000 per person is more like what is required for an adequate living standard in that city. I think we have to get above the subsistence standard in our thinking; otherwise the children will not have a chance for education. I think what we are trying to do is to help people not only to live but to raise their horizons and capabilities and potentials. So I think it has to be geared to the cost of living; it has to have an escalator clause; but I think we have to look at more than $3,000 per family of two.

Senator Fergusson: Do you think they would have to have the same amount, no matter what part of the country they live in?

Rev. Mr. Gemmell: That is one for the politicians. You almost have to say so, but I know that there are regional differences that could make a difference.

Rev. Mr. Gowland: I think we can answer that question. It does make a difference where a person is living. If a person has to pay $85 a month out of $1,500 a year for rent, then they do not have enough help, and there must be some flexibility in the amount of income that is available. If a person is paying $30 or $40 a month rent, that person could be living well as compared to another person with the same income, so there has to be some thought given to different amounts available in different regions of Canada. Again, if I may say so, Mr. Young mentioned something about a lady last night, when we were discussing our brief, who had to pay $85 for rent; and what was her income?

Rev. Mr. Young: $111.

The Chairman: In Hamilton?

Rev. Mr. Young: Yes.

The Chairman: Of course, you in Hamilton have had a very tight situation for some years, even tighter than Toronto.

While we are talking about variations—and that is very important for us and the people of Canada—we make no variations with family allowances; we make no variations on the Old Age Security; we make no variations on Unemployment Insurance; I do not know of any subsidy in which we make any variation. Why should we make a variation on income?

Rev. Mr. Gowland: Are you asking us?

The Chairman: Yes. We have been discussing this among ourselves. You are the pigeons this morning.

Rev. Mr. Gowland: I think it is very simple. If you do not have some variations, one person can be living in downright destitution while another person can be getting by adequately, because where one person is involved a difference of $60 makes a tremendous difference in how well that person can live. So I think in this area there has to be real consideration given to the situation in which the person is living or in which the family is living.

The Chairman: Let me put it to you this way then. Supposing we make an allowance in Toronto. Do we cut it off at Willowdale, on the outskirts? What street do we cut it off at, and do we say, "This side of the street, you get so much; and on this side of the street you get so much"? How would you like to be given that kind of undertaking? How could you do it?

Rev. Mr. Gowland: I appreciate what you are getting at, in an across-the-board program. If you have to get into individual cases, the cost of maintenance and so on becomes difficult.

The Chairman: What difference does it make? Is it not a good thing for the country that in the less prosperous areas there are a few more dollars being pushed in by the rest of the country? Is it not a good thing? After all, they spend it and do not put it in the bank.

Rev. Mr. Young: Mr. Chairman, you have indicated here awareness of the fact that Hamilton is a pocket with a special problem, but I am sure there are others in the country.

The Chairman: And a housing problem.

Rev. Mr. Young: Yes, and this reflects on the whole poverty situation. Perhaps even taking into account, say, the average cost of rent in a community or an area, that would determine the level of the kind of support they should have, and you could make an extra allowance for those areas of the country which are known to be higher in rent.

The Chairman: Mr. Young, you have had a great deal of experience in welfare work and amongst the poor. In so far as the Chairman is concerned—and I am not speaking for the rest of the committee—once we make an allowance it must be across the board, there are no special cases, because once you do that your allowance is not worth much. You say that a man is entitled to "X" dollars every place, but the minute you say that he is entitled to "X" dollars here and is entitled to something for housing and for another reason, your system is worth nothing and you are back where you are at the present time.

Rev. Mr. Young: I am glad you have brought it up just this way because this is the way the system is working now, and this is what bugs me. To use the words of the honourable senator back there, "raising hell," this is what I feel like doing all the time, and the system is grinding people down. I have some documentation here I may share with you later. A family can have so many dollars for their rent, and the landlord knows that they can have that many dollars for rent, so he tacks on so many more dollars that he requires them to pay, and because housing there is hard to come by the family cannot say, "Sorry, we will move somewhere else." So, in addition to what they get for welfare for rent, they pay out of their grocery and clothing allowance, but the landlord does not really deserve it because he will not even fix up the premises.

Senator Fournier: Mr. Chairman, I would like to change the subject a little, though it is very interesting and I hope that we can come back to it later.

We have men of the church here, and I am looking for advice from them this morning. I think that everyone of we old politicians have had a fair amount of experience with the local poor problems. Often when we talk about the poor we take poor on the average, and there is a great variety of poor, as far as I am concerned. We have the attitude of the people that was mentioned here, and I agree with the brief as a whole and I am not being critical of your brief. The attitude of people towards the poor will be changed because we are talking about the problem. We are drawing the attention of the public to it, and it is going to have some effect. But then there are the attitudes of the poor themselves. I think they are learning something also—that is, the responsible poor. Now, there are the irresponsible poor. To me, this is really a problem, and very few briefs have really gone into the question of the irresponsible poor. It gives you a class of society of people who I cannot say are happy to be poor, but they are poor and they like living poor and they will remain poor, and it is a very sad situation for the children. It does not matter what we do with these people because they are irresponsible. They will always be poor. I can give you three examples.

A man whom I know very well came to my door. He is very poor. He has six children and no job. I did my best for him. I knew that he is just about starving, so I called a contracting firm and said: "Here is Joe Blow; can you help him out." The manager said: "All I can pay him is $60 a week because he cannot read or write, and he is not a carpenter or anything else. In spite of this I will go along with you for a couple of weeks." But this man then said that he would not work for $60 a week because he had too many commitments. He had just bought a TV set or a refrigerator and he just could not work for $60 a week, so he did not take the job. I call such persons the irresponsible poor, and we have a lot of them.

Another fellow who is in the same situation may come to me. He has a large family, and that is probably the result of his being poor, because he has lots of spare time. I find him a job. Soon after he gets his second pay I find out that he has bought a second-hand car, which he does not need, for $260, and that does not help his situation. If we gave these fellows a minimum income I do not think it would improve their situation at all. We have to change their attitude.

I will give you another example. Around Christmas time a club to which I belong prepares Christmas boxes for poor people. This year we prepared 40 boxes worth about $30 each, containing canned goods, candies, and little gifts for the children. We delivered these boxes on Christmas Eve. I found out afterwards that three of these boxes were taken down to the bootlegger and traded for whiskey. I call the people who do this the irresponsible poor. This happens every Christmas. The poor fellow gets drunk and has a hell of a good Christmas, while there are millions of people starving to death.

This is a bad situation, but what can we do about it. I would like somebody to tell us what we can do for these people who are the irresponsible poor. We have a great number of them, but we seldom talk about them.

Then we have the abusers of welfare, while there are others who are ashamed to go on welfare because they do not want to be humiliated; they do not want to be in any of those three classifications I have just mentioned, although they are so classified by other people. It is difficult to draw the line. What is society going to do about this type of person?

We are talking about a minimum income. You could give these fellows $3,000 or $4,000, or $5,000, and it would not improve their situation at all. They are irresponsible.

Rev. Mr. Gowland: Mr. Chairman, I would be very happy to respond to the senator because we recognize the fact that there is this group of persons. What we would say, however, is that there is a tendency to exaggerate out of all proportion the number of people in this group. We find that this is a problem within the church. Somebody was talking about the church, but you cannot generalize about the church. All people do not think alike. You have every viewpoint within the Church of Jesus Christ. I find in the work of the Board of Evangelism and Social Action that one thing we have to fight against is the attitude that causes people to select a person such as those that have been mentioned, and project the description as though it includes all the poor. What we say is: Yes, there are these people, and we have to recognize the fact that they are irresponsible. We have to use that terminology. This is what we are trying to say in the appendix, that there are people who are poor today through their own fault. There is no doubt about that. They drink their money away, and they waste it. What we are trying to say is that we must recognize this fact. I suppose that this kind of poor will always be with us. But, we must not be blinded by this fact in looking at the whole question of poverty, because the great majority of people who are in the poverty category today are just as wholesome, just as motivated, and just as good people as the people in the church or in any other group.

This would be my answer. Perhaps other members of the delegation would like to speak to it, but we must look at this particular group in its true light and in its true perspective.

Rev. Mr. Young: I can see a very real role for the church to play in ministering to this particular problem that the senator has raised. If we can help these people have a different attitude towards themselves as people, and a more responsible attitude towards their families, then any kind of welfare assistance they may receive from the state will be much more meaningful. While we recognize the need for the state to do many great things in terms of welfare there is, at the same time, a great role for the church to play in working with these people personally and as families, and in helping them to learn how to live, to find out what life is all about. Perhaps we are not really touching the problem, but we are trying.

Senator Fournier: I quite agree with what you are saying, and I understand it very well, but I should like to clarify this a little more. Perhaps we have to accept the fact that the head of the family is a lost cause, and that we should do something with the children through education. We may have to kiss the man goodbye, and say: "You are gone. We cannot do anything more for you."

The Chairman: I hope that we will kiss him goodbye with enough money to live decently on.

Senator Fournier: He would never have enough, even if you gave him a million dollars.

Senator Quarr: I should like to ask a question to follow up what Senator Fournier has said. The type of poor person with whom I have come in contact is the one I really pity. I have not bumped into any of those mentioned by Senator Fournier, but do you not think that our welfare system is to be blamed for a lot of these troubles? A member of the staff of this committee knows personally of the case I am about to describe, and telephoned me about it. This is the case of a woman who has been deserted by her husband, and she has a child who is seven years old. She was on welfare, but some of her very uncharitable neighbours reported that she had a job. She is working as a waitress. The minute this fact was reported, she was cut off from welfare, and she did not know she was cut off until she received a letter from the welfare group saying that she was cut off. Now she is in debt. The child has been sick, and she has had to pay somebody to look after it. She did not declare to the welfare people that she had a job. She thought she would be able to get away with it for a while. Had I been in her circumstances I would have done the same, I think.

The Chairman: I presume she did not declare her income?

Senator Quart: Yes, her income. She has now received a letter instructing her to attend at the office. When her landlord discovered that she was working he raised her rent from $85 to $110. In the meantime we tried to find out where she could get legal aid. I have even offered to telephone the landlord. The point is that she is cut off. She now considers that she will have to discontinue working. In my opinion these people should be allowed to work and earn probably $100 or $150 before they are cut off. Give them a chance to pay back before they are cut off. Since we all seem to be talking about hell I might as well mention the devil: we are all between the devil and the deep blue sea as to whether she should continue working and pay a woman to care for her child, or just go back on welfare, which I believe she has now decided to do. It will be a couple of months before it is resumed. That is where the system is terribly wrong. They should be given a little more chance.

Rev. Mr. Gemmell: The Ontario Government announced in the legislature recently that this is going to be possible.

Senator Quart: Yes, but when will it be applied?

Rev. Mr. Gemmell: Your concern combined with Senator Fournier's (Madawaska-Restigouche) does not result in it being a case of the irresponsible poor, but of the irresponsible rich.

The Chairman: Irresponsible government. You are saying the Government has not taken the proper action.

Rev. Mr. Gemmell: The Government is also rich. If a man can only earn $60 a week and cannot live as well on that as he can on welfare, it is not a case of being irresponsible in refusing the job. Is it not a case of the company being irresponsible in paying a substandard wage? We have to get our reasoning straightened out a little. The cause of what we refer to as irresponsibility has been the dehumanizing of these people over generations and generations. We cannot expect them at one fell swoop to pick up by their own bootstraps and become like us.

Senator Quart: If we pay a guaranteed income and do not increase the minimum wage, why would they work?

Rev. Mr. Gowland: Mr. Chairman, part of our brief is concerned with this very question, how do you make help available to people who need it and yet provide the incentive to earn more? I think this is an essential because this lady is a classic example of many poor people today. All the money they earn is deducted from that received and they cannot improve their lot at all.

Senator Quart: There is no incentive.

Rev. Mr. Gowland: There is no possibility of doing it.

The Chairman: You represent the Presbyterian Church of Canada, not Ontario. I should think that as people who are interested in the social aspects of the Canadian scene you would know, and particularly Rev. Mr. Young, you would know, and you, Rev. Mr. Gowland, that in eight provinces in Canada a person in such circumstances as described by Senator Quart would be able to go to the welfare office and receive a subsidy so long as she worked. Ontario is not doing this; Quebec is doing very, very little, if any, but the rest of the provinces are doing some subsidizing. The Province of Alberta is subsidizing more than all the other provinces put together.

Senator Quart: Yes, that is right.

The Chairman: That, of course, is what the committee has been trying to tell the people.

Senator Quart: These people do not know; they need a co-ordinating council of some kind. Unless some person of certain influence takes a little interest in them, they do not know what to do and become discouraged. One of the welfare workers asked this lady why she was working.

The Chairman: That is one of the statements Senator Carter, Senator Fournier and others have made on the floor of the Senate in the last weeks: how do you get these laws across to the people? That is what we have been talking about: how do you get them to know about it? During these hearings we have repeated the statement time and time again. It is going out to the press and yet it has registered. However, my friends here, and no reflection on you people at all, ought to know that sort of thing, and be familiar enough with it to know what is being done. For instance, in the case raised by Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche), $60 may be the normal wage in that area. There is no use in saying raise all the minimum wages; it does not work that way and you people know it as well as I. He has a large family with six children and the cost of living is going up. There is nothing to be done except to keep him working and assist him. That is my own view, but I believe it is the view of the committee. We are not the only ones who do not completely know what is going on in the country. You share a little of that with us. The poor people themselves have so little knowledge that you would be amazed how ignorant they are of their rights. That is the name of the game.

Senator Inman: I have read this brief twice because I was so interested in it and found much to consider. How do you think the committee can deal with the myth that there is a job for everyone? Some people will say there are jobs if people will work. Do you think that is so, and how do you think you could dispel that idea?

Rev. Mr. Young: The very introduction of some kind of guaranteed annual income would have to be justified by educating the public to know that there just are not enough jobs to go around any more. With automation being what it is we can no longer say if a person is going to eat then he must work.

Senator Inman: I come from a province that is supposed to be one of the most depressed in Canada. Of course, I cannot agree with that.

The Chairman: I do not agree.

Senator Inman: There are small businesses run by men who perhaps employ two or three people. They cannot pay more than $60 a week without their business closing. Is that a case where the Government should supplement that? Is that Senator Croll's idea of a guaranteed income?

The Chairman: Senator Inman, what you and I are saying is that the purpose of the exercise is to try and keep him working. So long as he is willing and anxious to work and cannot earn enough, he has to be assisted. It is as simple as that.

Senator Inman: A man running a small business is limited in the amount he can afford to pay to two or three people. Do you feel that the churches as a whole are doing their part with regard to the conditions of the poor and the underprivileged and taking all the interest they should?

Rev. Mr. Gowland: I am absolutely certain that we are not. One of the greatest jobs of education with regard to the plight of the poor has to be done within the church. I find that in going from congregation to congregation within our own denomination I have to break down the wrong attitudes to the poor. In many essentials the church is not doing what it should, because we have some people within our denomination—I am not going to speak for any other—who do not feel the church should be involved in social issues at all. They are quite prepared to leave all this to secular agencies.

I think one of the contributions the Board of Evangelism and Social Action of the Presbyterian Church in Canada has been that of emphasizing the wholeness of the Gospel; the church is not just interested in people's souls but is interested in whole persons, in communities, the nations and the world. It is because many people within our congregations are prepared to dismiss poverty as though it is not a concern of the church that we have this problem. I am very happy to be able to report that there is an increasing number of people within our denomination who feel that the church's concern has to be for the total person in every area of his life.

Senator Inman: Do you feel that perhaps it is the better off people who have the feeling that they are not too interested in the condition of the poor? Do you find that perhaps amongst the wealthier people in your congregation?

Rev. Mr. Young: The question is?

Senator Inman: The question is: in the congregations of the church, do you think perhaps it is the wealthier people who are unconcerned about the condition of the poor in the church? Are they the ones who sort of brush it aside, more than the medium income people?

Reverend Mr. Young: I think this is perhaps a natural tendency, but I would suggest from my experience, and within my own congregation, maybe those who are hardest to convince are the middle class people; the wealthier people have seen it as their mission to support some fairly expensive, if you like, programs through their church on behalf of the poor.

Senator Inman: I am glad to hear that.

Reverend Mr. Young: However, there are people who have good jobs, who work every day, who have never had a real run of illness, whom it is difficult to convince that the plight of the poor is in any way their concern.

Reverend Mr. Gowland: I would add that I do not think it is peculiar to any income group. Maybe those who are most responsible for this attitude are those who have the attitude that they are self-made people. They say, "I did it. Therefore they can do it. I have worked hard and got this money. They can do the same thing." People say to me, "Why should I take my hard earned money and give it to those people?" Some of these people are not very rich themselves, but this is their attitude towards those who are a little poorer than they are. I think it is a few people in every area.

Senator Pearson: As I read this brief, your main topic is really the attitude of people. Sixty years ago, when I lived in Winnipeg, a great many people were very concerned about the poor and there were small organizations, in churches and suchlike, working on their own to try to better the condition of the poor. However, there were so many of these organizations that finally it was thought that community funds would be the answer, so it was decided to collect a large sum of money once a year and hand it out to different welfare organizations and tell them to go to it. This left a great many of those who had been working in the small church organizations a feeling of not being wanted. Consequently, they said to themselves, "All right, let the community fund handle it." This is the sort of attitude that grew up then.

Over the years the middle-class people have got to the point where they are successful in their line, they are making good money, the young folk are out on skidoos, skiing and so on, having a whale of a good time, and have no thought of the poor in their own community. There is now the feeling that there has to be a guaranteed minimum income, which is an enlargement of the community fund idea as far as I can see. But we are not getting at the attitude of the people. We need to get the people involved, the whole community, in the needs of the community for the poor. How do you propose we should do this, to bring the community together again? These funds will never bring the people together at all; they just leave everybody cold. They just say, "To heck with it. I have done my job and that's it. I have given $10 and that's enough." Do you think there is any way of overcoming this attitude?

Reverend Mr. Gowland: I am wondering if part of the problem is not how the poor people look upon the help that is given. I believe every one of us has an aversion to accepting charity. I do not think we understand the poor or the feelings of the poor. A lot of our churches have been handing out Christmas baskets and that kind of thing, and having been a minister in a congregation for over 20 years, I happen to know that a lot of the people receiving this help just detest it; it is humiliating; they take it out of courtesy, but if they could find any way of not taking it they would not take it. The reaction to this attitude is, "How come? They are not appreciative."

I think what we are trying to get at is that we have to get away from help to the poor in terms of charity and hand-outs. What we are trying to say here is that there must be something that makes this available to people as a right. This is why, as far as I personally am concerned—I am not here speaking for the Board of Evangelism and Social Action—the pension for older persons has been a God-send.

The Chairman: Old age security?

Reverend Mr. Gowland: Yes. I know older people who would not have asked for help, but the fact that this has been made available to them as a right means they will take it and use it, and it has been a great blessing to them. My answer would be simply this. I think we must not give money to people as though it is a hand-out from the community, but as something given to them because they are persons, because they are human beings and have a right to live like decent human beings.

Senator Pearson: In other words, you would say the guaranteed annual income is a real need for the times we are living in?

Reverend Mr. Gowland: Yes.

Senator Pearson: So they do not get the feeling that they are living off the community or on the community fund?

Reverend Mr. Gowland: That would be my opinion.

Senator Pearson: You talk in your brief about recreation. When the committee was in Halifax we looked at one of the local public housing estates there and found that the children had no place in which to exercise or play, except the yard between the two rows of houses. What do you think about recreation? What do you mean by recreation?

Reverend Mr. Young: Certainly the type of housing that you mention, senator, puts people together in a very condensed community and if there is no place provided for the children then you are really aggravating the problem by creating another ghetto. Perhaps the answer would be for laws to be implemented which would require communities, contractors and builders, when building this kind of facility, to provide for recreation or indoors and outdoors, so as not to allow this kind of thing to happen.

Senator Pearson: What do you mean by recreation? is it just a game of baseball, hockey or what?

Reverend Mr. Young: This must be the opportunity for people of various ages to relate to one another as persons meaningfully. This is what a game of baseball is all about. It is not just the competition to see who is the best guy.

Senator Pearson: Recreation to older people is reading and not physical exercise, which is something else entirely different. In providing for recreation you have to think of your districts and where you are.

Reverend Mr. Gowland: In connection with this particular item our concern, referring to page 9, section C of the report is that while we recognize that recreation is different for persons at different ages, we really are concerned about boys and girls living in these communities who need the opportunity to play and meet with each other and to have this interaction.

Senator Pearson: You only involve so few of them at a game of baseball. You provide a great area for the baseball, but do not give very much choice for the great mass of those youngsters in that area.

Reverend Mr. Gowland: We would be concerned about providing recreation in the broadest sense of the word and this is what we have in mind.

Senator Croll, Mr. Zeidman has just arrived. He is the other member of our delegation, the superintendent of Scott Mission.

The Chairman: I knew Mr. Zeidman's father. Is there anything further, Senator Pearson?

Senator Pearson: Yes, with regard to page 2 of the brief, under Summary of Recommendations No. 3:

Commendation for the Government's attack on inflation...

Do you think that the attack at the present time on inflation has produced any results or is it producing any results?

Reverend Mr. Young: Mr. Chairman and honourable senators, we were talking about this last evening as a group and we felt that perhaps since this report was written some time ago we are beginning to see a few of the results and they are not as desirable as we would like them to be. I am referring to the fact that unemployment is increasing probably as a result of some of the measures which have been taken to curb inflation and it is unfortunate.

The Chairman: A fair summation would be to say that as a result of the policies we have more inflation and more unemployment. Goodness knows where we are going. At the moment we have worst of both worlds.

Senator McGrand: I was taken with the expression "A War on Poverty may be a War on the Poor". I believed you mentioned that expression. If the poor are looked down upon and if they may be looked down upon in the future it seems to me that the best way to spread this principle of brotherly love and charity at the different levels of influence is in your church. All congregations are made up of a certain amount of well-to-do and a certain amount of poor. I cannot think of an agency better qualified to do this levelling out at the level of the congregation than the churches. If they have not done it they have not been doing their job. If it is not done in the future it will be, because the churches are not doing their job.

With regard to this expression "The War on Poverty may become a War on the Poor" I would like to hear you talk a little more about that. That is my first question.

Reverend Mr. Gowland: This is not an original idea of mine. It is really taking up the idea of Alvin Schorr. This is what he was saying and it has partly to do with the attitude on the part of people that if you can just motivate the poor then you will eliminate the problem of poverty. As I said, many church people and many people who are close friends of mine, are inclined to say—maybe not at a public meeting but during a personal conversation—"If people are poor, it is their own fault, because they are lazy and shiftless". If the war on poverty turns into that kind of an attack on the poor it is going to be most unfortunate.

I think we have to recognize that while they may be in a sense responsible there is also the sense in which society must accept its responsibility for their plight.

Senator McGrand: I do not think there is enough work being done to inform the public and to understand who the poor are and why they are poor. Many of these people are emotionally sick. They are just the same as the people who get into crime and drugs, because they are emotionally sick people. You have that type of poor in your congregation and then you have another type of people in the comfortable pews who are also emotionally sick in a certain way. In order to do your job it seems to me that you have two approaches: the person who is emotionally sick and handicapped is better helped by the sociologist, but the man who is poor in spirit is best helped by the theologian. Would you just give me your appraisal on that.

Reverend Mr. Gowland: I defer this question to Mr. Zeidman.

Reverend Alexander Zeidman, Superintendent of Scott Mission, Toronto, Ontario: First of all, my apologies for being late. When we drafted this brief one of the things that occurred first was that we found we were speaking to ourselves almost more than we were addressing this committee. All along the line, as we came up with ideas we found that we were addressing ourselves and through ourselves, the general assembly and the church at large, the very same comments which you are making, that it is the work of the church to identify with the poor. Coincident with this brief we have been making recommendations through the Board of Evangelism and Social Action to the general assembly.

Rev. Mr. Young: May I respond to that? Your concern about departmentalizing or pigeonholding things—it would be important, I feel, that the sociologist must have a theology and the theologians must have a social conscience. We see our role as working closely together on that program.

Senator McGrand: There are two approaches to the problem.

The Chairman: That one answers it.

Senator McGrand: I have a further question. There are some of the poor on welfare who complain that welfare officials have a tendency to push the board around, by inspecting their homes. Perhaps without notifying them that they are going to make a visit. That has been brought up several times. It has been my experience that welfare officers are trained in sociology and that they are recruited from those who are interested in sociology and in welfare work. If welfare officers are to see that this money is being properly spent on food and clothing, they must visit the homes of these welfare people, occasionally. Have you found in your work that these welfare officials do overstep their role, when they visit and inspect, and perhaps criticize, the recipients of welfare. This is a big question which has to be dealt with.

Rev. Mr. Young: The answer is definitely yes, in my experience.

The Chairman: The answer is yes, to what?

Rev. Mr. Young: That the welfare officers do, in my experience, overstep their bounds. But I want to expand on this a little further, because I believe that those people, just as you say, come into this with a good deal of compassion and they are very idealistic, but something happens, I think the system is the problem. Welfare in Canada is administered from three levels—the federal department makes certain rules, the provincial department makes certain rules, and the municipal department implements then all the rules, and this is where it comes down to the personal crunch between the officer, the inspector and the poor person who is receiving assistance.

Somone earlier asked the question, if the guaranteed annual income is not possible, what else do you propose? Somehow, the system has to be changed so that it works more smoothly, so that there is a better relationship between the three levels, and perhaps so that there is less responsibility at the local municipal level for implementation of things, where personalities can enter into it and where the local officer or inspector can just get fed up to the teeth with what is happening every day, until he becomes automatic. This is the dehumanizing effect of the system as it presently works, so that the person on welfare, as a result of the long and bitter experience, begins to ask the question, "Am I a person, or am I a pawn, I do not know who I am, does it really matter who I am. So we have the phenomenon of drugs, alcohol and other chemicals, they are the manifestation of the search for identity and the attempt to hide from the problems as they really are."

Senator McGrand: You have mentioned two things. You say that there is confusion between the levels of Government, in administration, and that has led to a lot of, we will use the word, harassment of the poor. But is it the conduct of the individual officer who goes in to make an inspection of a home, to see how they are making out. The Children's Aid Societies put children into foster homes, they pay people something to take them. Surely they have a right to visit those homes to see that those children are being properly cared for. I do not think it is necessary to notify the foster homes that they are coming to make an inspection. If the people have nothing to hide, they should not make any objection to an inspection.

This is what I want to know, whether this comment, that welfare officers do harass the welfare recipients—I am not referring to the confusion that comes from the administration being at three levels of Government. That is not harassment, that is incompetence. I am talking about harassment.

Rev. Mr. Gowland: I think that what we have to realize is that this is an area in which we must not generalize. I was at a meeting, I was part of a panel and one of the other members of the panel was a person in charge of welfare in this particular municipality. I made a statement to the effect that one person in this welfare office had treated a woman with contempt and there is no doubt about it that this woman had been treated in that way. The panel member was somewhat dismayed to hear that that had happened within the area of his responsibility; and in no time I had a telephone call from him and a letter, and he wanted to know who that person was. So we must be very careful and we must be fair to those in the welfare departments and not indict them all.

There are some persons who are like that. I would say, as far as the ministry of the church is concerned, you might say a man comes into the ministry because he loves people. We have discovered there are some men who come into the ministry of the church not because they love people but because they hate people. It could be that some of the social welfare workers are the same.

The Chairman: Senator Carter has to leave for another committee and he wishes to ask some questions.

Senator Carter: I wonder if I could just put my questions, and the answers can be on the record. I do not think I can wait for the answers, because they are waiting for us in another committee.

The Chairman: Very well, we will come back to this.

Senator Carter: They are short questions. I will just put the questions and I will not wait for the answers. Is that agreeable? The answers will be on the record.

The Chairman: Yes.

Senator Carter: First, if you had to cut Government expenditure by a billion dollars, what would be your priorities?

Secondly, if you had two billion dollars in money to spend, an extra amount, to eradicate poverty, what would be your priorities?

We are talking to churchmen, Presbyterians, and I said about "raising hell" just now. I understand they are the best "hellraisers" in the country.

The Chairman: That is their reputation.

Senator Carter: I would like to get their opinion on the scriptural concept of "earning your living by the sweat of your brow". Is that a concept of people with today's conditions?

The Chairman: Earning your bread by the sweat of your brow. What you are talking about is the work ethic.

Senator Carter: Yes.

The Chairman: Is the work ethic still compatible in the present day and age?

Senator Carter: Yes. It has a scriptural foundation. I have two more questions.

The Chairman: Very well. We will follow them up.

Senator Carter: One of the witnesses described the attitude of one of his congregation, or of the typical attitude of a congregation, saying "why should I give my hard-earned money to him", and so on and so forth. Is not that an admission of failure of the church, because the church's teaching as I understand it, that of the Christian teaching, is that you do not own what you have, it is not yours, you are just a steward of what you have received, and when you give something you are not actually giving it to a person but you are giving it to the one you got it from. If the attitude that pervades in the congregation is typical of what you have described, is not that a failure of the church to drive home the Christian ethic?

The last question I will ask comes back to the point raised by Senator Fergusson which you, Mr. Chairman, followed up, having to do with varying the allowance depending on where a person lives. Is that not going back to the concept of minimum existence, which you actually refute in another part of your brief? If you do have people living in poverty in cities, paying high rents, would it not be better to give them whatever is adequate for them to live on? And if that is a little better for the people who are living in rural areas would that not be an incentive for people to get out of the ghettos and move to where they can get a better life?

I realize that that question will require a fairly lengthy answer, Mr. Chairman, but I really must leave to attend another committee.

The Chairman: That is all right, Senator Carter. The answers will go on record.

So there are two or three questions for you to answer, then, gentlemen.

Rev. Mr. Gowland: As I recall, Mr. Chairman, the first question had to do with cutting Government expenditures.

The Chairman: If you had to cut Government expenditures by a billion dollars, what would be your priorities? The second question is, if you had to spend $2 billion, what would be your priorities? You can see what Senator Carter was getting at.

Rev. Mr. Gowland: Perhaps the Chairman of our board, Mr. Campbell, might like to start.

The Chairman: We realize that answering such questions requires a little time for consideration.

Rev. Mr. Young: In fact, Mr. Chairman, it is really beyond our area of competence.

Rev. Mr. Gowland: Perhaps I could answer Mr. Chairman. We recognize that the real wealth of a nation is its people, and the answer would be that we must look at the problem in terms of the total well-being of the people of Canada. We cannot be concerned with just a small segment of the country or a small group but with how we can best use the money in question for the well-being of most of the people of Canada.

Rev. Mr. Campbell: With respect to the first question, Mr. Chairman, we are not aware of where the Government is spending in excess and where such spending could be cut. Obviously, we don't have access to departmental records, and it would be necessary to examine carefully such records in order to have the necessary information on which to base the making of priorities.

The Chairman: Let me make it easier for you. We have four million people in Canada who are below the poverty line, assuming that we take the Economic Council's poverty line, with which everybody is acquainted. Half of those four million people are working poor, such as the man described by Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche) who receives $60 a week and has a large family to feed and just cannot make it. That is a working poor man. He is prepared to work but cannot get enough in the trade and he has no particular skill and so on.

The other half of the four million below the poverty line are those who are blind, crippled, maimed and so on, together with female heads of families and welfare poor.

Have you got the picture? There are two million on one side and two million on the other side. Now, let us say you have the money; for example, half a million dollars or a million dollars. What are your priorities? And, of course, I am talking only of the poverty stricken.

Rev. Mr. Young: I would say first of all, Mr. Chairman, the people who come in the category of the poor who are ill.

The Chairman: Who are out of the labour market?

Rev. Mr. Young: Yes, out of the labour market altogether. They would have to be the first priority because they just cannot do anything to help themselves.

The Chairman: Let us refine it a little bit. In that priority—the disadvantaged who are no longer in the labour market—we have the aged, the crippled, the blind and the maimed. What are your priorities there? We are getting short of money.

Rev. Mr. Young: The aged are getting some assistance now.

The Chairman: You know what the aged are getting; and the others are all getting some assistance as well now. All that assistance is inadequate, we will admit, but we have only so much money and we have to spread it around. Where do we go? What priorities could we set up, if we had to?

Rev. Mr. Gowland: I would say that one area, in addition to having money, would be to ensure that they had housing.

The Chairman: No, no. Don't misunderstand me. Look! I should like you people to understand our thinking. I believe the thinking of the committee, which is what we have to get across to people, is that if we go in for a guaranteed income period, then we are not going to tell somebody the kind of house he is going to live in or whatever he is going to do with the money he receives. Either he is a free man or he is not. If we decide to give a person $1,500 or $1,800, then he is on his own, except for the social services that he may need from the provincial government. So that we are not going to reach into the housing part of it. You don't expect the Government to reach out and say here is so much money, but because you don't know how to manage housing the Government is going to manage housing for you. If the Government did that, it would have done nothing for the man. It would have left him as poor as before except to put a few dollars in his pocket. We would be doing exactly what you are telling us not to do.

Rev. Gowland: Right.

The Chairman: Then keep that in mind.

Rev. Gowland: I failed to understand your question.

The Chairman: Now we have so much money to spread among these people, the disadvantaged, the poor, the old people, the blind, the crippled and others. If we have to choose priorities between these people, what is your idea of the priorities, or is there any priority among them?

Senator Inman: Mr. Chairman, if I might speak for a moment, if I had the choice I would say the chronically ill need nursing care and need to be looked after. Those who cannot look after themselves need to be looked after and still they might have years left to them. That would be my choice.

The Chairman: That is a contribution. We may have to get ourselves in a position where we look at the bill in front of us and say, "these are the priorities". I don't know what the committee will decide. I won't argue that point.

Let us speak for a moment on the work ethic, about which you people have been rather outspoken. You have sold to us for hundreds and hundreds of years the idea of the work ethic. Now, how do you go about unselling the idea? You have to, you know, because you started out by admitting that we have not got jobs for everybody, even if we wanted to. What are we going to do about the work ethic which is so embedded in the minds of all people? What are we going to do about it at this time?

Rev. Mr. Gowland: Senator Croll, I don't think there is too much of a conflict here. We have thought of work in terms of labour for which there is remuneration. There may not be that kind of activity or exercise, and there may come a time when that is not as available as it is at the present moment. However, there are other things that people can do. They can serve their fellow men, and they can serve their fellow men without remuneration. There are so many social services that can be rendered by people who are retired, and by rendering them they are kept busy and are able to lead a useful kind of life. They feel they are able to fulfill themselves by serving God and man. So, I think that work has a certain therapeutic value for us—most of us, I think, who work enjoy our work,—and if there is not work for pay then there are many other things that we are able to do. I do not think there is too much inconsistency.

The Chairman: But you have overlooked one thing. We are older people around here. We are looking at work as though it affected those who are 65 to 70 years of age. That is not our problem. We are prepared to pay that man. We do not care whether he works or not. We are now getting into the area of those who are 50 years of age. Is the Canadian public prepared to pay that man to do the kind of things you have defined as work? That is the question.

Rev. Mr. Gemmell: It is true that it is very facile to say that there is work to be done in terms of serving your fellow man, but if a man is poor, and if he is spending all his time trying to keep his family together, then he has not the time to worry about anything respecting his fellowmen. So, we have to raise our sights beyond the subsistence level of living. For one thing there is an educational job to be done. To say "education" is again very facile, but some things are being done that are very interesting, and we must try to find ways of involving more people. There is urban training such as the sending of people down into the inter city; taking all their security away from them and letting them go in there without a name, without a job, without an education, and without money, and just challenging them to live for so many days or weeks in that environment. This is a kind of sensitivity training which, if we could spread it a little wider, would be useful, I think, in helping our middle class parishoners to understand the plight of the poor.

The Chairman: But you are off the question. We have had, like an albatross around our necks, the work ethic, and we are as aware of it as anybody in the country. But, there is much evidence before us that the work ethic is not as tenable as it used to be, and you have said so too. We have to sell that to the Canadian people, because they are going to have to pay the people who are not working. This is not easy for them to swallow. How do you do it? How do we go about doing that sort of thing, if it is necessary to be done. First of all, is it necessary to be done? What have you to say to that?

Rev. Mr. Young: Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that in one way it may not be necessary to do it. Let us face the facts. There are not enough jobs. There will never be enough work for everybody to have a job. We have to live with this fact. Perhaps my statement was a little too facile when I said that we should simply tell them that there is not enough work to go around. However, there is another answer, and that is to examine the basis of the work ethic that we have held for generations. Is it based simply on the text that Senator Carter quoted, "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread..." This was man's attempt to evaluate his situation in the light of his experience with God, and he was doing so as a guilty person. He relates that things were not all they should be. Something had happened to the ideal situation as it had been originally, and this miserable thing of having to work and hoe weeds in his garden was all part of his faith. For generations we have gone along with this, putting the emphasis too much upon the thinking: Man is a sinner, and, therefore, he has to work. Perhaps we should now look at man as fulfilling his role before God and in other ways than simply by the sweat of his brow in relationship to his fellow man with, and his feeling of concern for, his fellow man. Perhaps he is working better in this role than in the role of a producer in society.

The Chairman: What you are saying, in effect, if I understand you correctly, Mr. Young, is that in the light of that he has to be provided for by the community? In doing that work he has to be provided for by the community?

Rev. Mr. Young: Yes, that is right.

The Chairman: Were you going to say something, Mr. Gemmell?

Rev. Mr. Gemmell: I think the original question could have added to it the fact that there is a two-pronged focus to the bible. It says, on the one hand, "In the sweat of thy face", but, on the other hand, it lays out specifically in the Old Testament how you care for your neighbour who is poor, who has no food, who has no house, and who is a stranger in your midst. It does not say that these are going to eat by the sweat of their brows. It says that this guy who is able to sweat is going to help this other guy stay alive.

The Chairman: What has happened is that Mr. Young and I have mixed the two testaments together, and have hopefully made something out of them.

Senator Fournier: You have made a new one.

Senator Pearson: Mr. Chairman, I think you have been expounding purely theoretical ideas. You are not working on anything real at all.

The Chairman: Very well, I think we were theoretical, but we had to follow through with the question that was asked about the work ethic. Are there any other questions that you noted down, that you wish to answer, Mr. Gowland?

Rev. Mr. Gowland: No, Mr. Chairman, I think that covers all of it.

Senator Fournier: My question will be about the minimum income, and I want to come back to my friend whom I mentioned some time ago who turned down a job paying $60 a week.

Poverty is general all over the world, and it revolves around the matter of employment. In India they are fighting poverty by requiring everybody to go to work. Women work for 14 cents a day, and men work for 27 cents a day. I do not advocate that we do that here, but the principle behind it is that of keeping every member of that vast population busy. To do a job that I could do in one day they would use 50 people and let them take a week to do it. It is to keep people busy, and that is the attitude all over the country. In Israel they are putting people into community groups. The results have been tremendous. The scheme has been very successful. Poverty has been eliminated, and there is no such thing as staying home and getting a handout.

It seems to me that here in Canada we overlook this point. I believe that technology has taken work away from a certain class. We do not look at that and we have been starting the policy back twenty years ago of handing out money, money, money. We have arrived at a population which, to my mind, makes me a little bit nervous. I am going to speak a little more largely because I am not in front of a group of people on welfare, but before clergymen who know the situation.

People are becoming a little bit nervous about what we have developed across the country. The attitude of the people is that the more you give them the more they want. The vice that is getting into these systems is how one can cheat and get anything they want from the Government. It seems to be an attitude that as long as it comes from the Government there is no arguing as to how you get it, it is your own, because it belongs to the Government. This is what I am coming to in my question. There is a lot of talk about minimum income and paying everyone below the national counsel poverty line which was around $4,000. Are we going to have a minimum and pay anyone who is below that line or are we going to ask to pay the receivers of this income to provide on their own what they can by working.

I will give you an example. There is a man who earns $60.00 a week. He turns a job down and goes and collects $80.00 a week. Should the minimum income insist that this fellow goes back on the $60.00 job and we pay the balance so that he will have enough to support his family or are we going to give him a free handout, a blank cheque of $3,000 or $4,000 as a certain level regardless of what he can earn on his own? What would be your opinion on that? Do I make myself clear on this point?

Reverend Mr. Gowland: I think that it would be far better if you let the man work for $60.00 a week and augment his income by $20.00 so that he could have a decent standard of living than to give him the whole amount without working. I think it would be good for the man.

The Chairman: In fairness, Senator Fournier, it must be said that no one in the committee has ever suggested that it be handed out without the requirement to work. If you take a look at President Nixon's present scheme, the work requirement is there along with the outlay.

Senator Fournier: I do not address my question to the committee, but the witness.

The Chairman: He agrees with us too.

Senator Fournier: I wanted the opinion of the witness. I do have another question.

The Chairman: We have time and this is your opportunity. You may not have the Presbyterian Church group before you again. Take advantage while they are here.

Senator Fournier: Sometimes we are critical of the welfare situation across the nation. There is something in the system which naturally will have to be corrected. I am going to give you two examples: there are two men, one, whose name is John, lives on one side of the street and the other, whose name is George, lives on the other side. Both of these men have the same education and the same size families. One of these men was a faithful worker throughout his life. He did not drink more than necessary and he saved all of his money and was able to provide a few dollars to educate his children. This is a model Canadian citizen who went all the way at a great cost. He made great sacrifice and reached the age of 65. The other fellow was a jolly old man. He drank as much as he could and went to all kinds of parties. He really enjoyed life but did not care much for his family. He was able to get everything he could and the best he could. They both arrive at the age of 65. The one man has got a zero record. He has nothing, not even a penny and no house. He is a public charge. The other fellow has a small home, two or three thousand dollars and had a miserable life. The lazy fellow goes to the welfare and receives a card which gives him free medical attention. He gets his teeth fixed and he will be buried as a public charge and may ride in a cadillac, possibly the first and the last. The door is wide open and there is no problem for him.

The man who worked all of his life does not receive anything at all. The welfare will check on his bank account and say he cannot receive anything because he has $3,000 in the bank. They will tell him to use that up and then they will help him. His widow has a small home but the welfare will tell her she cannot get anything because her husband left her this small home and that she will have to use up the money to raise her family and then they will help her.

I think this a most ridiculous and shameful situation which we Canadians have to live through. I know that you are not responsible for this. I am not all responsible for it, but as a member of the Senate I have to admit that I am part of the machinery which put this into effect and I feel very guilty about it. I hope that I live long enough so as to cure this terrible situation and try to bring some incentive into this group so that they will save a few dollars and not be punished at the age of 65. The first man who worked should have the same privilege as the one who did not so that he could use the little surplus which he worked hard to earn. He deserves it as a little privilege that the other fellow does not. After all, I think there is merit on everything we do and it can either be good or bad.

Reverend Mr. Gowland: My reply to this is that I do not think the man who spent all of this money got all that enjoyment out of life. I am inclined to feel that the other man got enjoyment by being able to have his own home and the feeling of independence. I would think that the man who squandered his money sacrificed more than the other. This is on the surface, but I suppose it is one of the injustices.

I suppose this is the reason that this special committee has been appointed. We cannot look at the needs of people from the point of view of whether they are worthy of help. I think we have to look at it from the point of view of the need of a person, such as the man who has not got any money and stands in need of help. He stands more in need of help than this other man. This may seem unfair but we have to deal with it in that way.

Senator Fournier: I do not object to you, but the point is we are putting a very severe punishment on the good man. He is being punished for saving money. The result is that he arrives at the age of 65, and has a little home with a few thousand dollars. He cannot have all the privileges as the one who is having a good time. Believe me, when you speak of fun in life it all depends on what is fun.

Reverend Mr. Gowland: Presbyterian fun.

Senator Pearson: I was talking to a chap Sunday who was a widower, and had two married daughters both of whom have left home. He still had his own home. He also had the old age pension which he lives on quite comfortably. He said that he could get by on that but the extra money helped to pay his taxes. The rest of the money he lived on quite easily. He was sitting in the hotel having a Sunday dinner and this small extra in life was his enjoyment.

The Chairman: Going to the restaurant to eat.

Senator Pearson: He eats at home, but on Sundays he goes down to the hotel and takes his meal.

The Chairman: Senator Fournier, just for the record, do not forget that that good man that you are talking about who worked hard, his widow will not be left helpless if we decide on a guaranteed income. At that age she is entitled to have a minimum income which somehow makes up for the taxes he had to pay to maintain this other fellow.

Senator Fournier: That is for the future.

The Chairman: You are quite right, for the future I hope.

Senator McGrand: I am still not satisfied to let this question drop about the harassment of the recipients, the welfare people, because this has been brought up so often. I think we should have some sort of an answer on it. When I asked about this it was mentioned that welfare people are recruited from the ranks of those who had studied in the social sciences. It was mentioned that welfare people were recruited from the ranks of those who had special skill in social science, you replied that churchmen were usually recruited from people who loved their neighbour and so on. That is what seemed to put us off the trail and I want to get back on it, because this is important. The woman who was on welfare and then went to work and lost her welfare because she went to work, surely that is not harassment on the part of the welfare officer, it is due to the incompetence of the system. What I want to get back at is this question of the welfare officer who thinks that he is a policeman, that he is handling drunken drivers or people who are speeding on the roads. I mean, that is the policeman approach. I doubt very much if most of the welfare officers have that attitude when they deal with these people. I have had a lot of personal experience over the years, dealing with this sort of thing.

Senator Fergusson also has had experience as an administrator of the old age pension fund in New Brunswick for a long time and I think whether it really does exist and whether you are in a position to say whether it does or not. I am speaking of the personal bullying type, the sort of bully who goes into a person's house and begins to order them around. Does that actually happen, or does it happen very often?

Rev. Mr. Zeidman: I believe it does happen on rare occasions.

Senator McGrand: On rare occasions.

Rev. Mr. Ziedman: But as so often happens, it is the rare occasions which are blown up and they are the occasions that get the headlines. In my work, I come in contact with a good number of welfare officers who are bound by this system, and I find they come to me because of the independent nature of my work, that I am not bound by a system, so I am able to give help immediately, before the home visit takes place. This officer would be very sympathetic to a particular family, but because of the rules and policy and so on, help cannot be given immediately. The sympathy is there, the concern is there, but they are bound by the system.

Senator McGrand: Bound by the system, that is what is wrong, it is the system that is wrong.

The Chairman: What happens is that the man cannot fight with the system, so he fights with the person whom he deals with, and he blames him. I think, doctor, you should make one distinction, and I think Rev. Mr. Young should make it, too. Are we talking about the trained social worker, or are you talking about the clerk charged with responsibility. For instance, in Hamilton, how many trained social workers have you in the department?

Rev. Mr. Young: I am not able to answer that question.

The Chairman: I can tell you this. I can give you the names of three large cities in Ontario, larger than 100,000 population, where they have not one social worker on the staff. We are talking about a social worker. A clerk is a different person.

Senator McGrand: I am talking about the social worker, the person who goes into a home. On the other hand, you have this person who comes into an office, where there is someone sitting behind a desk, just dealing with an entry in a book, and they do not know the story.

The Chairman: But, doctor, we are again talking about this—if you work for the Children's Aid Society or some of these groups, the social worker goes into the home. In matters of welfare, the social worker does not go into the home, somebody else goes into the home. What they are objecting to is particularly, in the case of the deserted wife, when at 11 o'clock at night somebody rushes in there to see if there is some man under the bed. That has happened hundreds of times. Or there is the case of some telephone call, as in this instance, the welfare department writes a letter saying "You are off relief, cut off, we understand you are working". That kind of harassment does grow out of proportion, it is taking place all the time. And that is what they are objecting to.

Senator McGrand: I want to know how common is it? I know it does happen but whether it is rare or whether it is quite common, that is the point. Because if it is too common, that is an evil.

Rev. Mr. Young: I have responded to this question before, with a "yes", that it does happen, and more often than I think it should.

Senator Inman: Then, again, sometimes I have known that the recipient is at fault—and they hate it.

Rev. Mr. Young: This is exactly what I was going to say. These people come into the job probably with high ideals, serving their fellow man, but they find that the system makes certain rules "Don't you dare give assistance to people who do not deserve it, you make jolly sure they deserve it before you give out our money". On the other hand you have people who are the recipients, who do all they can to trick the system, and get away with it, and boast about it if they do. And the person who is caught between these two things, something happens to him, he gets dehumanized, too.

I think we could share with the committee a couple of incidents which are very much on my conscience as a member of society, where the system has caused very great hardship.

There is the case of the mother of five children, deserted by her husband, who applies for welfare, and they say "Yes, but you must first charge your husband with non-support". So she goes to family court and she charges her husband with non-support. He gets word that he is charged. He comes into family court and makes one payment, and that takes him off the hook. She gets that one payment from family court, and when it is done and then when she has no money and she goes back to the welfare they tell her that she will have to charge her husband with non-support and then she says "Forget about it", and she works from 11 o'clock until 7 o'clock in the morning, supporting her five children, the oldest looking after the younger ones, and she says "I will not bother trying to get any welfare or trying to get any support".

There is another incident. This is a case of a Philippine nurse, unmarried, about to become an unmarried mother. She is told she should go to see the welfare people. There is one interview, it is some time before she gets a chance to talk to anyone at the office. The inspector would come to the home and interview her. This took place, and she was terrified, because being an immigrant she did not know whether even her visa was being questioned, and so on. Then she is told to come back on Wednesday at 10 o'clock for a final arrangement. She went on Wednesday at 10 o'clock, it now being three weeks from the delivery room, and she sat there from 10 o'clock until 2.30 p.m., crying, scared, upset.

The system is just inadequate to deal with those needs.

Senator McGrand: I agree with you on that, that the system is wrong.

Rev. Mr. Young: This is where the dehumanizing takes place—both on the part of the recipient and, on the other hand, the agency or the officer or the inspector.

The Chairman: We have had before us the story of the wife who, as a condition of receiving welfare, must charge her husband. We have not had the one of this poor girl who sat around all week, but we know it is so. And there has definitely been a complaint against welfare people unnecessarily going into the home. We have that complaint in Prince Edward Island.

Senator McGrand: You have it everywhere.

The Chairman: Yes, we have it everywhere. It is not just made up. Someone said that some member of the church was surprised that one of his people did not act well. That can happen, too. But so far as the welfare experience is concerned, we knew it exists and we just have to face up to it and try to make some correction if we can.

Now, have any of you gentlemen anything to add that you think would be helpful to the committee? Have you any suggestions you would care to make?

Rev. Mr. Gowland: Not beyond this, Mr. Chairman, that we have no delusions as to the scope of the problem. It is a big problem and the solution to it is not going to be easy. I am convinced of that. I think our whole Board of Evangelism for Social Action feels as I do in that respect. This is a situation we must come to grips with. If we have the will to do it, Canada can meet and eliminate the problem of poverty. We have to have that confidence.

The Chairman: There is no escaping the fact that if a recommendation is made to have a guaranteed income and that recommendation is acted upon, that will be a break with yesterday and something new for the future; but it will cost money. There will be taxes at all levels. What is your opinion with respect to how the Canadian people will accept that in view of what you have said about your congregation, Mr. Gowland, which is typical of all congregations?

Rev. Mr. Gowland: Mr. Chairman, I can give you a case in point. Our board has study committees. One of our study committees brought a recommendation to our annual meeting a year ago, suggesting that as members of the Presbyterian Church in Canada we should be prepared to accept higher taxes in order to make this possible. I was surprised as you will be surprised to hear that that recommendation was deleted from our report to the Assembly. So this is part of the attitude, and it is part of the problem: "Oh, yes, we want this so long as it does not cost us anything." But this is why we feel education is so important for the people in the church and in the nation. We have to make it clear that the problem is not all with the poor; it is with society as well and it is going to cost us something if we are going to achieve the proper solution.

Senator Pearson: You have to sell the whole program to the public, and that is a big job. It is not going to be simple. Perhaps we could sell the White Paper at the same time.

The Chairman: If there are no more questions, let me say, gentlemen, that your contribution this morning is, if I may put it this way, worthy of "hell raisers" against injustice.

The members of the committee are very thankful for this conversation we have had and for the opportunity to "pick your brains" and discuss matters with you. It is most helpful to us. I know you appreciate the fact that you were asked some pertinent and important questions. You did very well in answering them. On behalf of the committee I give you my heartfelt thanks.

Rev. Mr. Gowland: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Rev. Mr. Campbell: Mr. Chairman, we should like to thank the committee for inviting us here, as our secretary has said. We trust that on any future occasion you desire we may be called upon for any ideas we may have. We will be only too pleased to come again.

The Chairman: Thank you very much. The committee adjourned.

A Brief

To the Special Committee of the Senate on Poverty

from the Board of Evangelism and Social Action

The Presbyterian Church in Canada
50 Wynford Drive, Don Mills, Ontario
Phone—416-429-0110.

I. Introduction.

I. 1. The Board of Evangelism and Social Action of the Presbyterian Church in Canada is responsible for promoting the two concerns of evangelism and social action among the members of our denomination across Canada. One of the tasks committed to the Board is the study of issues of public concern, to consider what the Bible and Christian theology have to say to these matters, and to recommend to the membership of our church the stand that should be taken, the witness that should be made and the action that should be carried out. The Board can only "recommend"; it cannot bind the conscience of the church's membership. It can give the benefit of its thinking to our people; it is not "the voice of the church".

I. 2. The General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in Canada is our highest "court". Among its numerous functions is that of speaking on behalf of the church. Thus its statements are more authoritative than those of a Board and can fairly be regarded as reflecting the views of the Presbyterian Church in Canada.

I. 3. This brief contains statements and resolutions both from the Board of Evangelism and Social Action and from the General Assembly, and we shall endeavour at all times to indicate which is which. In most cases the General Assembly statements originated from recommendations by the Board.

II. Witnesses

The persons who will appear to support this brief are:—Rev. Arthur J. Gowland, M.A., Secretary of the Board of Evangelism and Social Action, 50 Wynford Drive, Don Mills, Ontario. Mr. Gowland is a full-time national staff person. His involvement in the question of poverty has included attendance at the World Conference on Church and Society in Geneva (1966), the Canadian Conference on Christian Conscience and Poverty (1968). He is a founding member of the National Committee on the Church and Industrial Society and the Coalition for Development.

Rev. Alexander K. Campbell, B.A., is chairman of the Board of Evangelism and Social Action and pastor of St. Andrew's Presbyterian Church, Thorold, Ontario.

Rev. Thomas Gemmell, B.A., B.D., is pastor of St. Luke's Presbyterian Church, Oshawa, Ontario, and a member of the Board's Committee on Economic and Social Justice which had chief responsibility for the preparation of the Brief. He recently represented the Board at the founding meeting of the Canadian Coalition for Development.

Rev. W. L. Young, B.A., B.D., pastor of St. Andrew's Presbyterian Church, Hamilton, Ontario, is involved with his congregation in several creative programmes in housing and the war on poverty in Hamilton. He is the past chairman of this Board.

Rev. Alexander Zeidman, B.A., B.D., M.Th., is Superintendent of Scott Mission, 502 Spadina Avenue, Toronto, Ontario, who by the nature of his work is deeply involved with the poor.

III. Summary of Recommendations

III. 1. An improved welfare system to provide necessary levels of support while avoiding the stigma and dehumanizing effects of present welfare shemes.

III. 2. An educational programme aimed at public attitudes toward the poor.

III. 3. Commendation for the government's attack on inflation, and support of a capital gains tax.

IV. The Concern of the Presbyterian Church in Canada

IV. 1. In a country of increasing affluence, there are vivid contrasts between the lot of those who have and those who have not. As Christians, we recognize that we are called by God, to serve all men in the knowledge and love of Jesus Christ our Lord. Our concern goes beyond the spiritual. We recognize that we must be concerned with the quality of life of all men. We realize that there are minimum real requirements to live a qualitatively good life. Every living person needs adequate food, shelter, clothing, health, education and recreation.

IV. 2. The church's interest in the problem of poverty stems both from a Biblical imperative and by our historical involvement in the concerns of the poor. We believe that wrong attitudes towards him can deepen a poor man's poverty and engender in him wrong attitudes toward himself and with a consequent impoverishment of spirit. This psychology of poverty is combatted not only by the injection of material resources, but by the education of the community.

IV. 3. It may interest the honourable Senators to know that, as a result of our studies in the preparation of this brief, as well as in the continuing deliberations of the Board of Evangelism and Social Action of the Presbyterian Church in Canada, we have made several recommendations directed to our membership regarding the problem of poverty and these are quoted in the appendix. Our highest court, the General Assembly, has recommended that the financial, physical and personnel resources of the Church be used in programmes of assisting the poor and the underprivileged. The Board of Evangelism and Social Action will recommend to the forthcoming General Assembly that local congregations, particularly those in depressed areas, consider participation in government programmes, or initiate programmes to combat poverty and make their premises available. We shall recommend that landlords, employers, union leaders be cognizant of their duties as Christians, and the rights of their fellow citizens. We shall urge our membership to endeavour to understand and have empathy with the poor and assist them to solve their problems where possible.

IV. 4. Our Board believes that an approach to the problem of poverty must be made from two directions:—income and education. We favour a structure of income support as outlined in the appendix. We do not believe that the fear of starvation is the only reason why men work. While, undoubtedly, the provision of a guaranteed income will provide the loss of incentive to some, we feel that for the majority of Canadian citizens it will remove the threat of the Damoclean sword of unemployment and of seasonal or cyclic unemployment which threatens so many of our wage-earners. Indeed, the provision of a guaranteed annual income would provide for many the opportunity to demonstrate that their employment is a true vocation, or to undertake their vocation in an area which, otherwise, might not be economically feasible.

We do not believe that "anyone who really wants to can find a job". Lack of training, education or opportunity and regional economic problems make this a myth. We recognize too that in spite of the best efforts of many of the people involved, the present system of supplement or welfare very frequently carries with it a certain stigma which engenders a feeling of humiliation or lack of self respect in the person requiring such assistance. Provision of a guaranteed annual income, or negative income tax, concurrent with the education of citizens as to their right to share in this equitable distribution of resources, would do much to restore the dignity of all of our citizens. Some of us in our work still come across old age pensioners who have refused to apply for their pension in the mistaken belief that they would be giving up some of their freedom and independence to do so. The Senators will be well acquainted with the many myths, mistaken attitudes and misconceptions concerning the poor. This too is a fit subject for the education of all Canadians so that there might be an understanding of our needs and particularly the needs of those of our fellow citizens who, for one reason or another, are looked upon as being poor. We recognize that in this period of rising inflation there is a necessity for restraint in all sectors of the economy. We have noticed how the poor, and particularly those on fixed incomes, suffer in such a time.

IV. 5. Several recommendations on a structure of income support were adopted by the Board of Evangelism and Social Action at its recent annual meeting, and they appear in the appendix. The authors of this brief would make two additional recommendations:—

1. That a programme of education be mounted to avoid a condescending and sneering attitude towards the poor, e.g. radio and TV programming, special releases by the National Film Board, the Queen's Printer, etc. that the situation as to the varying qualities of life existing in Canada be publicized so that the concern of all might be aroused.

2. That the government of Canada be commended for its policy of restraining the process of inflation because of the obvious benefit for the poor on fixed incomes. Further to this end, we support the idea of a capital gains tax as a measure of controlling inflation.

Respectfully submitted for the Board of Evangelism and Social Action.

APPENDIX 1

Recommendation adopted by the Annual Meeting of the Board of Evangelism and Social Action, March 10-13, 1970 Re: A Guaranteed Annual Income:

1. "That the Ministers of the Crown responsible for welfare be commended for seeking improvement in the Canadian welfare system, and that they be urged to base any changes on principles which include the following:—

(a) "The method, whether by means of the Guaranteed Annual Income, or some other, have for its objective giving people necessary support without the dehumanizing effect and the stigma associated with 'welfare' as at present understood;

(b) "The level of support should be adequate, perhaps necessitating an increase in the minimum wage, and it should include opportunity for self-improvement so that people might be encouraged to increase the degree of their self-reliance and humanity through training, and part or full-time work without penalty;

(c) "The scheme should be integrated with health departments in ways which would help the emotionally disturbed and mentally incompetent and those otherwise unemployable because of life peculiarities."

APPENDIX 2

Excerpts from a statement on poverty presented to the 1967 General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in Canada by the Board of Evangelism and Social Action:

"Canada is acclaimed everywhere as one of the affluent nations of the world yet research by governmental and voluntary agencies reveals that in the very midst of our affluence there is widespread poverty ranging from privation to outright destitution. On the basis of the Census definition of 'family', in 1961 23 per cent of Canadian families had an income of less than $3,000.00 with many of this group receiving less than $2,000.00. However, in spite of this widespread need, the public is not generally aware of the plight of the poor.

"Poverty is much more than being short of money. The Scriptures depict poverty as a state of deprivation that results in people being bowed down and afflicted. It is an insidious thing that not only causes suffering but also robs people of the opportunity for personal fulfilment and of making effective use of their lives in the service of God and Man. In other words, poverty is an unmitigated evil. Robert Burns speaks thus of poverty: 'thou half-sister of vice, thou cousin-germaine of hell, when shall I find force of exorcism equal to the amplitude of thy demerits?'

"The poor are robbed of freedom by being forced to live in sub-standard housing. This in turn is an additional threat to the marriage relationship, and is a veritable breeding ground for juvenile delinquency.

"In a day when education is essential if young people are to be able to compete in the labour market, poverty deprives them of both the possibility and incentive to take advantage of educational opportunities.

"Higher income groups receive better health care than low income groups, although the low income groups have greater health problems and their illnesses tend to be more severe.

"Poverty results in less participation in community affairs. Poor people not only have very little say in the decisions which affect their lives, but also the community is robbed of the contribution that this group of people should be able to make.

"One of the most serious effects of poverty is the attitude of the 'well-to-do' to the poor people of the community. There are those who blame the poor people for their condition. They believe that anyone can succeed if he wants to, so they tend to think of the poor as lazy, shiftless and undeserving. In fact, by way of justifying their attitude to the poor, they give the impression that God is the God of the 'well-to-do'. This attitude leads to a feeling of inferiority on the part of the poor and also an alienation from the society which rejects them.

"While in no way seeking to minimize the need for individual initiative and the necessity of doing all within one's power to help oneself, and while recognizing that the poverty of some people is their own fault, the Scriptures speak of a God who loves poor people as well as others, and who is genuinely concerned about their plight. Though poverty may be the result of the sin of the poor, the scriptures are more inclined to attribute it to the sin of society. They suggest that their plight is due to the greed of the rich (Amos 8:6) to the low wages paid by employers (James 5: 1-4), and the lack of genuine concern on the part of all of us for the total welfare of the people of our communities and the world (St. Matthew 25: 31-46).

"God's love and concern for the needy should be a constant reminder and challenge to His Church to join him in His concern and action on behalf of the poor in Canada and the world. This concern will of necessity express itself in demanding adequate financial assistance for the poor, but it will also mean identifying ourselves with them, getting alongside them, working with them to the end that they may assume their rightful place in society, and come to know God and the fullness of the blessing of the Gospel of Christ."

Recommendation adopted by the 1967 General Assembly, Re: Poverty

"That the General Assembly alert Sessions and Congregations to the insidious effects of poverty in Canada today, and urge them to do all within their power at the congregational, community, provincial and national levels to eradicate this evil that is blighting the lives of so many individuals and families; is robbing them of the opportunity and possibility of fulfilment; and of making effective use of their lives and gifts in the service of God and Man."

APPENDIX 3

Recommendations adopted by the 1968 General Assembly, Re: Poverty

1. "That the Assembly commend to all kirk sessions and congregations for study, the material of the Montreal Conference on Poverty.

2. "That the General Assembly urge sessions and congregations to assist in an unabating struggle to end poverty:—

(a) "By being the catalysts that bring together other groups, agencies and concerned people to discuss means and ways of improving the lot of the poor, and enabling them to enter into their rightful heritage as citizens of Canada.

(b) "By getting to know and identifying with "disadvantaged" persons and families in their communities, and supporting them in their desire to have a voice in determining their own destinies.

"That the Board of Evangelism and Social Action and the Administrative Council be requested and authorized to study the findings of the Montreal Conference on Church and Society so far as these call for re-examination of our National Priorities and Policies.

APPENDIX 4

Recommendations adopted by the 1969 General Assembly, Re: Poverty

1. "That the General Assembly call the courts and congregations of our church to take more seriously the social implications of the Gospel, and alert them to the fact that poverty is not only a great destroyer of human rights, but also one of the greatest problems and causes of tension in Canada and the world today.

2. "That sessions and congregations be urged to undertake a study and to co-operate in ecumenical studies of the needs of their own communities with a view to providing a forum in the community for the free discussion of the issues of poverty.

3. "That Presbyteries and congregations encourage the erection of multi-functional buildings and emphasize the need for buildings to serve the mission of the Church and the needs of the community.

4. "That congregations, emphasizing the primacy of worship, be encouraged to make their buildings available to serve other community needs, where not doing so.

5. "That in Presbyteries where two or more congregations have amalgamated and church buildings and properties have been sold, the General Assembly urge Presbyteries to encourage congregations to use some of the money and/or the land that is made available for the care and housing of Senior citizens.

6. "That the General Assembly commend the government of Canada for their avowed aim of making 1 per cent of the gross national product available for economic assistance to poor and underdeveloped countries, and urge them to increase our contribution in this field to 1 per cent as soon as possible."

APPENDIX 5

Recommendations adopted by the 1968 General Assembly Re: Housing

1. "That the General Assembly express to the Government of Canada and the Provincial Governments of Canada its concern about the housing situation in Canada and state its conviction that—

(a) "The future needs for housing in Canada can no longer be fully supplied by private industry and that there is a need for public housing and co-operative housing in addition to what is supplied by the private sector;

(b) "That there is great need for a co-ordination of (not to say interference in) the many segments in the economy which are involved in housing.

SUMMARY AND CONCLUSIONSI. GUARANTEED INCOME - THE ANSWER TO POVERTY?

"Guaranteed Income" nowadays is brandished as the magic wand which will erase poverty in our time.

A. Why This Intense Interest?

1. The popular view is that it is "to transform the welfare system which is frozen in failure and frustration."
(President Richard Nixon)
2. A more basic reason for the support of the guaranteed income concept by all political parties is our changing technology and changing labour needs. Private industry no longer needs the pool of low-skilled labour which once provided an important cushion for the ups and downs of the labour market.

B. Is A Guaranteed Income Plan the Answer to Poverty?

1. An analysis of proposed schemes shows that they all consider four goals:
 - a) to provide an adequate minimum level of benefit to all people;
 - b) to aim benefits directly to those below the poverty level;
 - c) to include a "work incentive";
 - d) to maintain costs at a tolerable level to the taxpayer.
2. Major problems arise in any of the proposed plans:
 - a) it is impossible to meet all four goals. For instance, if the guaranteed income is set at an adequate level, there is no "work incentive".
 - b) Guaranteed income programs are directed at the "employable": but it is incredibly difficult, if not impossible, to categorize persons as "employable" or "unemployable". Also, a duplicate administration of income maintenance for "unemployables" would be necessary.
 - c) In practice, any guaranteed income program would have as many rules and regulations and be as complex to administer as a simplified welfare system.

TO EXTOL A GUARANTEED INCOME PLAN AS A SIMPLE SOLUTION TO THE PROBLEM OF POVERTY IS THEREFORE BOTH UNWARRANTED AND UNWISE. No one denies the need for major reform in present social policies. But before pressing for a simple panacea, present income maintenance programs - which in fact guarantee income to special groups - must first be considered.

II. A LOOK AT PRESENT INCOME MAINTENANCE PROGRAMS

A review of six major programs points to basic reforms which would eliminate waste and inequities. Some examples of present anomalies:

- a) In British Columbia, as of April 1, 1970, a widow aged 65 can receive $150 monthly - but up to that age her monthly income is $95, including the rental supplement.
- b) A veteran may be forced to accept an income lower than that payable to a non-veteran.
- c) A person may have to undergo three "means tests", administered by different personnel, all requiring documentation and personal interviews, before receiving maximum benefit.
- d) The steadily employed worker bears the burden of benefits paid by Unemployment Insurance - including payments to seasonal workers who may have much higher annual incomes.
- e) Benefits and methods to determine needs range wildly between programs - even though they are all publicly funded.

Principles can be set out that would resolve these anomalies, and direct resources to a concerted attack on poverty:

1. ESTABLISH A COMPARABLE LEVEL OF BENEFITS FOR ALL INCOME MAINTENANCE SYSTEMS.
2. SET BENEFITS AT A LEVEL WHICH PERMITS A REASONABLY NORMAL AND HEALTHY EXISTENCE, WITH DUE REGARD TO REGIONAL DIFFERENCES IN COST OF LIVING AND INDIVIDUAL REQUIREMENTS.
3. ELIMINATE LEAKAGE OF BENEFITS TO THE HIGHER INCOME GROUPS BY TAXING BACK.
4. REFORM COMPULSORY INSURANCE SCHEMES TO ENSURE THEY ARE NOT A FORM OF INEQUITABLE TAXATION - ESPECIALLY THE CANADA PENSION PLAN AND UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE, WHERE THE FINANCIAL BURDEN FALLS MOST HEAVILY ON LOWER INCOME GROUPS.
5. SEPARATE THE FUNCTIONS OF INCOME MAINTENANCE FROM PROVISION OF SOCIAL SERVICES.
6. SIMPLIFY ELIGIBILITY PROCEDURES AND MODERNIZE METHODS OF DETECTING FRAUD.
7. DISCARD THE CONCEPT OF UNEMPLOYABILITY AS PRACTICALLY AND MORALLY INDEFENSIBLE.

The elimination of poverty will be more rapidly attained if jurisdictional conflicts between different levels of government, particularly with respect to financing arrangements, can be resolved.

III. WORK INCENTIVE - OR WORK OPPORTUNITIES?

The suggested reform of income maintenance programs begs one question. If benefits for the unemployed are set at adequate levels, what of the 'work incentive'? Will the result be to create a nation of loafers? And with increasing automation, should we stress the need for work - or train for leisure?

- A. Several factors suggest that "man cannot live by bread alone", that opportunity for constructive work should be our primary goal.
 1. People want and need to work. They develop their identity, their meaning in life, through working in an occupation. Contrary to popular belief, mounting evidence shows that when job opportunities with adequate incomes are available, even the "hard-core unemployed" choose to work rather than loaf.
 2. The loss to our economy of our unused human resources is estimated by the Canadian Economic Council to be two to four billion dollars yearly.
 3. Automation is not synonymous with work obsolescence. Many sectors of the economy, particularly the service industries, require additional manpower.

B. How Can Work Opportunities be Increased?

1. DRASTIC REORIENTATION OF CANADA MANPOWER POLICIES. Present focus is on meeting the needs of employers - needs which are more and more met by private employment agencies. Manpower should concentrate on training and placing the pool of unemployed and underemployed. Training grants should be aimed at providing equal access to opportunity for all, regardless of income. The present "trickle-down" theory of training those now in the labour force is only effective in a closed society. Long-range projection of manpower requirements for the future, and training programs to match human resources to them, are imperative.
2. A VIGOROUS POLICY OF JOB DEVELOPMENT. The Regional Development Incentive Act is a measure using tax concessions and other incentives to increase the aggregate demand for labour in certain slow-growth areas. Such measures should be expanded, but further refinement is necessary. Policies should be designed around people, not places; i.e. concessions to those industries which can best provide jobs for the supply of potential employees.

IV. SOME CONCLUDING OBSERVATIONS

It is abundantly clear that the under-utilization of human resources in Canada at the present time results in a tremendous loss to the Canadian economy and its citizens.

The extent of poverty and the lack of employment opportunities are related to society's inability to simultaneously meet four basic economic goals: full employment, a high rate of economic growth, reasonable price stability, and an equitable distribution of rising incomes.

A satisfactory high rate of employment is brought about primarily through fiscal and monetary policies; changes in the tempo of economic activity are controlled through changes in government expenditure, taxation and interest rates. In the last few years, we have enjoyed a relatively low rate of unemployment, and inflation has replaced unemployment as the chief ill to which our economy is prone. In our attempts to control inflation, we have reverted to the traditional technique of reducing aggregate demand by creating unemployment. Other techniques should be examined.

One of the factors that contributes to inflation as an economy approaches full employment is the fact that the supply of labour does not provide the proper mixture of skills and experience to meet demand. This in return results in "bottlenecks", where particular skills are in short supply; employers then bid up the price for labour. Wage increases in any one sector tend to be telegraphed through the whole labour force, and an inflationary spiral is created.

Anticipating the demand for labour, and training the unemployed appropriately, can therefore reduce the pressure upon prices of increased economic activity. In addition, this strategy would reduce the tremendous loss to the Canadian economy and its citizens now caused by under-utilization of our human resources.

So complex are the factors involved in gauging the trade-off between unemployment and inflation that to predict the exact effect of any economic or fiscal policy is hazardous at best. This is why it is imperative to reform our present programs of income maintenance, and job placement and job development. For to enact fiscal policies which push a man out of a job and into poverty can only be considered a monstrous social injustice.

CHAPTER IGUARANTEED INCOME - THE ANSWER TO POVERTY?Introduction

During the past few years, politicians of all parties have promoted plans for a "guaranteed income" to solve the glaring problem of poverty in Canada. What are the reasons behind this sudden and intense interest?

The most common reason given is the failure of the present welfare system which is accused of "fostering dependency, perpetuating poverty, and strangling in its own red tape". Evidence cited includes rising welfare rolls. One out of eight residents of New York City now receives public assistance. In British Columbia, the number of individuals and families receiving social assistance has nearly doubled in the past eight years (from 19,503 in 1960 to 38,561 in 1968). In addition, evidence is mounting that families tend to remain "on relief" through three and four generations.

Undoubtedly, public welfare workers have oversold their ability to rehabilitate the poor, to help them back into the economic mainstream. The plea "only give us more staff and we will do the job" appears not proved out in practice. A major experimental project conducted by United Community Services in Greater Vancouver 1965-1969, showed no significant decrease in economic dependence in a group of "hard core" families as a result of intensive counselling services. (1)

A more basic reason for the present "in" status of guaranteed income is the dawning recognition of changing labour needs in North America. Until recently, a "frontier" ethic pervaded all segments of our society, a conviction that anyone who wanted to work could find a job, and that public funds should only support the widow, the orphan and the handicapped. This attitude is still held by many people. Its effect on policies will be discussed in a later chapter.

Looking back in history, we can now feel sympathy for the hapless able-bodied poor of the 17th century, caught in a technological revolution which threw them, unprepared, from farmer's field to urban slagheap. We have little sympathy, however, for today's technological outcast; we label him "deadbeat" or "freeloader" and devise ingenious means of humiliation to deter him from fattening on the public purse.

The fact that support for a guaranteed income cuts across the full spectrum of ideologies regarding the work ethic reflects a growing awareness of changing labour needs in our society.

"For decades, relief programs had the function of maintaining a pool of low-skilled labour at subsistence levels low enough to make low-paying jobs in private industry attractive. This surplus of cheap labour provided an important cushion for the ups and downs of the labour market. Recently public assistance has fulfilled the same function for public and other non-profit institutions, also providing a buffer against the inroads of organized labour in these fields

But recent technological changes are making cheap, mass labour a thing of the past. Thus, public assistance is losing one of its central functions. As it becomes dysfunctional to goad the poor into competing for jobs in the regular economy, the notion of an automatic benefit system unrelated to work - the guaranteed minimum income - emerges." (2)

A Look at Guaranteed Income Plans

Popularly, guaranteed minimum income plans and negative income tax schemes are considered to be dramatic departures from present practice. Although the schemes vary in detail, they involve consideration of exactly the same variables:

1. The minimum income that every individual or family shall receive, related to family size.
2. The point at which the regular income tax shall apply.
3. The relationship between earned or independent income and the income paid from public funds (hereafter called an 'income transfer').
4. The income tax rate required to finance the scheme.

The essential ingredients of the current plans are illustrated in the graph and table below. In this example, the minimum adequate income (3) for a family of four has been assumed to be $3,500 (A). The guaranteed annual income is established at $1,750 (B). The negative tax rate between the guaranteed income and the minimum adequate income is 50 per cent. The plan, in other words, guarantees an income of $1,750 but reduces this amount by 50 per cent of each dollar earned up to a total income of $3,500. For example, under such a scheme, a family earning $1,000 per year would keep all their earned income and in addition would receive a negative tax payment of $1,250 for a total income of $2,250. Similarly, if earnings are $2,000, the negative tax payment would be $750.

The amount of guaranteed income payable with different rates of earnings, under the same fifty per cent plan, is shown in the following table.

positive taxation begins

Obviously, an infinite number of schemes can be developed by changing the magnitude of the basic variables. Each scheme involves consideration of four major criteria:

1. The provision of an adequate minimum level of benefit to all people.
2. The reduction or elimination of the "leakage" or benefits to people above the poverty line, i.e. income transfer should not benefit those in higher income groups.
3. The provision of adequate incentives to encourage people to work.
4. The maintenance of overall cost to the taxpayer at a tolerable level.

For example, some proposals for guaranteed annual income would guarantee the family of four referred to above an income of $3,500 annually. In this case no leakage occurs, and it is conceivable that the burden on the general taxpayer would not be too great, but there is no work incentive. For each dollar earned, the income transfer would be reduced by an identical amount up to the income guarantee - as in the present much vilified welfare system.

By testing proposals against these four criteria, it will be clear that there is no ideal solution. What is involved is a series of "trade-offs", and decision on a compromise position.

Problems!

Given that a compromise scheme is designed, what basic problems would still exist?

The problem of defining what constitutes an adequate income is certainly not eliminated. While size of the family is considered in most programs, the age-sex structure is not. This can change the adequacy level by a significant amount; for example, in the case of a four-person household, food costs based on the provincial Low Cost Food Plan can vary from $99 to $165 per month. There are also unique requirements, such as special diets.

How are regional discrepancies to be handled? Again using food costs, these can vary as much as thirty per cent, and housing costs differ dramatically within British Columbia. Can the assessment of unique individual requirements and of regional differences in cost be totally eliminated and rates based upon an assumed average need?

A continuous problem is that of adjusting the adequacy level over time. Since poverty is defined relative to the norm, should changes over time be related to the cost of living or to changes in median income? If a cost of living adjustment is used, such a program will fail to redistribute even a portion of our growing affluence in "real" terms.

A major problem arises if, in order to provide work incentive, the guaranteed income rate is set below the poverty level. A separate system of maintenance is then necessary for those who cannot work. And when it comes to deciding who is employable and who unemployable, Pandora's box opens with a bang. Is a deaf person unemployable? He might well be categorized as such; yet an aggressive placement officer with the Western Institute for the Deaf in 1968 placed 126 deaf persons in employment. Is a deserted mother with three children employable? Society would not expect her to work; yet given a job and social utilities such as day care, she may be a happier and more productive member of the community.

On the other hand, a senior Vancouver public welfare administrator states that "an able-bodied man 40 years of age, with a grade XII education but with no specialized skills, can look forward to chronic unemployment"; can this man be considered employable? To classify individuals as 'employable' or 'unemployable' according to categories is incredibly difficult if not impossible.

For those who are deemed employable in any proposed guaranteed income plan, another problem arises - the fact that the incentive to work decreases as the size of the family increases. In 1966, a family of four living on the average wage of a full-time employee in a service industry, would have been better off on social allowance. Earnings are determined in the market place without regard to the need of the family. Therefore, as the family size increases, there are fewer and fewer employment opportunities which will provide an income above the poverty level. It follows that as the size of the family increases, the work incentive becomes less relevant.

A negative tax scheme to provide guaranteed income must face other complex problems. Eligibility under any plan must consider the net assets of the individual family. Any scheme based upon income declared for tax purposes which ignores net assets could result in income transfers to persons for whom the program was not designed. Some procedure must be provided to control such abuses. Yet the creation of these rules and regulations destroys the simplicity of a negative income tax scheme - and simplicity has been stressed as one of the most attractive features of the proposed plans.

Consideration of eligibility procedures raises another serious practical problem. Generally, the benefit schedule of any of the current proposals has been stated in terms of annual income. Quite obviously this is not a suitable time frame within which to retrospectively transfer income required for subsistence. What is required is a monthly benefit payment based upon current income. If, for example, a family earns $600 per month for the first six months of the year, has no assets and no income in the seventh month, some provision will have to be made for their continued existence.

When the points raised above have been taken into consideration, a guaranteed income program in practice would be as complex to administer as the present welfare system. Proof of this is contained in a review of the rules and regulations developed by the New Jersey experiment in guaranteed income. (Appendix A)

No one seriously questions the need for reform in our present welfare system. But to extol a guaranteed income plan as a simple solution is both unwarranted and unwise. The problem is complex, and "welfare" represents only twenty five per cent of the income transfers which must be taken into account. A critical look at all major income maintenance systems is called for.

CHAPTER IIINCOME MAINTENANCE PROGRAMS

An indication of the legislative complexity of existing income maintenance is shown by the list of assistance programs prepared by the Senate Committee on Poverty. (Appendix B) This contains fifty federal-provincial programs - it does not include programs solely provincially financed such as, for example, Workmen's Compensation. This chapter will concern itself with a brief examination of income payments, the benefits, and the eligibility criteria of six of the major programs. The payments to individuals of these are presented in Table I.

Selected Income Maintenance Programs1. Family and Youth Allowances

Family and Youth Allowances are universal grants, payable in respect of each child resident in Canada. Benefits are $6.00 to the age of 10, $8.00 to age 16, and $10.00 youth allowance to age 18 if attending school.

In fact, these allowances are "guaranteed income" to all families with dependent children. Under any system other than specific allowances for dependent children, large families are at a disadvantage, since the private market does not take family size into account in determining the level of wages. The fact that a family of five must exist on virtually the same earnings as a single person is a major element of poverty.

How do family allowances measure up against the four criteria of guaranteed income plans discussed in Chapter I? Firstly, they do not provide a disincentive to work. However, whilst at present the overall cost to the taxpayer may be considered at a tolerable level, the amounts paid to families are too low to effect an adequate minimum level of benefit; and, of course, as is common with universal programs, there is a high leakage to families above the poverty line.

What the results in dollars would be of redistributing the allowances so that families below the poverty level received a greater share of the monies, can only be hinted at in this paper.⁽¹⁾ If, for the sake of argument, in British Columbia the family and youth allowances received by families above a level of, say, $6,000 annual income were reallocated to families below a level of $3,000 per annum, the child allowance would increase from a present crude monthly average of $6.91 per child to one of $15.97 per child for the lower income group, at no extra cost to the taxpayer. This calculation is of course a gross oversimplification. However, the rationale of taxing back benefits from those not in need and increasing payments to the poor is perfectly valid and demands serious attention. (See Appendix C)

2. Old Age Security

Like Family Allowances, Old Age Security is universal - there is no means test. It provides a guaranteed income to a specific section of the population in the same way that family allowances do; the major disadvantage of the Old Age Security program (again as measured against the criteria set out for guaranteed income), are that i) the benefits (now $79.58) are below an adequate minimum; and ii) the leakage of benefits to people above the poverty line is high. (An estimate of the magnitude of the leakage is provided by the fact that some 50.2 per cent of old age pensioners in British Columbia were not in receipt of the Guaranteed Income Supplement in 1968) (2)

The federal Guaranteed Income Supplement - an additional amount up to $31.83 per month - remedies to a large extent the deficiencies outlined above. It is sent on completion of a mailed application showing that annual income in addition to Old Age Security does not exceed $768.00. Although this constitutes a 'means test', it is extremely simple - no verification of applicants' statements, no case histories, no home visits for periodic review, no translation of assets to income. However, with the exception of a small group of non-earners, the Guaranteed Income Supplement program will be eliminated by 1976 and replaced by the contributory Canada Pension Plan. Provincially, a Supplementary Social Allowance (of up to $38.59), which basically provides for regional cost differences, requires a home visit to establish eligibility. This includes verification of bank accounts and rent receipts.

3. Unemployment Insurance

This income maintenance program, paid to certain numbers of the unemployed, is based on contributions by employer and employee, but is subsidized by the federal government as required. Benefits range from $13.00 per week for a single person who previously earned up to $30.00, to $53.00 for a married man with one or more dependents, previously earning $100 or over. One week's benefit is paid for each two weeks of employment, up to a maximum of a year.

Since unemployment insurance payments are based on contributions, they are - in times of normal economic activity - self supporting, and hence overall cost to the taxpayer is at a minimum. The length of benefit is related to length of employment, and the unemployed person is required to register with Manpower and accept employment offered him; there is, therefore, in theory at least, no disincentive to work. In the absence of a high demand for labour and of an aggressive job placement program, it is of course easily possible to "fiddle the system". Two sorts of abuse can be identified: Firstly, there are those which constitute fraud; for example, the failure of some claimants to disclose earnings during weeks of partial unemployment. Secondly, there are those who may be said to 'misuse' the system. For example, these include the married women or retired persons drawing benefits but who in fact are not seeking employment; and the seasonal workers who draw benefits during 'off-season' irrespective of annual income. In addition, there is the very narrow view taken by claimants and the administration as to the types of employment that constitute 'suitable employment' in any individual case. Whether an out of work farm-hand in urban society is eligible for unemployment benefit is, at best, questionable. (3)

While a computerized system has been devised to bring to light those most likely to commit fraud, by identifying categories of risk, no such check on the other types of abuse exists.

Although there is no means test, there are eligibility requirements, based on employment record. Leakage of benefits to higher income groups is curtailed since there is a salary ceiling of $7,800 (1 1/2 times the composite average industrial weekly wage in Canada) above which unemployment insurance does not operate. Consideration of this leads to a major criticism of this program: namely, a plan supposedly based upon insurance (actuarial) principles but with a contributory ceiling, means in effect, that it is the steadily employed worker who bears the burden of the benefits received by the group of high risk unemployment, and this same worker who 'carries' those who abuse and misuse the system. Higher income groups do not contribute.

In addition to this system of financing, which in effect is an extra tax paid by the steady workers, the unemployment benefits themselves are often inadequate; some are obviously well below the poverty level.

4. Workmen's Compensation

This income maintenance program is also financed by contributions, but from the employer only. As well as providing temporary maintenance and rehabilitation for industrial accidents, pensions are paid where disability is permanent. These depend on the extent of injury and the amount of wages; 75 per cent of earnings is the maximum payable and the wage ceiling is set at $550; payments can therefore be as high as $412.50. There is a schedule of rates for each type of injury.

Eligibility for permanent pension is established by i) a statement from the claimant's doctor; ii) examination and assessment by Workmen's Compensation Board doctors; and iii) a travelling Medical Board which tours the province three or four times a year.

Permanent disability pensions under the Canada Pension Plan are coming into pay in 1970. Here, the disability must be severe and prolonged; payment is only for complete disability and will be $106.43 monthly plus $26.53 for each child. The plan covers all wage earners aged 18 to 70 years, except casual labour and farm workers.

Eligibility procedure is complex and rigorous; district office interviews, field visits, medical reports and, finally, review by a medical board in Ottawa. There is no coordination with the Workmen's Compensation Board medical eligibility procedures where the disability is the result of industrial accident. Full pensions from both sources can be received by the same individual.

5. Veterans Pensions and Allowances

Yet a third pension plan has a rigorous eligibility test - that for service-related disability. Eligibility for Veterans Pension is based on degree of disability; each of numerous conditions has a table of payments (only the Pension Commission in Ottawa has this table).

Applications are prepared by a Pension Advocate, based on a "firm" diagnosis by the individual's doctor. The application with supporting evidence is submitted first to a Medical Board, and then to the Pension Commission in Ottawa. Appeals are heard by a Travelling Board of three Commissioners, based in Ottawa, who come to British Columbia roughly five times a year. Approximately 100 appeals are at present awaiting attention.

Whilst the actual number receiving benefits under more than one of the above programs may be negligible, it is nevertheless possible for a person to be eligible for all three at one time. To obtain maximum benefits, he must go through three separate elaborate screening processes. Aside from the drain on the energies of a disabled man, the duplication of administration costs is a sorry fact in a country striving to control inflation.

None of the three disability pensions referred to above takes into consideration the income or the assets of the applicant: medical eligibility is the major criterion. Other income maintenance programs, however, require an investigation into the economic circumstances of the individual - an investigation known as a 'means test' or a 'needs test'. A 'means test' focusses on the income and assets of the applicant, and the difference between such income and the benefit to which he is entitled is paid. In theory, a 'needs test' focusses on the actual need of the applicant; but since it also requires investigation of finances, and since, in practice, no maintenance program pays benefits on the basis of actual need (except in a unique and individual case situation), there is no real difference between them.

A major difference in the methods of investigation, however, does exist between different programs. As noted above, the Guaranteed Income Supplement has a means test which is a simple declaration submitted by mail. Two other major programs, on the other hand, War Veterans Allowances and Social Assistance, require detailed investigation of the finances of each applicant, including verification of documents.

War Veterans Allowances are payable to veterans over the age of 65, or to "veterans of any age who because of disabilities are permanently unemployable or are incapable and unlikely to become capable of self-maintenance because of physical or mental disability combined with economic handicap."

Applicants first prove service eligibility under a complex set of regulations - for example, First World War members of the Imperial Russian forces are eligible but only up to the date of the revolution. Veterans' welfare officers then visit to see documents on marriage, divorce, bank accounts, ownership of property. A single applicant may have $1250 cash in the bank, and a married applicant $2500. The ceiling income is respectively $145 and $245 per month, the basic allowance payable $105 and $175.

If these allowances are inadequate, application can be made to the Veterans' Assistance Fund. A 'needs test' is applied, with welfare officers of the Veterans Department checking rent, light, heat, telephone, medical and special diet costs. The individual may be entitled to a further $40 per month single or $70 if married, depending on his budget. A table sets out fixed amounts for food, clothing, personal care and household utilities; these tables vary in different regions. They also vary with the number and age of children in the family. Medical care of children is not provided.

Comparison of this program with the following brings out some interesting anomalies.

6. Social Assistance and Rehabilitation

Public welfare is the income maintenance program of last resort. When all other resources have been tapped, it provides for cash allowances to those people who do not have the income necessary to maintain a reasonably normal and healthy existence.

Basic allowances for food, shelter and sundries range from $75 for a single person to $284 for a mother with 8 children. Extra rent allowances raise these rates to $90 and $404. In addition there are recreation, clothing and school supplies allowances of $15 annually for each child, extra extra-rental grants, monthly dietary allowance of $10, moving expenses, housekeeper and day care payments, and general overages to cover situations which create hardship. Medical coverage is complete for unemployable persons, but not for those classed as employable, whether or not they can obtain employment.

A veteran with a wife and three children or more could receive much greater benefits from public welfare in the form of the "extras" listed above. He could not obtain them if he qualified for veterans' allowance, however, because their rate of $245 per month is higher than the basic $224 social allowance rate for this size family. Yet the extra rental benefit alone would bring the public welfare payments to $254 per month, and the extra benefits listed above could provide much higher payments.

THE VETERAN WOULD IN FACT BE FORCED TO ACCEPT AN INCOME SUBSTANTIALLY LOWER THAN THAT PAYABLE TO A NON-VETERAN.

If the Veteran's Allowance of $245 is lower than the basic social assistance rate, supplementary social allowances could be granted. THE INDIVIDUAL, HOWEVER, WOULD HAVE TO UNDERGO THREE MEANS TESTS, ADMINISTERED BY DIFFERENT PERSONNEL, ALL REQUIRING DOCUMENTATION AS WELL AS PERSONAL INTERVIEWS.

The foregoing brief review reveals critical flaws in the major income maintenance programs - all of which are providing a 'guaranteed income' to special groups of the population:

1. They provide an inadequate income for people to lead a normal, healthy existence.
2. They tend to lock people into dependency as any earnings above a small exemption reduce the allowances by the total amount earned.
3. Some include a means test which is both complex and demeaning.
4. Some involve an unnecessarily complex administration
5. Programs not based on the means test transfer monies to people with above average incomes.
6. Different benefits are available for basically the same category of need depending upon historical events or chance occurrences.

Basic Principles for Income Maintenance Programs

The previous analysis of guaranteed income proposals suggests that there are major inequities and anomalies in present income maintenance programs, but that no simple panacea exists. What then should be the priorities for action? To spell out a detailed program of reform is obviously not possible here. Precise alternatives will require the use of simulated models and sophisticated operational research. Moreover, political realities will strongly influence the decisions taken. Not the least of these realities is the complex pattern of financing and the jurisdictional disputes that exist between different levels of government. To evolve effective social policies is infinitely difficult under such conditions of blurred and overlapping spheres of federal and provincial responsibility.

Despite these limitations, directions can be established if the clear intent of income maintenance programs is to reduce poverty. In the long term, consolidation of programs will best ensure that all Canadians receive an adequate minimum income, whether they are able to work full time, part time, or not at all. Integrated funding of all programs would maximize efficiency and economy.

Political realities suggest that such integration will not happen soon. The first step, therefore, must be towards major reforms in our present income maintenance programs.

The following basic principles are set forth to point the direction in which our major programs can move and to act as a yardstick against which new legislation can be measured.

1. ESTABLISH A COMPARABLE LEVEL OF BENEFITS FOR ALL INCOME MAINTENANCE SYSTEMS. It is obviously inequitable that a widow of 65 years of age can receive $150 monthly, but at 60 or 64 be expected to exist on $95 monthly. In 1961 nearly 38% of single women in Canada aged 60 to 65 had annual incomes of less than $1500.
2. SET BENEFITS AT A LEVEL WHICH PERMITS A REASONABLY NORMAL AND HEALTHY EXISTENCE. Due regard must be given to regional differences in cost of living and individual requirements. Benefits should automatically change with changes in median income.
3. ELIMINATE LEAKAGE OF BENEFITS TO THE HIGHER INCOME GROUPS BY TAXING BACK. This is particularly important in universal grant programs such as Old Age Security and Family Allowances. In the latter case, as illustrated earlier, this step could nearly double the Family Allowances to those below the poverty level. Leakage of benefits where taxing back is not possible or desirable can be eliminated by use of a simple 'declaration of need'. Unemployment Insurance and Social Assistance might jointly adopt such a form.
4. REFORM COMPULSORY INSURANCE SCHEMES SO THAT THEY ARE NOT A FORM OF INEQUITABLE TAXATION. The Canada Pension Plan and

Unemployment Insurance, where the financial burden falls most heavily on lower income groups, are examples.

5. SEPARATE THE FUNCTIONS OF INCOME MAINTENANCE FROM PROVISION OF SOCIAL SERVICES. At present, only Social Assistance combines these functions. The rationale for functional separation is briefly summarized in Appendix D.
6. REDUCE OVERLAPPING ADMINISTRATIVE UNITS AND SIMPLIFY PROCEDURES TO DETECT FRAUD.
 - a) A common medical screening procedure where required, e.g. War Veterans Pensions, Workmen's Compensation, Canada Pension Plan.
 - b) A common 'Declaration of Need' form - without personal interview and verification - for the use of applicants for Social Assistance, War Veterans' Allowances and Unemployment Insurance if suggested 'means test' is adopted.
 - c) Sophisticated techniques, such as now used by the Unemployment Insurance for detecting fraud, expanded to all programs.
7. DISCARD THE CONCEPT OF UNEMPLOYABILITY AS PRACTICALLY AND MORALLY INDEFENSIBLE. A central registry should be established for those seeking but unable to find employment by their own efforts, or those requiring income maintenance. If no employment is available, benefits would be paid through the same office on completion of a simple declaration of need.

Work Incentive - or Work Opportunity?

The suggested reform of income maintenance programs begs one question. If benefits for the unemployed are set at adequate levels, what then of the work incentive? Will the result be to create a nation of loafers? It is imperative at this time to ask some questions regarding work incentive.

First, should we really be stressing the need for work rather than training for leisure in a future automated society? Several factors lead to a strong 'YES':

- a) The Economic Council of Canada has pointed out that to maintain one couple for a lifetime costs the country directly $134,000 - as well as an inestimable cost in unused human resources. Their estimate of the total cost to the Canadian economy of unemployment and underemployment is 2 - 4 billion dollars annually.

- b) Automation is not synonymous with work obsolescence. Many sectors of the economy, particularly in the service industries, require additional manpower.
- c) People want and need to work. People develop their identity, their meaning in life, through working in an occupation. The Economic Council in its recent annual report concluded that voluntary unemployment is not a significant factor in our society; 68 per cent of urban poverty families are headed by someone in the labour force. There are persons and families in British Columbia maintaining an independent existence, who would economically be better off on welfare. In 1966, a couple with two children, where the head of the household was fully employed and receiving the average wage in the service industry in British Columbia, would receive a higher total net income on social welfare.

Further evidence is provided by a recent study of the social welfare caseload in Calgary, which concluded that "to emphasize its existence repeatedly (lack of initiative), is to convey the erroneous impression that such uncommon practices are in fact common". Hence one has to conclude that, when job opportunities which provide an "adequate income" are made available to the poor, they can and will become active participants in the labour force.

Secondly, even if it were true that work incentive is needed, is the strategy of setting income maintenance payments below the poverty level the only way to make sure that people will work rather than loaf?

Another alternative exists. PRIORITY SHOULD BE GIVEN TO THE CONCEPT OF GUARANTEED EMPLOYMENT, NOT GUARANTEED INCOME. Maintenance programs must be tied to aggressive programs of job development and job placement. Work opportunity, not work incentive, should be our major concern.

How the poor fare under present employment programs will be examined in the next chapter.

CHAPTER IIICANADA MANPOWER AND OTHER EMPLOYMENT PROGRAMS

In 1966, the National Employment Service became part of a newly created Department of Manpower and Immigration. Wide publicity was given to the Department's new stance which would actively help the individual find his niche in the world of employment.

"Its new approach to Manpower problems is designed to help you. A C.M.C. Counsellor will talk to you about your experience, interests and aptitudes. He will help you decide the best course to follow for placement in a suitable job Remember, the many services available are designed to help you find a good and rewarding job."

(Quote from 1967 brochure)

Policies and Practices of Canada Manpower

In theory, the programs of Canada Manpower offer an opportunity for those in the poverty group to re-enter the economic stream. Mobility grants help move workers to locations where employment is available. Counselling and assessment are a primary function of Manpower offices - although in Greater Vancouver referral for intensive vocational counselling is made to a private agency supported by United Community Services.

Basic training skill development courses are available, but not academic upgrading, which is a provincial responsibility. Since it is extremely difficult to draw a line between these kinds of upgrading, this is a prime example of the blurred jurisdictional areas referred to in the previous chapter. A tremendous variety of occupational training courses are scheduled, ranging from a week to a year in length. The Department of Manpower buys 'seats' in educational institutions or private colleges, and can pay a living allowance during training, ranging from $40 to $103 per week, to persons who have been in the labour force for a period of three years. No means test is involved.

Statistics reveal that the B.C. Pacific Region receives far less than its "fair share" of these occupational grants, as shown in the following table:

The text of the Department of Manpower's brief to the Special Senate Committee on Poverty states that:

"The total expenditures under the Occupational Training of Adults Program in 1968-69 are estimated to have been $190 million. They were distributed among the geographic regions of Canada on the basis of the size of the labour force in each region as well as their economic need as indicated by their unemployment and poverty rates."

Yet an analysis of the figures in Table II above shows that on these criteria, the B.C. Pacific Region is being grossly short-changed; Ontario, with a much lower unemployment rate and lower incidence of poverty, receives almost exactly double the amount spent per labour force member in British Columbia. No reason for this situation could be obtained. Since both federal and provincial departments are involved in the occupational training courses, it is impossible to pinpoint responsibility.

Have these programs resulted in assisting the poor to gain employment? It was not possible to obtain an answer to this question for the Pacific Region. (1) Statistics available as to numbers placed in training or employment supply no information as to the effect of these programs in reducing poverty. In fact, the federal Adult Occupational Training Act discriminates against the poor; a woman whose husband earns $12,000 and is herself employed can qualify for a training allowance, while the mother who has raised her children on Social Assistance cannot obtain such an allowance. A special referral system introduced by the Regional Manpower office is designed to give special help to those in the poverty group; as it was initiated less than two years ago, no objective evaluation is yet available.

How does the consumer feel about the efficacy of Manpower services? During the past months, United Community Services has interviewed numbers of those receiving social assistance in regard to "hang-ups" in the welfare system; their comments about Manpower have been devastatingly critical. These criticisms are not without support; indeed, one social service administrator bitterly stated: "It is as if they had the brand of Cain on their forehead when Manpower finds out they are on welfare." The Director of the John Howard Society states: "Our referrals are quickly categorized by Manpower as 'untrainable', and therefore not adaptable to their procedures."

In the basic conflict within the Manpower Department between their two "clients", the employer and the employee, the B.C. Regional Office has opted to serve the employer. This philosophy was clearly expressed by a Manpower representative on an open-line show on December 2, 1969; he repeatedly told callers: "We have no responsibility to you; our responsibility is to the labour market." Asked by the interviewer if Manpower didn't sometimes assign a counsellor to help a person find a job, the response was "We'd love to, but we don't have enough staff." (A summary of this radio program is included as Appendix E).

In fairness to Canada Manpower, it must be realized that the excitement surrounding its establishment led to unrealistic expectations by the public. The Department has neither the financial resources nor the legislative powers to perform the task expected of it, i.e. job placement of all those capable of employment.

Essentially, Manpower's interpretation of reality is correct. The creation of the Department was based on the assumption that economic growth will be stimulated by efficient matching of people to jobs. But their role in this area is being emasculated by the phenomenal growth of private employment agencies. Large corporations and professional associations as well are now active in the job placement field. The needs of employers can be met more and more by these burgeoning resources. It is evident that Manpower will become the "employment agency of last resort", if it is not approaching this now. Only twenty per cent of job vacancies are registered with the Department. A recent attempt by Manpower to "upgrade their product" by advertisement to attract registrants with a high degree of employability reportedly met with little success.

The Department itself is concerned with its present predicament. A recent self-study in Victoria was made because of the high proportion of time spent in counselling and assessment with no resultant referral to jobs. The study showed that 58 per cent of approximately 4000 registrants were considered unreferrable or of limited referrability. Nor were most of those of limited referrability the so-called "dregs of society"; well over 80 per cent were average or above in grooming and intelligence, and were reported to have a 'good' attitude. There was no one factor which by itself made an individual unreferrable. Work history and education were the least correlated, while there was a high correlation between registrants' attitudes and "acceptance of realistic limitations" - highly subjective judgments. Had more employers registered with Manpower, the status of many registrants would undoubtedly have changed to "referrable". Essentially, this is the same issue noted earlier, that it is impossible to label individuals as 'employable' or 'unemployable' without reference to the job opportunities available to them.

Perhaps the most alarming statistic in this study is that, of 27 per cent of registrants in the age group to and including nineteen years who "want and could use upgrading", only 5 per cent were given Manpower training courses. Present Manpower regulations militate against this age group. Only those who have been out of school at least one year are eligible for enrolment in training courses, and three years must elapse before they can qualify for maintenance while training. Clearly, this policy is related to the jurisdictional conflict referred to earlier - education being a provincial responsibility and 'training' a function of the federal Department of Manpower.

The absurdity of these regulations is illustrated by the case of a Vancouver woman given an academic upgrading course by the social welfare department to help her on the road to independence; she found herself disqualified for Manpower training allowances for the next three years.

Of all applicants for Occupational Training courses, only one in ten is accepted. It is obvious that, since the primary object is to satisfy the employer, training is almost unavailable to those whose skills are least and whose income is most likely to be well below the poverty level.

How are applicants for Occupational Training courses chosen - how are appropriate people selected for training in an attempt to more perfectly match supply and demand for labour? There are two different forms which such a program can take. First of all, training can be offered to any one in the labour force who can be expected to ultimately master occupational skills that are in scarce supply. This is sometimes referred to as the "trickling down" process, i.e. by retraining people who are already in the labour force for higher skilled jobs, entry level positions are then available to the unemployed or under-employed. Manpower's present policy appears to follow this form.

This theory has some validity in the context of a closed society. However, in British Columbia, as our level of economic activity increases, so increases the flow of immigrants from other provinces as well as other countries. Hence, in the last 10 years, in order to reduce unemployment by 10,000, employment had to be increased by 22,000 or roughly 2 : 1 ratio. (2)

The net effect of present policy is therefore to create a permanent subculture of the unskilled and chronically unemployed, with all the social ills arising from a permanent condition of poverty. No society can remain socially healthy where such a subculture exists and grows.

On this basis, there is justification for an alternative method of selection for training: singling out people who are not in the labour force or who are underemployed, and designing a specific program for them. The overriding principle of selection would be to provide equal access to opportunity for those who now face a closed door. Training grants to persons financially able to pay for upgrading courses must be regarded as a misuse of public funds.

Obviously, to completely attain this goal of "equal access" is impossible - yet it is a worthy goal to strive for. The boy of seventeen - who knows what pressures led him to drop out of school? - should be eligible for training not because he left school one year or three years ago, but on the basis of whether or not other training is within his means. Nor should eligibility be based on the subjective judgment of a counsellor in a matter so vital to the applicant's well-being. If doubt exists as to ability or motivation, screening could take the form of a short pre-employment course. The principle must be established that no one should lack opportunity for training because of lack of money, or because of a negative evaluation by a counsellor.

Special Training and Employment Programs

Canada Manpower has recently made modest attempts to develop programs for those needing extra help in obtaining training or employment. Reference has been made to a special referral system by social agencies to the Rehabilitation Division of Manpower; it is regrettable that no statistics are available of numbers placed. A recent innovation offers women a "pre-employment course" designed to increase self-confidence, social skills and knowledge of the community. Numbers are limited to fifteen per course, with an instructor highly skilled in human relations. The third course is underway at present, and a similar course for twenty men was inaugurated in January 1970.

Several other initiatives have been developed under auspices other than Canada Manpower.

The Provincial Alliance of Businessmen was established by the provincial government in 1969, under the direction of a cabinet minister, to find employment for those on the social welfare rolls. Offices have been opened in Vancouver, Victoria, Kelowna, Kamloops and Prince George. Applicants register on a simple form and may be referred to a businessman for possible employment. Unfortunately, it has not been possible to obtain any detailed results of this program which has been in operation less than a year. Coordination with similar efforts of Canada Manpower appears to be lacking. However, since this program has been given a budget of $500,000 for 1970 with the idea of involving the total community in its efforts, it has the potential of developing innovative programs for numbers of unemployed.

The Opportunities Incentive Program in Vancouver was set up in 1969 on the initiative of a group of women on public welfare, with the assistance of a community development worker. Under this program, women (and more recently, men) who wish to re-enter the labour market are paid an allowance of $50.00 monthly for six months by the Welfare Department for working thirty hours or more monthly in a community service (with the schools, libraries, social welfare department, etc.). The objective is to encourage those who have been dependent on public welfare to take the first step towards independence; the program has met with enthusiastic response by those receiving social assistance, and the present enrolment of 96 is almost doubling monthly. Unfortunately, the prospect of employment at the end of the training period is slight, and is a matter of urgent concern to those in the program. The Opportunities Committee, recognizing this need, has set up a 'job registry', operated by a social welfare recipient. In the past two months, fifteen applicants have been placed in jobs.

Another 'employment preparation' project is being developed in the Vancouver area, sponsored by the Vancouver City Social Service Department and the Department of Social Welfare. It is a pilot project designed to train twenty men, by a thirteen week program of class instruction and on-the-job training, to work in the Parks Department. The limitation, as in the Opportunities Program, is the lack of assurance of employment at a living wage following the employment preparation project - only the hope "that the candidates who successfully complete the course may be referred to the City Personnel Office for possible job placement with the understanding (to comply with union regulations) that no employee on the existing lists of the Parks Board will be unemployed while welfare recipients are engaged on the project."

How practical are these various programs? What are their chances of success? A strong feeling persists in our society that anyone who wants to can "make it" on their own, that those requiring help are deadbeats and ne'er-do-wells, happily freeloading on their fellow citizens. This is part of the "frontier" ethic referred to earlier; but the hostility which ordinary citizens often reveal in discussion of those on 'welfare' suggests that other factors are involved. Man throughout the ages has increased his feeling of power by "putting down" other men and groups of men, often of a different race. Now that blatant racial prejudice is no longer socially approved, the same deep-seated need to feel superior to some other groups has led to an irrational hostility towards "welfare bums".

If in fact a large sector of the unemployed are "lazy ne'er-do-wells", any scheme to assist them into employment is doomed to failure. But mounting evidence reveals that the vast majority of those on welfare would prefer to work. This is the opinion of U.S. business-leaders who have been active in finding jobs for the unemployed. (3) The Economic Council of Canada, on the basis of evidence available to it, concluded that voluntary unemployment is not a significant factor in our society. The relation between numbers of persons unemployed and numbers dependent on social assistance dramatically illustrates how welfare rolls increase with a downturn in the economy. (4)

Further evidence is provided by a review of programs which have been successful in placing the "hard-core unemployed."

1. The Boeing aircraft plant in Seattle is employing 350 hard-core unemployed yearly. Over 86 per cent of those who enrolled in this federally-supported program were still employed after one year - A HIGHER RETENTION RATE THAN FOR THOSE HIRED FROM THE GENERAL LABOUR MARKET. Over half of those enrolled were women with children who had been receiving social assistance; others were men with as little as Grade III education. The factors responsible for this high success rate are:

- a) Full pay ($2.87 an hour) commencing from the first hour of enrolment.
 - b) The possibility of upward mobility. These are not "dead-end" jobs - in fact such jobs are expressly excluded in the terms of the federal contract.
 - c) The training consists of both remedial teaching and skills training but both are job-related. Some trainees have improved their reading by three grade levels in the twelve week course.
 - d) Concrete and persistent supportive services are available to facilitate the transition period. Buses round up the employees and take them to and from work. Making a second trip in the morning, they rouse and deliver those who were not ready the first time round. The results have been close to 100 per cent attendance. Licensed day care homes are essential to the system. A major break-through came when Boeing secured a list of the available day care homes and commenced arranging placement directly rather than through the established agency.
 - e) A counsellor, trained specially for this job, is assigned each employee from the first day, to assist with problems as they arise, including management relations. Some counsellors drop in to the trainees' neighbourhood at night to establish a more personal contact and get feedback on problems which the employees may be reluctant to discuss while on the job. Many of the counsellors are highly dedicated; there is open communication between employer and employee.⁽⁵⁾
2. The Alberta Department of Social Development in the summer of 1969 initiated an Employment Opportunities Program for persons receiving welfare benefits. In this program, a group of persons receiving welfare was randomly split into experimental and control groups, the former receiving intensive help in obtaining employment, including supporting services. Although it is too early to assess the retention rate, the initial results are striking: 47.1 per cent of the experimental group were placed in jobs, and 13.7 per cent entered training programs, compared to 9.7 percent and 1.3 per cent respectively in the control group.

The most striking fact in this experiment is that the elements which proved of importance were the same as in the Boeing program: definite financial benefits to those enrolling in the program, high employer interest, dedicated counsellors and access to day care and transportation services.

Analysis of these programs, particularly the Boeing experiment, is of vital importance because it stands out like a beacon amongst a host of costly failures and semi-failures.

While programs such as those operating at Boeing Aircraft are expensive when compared with our present programs, they must be considered in the context of i) their effectiveness; and ii) the staggering cost, noted earlier, of a chronically dependent family through its lifetime. In addition, the evidence that children of such families tend to adopt similar life styles, suggests that the problem and the costs do not end with the primary family. Hence, such programs must be considered as a rewarding investment in human resources.

Implications for Canada Manpower

What are the implications of the above review for the Department of Canada Manpower? A DRASTIC RE-ORIENTATION IS REQUIRED: THE UNEMPLOYED AND UNDEREMPLOYED MUST BECOME THE FOCUS OF THEIR CONCERN. Manpower's central concerns must change from an emphasis on filling slots in the economy to the maximum utilization of human resources. Manpower resources are human resources; their primary client is the employee, not the employer.

Does this change in orientation transform the Department into a welfare agency, a fear which has been expressed by their senior officials? Exactly the opposite is true. At present the strong emphasis on counselling is more related to the role of welfare agencies than would be a practical program of job training and placement. This is not to belie the need of many for counselling services (especially in providing resources such as day care, housing, etc.), in addition to training or placement. The primary role of Manpower must be to supply training and placement opportunities for those requiring employment.

To adopt this role, several specifics are mandatory:

1. A thorough analysis of the pool of unused human resources. The complete registration of those requiring income maintenance, suggested in the previous chapter, would supply the material for such analysis.
2. Long-range projection of manpower requirements for the future. Although this is a function of Manpower at the present time, much more sophisticated techniques must be brought into play and the information made public in order to influence the vocational choice of the future labour force.
3. Design of training programs to match human resources with projected employment opportunities.

4. An aggressive program to sell the finished product. Manpower must here compete with private employment agencies - but it has the advantage of being a free service for the employer. In addition it could provide funds (with a change of present national policy) for on-the-job training programs which wed the applicant to the job during the training period.

All of these functions are at present being carried on to some degree by Canada Manpower. There is much room for improvement within the limitations of their legislative powers; but these limitations must be recognized, and both the public and politicians made aware of them. Basic to the dilemma of Canada Manpower is the fact that it does not have the capability of creating jobs. A vigorous and intensive campaign to find jobs for the chronic unemployed would do little more than shift poverty rather than reduce it - unless it is integrated with a vigorous policy of job development.

The Regional Development Incentives Act, passed in June 1969, is a move designed to increase the aggregate demand for labour. Many incentives are offered to industries to locate in "slow growth areas", i.e. those with a marked incidence of poverty. Incentives include 20 per cent of capital costs for modernizing a plant or expanding its production; 25 per cent of capital costs for a new plant; up to $5,000 for each new job created.

Canada Manpower must be firmly "locked-in" to these federal and provincial plans for regional economic expansion, and commence now to train the unemployed for the jobs which will be created. But perhaps we need a further refinement of this concept. Why should it be limited by the fact of geographic location? It is possible that the total population in a "slow growth area" may be less than the number of unemployed in Vancouver. Moreover, a regional focus encourages industry, in order to obtain these concessions, to locate in areas which may not be the most economically feasible. THE PRINCIPLE OF ENCOURAGING INDUSTRIAL EXPANSION THROUGH TAX CONCESSIONS AND OTHER FISCAL MEASURES IS VALID; BUT THE POLICY SHOULD BE DESIGNED AROUND PEOPLE, NOT PLACES. The starting point of policy should be an analysis of the pool of unused human resources; and special tax concessions should be given to those industries which can provide employment opportunities to match the supply of potential employees. Government hiring policy must also focus on this group.

Some Concluding Observations

It is abundantly clear that the under-utilization of human resources in Canada at the present time results in a tremendous loss to the Canadian economy and its citizens - between two and four billion dollars annually is the estimate of the Canadian Economic Council. At the same time, the people whose talents and energies are not being used suffer the many ills created by poverty. Several major economic factors must be taken into consideration in attempts to remedy the situation.

The extent of poverty and the lack of employment opportunities are related to society's inability to simultaneously meet four basic economic goals: full employment, a high rate of economic growth, reasonable price stability, and an equitable distribution of rising incomes.

A satisfactory high rate of employment is brought about primarily through fiscal and monetary policies; changes in the tempo of economic activity are controlled through changes in government expenditure, taxation and interest rates. As full employment is approached, governments must be concerned with the delicate trade-off between increased economic activity and price stability. In the preceding decade, because of a growing affluence, our preoccupation has shifted from the problems of economic growth to redistribution of abundance. In the last few years, we have enjoyed a relatively low rate of unemployment, and inflation has replaced unemployment as the chief ill to which our economy is prone. In our attempts to control inflation, we have reverted to the traditional techniques of reducing aggregate demand by creating unemployment. Is this the only technique possible?

One of the factors that contributes to inflation as an economy approaches full employment is the fact that the supply of labour does not provide the proper mixture of skills and experience to meet demand. This in return results in "bottlenecks", where particular skills are in short supply; employers then bid up the price for labour. Wage increases in any one sector tend to be telegraphed through the whole labour force, and an inflationary spiral is created.

Anticipating the demand for labour, and training the unemployed appropriately, can therefore reduce the pressure upon prices of increased economic activity. In addition, this strategy would reduce the tremendous loss to the Canadian economy and its citizens now caused by under-utilization of our human resources.

So complex are the factors involved in gauging the trade-off between unemployment and inflation that to predict the exact effect of any economy or fiscal policy is hazardous at best. This is why it is imperative to reform our present programs of income maintenance, and job placement and job development. For to enact fiscal policies which push a man out of a job and into poverty can only be considered a monstrous social injustice.

This represents the most conservative estimate of poverty levels suggested by the Canadian Economic Council, i.e. individuals or families who spend 70% or more of their income for food, clothing and shelter. The levels are: single $1500, two $2500, three $3000, four $3500. These figures take no account of the higher cost of living in British Columbia and are hence below the adequacy level here. Yet despite this, 22% of the residents of this province have incomes below the poverty levels given above.

SOME REGULATIONS SET UP BY THE NEW JERSEY EXPERIMENT IN GUARANTEED INCOME

- 1) Income received by all members of the family unit must be included in the income calculation. (Head and his wife, any child or step child or descendant of any child or step child if such a person is living with the head or derives more than half his support from the head. In addition, any other person who both lives with and derives more than half his support from the head is included.)
- 2) Items added to the definition of current taxable income for the experiment represent a substantial modification of the definition of income used in the positive tax system. The New Jersey concept of income includes:
 - a) any pension or annuity
 - b) all prizes and awards
 - c) all life insurance proceeds over $1,000
 - d) gifts, support payments and inheritances over $100 from persons outside the family unit
 - e) all interest on governmental obligations
 - f) damages, insurance payments or workmen's compensation due to injury or sickness including wages or income continuation
 - g) all dividends
 - h) fellowships or scholarships, including value of room and board supplied without charge, to the extent that such stipend exceeds the cost of tuition, fees, and books
 - i) income from trusts and estates
 - j) gross rental value of owner-occupied housing or other quarters occupied rent free
 - k) capital gains counted in full as income, and losses to be deducted to the extent of gains received during the period of the experiment
 - l) payments received from
 - i unemployment compensation
 - ii strike or supplementary unemployment benefits
 - iii Social Security benefits
 - iv veterans disability benefits
 - v training stipends

APPENDIX A

3. Specific Exclusions are the following benefits and others for which the size of the benefit is based on demonstrated need:

- a) Aid to the Permanently and Totally Disabled
- b) Old Age Assistance
- c) Aid to the Blind
- d) Aid to Families with Dependent Children
- e) General Assistance

4. Deductions are limited to the following:

- a) Businessmen and independent contractors may deduct costs of earning income except, if the net income so derives is below the New Jersey minimum wage, that wage rate will be imputed to them.
- b) Mortgage interest and real property taxes may be deducted in full in computing income from owner-occupied housing.
- c) Alimony or court-ordered support payments to persons outside the tax unit may be deducted.
- d) Finally, full credit (reimbursement) will be allowed for all federal income taxes paid or withheld, and reductions in benefits will be made to offset any tax refunds received. Thus the recipient's unit will be insulated from the regular tax system until its income reaches the level at which the unit will fare better under the positive tax system.

5. Income will be averaged over the preceding 3 four-week periods for determining the level of payment in the current four-week period - an automatic estimation device which could be superseded by a declaration showing cause for adjustment of the estimate. At the end of each year of participation, total benefits paid will be compared with the benefits properly claimable on the basis of actual income experience and any difference will be paid to or recovered from the unit (normally by adjustment of current and future benefits).

This scheme requires four-weekly income reports by the family unit and allows for the possibility of under- or over-payment to accumulate for an "April 15th" type of final reckoning. Not only does this system enable the benefit to respond relatively quickly to changes in income, it also causes the force of the effective marginal tax on earnings to be felt without much delay.

APPENDIX CPOSSIBLE METHODS OF REDISTRIBUTING FAMILY ALLOWANCES

(Note: The following figures are crude estimates and are presented for the purpose of example only)

There are two major ways of redistributing Family and Youth Allowances. The first is to take the total amount presently being spent on these allowances and to reallocate it without exceeding the total expenditure. The second is to increase the total expenditure by adding funds where needed or desired. While the former is probably more palatable to the tax paying public because it means no increase in present costs, the latter is not entirely unjustified since Family Allowances have not kept up with increases in the cost of living.

To illustrate this particular point, when Family Allowances were first issued in 1945, the rates were:

Group	Age Group Covered	Rate
A	0 - 4+ years (1)	$5.00
B	5 - 9+ years (1)	$6.00
C	10 - 12+ years (1)	$7.00
D	13 - 15+ years	$8.00

In 1957, Groups A and B, and C and D above were combined and the rate schedules for groups B and D were applied. Thus a rate of $6.00 for children 0 - 9 years, and $8.00 for 10 - 15 year olds was instituted.

The cost of living, as measured by the Consumer Price Index, increased 49% between 1949 and 1967. If Family and Youth Allowances had kept up with that rate of change, in 1967 they would have been as follows:

Age Group	Rate/Month 1967	Rate/Month (If consistent with C.P.I.)
0 - 9+ years	$6.00	$8.94
10 - 15+ years	$8.00	$11.92
16 - 17+ years	$10.00	$10.73 (2)

In order to redistribute Family and Youth Allowances, it is first necessary to establish income groups and to determine how many children receive allowances within each group. Dominion Bureau Statistics figures (3) were used to determine the number of children, aged 0 - 18 years (only children going to school for ages 15 - 18 years), who were in specified income groups.

These figures were converted into percentages for each income group and applied to the number of children receiving Family and Youth Allowances and to the total expenditure in 1967. (4)
From this information the following table was devised:

Family and Youth Allowances in B.C., 1967

Income Group	% of Children	Number of Children	Amount Received
A) under $2,000	8	52,779	$ 4,374,803
B) $2,000 - $2,999	8	52,779	$ 4,374,803
C) $3,000 - $3,999	19	125,349	$10,390,155
D) $4,000 - $4,999	26	171,531	$14,218,107
E) $5,000 - $5,999	18	118,752	$ 9,843,306'
F) $6,000 - $6,999	10	69,973	$ 5,468,503
G) $7,000 - $9,999	8	52,779	$ 4,374,803
H) $10,000 +	3	19,792	$ 1,640,551
TOTALS	100%	659,734	$54,685,031

By assuming that all families have two children⁽⁵⁾, a poverty line⁽⁶⁾ can be drawn under Income Group C ($3,000 - $3,999). This represents approximately one-third of all children receiving Family and Youth Allowances. By removing the amount paid to income groups F, G & H and by applying that money to income levels A, B & C, the effects in Family Allowances that would occur are as shown in the diagram overleaf. Note that the dotted lines represent the recipient income groups when Family and Youth Allowances are redistributed from one or more higher income groups.

Examples: In Plan 1 Family Allowances paid to income group H are taxed back at 100% and distributed to group A resulting in a new gross average monthly allowance of $9.50 per child. In Plan 8 the allowances to those families with annual incomes over $6,000 (groups F, G & H) are taxed back at 100% and redistributed to those families with annual incomes below $3,000 (Groups A & B). This results in a gross average monthly allowance of nearly $16.00 per child for the lower income groups. Those families with incomes between $3,000 and $6,000 would receive allowances on a diminishing scale as their income rose to the $6,000 level. (Note: in the above examples the present tax on allowances to the higher income groups has not been taken into consideration.

REDISTRIBUTION SCHEME

PLAN		1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9
LOW	A	$9.50			16.40			25.04
	B		8.20	7.50		11.65			15.97
	C						9.08			11.05
	D
Income Group	E
	F
	H HIGH

Note: Present monthly average for all income groups is $6.91 per child.

A second way of redistributing Family and Youth Allowances is to apply a weighting scheme to each income bracket in such a way that those in most need will receive a greater Family and Youth Allowance than those with less need. For example, if the average monthly Family Allowance per child was "x", one might wish to give Income Group A "2x", Income Group B "1.5x" and Income Group C "1.25x". In order to do this without increasing total expenditure, one would have to reduce the funds that other income groups, such as F, G, and H, received. If it is seen as desirable not to eliminate any income group from receiving a Family and Youth Allowance, then it is essential that weights be assigned so that benefit is given where needed but that allowances are not reduced in the upper income groups to the extent that the administrative cost exceeds the Family Allowance to be received.

APPENDIX C

The second major method of increasing Family and Youth Allowances is to increase the total expenditure. This would not seem to be as acceptable as the redistribution plan, simply because it would probably mean an increase in overall taxes for everyone, including those who were to be assisted by increased Family Allowances. An example of doubling and tripling the allowances is shown below.

Effect of Doubling and Tripling Family Allowances

Income Groups	Net Amount	Increase in Cost	Average/child/ month
Effect of Doubling Allowances:
A	$ 8,749,609	$ 4,374,803	$13.81
A & B	17,499,212	8,749,806	13.81
A, B & C	38,279,522	19,139,761	13.81
Effect of Tripling Allowances:
A	13,124,412	8,749,609	20.72
A & B	26,248,818	17,499,212	20.72
A, B & C	57,419,283	38,279,522	20.72

1. Children would move into the next category one month after their 5th, 10th and 13th birthdays respectively.
2. This is the Youth Allowance, first issued in 1965 to children 16 - 17 years, provided they are engaged in full-time educational training, barring only physical or mental handicaps which would prohibit this.

5. D.B.S. breakdown of children into various age groups could not be correlated to the number of children per family. Furthermore, the figures at our disposal did not correspond to children's age when they received an increase in Family Allowance. With these limited data it was not possible to calculate the precise percentage of children receiving $6, $8, or $10 per month.
6. National Economic Council figures establish poverty line for family of four persons at $3,500. See United Community Services for Greater Vancouver, Social Trends in British Columbia, p. 26, and references therein.

APPENDIX DSEPARATION OF INCOME MAINTENANCE FROM SOCIAL SERVICES

There is widespread conviction that separation of financial aid from social service is a crucial part of improving the welfare system. This step is recommended by the Technical Assistance Program of the American Public Welfare Association. They also recommend the related concept of a simple declaration of need to replace the present case investigation.

The rationale for this change is clear. To have financial aid offered on the bases of a "case assessment" is to infer strongly that there is something wrong with the applicant or he would not require money.

Certainly both functions must be integrated within the same Department, but it is becoming clear that they should be performed by different workers.

"The principle that the same public assistance case-worker should do everything related to his client's need died hard. On the surface it makes supreme sense for one person to integrate all help to the recipient. But several things have become clear in recent years. The first is that, given the pressures and expectations of public assistance programs, the more punitive functions tend to drive out the more humane, in a kind of Gresham's Law of welfare. Both official demands and unofficial pressures have made the policing and investigating activities the central ones. In the early 1960s, we saw training and workload reduction as the solution to this problem. But experience has demonstrated that the trained worker with 60 families tends to act like the untrained worker with 160 if nothing else changes." (1)

In separating these functions, it is important that the "financial aid" worker not only have a high level of knowledge of the resources of the department, but also training in interviewing techniques. This is not a clerical position - the impression the applicant gains of the agency during this interview determines whether or not he will make use of the services provided by the department. But at the same time the financial aid worker should not be a professional case-worker whose orientation is towards personal counselling. With such training he will have difficulty restricting himself to establishing financial eligibility.

OPEN-LINE RADIO PROGRAM - DECEMBER 2, 1969,RE CANADA MANPOWER

The following comments are based on detailed notes recorded by a member of the research staff and verified by a volunteer of the Social Policy & Research Committee who also audited the full program.

The opinions expressed by those who called in cannot be considered as representative of the general public, but they illustrate types of expectation and reactions of those using the services of Canada Manpower.

General Statements of Manpower Representatives: (guests on program)

- Retraining is not a right; "you must be assessed as to what you can do for the economy of the country".
- The Manpower counsellor has a responsibility to the labour market; he has no responsibility to you. (the person seeking employment)
- We are an economically-based program, not a welfare program.
- Less than one out of ten applicants for retraining is accepted.
- If you don't get good service (from Manpower), it is quite probably because you aren't certain about what you want to do ... "you don't have definite goals".
- Manpower has some aptitude tests but no vocational counselling in depth. You should go to the B.C. Vocational Counselling Agency.

Phone In

- 1) Telephone operator - couldn't find job, wanted to get into other employment - "I was bounced from one person to another, there were about 35 counsellors sitting around. After four weeks the counsellor phoned and said they had no work for telephone operators. I told them that at the beginning."

Response: We know only about the jobs that employers ask us to fill. Manpower is a place for people to go if they don't want to find jobs themselves.

- 2) Woman of 40, recently widowed, two children - "After my first visit to Manpower I felt like jumping off the tallest bridge." Used to be in a responsible position which required long hours - wanted to have a job with regular hours because of children, e.g. receptionist.
Told by counsellor that there was "no chance at all" because she had not completed her Grade XII.
- 3) Man, age 38, whose job was coming to an end. Grade 11 education, had welding certificate, not able to practise this trade for health reasons. Kept popping into Manpower. Found out (independently) about retraining. (Friend was retraining as a janitor) Told by counsellor that at his age this was not possible.

Response: Counsellor has a responsibility to the labour market, he has no responsibility to you.

Man: Then how about making me into a saleable product for the market?

Response: Perhaps it's that you don't really know what you want to do Suggest you go to B.C. Vocational Counselling Service. (private agency) (Man now happily employed as a guard at Oakalla, found it on his own).

4) Woman, two sons 18 and 19.

a) One son took a pre-apprentice course in painting, paid for by Manpower. Was one of four out of twenty to complete the course. Went to Manpower, told no jobs available. Later found out he had to have approval from union; went back and told counsellor who confirmed that this was so. Still has no job.

Response: You are supposed to know what to do; you should have looked into it.

b) Second son went to Manpower - was referred to two job possibilities in one day; obviously had to turn one down. The other (photographer's assistant) lasted two months. Went back to Manpower. They wouldn't send him out to another job, because his records showed he had turned one down. (the one noted above)

5) Man, unemployed 3 months

When you go to Manpower their attitude is hostility and snobbishness. You have to go from officer to officer, from clerk to clerk; I am listed in three different places.

Response: If you need a job in a hurry, Canada Manpower is not the place to go.

6) Man, foreign accent, age 36. Wanted training as a carpenter. Had two years university and a specialized trade; had been to forty places on his own. Told he was over-educated for carpentry, too old for it, and there were already 300 carpenters unemployed.

"They gave me absolutely nothing - not even hope".

Interviewer's question: Could Manpower not assign him a counsellor to help him find a job?

Response: We could if we had the staff.

APPENDIX E

- 7) Woman, age 50, former office worker coming back into labour market wanted upgrading to learn to use new business equipment. Told by counsellor, no chance of retraining, too old.
Response: Age is a factor that moves with the demands of the market. Right now it's a buyers' market. (Later: many older people are simply not capable of academic upgrading).
- 8) Man: Trouble with Manpower is that it is a brainchild of Tom Kent; he brought in intelligentsia. Counsellors are more concerned with getting things down on paper than getting out and finding jobs for people.
Response: Every bureaucracy is overwhelmed with paper work.
- 9) Young Man, B.A.: Asked if he could not get Manpower help in getting a year of Teachers Training.
Response: Under B.N.A. Act, academic training is sole responsibility of the provinces - referred caller to Student Loans.
10. Woman, 50, formerly worked in rehabilitation. Wanted job or re-training, would go anywhere in province.
 Manpower no help, told her there were no openings on the provincial lists.
- 11) Discussion of Manpower role in working with a major forestry industry that was curtailing operation. Placed 90% of employees without interim period of unemployment.
Interviewer: You mean there was almost no dislocation of people?
Response: Yes, and no dislocation of the Canadian economy.
- 12) Partially blind person, classified by Manpower as "disadvantaged" and hates the name - "I have a B.A., I have some dignity and some worth." Went to Manpower, told by counsellor he should find out what he wanted to do; took aptitude tests at a private agency, was advised to go into social work or theology. Went back to Manpower; 6 weeks later had heard nothing.
Response: Counsellor may be checking employment opportunities. Previously trained a blind person in social work after agencies showed interest, but he could not find a job. Referred caller to B.C. Vocational Division for Rehabilitation.
 Caller resisted suggestion - "They set it up as a help, but it's really a handicap - should let us try the regular system and see if we can hack it."
- 13) Woman taking Grade X equivalent through Manpower as a first step towards becoming an X-ray technician. Cannot get assurance of seat in Grade XII equivalent program, even though she has "B" average grades and recommendation from her teachers. Counsellor won't give her a decision till she finishes present course - if she misses a seat says she can go back on welfare again. "They are discouraging, not encouraging." Women in same course from out of town have been guaranteed seats.

13) cont'd

Response: Manpower policy is definitely not to decide on next course till first one is completed.

14) Young Man - 90% of the problem with Manpower is their arrogant attitude - They forget they are servants, not masters. He got nowhere until he wrote to the Prime Minister, and the Minister of Labour wrote to the Regional Office. Now is getting "top notch service".

15) Man, age 49 - questioned what qualifications counsellors have to have. Was told by his counsellor, young man of about 24, that there were no jobs listed that he could qualify for - "go and look on your own".

16) Man, 58, very pleased with his experience with Manpower. Interviewed by young counsellor - "she was almost like a psychiatrist". Three months later she phoned to say he would have to take a drop in pay (he had been earning $148 a week). "I should have told her I was willing to." No job yet, but he is confident she is doing her best to find one.

17) Woman phoned to say her son, age 22, has been out of a job since January. Has Grade XII, worked for a collection agency for several months but found it extremely distasteful. After last interview at Manpower felt completely worthless, wanted to jump off bridge. Acknowledged part of problem was in his own personality - he does not sell himself and cannot lie about his qualifications.

18) Salesman, cannot get help from Manpower to finish his grade XII, which he needs to get into a more productive job which is available to him.

Response: BNA Act does not permit federal government to provide academic courses.

Salesman: Then how is it that Manpower is paying for training insurance men in a course at UBC? How is the country going to get any return out of that? Why should they be able to get it and not me?

Response: He qualifies as a small business and we can pay for upgrading his skills to make him more efficient in employee relations, etc. ... "It's the law, we don't make the law. Our mandate is not to the individual, it's to the economy."

THE SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON POVERTY

EVIDENCE

Ottawa, Thursday, April 23, 1970

The Special Senate Committee on Poverty met this day at 10 a.m.

Senator David A. Croll (Chairman) in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, I call the meeting to order. This morning we have a brief presented by the Seventh-Day Adventist Church in Canada. Sitting on my immediate right is D. L. Michael, who has been a minister of various parishes of the Seventh-Day Adventist Church. In 1961 he wrote his exams in Osgoode Hall and is now a lawyer as well.

On Mr. Michael's right is Professor Ward Hill, Chairman of the Department of Religion, Kingsway College. Professor Hill is a graduate of York University.

Walter James Low, who is sitting beside Professor Hill, has his masters degree from the University of Toronto and is with the Ontario Department of Welfare.

Mr. Michael, will you now start the discussion, please. Each of you can take a few minutes for opening remarks, after which we will open the meeting to questions.

Mr. D. L. Michael (Pastor, Seventh-Day Adventist Church in Canada): Thank you Mr. Chairman and members of the committee. The Seventh-Day Adventist Church in Canada does not profess to have any particular competence or expertise to put at your disposal, but such experience as we have had in this area and whatever observations or comments or views we have we certainly would want to make available to your committee, especially in connection with your very worthy undertaking.

It is true that probably of all types of organizations in the private sector the church very likely comes as close in its contact with the disadvantaged as any other organization in the private sector might. While there may be a tendency to say that the poor we shall always have with us, I do not think the attitude or view of the church is that they need always be poor or that they need always remain poor. We may always have the problem with us; it may not be capable of complete eradication without risk of recurrence, but, certainly, the view of the church is that this is a problem which must elicit its concern and its efforts at alleviation and, hopefully, elimination at least in so far as individuals are concerned.

The Seventh-Day Adventists are a minority Protestant denomination numbering around the world in the vicinity of two million members, but carrying on a very extensive program of medical and educational activities not confined alone to their members. This has given us an insight into this problem which, while it may not be as deep and penetrating in any one community as others in that community may be, nevertheless has given a certain overview and a certain perspective that we feel may lend some significance and some background to the observations and comments which may be made here today.

The two gentlemen on my right were primarily responsible for the substance of the brief. The section on general observations was prepared by Professor Hill, and the submission dealing with specific suggestions or items for the alleviation of poverty, its elimination or reduction, was prepared by Mr. Low, who is a member of the Ontario Department of Social and Family Services, Vocational Rehabilitation Branch, and is a graduate of the University of Toronto with a Master's Degree in Sociology.

I think I will ask Mr. Hill to deal with the general observations, the part he was responsible for, and perhaps summarize them. He may wish to suggest points which have been omitted at the time the brief was in preparation, and if he does, I am sure he will feel free to do so. Following that Mr. Low will make some comments on the specific submissions contained herein and perhaps some others that should be included.

Professor H. Ward Hill, York University, Seventh-day Adventist Church in Canada: Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, perhaps you have at times noted that the Church is inclined to express a certain degree of apprehension at government intervention into certain areas where personal freedom of decision is held to be paramount, and where citizens have been deprived of access to the style of life which we believe incorporates the minimum standards of goods and services. It is our feeling that government has not only a very legitimate right, but actually a mandate to intervene even in what we may call private affairs in this sector. We feel, and it is our very firm conviction, that the state is in the singular position, the unique position I might say, to make provision for the welfare of its citizens, because only the state has the institutional machinery that can co-ordinate all the individual and group energies in an attack on poverty. Granting the fact that the government has, as we feel, a very vital interest in this area, there may be those who would somehow sense that the result could be a type of government paternalism, and we believe that this might be prevented or this concept might be altered. As Erich Fromm has suggested, it can be overcome by a simultaneous drastic increase in democratic procedure in all spheres of social activities. In other words, we feel that there should be the maximum use of all of those autonomous self-help projects, but directed by government.

Now we also feel that there must be a maintenance of income at a level which will allow for adequate housing, for health care, clothing, food and all other basic needs. But we can see the element of truth in the fear that government hand-outs can foster dependency and lack of initiative on the part of some who remain indigent even in the face of work opportunities, but we feel that this must not cause us to lose sight of the fact that many of the poor are ambitious to have jobs, but they are unable to find appropriate work or to support their families due to inadequate wages.

Perhaps a major role of the Church, as we understand it, and this we have not enlarged on in the brief, is that it has a very definite responsibility to the non-poor, because in some way the conscience of the non-poor must be so awakened that they would be willing to incorporate the poor into the larger society. In other words, we believe that the Church should direct its energies towards helping the non-poor in this very crucial area, because in some way there has to be a redistribution of means and in some way those who have the means must be prepared to accept this fact. We feel that any attack on poverty must indeed involve a very large spectrum of interventions in every facet of life. We feel that another vital role of the Church is this matter of social inclusion in that the poor must not be left to feel excluded from the mainstream of the community. It must not be such that they feel a sense of isolation. So, the Church by doing all that it can to include the poor, must direct attention to the fact that they must be included in the larger mainstream of society and must prepare those in the mainstream to accept this fact.

As I said, we feel this is a major role of the Church. We believe that there is at this time a very vast reservoir of public sentiment calling for the improvement of community life, and it is our very firm conviction that government would do well to channel this sentiment into specific areas worthy of support. It is in this area that my colleague will present some specific suggestions.

Mr. Walter James Low, Seventh-Day Adventist Church in Canada: Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, we have presented in this brief a few ideas that we believe would be helpful in alleviating poverty. We want to stress particularly that this is a question of alleviating rather than curing poverty, because poverty is such a complex thing with so many facets that we despair of ever finding a complete solution for it. The choices made, perhaps, have no particular priority, but we believe that the items suggested here are such that they will help in the fight to alleviate this problem of poverty. There are 13 suggestions made, of which I would like to mention just a few. One is the question of special education for the poor. It is well recognized that the majority of the poor, if not all of them, are people who have very little education—who may not in fact have completed elementary education. In our view, these people make up the bulk of the poor. Therefore it seems to us that in order to fight poverty, one of the major things that should be done—perhaps the first thing that should be done—is to try to raise the standard of education among these people so they can have at least a chance to compete with the rest of society.

Now, the question of establishing such education facilities is not on merely of setting up buildings and facilities. It seems to us that it involves something more than the normal school situation as we know it. It appears that we have to find some way of reaching these people and motivating them to want education. This seems to us to be the first thing. If we look at the drop-out rate in school, the highest rate is among the poorer section, and this ties up with the lack of motivation. I do not think it necessarily indicates a lack of ability, but simply a lack of motivation. This may be due to many things, including, perhaps, the need of money for enough food so that they can be comfortable while in school, the need of clothing, the need of an approach by teachers to understand the particular circumstances of these people. So, it is not merely a case of putting up facilities and supplying bodies to fill these buildings. Therefore, we think that education is something that should be stressed very much in the fight against poverty.

One other item I would like to mention is this question of special workshops. I am working in the field of social work and, in particular, in the field of rehabilitation, and this brings me into contact with many people who are handicapped in one nature or another, whether it be physical or mental. It has been my experience that there are many people—and I can only speak for Ontario—who, because of some disability, are unable to go back into the normal work force, or those who have not been in the normal work force are unable to get into it. Therefore, it seems to me that we need workshops where people can work, perhaps not at a competitive rate of employment but at a lower rate, but at the same time can be able to earn enough to maintain their standard of living, which we all expect our fellow beings to have.

These workshops could be helpful, not only to people who are handicapped but to many people who for some reason or another cannot fit into the competitive labour market. Many people, for psychological reasons—they have a psychological handicap, perhaps—just seem to be unable to fit in, and because of this there are many people on public welfare.

Using an old figure here, back in 1963 it was estimated that there were over 57,365 employable persons who were in receipt of some form of welfare assistance. That is a tremendous number of people who are employable. Many of these people, for some reason or another, cannot compete in the labour market and they need some form of subsidized industry where they can be gainfully and usefully employed, such as is operated in Holland and many other parts of Europe, where the handicapped have a chance to feel useful and be productive in the economy as a whole.

Senator Pearson: Mr. Chairman, I turn to pages 7 and 8. At the bottom of page 7 you talk about self-help projects as a method of aiding the disadvantaged. Would you suggest, if there were such a thing as a guaranteed annual income, that it should be given to the working poor first, so as to increase the production and therefore increase the wealth of the community, rather than work the guaranteed annual income in with those who are already on welfare?

Professor Hill: I believe we share the feeling held in many quarters that there should indeed be some type of incentive as far as the guaranteed annual wage is concerned. This poses the tremendous problem as to how to do this.

We see the method of subsidizing a job opportunity as something that perhaps is closely related to the guaranteed wage, but not precisely that. I am inclined to think that we would feel that, wherever there can be an association between personal initiative work and the payment of funds by the government, this is advantageous. This we would try to do wherever possible.

Senator Pearson: You would prefer this money, that you use as part of the incentive, to come from government rather than from volunteer funds? Do you think it would be possible to create a fund outside of Government altogether?

Professor Hill: We perhaps would be a little skeptical as to whether this might be accomplished, if it could be done.

Senator Pearson: We had quite a discussion the other day on the change of attitude of the public. If that change of attitude was strong enough, do you think you could work on a voluntary basis there? This might take time.

Professor Hill: Yes. I think this is the area of education that is very vital here, but I think the sentiment at the present time questions the outright handout from Government in this regard. As to whether this would be better facilitated by a voluntary fund, as against an outright government subsidy, this might be questionable. I am not so sure that the basic objection is removed when the source of the fund is voluntary rather than government. It seems to me that the basic objection is that there is payment given without a return in work. This seems to me, at least personally, to be the basic objection.

Perhaps a system whereby you could have a combination of government funds, supplemented, to whatever extent it can be, by private funds—excellent. But I am not so sure that by simply saying it is a private fund this will allay any objection to the idea of guaranteed wage. I am not quite sure that is true.

Senator Pearson: The reason I am talking about the voluntary fund is that you talk about the change of attitude in the rich—that is, the non-poor—you do not say the “rich.” It is a straight question of taxation; you do not build up the change of attitude at all. All it is further taxation, and the Government gives the cheque. This is all right for the poor and the working poor, to receive this cheque and have no strings attached to it, and that is a very nice way of doing it, but you are not getting a change in the attitude of the non-poor.

Professor Hill: It would seem to me the real problem here is that the people who will be taxed must accept the fact that their funds will be diverted into this channel. I do not think we get at that basic problem by making the provision from voluntary means. We must sooner or later meet the fact that there has to be a dip into the tax fund; and whether or not a preliminary measure of first utilizing private funds as a means of reaching this goal is a route is a questionable proposition, because it seems to me that basically that is not going to solve the real problem. A person must come to the point where he is willing to part with his income. That is the area that he has to be educated on. He does not concern himself so much if the poor receive private funds, he needs no education for that; but he needs education in the area in which he must himself part with his own tax money to accomplish this goal.

Senator Pearson: There is one further question I want to ask, on the matter of housing. On page 16 you talk about adequate housing. What type of adequate housing do you consider is necessary for the poor and working poor?

Mr. Low: I am thinking in terms of minimum medical standards, health department standards. If you are considering the type of housing units, whether single housing units, row housing or apartment housing, that is very difficult.

Senator Pearson: You are just thinking from the sanitary point of view?

Mr. Low: Yes, from the sanitary point of view.

Senator Pearson: You are not thinking about individual housing, row housing or high-rise, or anything of that kind; you just consider adequate housing from a sanitary point of view?

Mr. Low: It is known from previous studies of urban renewals, et cetera, that the idea of building these high-rise apartments and herding people together in them has not really changed or altered the people in any way. Here again I think education has to come in first. I think that people should first be educated, and then put into houses which they can make use of. When you put them into nice new shiny homes without first teaching them how to respect and make use of those homes it is just a question of time before you get another slum area all over again.

Senator McGrand: May I ask a supplementary question? How do you proceed to educate these people in an understanding of their problems, before you move them into a nice shiny home?

Mr. Low: This is perhaps why we emphasize in the submission the question of family agencies. You can call them family service agencies, or whatever you like, but these people have to be reached through some social agency which can educate them or re-educate them in the keeping of homes and the training of children, et cetera.

Senator McGrand: But you have only touched the fringe. Would you get down to the core? Go ahead and describe in detail, or a little better than you have done so far, how it can be done.

Mr. Low: I think this would involve the movement of a whole army of workers into the communities of these poor, and involving them somehow or other, and getting them to become interested in better management of the home generally, the care of children, et cetera.

Senator Hastings: Mr. Michael, I wonder if I might explore the very worth-while work that your church is doing as indicated on page 5. First of all, you are representing the National Executive Committee of the Seventh-Day Adventist Church in Canada?

Mr. Michael: Yes, senator.

Senator Hastings: That is the governing body of the Seventy-day Adventist Church in Canada?

Mr. Michael: That is right.

Senator Hastings: Is each congregation autonomous?

Mr. Michael: The system of church government in the Seventh-day Adventist Church is, if you will allow me to use an ecclesiastical term, a presbyterial form of government. Churches in a given region form a conference of churches, and then in Canada these conferences—such as the Newfoundland, the Maritimes, the Ontario and Quebec, the Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, and British Columbia conferences—form the Seventh-day Adventist church in Canada. So, we have borrowed from the Presbyterians and Methodists in terms of church government in structure.

Senator Hastings: On page 5 you state that the church has established 1,258 service centres. How many of these are in Canada, and what are they? What is a service centre?

Mr. Michael: Well, we have tried to encourage local congregations in communities to establish facilities and services that would meet some of the needs of the disadvantaged people. In large metropolitan areas where there are large congregations they have buildings or space which they have rented in the down-town area that is adjacent to the low income residents with a view to providing not just food and clothing but also—of the more sophisticated centres I am thinking of the newest one in Calgary where there is a continuing program of health education, narcotic education, cooking and nutrition classes, home making, and the type of service which we feel fills the gaps between the recognized and accepted services that a municipality or other organizations render to people who are in need in a small community. This may be merely a room or two rooms in the basement of the church which are open on certain specified afternoons or evenings, where people who need food or clothing or other assistance can go and indicate what their need is, and if it is possible to meet it then we try to meet it.

Senator Hastings: Are these staffed by professionals or by members of the congregation?

Mr. Michael: No, by members of the congregation.

Senator Hastings: And all of these 1,258 service centres are in Canada?

Mr. Michael: I believe the figures we have used here are all Canadian statistics and figures. We have not incorporated our North American statistics.

Senator Hastings: Then you say that you have 300 medical centres. Are those all in Canada?

Mr. Michael: We have two hospitals, and there are a number of either clinics or medical centres. According to page 6, we have 300 of these, but they would not be confined exclusively to Canada. From my own experience in the church there are clinics that some doctors will operate. A group of doctors will get together and operate a clinic for people in the disadvantaged areas. I think the figure of 300 would be too many for Canada alone. The same applies with respect to the 700 nurses who were graduated last year.

Senator Hastings: You say that you operate two hospitals in Canada.

Mr. Michael: Yes.

Senator Hastings: Where are they?

Mr. Michael: One is outside Victoria in British Columbia, and the other is in North York...

The Chairman: What are they called?

Mr. Michael: The Rest Haven Hospital in Sidney, British Columbia, and the North York Branson Hospital in Metropolitan Toronto, with a bed capacity in excess of 500 and a school of nursing attached to it.

The Chairman: That is in the Branson Hospital?

Mr. Michael: Yes.

The Chairman: How many beds are there in the one at Sidney?

Mr. Michael: The one in Sidney has 600 beds, and authorization has been given by the British Columbia Government for the erection of a new 150-bed hospital in the same community, and we have been asked to operate that one.

Senator Hastings: You state that 100 doctors complete their medical training each year at Loma Linda University. First of all, where did those doctors go?

Mr. Michael: A few of them come to Canada and a good many stay in various parts of the United States, but over the years I would say that an average of 10 to 15 per cent have gone to serve and staff church hospitals and sanatoria overseas in underdeveloped countries.

Senator Hastings: From ten to 15 per cent undertake to serve overseas?

Mr. Michael: Yes. Some who stay initially after graduation may, after they have become established and met their obligations, then volunteer for service, but of the initial group of graduates about 10 or 15 per cent go immediately into some sort of service overseas.

Senator Hastings: Then, we have these 50 medical welfare mission boats. Do they operate in Canada?

Mr. Michael: Not the fifty. We have one in British Columbia on the west coast. The others would be primarily in South America—in Central and South America.

Senator Hastings: Going on to the educational aspect, of the 4,972 schools operated by your church how many are in Canada?

Mr. Michael: The schools in Canada are elementary, secondary, and there are two post-secondary schools that offer tuition beyond grade 13. I would say that the total in Canada would be over fifty. It varies from year to year, but it would be in the range of 50 to 60.

Senator Hastings: Are your hospitals self-supporting, or are they subsidized by the church?

Mr. Michael: Well, the two hospitals in Canada, of course, come under the hospital insurance plans—under the B.C.H.I.S. in British Columbia, and under the O.H.S.C. in Ontario. Most of the hospitals in the United States are self-supporting. Of course, their system of health care is not as advanced as ours, as some would say, and in some of the areas overseas the hospitals are heavily subsidized by the church—at least, that is true in respect of those in the underdeveloped countries.

Senator Hastings: Those are outside Canada?

Mr. Michael: Yes.

Senator Hastings: And does the same apply to the schools? Are they self-supporting?

Mr. Michael: No, I would not say that any of them are...

Senator Hastings: Are they subsidized by the church?

Mr. Michael: Yes.

Senator Hastings: What percentage of your total church revenue goes to the poor?

Mr. Michael: If you include in the term poor those in underdeveloped countries, I would say that very close to 20 or 25 per cent of revenues from all sources finds its way either overseas or here at home in terms of services supplied that definitely assist the disadvantaged people. We operate summer camps in Canada for young people. True, the church's young people get the benefit of these, but in the last ten years we have increasingly made efforts to open attendance at the camps to anyone of any race or creed. This has been so particularly for those in areas where they do not have access to that kind of facility. Schools, similarly, are not confined to children of church members. They are available to anyone who wishes to attend them. For many years the church in its system of education above the elementary level has tried to stress a program of work and study. Until I enrolled at Osgoode Hall all my education had been obtained in church-operated schools. From high school level up I worked and contributed towards my education. We try to operate light industries, which have a twofold purpose. They are not only for vocational training, but to teach students that even though they receive a diploma, the work which enabled them to obtain it was honourable and worth while. We try that way to inculcate a respect for manual labour as well as the intellectual development. This has enabled many young people who would not otherwise have been able to afford university education or anything beyond the secondary level, or even secondary education in those areas where it is not publicly provided, to gain an education, because they have been able to work their way through school.

Senator Hastings: The reason I am exploring this area with you is that in discussing this problem with the poor I have found a rejection, indeed a hostility towards the Christian church in its work with the poor. The attitude is that the Christian church has become part of the affluent society instead of being with the poor. They reject you as they reject senators, because we are part of the establishment as it is. There is this underlying, or quite real and acute feeling of the poor that you have joined the money changers.

Mr. Michael: We feel this and are very conscious of it. In looking at our history in terms of denominational existence, we are not that old. We are over 100 years old, but as we become more institutionalized, with nice, big beautiful hospitals, schools, printing and publishing houses, beautiful church edifices and bigger administration offices, there is this great feeling that the church is becoming big business and perhaps is not as close to its original mission and purpose as it might have been in its early history. We are keenly aware and sensitive about this. There are members who help to keep our church officials quite aware of this. There are others who think we will render a better service with better facilities. We are going through that period of self examination and questioning, whether bigger hospitals, schools and churches with beautiful pipe organs actually meet the needs of people any better than if we just met in a very primitive, humble hall with a piano, not in tune at that.

Senator Hastings: I wonder whether Christ would regard 25 per cent of the income as adequate for the poor?

Mr. Michael: When I said 25 per cent, and I am guessing here, I am not counting, for instance, that portion of church funds that goes to pay the salaries of its own staff or of certain institutions such as our schools, colleges and universities. I would eliminate those. I am thinking of the money spent for youth camps and summer camps, clinics, dispensaries, welfare centres and community aid centres, more directly towards helping people in need and not, shall we say, the established institutions or structures of the church. I will not concede that the latter do nothing for people. However, their continued relevance may be open to question. I certainly agree with that.

Senator Carter: May we return to the line of questioning opened by Senator Pearson with respect to attitudes. Poverty is a national and stupendous problem. It cannot be solved or even alleviated without public support. To get that public support, as you point out in your brief, we must have a change of attitude in the public. You referred particularly to a change or quickening of the conscience of what you termed the non-poor, but it is almost the same as changing the attitudes towards the poor. What impact is the church having in this? I presume you can speak for your own denomination, but I would like your ideas of the church generally. Is the church really having any impact on people's attitudes or on their consciences?

Mr. Michael: This is always hard to assess, senator. We can only take some illustrations or examples and see where people who otherwise were not concerned are now quite concerned. I sat in a board meeting where a doctor from Calgary who had a very flourishing, lucrative practice, along with some of his colleagues in the medical profession, have taken time to establish a centre in Calgary. They put their own money into it at this stage, having not received any money from the administrative levels of the church yet. This is one of the problems we face, to respond to these situations promptly and creatively. These are not men who are doing it because they need to for the sake of their income. They are doing it for the sake of the people in the area. In this centre there is a continuing program of year-round education, health education, courses on nutrition, diet and healthful living.

Senator Carter: How many people are involved in that one project?

Mr. Michael: From the reports given to us I would say there are probably 25 or 30 people in that particular congregation who are volunteering time and money.

Senator Carter: That is out of one congregation?

Mr. Michael: Yes. There are instances of people becoming concerned at a situation in the community. They have volunteered to do something and are doing it. This gives us some encouragement to believe that if people can be motivated and led to feel that they are doing something that is needed they will do it. The secret is to get them involved. It is physically doing it, not just pulling out the cheque book and writing a cheque for it. This way they give time and effort and something of themselves, apart from their bank account. We are finding that in surrounding congregations it is quite infectious. They want to get in on the act, they want to do something like this that will be helpful and useful, and we are very heartened at how people respond in this respect.

I am not saying there is a great tidal wave of this sort of response; it is very isolated at this stage, but it does give us hope that if people can be approached, have the need pointed out and shown they can do something about it in practical terms, a lot of people still have enough of something in them that they respond.

Senator Carter: Do you agree that this sort of thing has to be speeded up?

Mr. Michael: Yes, I would not argue with that.

Senator Carter: What are you doing about speeding it up? What do you think should be done or can be done, not only in your own denomination but in others?

Mr. Michael: In this area I think probably sharing with others who are not getting involved the experience of those who have ventured and tried and done something certainly helps the telling. If you want one illustration of a practical means, many of these people, when it comes to their contribution of means—and we recognize that it takes more than money, it takes personal involvement, Churchill's blood, sweat and tears, and he never said anything about money in that famous speech, or about taxes, although I am sure it was implied that maybe some of the tears involved taxes; it was personal involvement and personal sacrifice—a lot of the people who are ready to help, particularly those in the affluent sector of church life, run into this problem, that 10 per cent is the limit they get any recognition of or assistance on from the government. Many of these people are giving much more than that and would appreciate a little help in that respect. This is something about which they have been disappointed in the White Paper on Taxation; that 10 per cent limit that has been there for decades; nobody feels any need to raise it, and yet we think this would help the private sector, and maybe reduce or remove some of the pressure for government always to step in and dispense the welfare programs.

Senator Carter: It would not help their motive, would it?

Mr. Michael: I think it might. Motives, you see, are mixed; they are not all altruistic. In attacking something like poverty, let us use every motive, that is at least legitimate if not altogether morally the purest. Let us use every motive we can to get people involved in doing things.

Senator Carter: I was interested in your reply to Senator Hastings' question. If I could sum it up, what you were saying was that over the years there has been a gradual transfer of responsibility from the individual to the impersonal, from the personal to the impersonal, the children's responsibility for elderly parents being transferred more or less to the government. There was a time when the congregation accepted responsibility for the poor in their midst. That has now been considerably watered down. It is the same thing with the community. There was a time when there was family enterprise, when the enterprise itself accepted responsibility for their employees. Now the tendency is towards the impersonal corporation, which has no body to be kicked or soul to be damned.

Mr. Michael: Nor a heart.

Senator Carter: There is this general transition, and with it the transfer of responsibility. The social measures that we undertake to solve the social problems must of necessity accept responsibility, and by accepting responsibility you diminish the individual responsibility. I do not think that is a good thing. I do not believe it can be avoided, because if government accepts the responsibility somebody else gives it up. What is the church doing to offset the effect of that on individual character?

Mr. Michael: I think again the approach has many facets. In the training of young people in our schools there is a great deal of emphasis on self-reliance, on not looking for hand-outs, and not thinking, "Let the proverbial George or the government do it." It is increasingly difficult in a complex society, in a welfare state, to develop this element of self-reliance. I can appreciate your comment on the church having once been responsible for medical care, for assisting the needy, but what do you in our large metropolitan areas where not everybody belongs to the church, and the church may not represent everyone? How then could it extend its services, as it once did in the small agricultural economy, where it was the force in the community and everybody shared and participated in it, it was the vehicle for that ministry of assistance to those who needed it? These are the practical problems we face. We try to do it through our hospitals.

Senator Carter: It is the same spirit, though, is it not? Whatever denomination you belong to, you are still motivated by this same spirit.

Mr. Michael: Let me just give an example of how this affects us today. I am a member of a congregation in which we have tried to help those in need. If there is a disaster, if a family is burned out of their home, a young parent dies leaving children, there is quite a surge of sentiment in the congregation to help. Let me give an illustration of how the change has an effect. I know a young man who was working his way through school, his wife was ill and had to have heavy surgery. The need was made known and we were asked to help and assist. We found out that he did not carry any medical insurance; he was not going to be bothered with that; God would provide. Well, God turned out to be me, you see! I would have been much happier to have helped contribute to the premium for hospital insurance and medical care than to be confronted later on with a $800 or $900 or $1,000 hospital bill and asked to kick in with $25 or $50. I would have been happy to kick in with $2.50 towards the premium, and felt I was helping him to help himself.

Senator Carter: That is not quite what I had in mind. A few days ago we had before us people from the United Church, and among the witnesses was a labour expert, or a labour advisor, who referred, if I remember correctly, to the beginnings of the Labour Movement, and to the Tolpuddle Martyrs in the old country.

The Chairman: Mr. Secord.

Senator Carter: Yes. Is that not the kind of spirit we must get back to if we are to solve the problems with which we are faced today, including the problem of poverty. Is not that the missing factor? What is the church doing? The church does not seem to be doing anything to create that spirit these days. Those people had a genuine concern for each other and their community, which was born out of their Gospel teaching, their religion, their belief and their faith, which showed itself in this act of concern and brought them together in a union which grew into a tremendous world movement, but which has now lost sight of its early chart and compass.

Mr. Michael: This is a problem. We recognize this trend away from personal involvement with the needs of people. We are trying to combat it by continually keeping our people aware of instances of need and calling for their help; not saying to them that those in need can get help downtown from the city welfare department, but rather that they are getting some help there but not enough, that we have been asked to help. We try to keep involved, but we face the problem that the larger you get the more difficult it is still to retain that personal touch.

Senator Carter: It is very easy for a rich man to raise one hundred dollars. He does not have to think about it any more until someone comes around for money next year.

Professor Hill: Mr. Chairman, if I may just offer a suggestion. If it is true that we can see that the churches have become a part of the establishment and a part of the affluent society then might we possibly see that this puts the church in an advantageous position to speak to those who are in a position to involve themselves. It is a fact that at the present moment this topic is occupying much of the energy that is put behind the pulpit.

I have just recently attended the Canadian Council of Churches in Montreal and I know that in our gathering there we spent a great deal of time on this very matter that this committee is concerned with. I think it is an encouraging fact that we do see so much emphasis placed on this. If, having the ears of those of this status, the church can take advantage of this situation and sensitize the conscience of these people by becoming involved, it is excellent.

I think the second part of your question deals with how do we somehow achieve individual responsibility even on the part of the poor. Certainly this must include the maximum involvement of the poor in their own situation. But due to the circumstances the Government has the advantageous position of being able to speak to all, whereas the church is necessarily limited by the extent of its constituency.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): Mr. Chairman, I would like to go back to this attitude business, but first I wish to ask a question of the witness. I was very impressed with your report and your answer to my friend's question in regard to the work you are doing around the country and all over the world.

I would assume that anybody can go to see your hospital, regardless of their race or religion, maybe a black sheep in the Catholic church. If I was living in a community where you are involved in these things would you accept me and will you accept anybody?

Mr. Michael: Certainly, senator.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): I was referring actually to a worker who wants to make a contribution, but who does not belong to your church.

Mr. Michael: For instance in our hospital in North York less than 50 per cent or barely 50 per cent happen to be members of the church. In other institutions we try, but perhaps should not, to give priority to those within the church. We feel that those who share the same philosophy might be able to work together better. As far as making the services available, they are available to all. In regard to accepting help and assistance, there are people in our congregations who are not formerly members but who are participating. There is a slight distinction made in voting of church officials, but this is not so even in communion, because we do not practice closed communion. This voting of church officials is a relic from a by-gone year of constitutional precision.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): Nobody has an answer to this question of attitude which has been discussed a great deal with regard to the poor. We are all facing this existing situation which is bad. Before we can change the attitude of the people by making contributions either by direct taxation or other means don't you think we should first find out how we arrived at this attitude? There must be a reason why the average person is somewhat sensitive to giving more money to the poor. Apparently we do not exactly do it voluntarily in many cases.

You have to classify the poor into various categories. There are certain classes of poor which no one has any objection to and they are really poor for a reason and a cause and there may be many causes. In my personal opinion this attitude towards the poor has been built up because of the abuses of the welfare by the poor themselves and not so much by the needy poor—I draw a line between the needy poor and the non-needy poor. You actually must know the people you are talking about.

There have been abuses of the welfare which is public funds and there has been misconduct. There is a case of laziness as well as the sad problem of alcoholism, cheating and falsification of facts. One of these will be picked out easier than the 199 cases which are needy. People do not build up their attitudes about the needy ones because these people receive their welfare payment and spend it for living and pass it on to their mothers and children. The ones who are abusing this welfare money are the ones who are spoiling the rest of the program and we have many of those. Let us not overlook the point that this is being done in many places. This is why we sometimes say that the welfare, as it stands today, has almost been a failure even when we are spending millions and millions of dollars. Never in the world or in Canada have the governments been so generous with public funds by trying to give money. There is the loss of conscience which we have built up in a certain group of people, but when it comes to dollars this conscience is completely gone. The attitude is that if it comes from the government, take it no matter how you get it.

What can we do to remedy this situation? We cannot pass all of this on to the church. I have heard a lot of people say that this is the work of the church and I agree with them but the church should possibly be our leaders. I know that in my church this is the mistake we have made and why we are in trouble. We have let our church leaders do all the work while we stood behind and never helped them, always saying that it was their job and let them do it. I think this mistake has been recognized now but it is too late. We are trying to reform and recognize ourselves and admit our guilt, only to find out that we were not on the job with our church leaders. This has brought about this issue. What do you think of this problem?

Mr. Michael: It is a real problem. I think the church has probably not done as much as it should have to teach its members that material prosperity is not the only issue of success. Perhaps the church has tended to pander to its more affluent members and probably has been afraid to stress the value or the validity of personal self sacrifice, which was one of the fundamental tenets of the founder of our religious heritage.

Perhaps labour and business have played a part, too, in putting the emphasis on affluence as a mark of success. That is, if we get more things, we are presumed to be more successful than the person who has fewer things.

To the extent that the church has become part of the Establishment, it may be it has accepted some of the ground rules of the Establishment, of the affluent society, that it is material things that mark your success in life.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): You seem to have got away from my question, which was, first, what are we going to do to break the attitude of this group that I have mentioned who will do anything to get anything out of the welfare system. The point is that, assuming the same class of people, somebody will arrive at a minimum income or something like that, there is then a certain group which I have mentioned, where I do not think we are going to better the situation if we gave them $3,000 this year, because they have not got the ability to manage their own business or their responsibilities. There is the head of the family, who has the responsibility of a wife and children, but he does not know how to exercise that responsibility. If we gave him $3,000 this year, possibly he will live on in the same way. He might improve a little bit, he will possibly drink the rest, he may change his car or do something like that; and the next year he will want $4,000 and it will go on like that.

On the other hand, there is this great majority that would make good use of it. We do not worry about them. We have no problem about that. The problem is with this...

Mr. Michael: Hard core.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): Yes. You have the word for it.

Prof. Hill: I am sure that all of us have been greatly troubled by this very question. It would seem to me that any worthy plan at all would always have the possibility of abuse. We will never get away from this completely, but even so, we should not abdicate our responsibility. It would seem to me that the extent of the abuse is to some extent related to the distance between those managing and distributing the fund, and the recipient. If this gap can be narrowed by an involvement of the people who are on the receiving end, and if to some extent there is surveillance of the operation at the local level, perhaps that is one way to cut down on this abuse; but I do not think we can ever completely eliminate it.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): I do not think you can do it in an individual case, as it is practically impossible. It may be that you may be able to make a different attitude in a community and then eventually you may find that these people would come in with the right view.

Mr. Low: This problem of the very few who abuse privileges of any sort...

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): Did you say the very few or the many few?

Mr. Low: The very few. I would say they might be 5 per cent, at the most. This points out that those people have a problem and their problem will come out perhaps in dishonesty—the psychiatrist calls it the sociopathic type of tendency, it is the tendency to go with the other fellow at the slightest opportunity. Therefore, the problem needs to be dealt with rather than restricted. If you give such a man $5, he will still try to rob you. If you give him $1,000 he will still try to do the same thing. The need is to deal with the problem, to re-educate them in that respect. We need treatment facilities, but what those facilities are I do not know. Surely for every problem there must be a treatment. If it is possible at all, if they are to be retrained, some treatment is needed rather than a punitive attitude.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): You mentioned training problems and a certain type of education for these people. It seems to me that in Canada now, at this very moment, we have a vast program of education, mostly for manual training of everyone, and anybody who wants to go to school today can get it and even can get paid. There are many points in that system which I do not agree with, but this is not the place to discuss that, we can discuss it in some other place. We are aware of some of their problems and are going to eliminate them, such as requiring that a man must have a Grade 12 education in order to become a barber. That does not stand up to common sense, as one does not need Grade 12 in order to become a barber—that is, unless one intends to specialize in a certain type of barbering line. If there is a man with a Grade 5 or Grade 6 education, who has good hands and is a clean man, he can be a darn good barber.

There are many faults in our system of education. You mentioned that, with all the facilities of education, you find that the lower class of people are leaving school, and you mentioned a possible problem at home. I believe there are sometimes more problems at home, rather than in the school. It may be a question of poverty, that there is a need for money there and it may be that when the young man comes to 15 or 16 years of age he needs a job and needs money, and this becomes one of the problems. You mentioned a special type of training and I would be interested in that, in a few words.

Mr. Low: I was thinking of this question which was mentioned about drop-outs. There can be a poverty attitude also towards the normal system of education that we have today, that these children and their appearance show that these have not had enough education. Perhaps it is their appearance, and so forth. They have not the attitude to want to make use of the educational facilities we have today. That attitude is not built into them. It is something quite far away from them. These things are far apart from them. Many of these homes do not have even a newspaper, much less a book, to get the children into the habit of wanting to read, to learn. The biggest thing that many parents want to do is to get their children out of the home, they get to a certain age and they want to get them out so that they can bring in a few cents.

These facilities we are speaking of here will include many other things—such as a force of workers, a force of people who will be able to teach people gradually, right in their own homes, perhaps, the need and value of education, so that they can make use of the facilities we have.

The Chairman: Are you talking about education that is pertinent to living and life? Is there a failure in that kind of education?

Mr. Low: A failure of the people to make use of it.

The Chairman: Not the people. I am not talking about people. You are talking about education. I am asking you what your view is about the pertinence for living of the kind of education that these people receive?

Mr. Low: The point I am making, sir, is that the educational system that we have today is very pertinent to making a living—that is true, it is geared to making a living—but the people are not making use of it. They are just not ready to make use of this thing. The bulk of them make use of it. Perhaps this is one of the unfortunate things about education today, that it is so geared to making a living that it has gone the other way. It is geared to making a living and not really doing what it should do.

The Chairman: What should it be geared to?

Mr. Low: Educating people all round, and not merely from a materialistic standpoint.

The Chairman: Should not the first education be towards making a living, and afterwards taking a broader concept.

Mr. Low: That is a very debatable point.

The Chairman: Yes, it is debatable.

Senator McGrand: On page 9 of the brief, the last paragraph states that considerable attention must be given to helping the non-poor to discover the benefits of allowing the poor to re-enter society. I think that is the key, because it is really the highest barrier that we have to cross. The major problem is to convince those who enjoy our so-called affluent society that the poor need a lot of and a variety of help. The problem is to convince the non-poor that they should assist the poor as a matter of duty.

Another question is how to assist the poor to achieve the success that comes to them by the exercise of their right.

Professor Hill: Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that involved in this question is the matter of the extent of militant activism that we might encourage on the part of the poor. If I may return to the first part of your question, how do I encourage the non-poor to admit the others to their society, all I have said so far is that there is the factor of motivating conscience, where we have the teaching of altruism from the pulpit and in every other way possible. That is one factor, but something else to be considered is that there may be a matter of necessity in that the organized and militant poor will take their share and, therefore, we must recognize this as an imminent possibility which may in itself serve as an avenue of motivation.

As to the second part of your question, how do we get the poor to take advantage of what is theirs as a right, frankly, I have some degree of hesitancy about encouraging too militant a stance, because associated with the most militant endeavour is merely a grudging response on the part of those against whom or toward whom it is directed, and while it is true that it may apparently gain a temporary concession it may so embitter the ones against whom it is directed that they will use other means, coercive means, or they will respond in kind, and we will have a problem.

This is not to say that it is not appropriate on occasion to utilize collective bargaining of a sort, where people may get together and make their case known. That is fine. But I think an educational approach to the poor which will acquaint them with all available opportunities and encourage them to take advantage of them would be better.

Senator McGrand: That is not answering my question, though. The last part of my question was how do you convince the poor people to achieve the most success through their right? I am not talking about collective bargaining. I am not concerned now with the management-labour conflict. The question is how to convince the person who is receiving social assistance to make a success of his life through the utilization of what comes to him as his right in the payment of welfare. In other words, how does he lift himself up the most, morally as well as economically?

Mr. Low: This again involves the special education we were talking about, senator. We need to send workers into the communities. Call them what you will, community development groups or organizations, they would be specialists organized into small groups whose purpose would be to change the concepts and values of life among the poor so that they will want something better. In addition to that, provision will have to be made to give people the opportunity to lift themselves up.

In any job the unskilled man is the lowest paid and is the first to be fired and so on; so it is necessary to find sufficient motivation in industry, or elsewhere, to cause the unskilled person to want to learn and to work. Such motivation together with education will help to get him above his present circumstances, but he must be able to see a goal to which he can aspire. As it is today, many of these people can see no way of getting out of their particular circumstances so they give up.

Senator McGrand: In the problem of welfare we have two forms of failure; there is the personal failure and the failure of the system in which a person lives. Families who fail in this rat race in which we live need help. That means guidance, and perhaps guidance implies supervision. You suggested a few moments ago that we might need a whole army of agencies. I should like to know what form these supervising agencies should take and what disciplines should be used by those who administer welfare, and what disciplines should be used in the attempt to teach poor people that they can have success in rebuilding themselves only by exercising certain restraints and developing certain good and necessary techniques in the spending of money.

How do you obtain that goal?

Mr. Low: Before answering your question, may I digress for a moment? It has been suggested that if automation proceeds at its present pace we will all be out of work in a matter of ten years because machines will have taken over our jobs. If that comes to pass, what would be the purpose of teaching people job skills? There would be no jobs for them.

Senator McGrand: I am not concerned with job skills but with the personal adaptation to environment and milieu.

Mr. Low: In other words, how to improve the quality of their living right within their present environment?

Senator McGrand: Yes. So far as my question is concerned, the matter of job skills is irrelevant because these people would be receiving money one way or another. The question is how to teach them to use what money they have to create for themselves a worthy citizenship.

Mr. Low: Well, so far as the kinds of disciplines involved are concerned, that is a rather controversial issue; all manner of specialist feel they should be involved. Psychiatrists, psychologists, sociologists, economists and so on; teachers, educators; home economists, homemakers, public health nurses: there is a vast array of forces capable of being called upon to help rebuild these people and help give them the new concepts of life they need and the desire for a new quality of life. I believe it requires all of that.

Senator McGrand: We have been talking about how to convince the non-poor that the poor really do need help. The peculiar thing is that most people are basically charitable when activated, but are not susceptible of sustained activation. For example, if news gets around that a child in a poor community needs to go to the Mayo Clinic for heart surgery, a fund is set up, and usually the fund is over subscribed. But the problem is how to convince people to keep that sort of practice up in order to enable the poor to re-enter society. How do you convince people who will contribute generously to an emergency to adopt a policy of continuance participation?

Mr. Low: The child is an object of appeal to all people. Funds are readily raised for children. That is why there are so many hospitals for sick children and crippled children and so on. But when we want to raise money for adults we find that people are not so responsive to adults. An adult must fight and make his own way, and if he cannot do that he is a failure and it is his own fault. But we do not tend to blame the children in this way.

Senator McGrand: You and I know these phonies we see on the side of the street selling pencils because they say they are deaf and dumb. Everybody knows about this, and yet some of these people can become fairly wealthy from imposing on the charity of the passers-by. I am not saying this charity is restricted to children. It comes to anybody in personal dire need, but how can you build this into our system of government?

Professor Hill: Senator, may I suggest that I think all of us or at least many of us are not quite prepared to admit that the poor are worthy unless they are making some contribution to society. Implied in your question here is the thought that there may be a poor person who is capable of working, but all he is doing really is receiving funds from the rest of society. Now your question is this; can a person actually lift himself morally if he is merely the recipient rather than a contributor? It seems to me that there is the real question. What can you do with that person? Are we prepared to accept it as a worthy stance to do nothing at all? I do not think we are. One way is to somehow involve the person in making some contribution. It may not be along the lines of traditional work, but it may be along the line of rendering some service to his fellows. There has to be some type of outgoing or outreach service impulse acted out, it would seem to me, in order for that person to become what we would consider a worthy member of society.

Senator McGrand: That is what I meant when I said that it is the highest barrier we have to cross.

Senator Fergusson: I would like to thank the delegation for coming before us because they have given us a lot of information about what they themselves are doing that I did not know about. Their study is very informative and I think some of their ideas are excellent. I had thought of speaking on many of the subjects that have already been discussed, but they have already been dealt with. But now I would like specifically to refer to page 6 of the brief where you say that you have 4,972 schools operated by the Seventh-day Adventist Church. Then on page 18 you discuss day-care centres and say how important they are. Are any of these schools kindergartens or do they start at the regular age of six? Do you have any day-care centres?

Mr. Michael: Mr. Chairman and Senator Fergusson, I am not aware of any day-care centre that the Church operates as such. My knowledge of course is really limited basically to Canada and a little bit of what the Church is doing in the United States and less still about India where I was born of missionary parents. There are some kindergarten facilities that the Church operates in some areas, usually in larger centres where there is a greater demand for them, in connection with an elementary school. Here I would like to correct a statement I made to Senator Hastings in reply to his question dealing with the statistics on page 5. As I re-read that paragraph, I find I was incorrect in the answer I gave. I was incorrect when I said that referred to Canada. I do not want to give the impression—none of us would, and I would be taken to task by my colleagues if I did so—that we are doing a great deal and are proud of it. We are in fact a small communion and our efforts are very feeble in comparison to those being made by others. These statistics and this section of the report in our brief was prepared by the secretary in charge of our lay activities, and we would not want for one moment to blow this up or to inflate it. These statistics are based on a North American basis.

We recognize this need for educational facilities and day-care centres would be one area the Church could enter into by using existing facilities. Again, the problem would be one of staffing and in some provinces of meeting the requirements of licencing for such centres. This begins to make it difficult for the sort of do-it-yourself spontaneous undertaking to get underway because you have to meet certain requirements in the interests of the children committed to the care of the centre. This makes it very difficult to initiate them in the atmosphere and spirit that Senator Carter very nostalgically evoked for us when he harked back to the question of the way the Church would often meet a need.

Senator Fergusson: Because the question of day-care centres comes so much to the fore at present, and because so many witnesses have stressed how important it is to reach the children at very early ages, I was thinking that in the interests of education it might start before the regular school.

Mr. Michael: I think this is an excellent suggestion, and one which would merit some study and consideration by the Church as being one way in which it can meet this need. Another reason why it has not been entered into is because in this community there has been a very strong feeling that children should not be deprived of parental care and attention by being parked in an institutional setting at too early an age. There are many members of this communion who even feel that sending a child to school at six is too early. My own parents while still living in India—and it was relatively easy to do so there because we were living in a Church environment in a Mission centre, and the school attendance laws and truancy provisions were not as rigid as they are now—did not send me to school until I was past my seventh birthday. There are some people, particularly my own children, who feel that I have suffered a certain degree of irreparable retardation as a result of that delayed start. But there is a strong feeling among the older members of the communion who feel that the child loses a lot if you pack him off to school at four or five as they are required to do in some countries. But I think that by putting them in the context of a day-care centre for working mothers, you might have an acceptable approach to the problem, and I think it is a very constructive one that we would like to carry back.

Senator Fergusson: I notice the suggestion on page 17 where you have pointed out that in many cases these children are deprived, particularly if they come from one-parent homes where there is no stimulation to learning. Then there is the suggestion that there might be a need to set up residential schools to remove these children from their environment. I may be wrong, but this is the first time this suggestion has been made to this committee.

The Chairman: But how do you read that, Senator Fergusson? What does it mean to you?

Senator Fergusson: What it says. Children who come from these homes where the atmosphere is not such as to encourage them to try to better themselves, to get education, and put them in a residential school where they will have this encouragement. That is what I read into it, and maybe I am wrong. Is that right?

Mr. Low: I was thinking here in particular of the hard core poor from broken homes, alcoholic homes, criminal homes, where most of the children would not have a chance. If nothing can be done to change the parents, to re-educate the parents, then it may be better for the child if he is placed in a residential home. I know all the stigma attached to the residential home and these mass group homes in Orillia and other places.

Senator Fergusson: I am not criticizing this. I just took it up in reading it, and I was interested.

The Chairman: I do not remember but I think, Senator Hastings, you said it was mentioned once before.

Senator Hastings: Yes, in the brief from the Secretary of State it was mentioned.

The Chairman: It had escaped me. I will examine the Record.

Mr. Michael: We found in residential boarding schools this sort of suggestion that I think Mr. Low has in mind. For instance, in underdeveloped overseas countries we have opened residential schools—in India, with which I am familiar, and in the continent of Africa. We found these children coming from homes where there was no great interest in education and they saw no need for it. They said, "Our family has been in this village for centuries, and you can get along here and you can till some scrap of soil outside the village." But when those young people come to the school there is no great pressure, no great arm-twisting to indoctrinate them, either religiously or any other way, and they invariably lift themselves up from the social and economic strata their parents were in. They go on with further education or get into some sort of work they never thought possible before. So if it has worked there, maybe it would work with this specific kind of problem Mr. Low has pointed out.

Senator Fergusson: There is another question I would like to ask. At the bottom of page 17 you state:

In short, what is needed is to introduce a whole new sense of values. This applies not only to the poor but to all segments of society. "Through unscrupulous advertising we have created a way of life that is lacking in moral and spiritual values."

Would you mind telling me where that quotation comes from I think it is very good.

Mr. Low: I am very sorry, but I do not have it.

Senator Fergusson: It is all right, I just thought I would like to use it some time.

The Chairman: I am sure it is not from an advertising agency!

Senator Fergusson: No, but it is quite true, that the kind of advertising we have is very hurtful, not only for poor people but for middle-class people, but is there any possible way that could be controlled.

Senator Pearson: Especially for women!

Senator Fergusson: Well, men buy just as foolishly.

Senator Inman: We had that question come up in the Consumer committee, and we could not seem to get anywhere with it.

I would also like to thank the delegation for such an excellent brief, with so much in it.

On page 15 you speak about the training programs, and I am going back to the employment question. At one of our recent hearings it was pointed out that in the United States many industries provide training on the job. Do you think this activity should be begun in Canadian industry. I think perhaps we call it an apprenticeship. I am a great believer in apprenticeship. Theory is fine, but, of course, in the old days people were apprenticed and got practical experience. I am thinking of Senator Fournier, when he was speaking about barbers. Would that take care of some of the unemployment.

Mr. Low: Mr. Chairman, in mentioning training on the job, I see this as a great need for those people who do not have the necessary academic background to make use of training in the trade schools, etcetera. I see the need for co-operation of industry to accept more people in training on the job. This is not a very widely accepted field. You have a lot of resistance today to people taking training on the job. The Department of Labour has fostered it, to some extent, but it is very difficult to find employers who are willing to accept someone for training on the job. I see this as a means of actually training many people who do not necessarily have a school background.

The Chairman: Did you say this was being done in the States?

Senator Inman: Yes.

The Chairman: May I make this suggestion. As I understand it, that training is being undertaken, and those people who are going in there are being paid something less than the going wage until they qualify. Have we tried that?

Mr. Low: Yes, we do have this training on the job.

The Chairman: Yes, but in training on the job, paying them less than we would normally pay a man doing the job. Is that what we do?

Mr. Low: Yes, that is correct.

The Chairman: Until he qualifies?

Mr. Low: Yes.

The Chairman: And you say there is some resentment to that—by the employer or by whom?

Mr. Low: On the part of the employer, it is very difficult to find employers willing to accept people for training on the job.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): I do not quite agree with some of the statements that have been made by anybody at this moment, because there is a vast program of shop training across Canada. I can only speak for New Brunswick, and I know something about Ontario and Quebec, and it has been very successful, with thousands of people in training who have been well received by industries. However, I do admit that some industries have been reluctant. They will train you to serve that purpose, to work in that particular shop. As far as the pay is concerned, in most of these places—and let us assume that the man is going to get $100—the employer will pay $25 and the Government $75. After six months of training the shop will raise him another $25 and the balance is taken off the Government. Finally, at the end of his training he reaches full employment. That is the way it works, and it has been very satisfactory.

Senator Inman: I was thinking about the problem in my own province of Prince Edward Island, because I do know of cases where young chaps, perhaps school drop-outs, are taken on. They do not get a high wage, but at least they get some money, and I always consider that some is better than nothing. They get training, and it works out well there. Of course, this is not big industry, only light industry there.

You mentioned somewhere in your brief that the non-poor must be awakened. How do you go about it in your congregations, trying to awaken the non-poor?

The Chairman: Most congregations have trouble just to stay awake. That includes all.

Senator Inman: I know it applies to every church.

Senator Hastings: In your church, senator?

The Chairman: You bet.

Professor Hill: I suppose that if there is a laxity on the part of the congregation, somehow the responsibility seems to get shifted to the ministry, so I suppose that in this respect the leader of the congregation has a primary responsibility. I believe though that many of the laymen in modern congregations are themselves very much awake. There is a core or there is a certain number of people who are already sensitized and who might become the core of a yet larger group. I think the wise pastor today attempts to utilize those in his congregation who themselves become the agents of propagation to the rest, you see. It is an effort to involve everybody as much as possible, and then by concentrating upon some particular objective—it is not enough to simply make some very high sounding moral injunctions, and expect them to lodge in the mind and bear marvellous fruition. I think if the congregation can be led to certain specific aims...

Senator Inman: In other words, you take projects to them, and interest them in them?

Professor Hill: Yes, exactly.

Mr. Michael: If I might interject here, I think one problem the churches tend to find—and I have found this in my own experience in parish work—is that there tends to be a resistance in the community to the congregation's getting involved in projects. There is a feeling that we have already got organizations to do this, and we are asked: "Why do you want to proliferate?" This can sometimes have a dampening effect on those who want to get involved. I do not say this as a criticism of the established agencies, both public and private, but they sometimes unwittingly give the impression that they are saying: "You do not need to get into this. We are doing this." There is a feeling that we are not wanted, and then a feeling that the problem is not as great as it was thought to be.

I have had this experience. We have asked welfare officials in a municipality whether there are areas or pockets of need where we might be able to do something that is beyond their budget to do, and sometimes we are told that they are taking care of everything adequately.

Senator Inman: By the way, I would like to congratulate your people in the little town in which I live—Montague, in Prince Edward Island. They do excellent work among the poor. I just felt that I should say that.

Mr. Michael: Thank you.

Senator Hastings: Mr. Michael, regarding the stirring of the conscience of the non-poor, I am going to suggest that there is only one group of people who will stir that conscience, and that is the organized poor. I was quite disappointed in Mr. Hill's rejection of militant activism of the poor. I am wondering if the church might not better utilize its efforts by working with the poor in pricking the conscience of the non-poor.

Professor Hill: Senator, perhaps I might be permitted a slight qualification. I did not intend to suggest that the poor being actively involved and making their case known as an organized group was questionable. What I do fear is that when the stance is one of a militant nature then it can often provoke violence, and I do have a serious question as to whether a pose that involves excessive violence is really fruitful of ultimate good.

Mr. Michael: To complement that observation, senator, I think I should point out—and I am sure you appreciate this—that the reason for this view being expressed by a church group is the church's historic apprehension of violence. The feeling is here that too often the threat of fear produces a reaction that is equally undesirable. Certainly, if we achieve a change of attitude by reason of fear then I think the change of attitude will not be a lasting one. You see, we then trigger it out of pure self-interest—and maybe that is not so pure. I think Professor Hill's feeling was that while we would not be opposed to the poor being active—in fact, we would encourage it—in the assertion of their rights in respect of articulating their need and spelling out how they want to see that need met, my friend's use of the term "militant" was in the sense of the threat of violence. We feel that you do not achieve lasting good by violence. Now, our friends to the south would say, of course, that history would refute that; that in 1776 violence did achieve something for them. We say: "No, we back an evolutionary approach."

Senator Hastings: Was not the Founder of our faith a militant activist?

Mr. Michael: I think He certainly was active, but I have never conceived of Him as one who was ready to employ violence on the person.

Senator Hastings: Did He not drive the money changers from the church?

Mr. Michael: He drove them, but it is a question of whether He flogged them out or showed them the door, saying that that was not the place to do that sort of thing. We do not want to quibble over terms, or play with words. I think we are agreed that the poor must be more self-assertive, and I think the church can play a useful role in constructively suggesting channels for that sort of activist activity.

It is not popular in Canada to cite examples from outside our country, but I have a great deal of respect for Martin Luther King's philosophy of passive resistance and non-violence. Some of his followers and some of his colleagues do not seem to have the same enthusiasm. As a boy I often rode my bicycle in the shadow of the jail where Mahatma Gandhi spent a good deal of his time as a guest of His Majesty's Government. I know the force that that kind of assertiveness can have, and I think that it is not inconsistent with those principles that we espouse and share with one another.

Senator Inman: I have one more question. At the bottom of page 10 you say:

Suggestions put forward for governmental action relative to the problem of poverty must be compatible with the basic principles of human justice.

Would you give us some examples of government action?

Professor Hill: Actually, what we had in mind is that it would seem that justice would require in a certain sense that the recipient of a benefit should make some return for it—there should be some exchange that is reasonable and just. So, we are saying that in whatever way government intervenes in this problem there should be an element of fairness—perhaps that would have been a more appropriate word—that must be seen and perceived on all sides.

Mr. Michael: Benefits should not be arbitrarily withdrawn, or without some opportunity for appeal. We may solve some problems, but by so doing we create worse problems.

Senator Inman: In other words, the recipients should not just get a notice that aid is taken from them.

Mr. Michael: They should not receive notice that it was taken from them three months ago, and that they should pay back what they have inadvertently received since that time.

Senator Pearson: On page 11 you say:

There now appears to be a vast reservoir of public sentiment calling for the improvement of community life.

In other words, attitudes are changing, in your opinion. You then go on to say:

Government will do well to channel this toward specific goals worthy of united support.

Then at the end of that paragraph you seem to be a little nervous as to how fast you can go, and you are a little scared, it seems, because you say:

Promises for the removal of poverty should therefore be restrained, lest failure to achieve the goals envisioned leads to further radicalization of the poor.

Why do you fear this?

Professor Hill: If promises tend to suggest more than we are in a position to deliver, the ultimate result is demoralization. We must make sure we will deliver whatever we promise, or else sooner or later the day of reckoning will come. I am not suggesting that we should not have bold and imaginative plans. Yes, this is a necessity. However, in stating what we are actually going to carry out, I am suggesting caution, lest one day we have to face a disappointed people.

Senator Pearson: In other words, you feel that you should have everything ready before you start to suggest that you are going to bring this program forward?

Professor Hill: In a sense. Naturally, we recognize that there must be considerable preparatory work and there enters the element of vision, but when we actually make a concrete, concise promise it should be with caution.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): Even when dealing with politicians.

The Chairman: Mr. Low, you have been talking very knowledgeably about education. It is my opinion that for the last ten years we have had open-handed, endless amounts of millions of dollars for education at all levels. Has that brought the results that we should have expected and wherein did we fail?

Mr. Low: If you are thinking in terms of results with regard to a particular group, this group with which we are concerned, it would appear that by and large it has not brought the results which we expected. This group has not moved at all and remains the same from one generation to the other. It would be a very interesting study for someone to make to see what percentage of this poor group has actually moved above the poverty level.

The Chairman: In the last ten years we have had great prosperity and great poverty. How do you reconcile that?

Mr. Low: It seems that the education has benefited one group and at the same time made the prosperity gap greater. One group has benefited tremendously and the other has remained at the same level.

The Chairman: If that is the case, and I was talking in terms of ten years, why have you educationalists not brought that to our attention long before this? When there was relatively no movement five years ago, why were the educationalists silent?

Mr. Low: To speak on behalf of educationalists, these people themselves are from a certain category, middle class for example, and they cater to that class. The people below them are not much of their concern.

The Chairman: As a matter of fact, you can see that many of the senators sitting here are agreeing with what you are saying. They know that only too well from actual experience. We had some discussion last week with the Presbyterian group on the work ethic. They related it biblically and brought it up to date. They said that in their view it does not mean what it meant in the days when the Old and New Testaments were written. Professor Hill, you have repeatedly said throughout your evidence that we must have incentives and have the people doing some work. You just do not hand out; you have got to have them interested in doing something. Your colleague said that automation will make sure that we have not got too many jobs available. In the light of all this, tell us what you think of the work ethic?

Professor Hill: I heartily endorse the Apostle Paul when he said if a man will not work, neither shall he eat. The principle involved is that there should be some contribution made on one part that appears feasible as a means of exchange from the other part. What is actually performed as the work is going to change vastly in every society and every age. However, I do not believe we have moved away from the basic principle. Surely we do not have the same type of work today that we had ten years ago. It is not precisely clear to us what our responsibility will be under automation, but I cannot believe that we would become totally irresponsible. I believe that the human character actually needs a sense of achievement and accomplishment. That is important.

The Chairman: Let me bring you up to date. In this day and age this is as real for you as for us. Consider a man of 45 or 50 years of age working in Dunlop's factory in Toronto for 20 years. The factory closes down; he knows nothing else and is a human being with no great savings. What is work for him? He has got to eat and live but he cannot get a job, or is not likely to, without retraining. How does the work ethic apply to him?

Mr. Low: He may have latent talent as an artist and may blossom out at this time and get more fulfilment out of his life.

The Chairman: Let us be realistic.

Senator Hastings: I think he is realistic.

The Chairman: That may happen, but not to a very great degree.

Mr. Michael: There may be a responsibility there with respect to the individual and I would not deny the responsibility of the company. A company that shuts down operation abruptly in terms of its employees is showing a degree of irresponsibility. I would not for one moment wish to soft pedal that the corporate responsibility of good citizenship calls for consultation and separation warning. There is a great tendency on the part of the worker himself to feel that he has a job and lives in an industrial community, a General Motors town. Many young people feel that if only they can get into GM they have got it made.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): They have got the world by the tail.

Mr. Michael: That is right, and a pretty good pay packet attached to that tail. I have the problem with my own children. I tell them that they are going into a job which may not always exist and they should have something in reserve. I have even told my girls that the whole pattern of society today is that you are going to get married and not to worry, the husband will do it all then, but that they must have some skill. The husband may be disabled and the wife will have to become the wage earner and should have something up her sleeve that she can do. If the employee did not have that self concern and self interest, certainly his union could have done something about it. However, I admit it is very difficult for them to see beyond the immediate problem of wages and benefits and they are not interested in training people for something else, because ultimately it means they will leave that union. I really think that many of those workers could have embarked a few years ago on some sort of evening course or correspondence course, or some training that would give them some preparation for this kind of calamity. I know that is not the full answer.

Professor Hill: I have pastored quite a number of congregations and I invariably have had a number of retired constituents. I have always noticed that disaster results when the retired person equates inactivity with retirement. If he comes to the point where he feels that he is on the shelf, he does not matter to anybody else, he is not needed, there is no contribution he can make, I might as well get his funeral service ready. I have seen this again, again and again. I believe there has to be some sense of a person fulfilling a need; he has to have a sense of achievement; there has to be something to absorb his energy; he has to feel that he is a useful member of society, or there is a problem.

Mr. Low: If I may make a comment on what Mr. Michael has said, he said it is typical of the middle class man who can think and plan ahead. All the poor man can think of is filling his stomach; he has not the ability to plan for tomorrow.

The Chairman: That was the next question. I was going to ask you, Mr. Hill. Take the ordinary poor man. We already have three generations in this country to my knowledge and yours. He asks himself what he is for. Now you tell me what he is for?

Professor Hill: If I cannot convince him, or if his social milieu is incapable of in any way getting across the point, that he is not for something, if he interprets his life or perceives it as useless, then I think disaster is there. I think the church has a responsibility to find something for that person today.

The Chairman: I am not getting on the back of the church. I am not blaming you. I am not questioning you as a church group, but using your basic knowledge of life. We are at the point where in this country we have 24 million people, with 800,000 or 900,000 heads of family who are what we consider poorly stricken. You know the line we use, I will ask you something about that in a minute. It is all very well for you and me to say that the man has a purpose in life, that he is there for some purpose. How does he answer it himself to himself? "Here I am poor and my father before me was poor. My children look as though they will go along in the same way." What is his thinking? You live with those people and deal with them, as we do. What are his thoughts?

Professor Hill: Frequently in those circumstances he is tempted to do all the things you just said, to feel, "What am I for? The implication is that I am useless." I think the temptation towards that is very strong. One type of approach is in the area of relating to his associates, that he is performing some type of service in that way so that there he has some perception of usefulness. Here, though, I think our religious faiths have something to offer, in that very important in all of our religious convictions is some element of provision for the future, even though we have to cope with gross disappointments in the present existence. I think many times a person can be equipped to face what may seem as insurmountable obstacles in his immediate environment, because he has the type of faith that envisions some type of future life where new equalities are present.

The Chairman: I am not arguing with you people in the church about the infinite. I am talking about the finite. Mr. Michael said that the standard, perhaps not of success, but that we accept for people today of success or usefulness in the community is possibly the economic. That is what he said, and I agree. Are we likely to be able to build the man up to the point where he feels he is somebody, that he has a use and a purpose, if we make some money available to him so that he has access to the things in the community that others have? Do you not think he would appreciate that a little more than some of the other things we have been promising?

Professor Hill: I think is a part of our purpose in being here. We are certainly not in any sense negating that what you have just said plays a vital part. We see it, but we feel that this in itself may not be the total answer.

The Chairman: No, we agree with that.

Senator McGrand: Mr. Chairman, you will remember a lot of members of this committee were on the committee studying the aging and the aged, and it was repeatedly pointed out to us then that everyone as he grows older should have continuing education in order to adjust himself to his environment, come to old age and grow old gracefully. Many of the poor, these drop-outs, the people who cannot rediscover themselves, as you say on page 9 of your brief, have grown old before their time. What applies to these people who throughout life have to adjust in order to grow old so that they do not have to re-enter society has equal applicability to the poor, who have to be educated, to change with their environment. Is that not right?

The Chairman: We do not disagree. I think Senator Carter has another question.

Senator Carter: Mr. Chairman, you have covered the two main questions, employment and the work ethic, in which I was interested. I was rather confused about the reference to workshops. What do you have in mind? In manpower training there are all sorts of courses that people can take and get retraining. Are you thinking of something different from that?

Mr. Low: In addition to that. With the manpower courses, a man who starts from zero, from no education, can perhaps get to grade 8, if he is lucky, and still he is at the bottom of the stream without a skill. In referring to workshops, I am likening them to a little semi-industry. Two or three years ago a gentleman came from Holland to tell us about what goes on there, where they manufacture anything from typewriters to television, radios, clothing and shoes. The people are taught to work, even though they are disabled or handicapped in some way; they are taught to produce.

Senator Carter: On-job training?

Mr. Low: It is on-job training, yes. Instead of giving them welfare the government subsidizes industry so that the individuals are not given welfare but receive the normal minimum wage, whatever it is.

Senator Carter: I would not call that a workshop.

Senator Inman: I have a short question. Perhaps it will only take a few minutes to answer. I was rather intrigued by what you said in regard to special education for the poor.

Mr. Low: By special education I meant getting this army of people we need to reach out through family agencies, and public health agencies into the homes of these people.

Senator Hastings: Don't we have an army now working—these specialists and so forth. Have they failed?

Mr. Low: They are not in the front lines, sir. We do not have these people reaching into the homes of the poor.

Senator Hastings: Where is this great army working now?

Mr. Low: That is a good question. Maybe it is the Ontario Institute of Studies of Education. I do not know.

Senator Carter: I gather that you have done a lot of social work. Have you discovered in your activities, among the very poor, that they have a totally different outlook on life as well as different expectations and different sets of values? For example, they do not expect marriage to last because their parents or grandparents' marriages did not last, and that their outlook is totally different from what we might call the non-poor.

Mr. Low: Their outlook is totally different. Perhaps the reason for this, I would tend to think, is that it is imposed upon them through circumstances rather than saying that they assumed this outlook because they feel that they are different and are going to be different from you.

Mr. Michael: I agree with that, senator. I find in my work now, as a lawyer, people come to me with problems and you can very quickly find out that they are in that category. For them it is a matter of survival. They are likely to lose a home, apartment, or be without housing when there is no job. The family has disintegrated or is on the verge of it. It gets down to very earthy issues. They are not thinking about careers or future for their children, they are thinking about whether they are going to make it to the end of the week or next week. This is a striking contrast to the middle class and up—these are artificial terms—because they are able to think and look ahead.

I know of a case where a couple was sent to me and the man was running a little trucking business. His debts were in the range of $30,000 to $40,000 and he was lucky if he made $4,000 or $5,000 per year. They are going to lose their home, but some generous person is willing to give them a mortgage at 18½ per cent. I could not tell them to take it because that would be no solution. It is really a question of life and death economically and socially.

Senator Carter: How can we come to grips with that kind of problem where you have got to re-orient them completely from their present environment to what to them is a foreign one.

Mr. Michael: This is where I think Mr. Low's suggestion that perhaps both husband and wife need some help on money management. The only practical answer is probably bankruptcy and then to start afresh so that they do not dig the same hole again and fall into it. This would be perhaps help for the wife because superficially she was viewed by those who referred the family to me as the good one, the brick who is standing by. I am sure she was trying to but there were many things which she needed to learn about in regard to her home. He had an alcohol problem, but he also needed a great deal of help in plain simple elementary matters, such as not hiring people unless you know you have work in order to pay them their salaries. Those types of people really need some practical help in terms of how to run their lives. Church, department of education and social family services can perhaps all make a contribution there but it becomes a question of absolute survival.

Senator Carter: Do we have these services. I know we have the services, but are they getting down to the people who really need them?

Mr. Low: It is a question of shortage and non-adequate staffing.

Senator Carter: There has got to be a concentration on that type of service.

Mr. Low: You need a real deluge to make any impact on the problem.

The Chairman: Are there any further questions? May I say on behalf of the Committee that you can see how carefully and thoroughly your brief was read by the page reference to it by the various senators. It was a thoughtful and convincing brief and you presented it very well this morning. We appreciate the fact that you took time and thought about the matter.

Of course, Reverend Michael is an old hand at this. He has been before many committees dealing with social matters over a period of ten or fifteen years. He was always Senator Roebuck's main witness on all those important questions and he has done himself credit in that extent.

Senator Hastings: I might mention that it was some 35 years ago in Oshawa that you said, "I would sooner walk with the workers than ride with General Motors". It may be of interest to know that through his years in the Parliament of Canada he has been a great humanitarian and even in the work of this committee, he is still with the workers.

lived is still held due to the efforts when the senator was a mayor.

Mr. Michael: I was first introduced to him by a parishioner 30 years ago in Windsor who told me one night that the house in which he

INTRODUCTION

The Seventh-day Adventist Church in Canada, through its National Executive Committee, wishes to express to the distinguished Chairman, and Members of this Special Committee of the Senate its appreciation for the invitation to appear and present its views on the subject of poverty.

The Christian Church is not unmindful of the difficulties and complexities that confront anyone who attempts to probe deeply to discover the causes of poverty and the remedies that can be realistically employed in a democratic society to eliminate or reduce the incidence of poverty. Too often the view that we shall always have the poor with us tends to obscure the fact that while it might not be possible to completely eradicate poverty, a truly free society cannot afford to sit back and do little or nothing to reduce it to the absolute minimum.

If we truly believe in the fundamental tenet of a democratic society, the freedom of the individual then, anything that curtails or destroys that freedom poses a serious threat to the very life of our society. Poverty deprives the poor of the freedom of choice. It deprives a person of his freedom to make those important, meaningful decisions that a free person must be able to make if he is to be truly free in our materialistic, free enterprise economy.

Seventh-day Adventists believe passionately in the freedom of the individual. The members of this Communion hold the view that poverty represents just as grave a menace as that posed by any tyrant or dictator that has threatened human liberty. To stand aside indifferent to this danger is to encourage the enslavement of our fellow men. We would be the first to admit that adversity can often result in the spin-off of patience and fortitude that characterize men and women of courage. Even as these admirable qualities are frequently displayed in wartime, no one would suggest for a moment that a little poverty is required in order to develop strong characters and good citizenship, any more than a little war is desirable because of the courage and self-sacrifice it often brings to the surface.

For these reasons, and because we do not believe that poverty is an essential weapon in the arsenal of the Church in pointing people to a better way of life, we wish to commend the Members of this Committee for the thorough, painstaking and objective study to discover the causes of poverty and the means of removing it. While we possess no special expertise in this area, and have no secret formula or magic policy to offer, apart from the great Christian principle of unselfish concern for our neighbour, we sincerely hope that the views expressed herein will assist not hinder, enlighten rather than confuse and encourage, not discourage the Committee in its admirable task.

HISTORICAL BACKGROUND

It was felt that it might assist the Committee to know something of the historical background of the Seventh-day Adventist Church and the reasons for its desire to submit its views on this subject to the Members of this Committee.

Seventh-day Adventists are a conservative Christian communion with theological antecedents that unite them in some respects with their co-religionists in the Catholic, Anglican, Lutheran, Presbyterian, Baptist, Methodist (United Church), and Congregational faiths.

Growing out of the great religious renaissance teachings of Scripture, Seventh-day Adventists emerged as a distinct church organization. Believing in the Holy Bible as the only sufficient guide or rule of faith, the name fairly sums up the outstanding and distinguishing features of their faith.

A conviction that the seventh-day of the week (Saturday) is the only day of religious worship mentioned in the Bible and observed by Christ and His apostles, leads Seventh-day Adventists to observe the Sabbath from sundown Friday night to sundown Saturday night. The Biblical teaching of the literal, visible, and physical return of Christ to this earth and the need for men and women to prepare for this cataclysmic triumph of the Christian faith is the other salient doctrine summed up in the name.

Seventh-day Adventists believe that governments "are ordained of God" and teach obedience to properly constituted civic authority within its legitimate sphere as a religious obligation. Adventists are known for their loyalty to their country and for their devotion to the great traditions of responsible government, parliamentary institutions and liberty. They view the preservation of our tradition of personal liberty as the inescapable responsibility of every loyal citizen.

Numbering nearly two million members around the world, (Practicing baptist by immersion only adults are counted) and over 18,000 in Canada, Seventh-day Adventists conduct a world-wide programme of Christian missions, education, welfare, evangelism and medical service to the community. It is their firm conviction that devout Christianity and a strong sense of social responsibility are not incompatible.

In harmony with this conviction, the Church operates a world-wide welfare and disaster relief service, resulting in over one million pounds of food and clothing sent overseas last year. To better service those in need at home and abroad, the Church has established 1,258 service centres and 8,523 welfare societies. All distribution to the poor from these locations is without charge. The Church cooperates with EMO and related Civil Defence organizations in training programme so that its members may be adequately prepared to serve in case of emergency.

Recognizing the shortage of medical personnel to adequately care for the needs of the sick, the Church operates over 300 medical centres. Some of these are teaching institutions where more than 700 nurses were graduated last year. In addition to nurses, approximately 100 doctors complete their medical training each year at the church's medical school affiliated with Loma Linda University. To help underprivileged people in isolated areas, the Seventh-day Adventist Church operates a fleet of over 50 medical-welfare mission boats. The denomination is now adding airplanes to speed services of help to people in remote places, with 35 planes now being operated by 200 licensed pilots.

An adequate education is essential if citizens are to participate in and support responsible government, a prosperous economy, and a progressive society. In helping to meet these objectives, 4,972 schools are operated by the Seventh-day Adventist Church. Many of these schools are located in under-developed countries and areas. As a further means of assisting youth in gaining an education and training, the denomination offers work opportunities helping the student to earn as he learns. Thus, by a combined programme of welfare services, missions, medical assistance, and education the Church is endeavouring to meet the needs of the disadvantaged in today's world.

GENERAL OBSERVATIONS

The Seventh-day Adventist Church commends the willingness of government to seek more effective ways of preventing, mitigating and removing poverty. It is not unmindful of the fact that much has been done to ease the burden of insecurity in our society. Strides have been made in giving the sick adequate medical care, and there have been extensive efforts to enable the handicapped to lead useful and productive lives. While much has been done to meet the needs of distressed persons, abuses to exist in society, and these facts are not to be lightly passed over to the suffering of the disadvantaged.

The very complexity of modern urban society places the State in the singular and unique position of making provision for the common welfare of its citizens. Only the State has the institutional machinery to coordinate individual and group energies in an attack on poverty. The Seventh-day Adventist Church does not see this effort of the State as infringing on the individual Christian's responsibility of giving assistance to those in need. Massive governmental aid conducted in a most efficient way will still leave pockets of physical need calling for a practical ministry by the Church, to say nothing of the other dimensions of the Church's concern which appear as an ever-increasing challenge.

In order to maximize anti-poverty resources, government might well encourage autonomous, self-help projects insofar as their methods for aiding the disadvantaged are compatible with the basic principles of our free society. It should be clear that the efforts of such groups play a complementary role in the comprehension programme which must be undertaken by government. The governmental structure especially involved in this work may be enhanced by incorporating so far as possible local representatives who may be in a better position to communicate more effectively than those whose social background puts a certain distance between themselves and the persons they serve.

We recognize that income must be maintained at a level which will allow for adequate housing, health care, clothing, food and other basic needs. We also concede an element of truth in the view that government handouts can foster dependency and lack of initiative on the part of some who remain indigent even in the face of work opportunities. But, this must not cause us to lose sight of the fact that many of the poor are ambitious and have jobs, but are unable to support their families due to their inadequate wages. By being trapped in such circumstances, their spirit may be broken and their initiative destroyed.

Should some form of guaranteed minimum annual wage be adopted, then it must have built-in incentives for personal industry. Such a plan, incorporating a negative income tax scheme, might have to be entered upon gradually on an experimental basis. If we give the right to government to take money from individuals, then it would appear that government should have the right to disburse its revenues on an individual basis, if it so desires.

Many appear opposed to the idea of making an adequate income a human right alongside of other human rights. In the face of this opposition, it is necessary to demonstrate logically that a guaranteed income would not undercut Canadian productivity nor increase inflation. It may be helpful to suggest that action in this regard is not only our Christian duty, but possibly our key to survival.

While direct economic support to the poor is vital, yet it appears to us that this must be seen in the larger context, involving a large spectrum of interventions in every facet of their lives. Unrelenting efforts to improve educational facilities must be accompanied by strong encouragement to the children of the poor to avail themselves of the opportunities provided in this area. Thus, we may eliminate the cause of poverty rather than simply treat its effects.

Again, it would seem that considerable attention must be given to helping the non-poor to discover the benefits of allowing the poor to re-enter society. To make a place for the poor may require a complete change in attitudes and actions toward the poor. Gaining permission from the secure segments of society for a diversion of resources may prove a formidable hurdle. A system which lays too heavy a burden upon the more prosperous elements of society will engender a sense of injustice and hostility which keeps alive antagonisms and fails to promote the peace and harmony which should characterize a just society.

Seventh-day Adventists believe that the Church should provide a helpful perspective to a social welfare programme. As poverty persists in the midst of plenty, they do not endorse tokenism as a way of escape. They feel that the Church should quicken the consciences of all men and help them to sense their responsibility to one another.

Personal morality is not irrelevant to the building of a just society. Dishonesty will invariably work to the disadvantage of the dispossessed. If honesty characterized all of our actions, a significant increase in tax revenues would be realized by the Federal and provincial treasuries. By discharging its prime responsibility of inspiring high moral standards among its parishioners and those who fall under its influence, the Church could stem some of the corruption of contemporary society and thus contribute toward justice in all human relationships.

Suggestions put forward for governmental action relative to the problem of poverty must be compatible with the basic principles of human justice. Otherwise, there may be indirect, unintended and unwanted consequences more baleful in their effects than the condition occasioning the special intervention of government.

We recognize the difficulty facing any specific programme advanced as an attack on poverty due to the conflicting interests of varied groups in our pluralistic society. Nor are proposals always compatible with each other. For instance, raising the minimum wage appears as a worthy objective, but it may have a negative effect on the goal of full employment, or on the battle to curb inflation.

There now appears to be a vast reservoir of public sentiment calling for the improvement of community life. Government will do well to channel this toward specific goals worthy of united support. The inherent weaknesses of both the individual self and the community as a whole are sufficient to guard us against undue optimism. Promises for the removal of poverty should therefore be restrained, lest failure to achieve the goals envisioned leads to further radicalization of the poor.

Enlightened government will surely seek the alleviation of suffering through intelligent efforts for social justice. Such efforts will activate the moral faculties of other segments of society, and the very effort to help the disadvantaged will result in the moral betterment of society as a whole.

SUBMISSION

Poverty in the midst of plenty is one of the paradoxes of our North American Society. It is a problem which, until fairly recently, was thought to exist only in the developing countries. Today, however, the poor are making themselves felt and heard, and they are not just a small handful as some would like to suggest. It is estimated that one third of our population are living in poverty; and to be poor in a rich country is far worse than to be poor in a poor country where there is not as much contrast between the "haves and the have-nots".

The psychological effects of poverty in our society are as crippling as the direct effects due to the lack of financial means, if not more so. The poor are relegated to the "other side of the tracks", they are the slum dwellers—often housed in dwellings that are dilapidated, lacking running water and indoor plumbing, and impossible to keep warm during the cold months. There they become estranged from the rest of society, and as such are deemed to be misfits and undesirables. It is no wonder that they lose all hope and give up their struggle for survival.

Any definition of poverty must include such factors as unemployment and under-employment, low wages, insufficient income, unskilled jobs, lack of education and training, poor health, poor housing, feelings of despondency and despair, repeated failures, feelings of being an outcast of society in general and inability to fit into the mainstream of life. The free enterprise system does not give evidence of its ability to deal with the problem, or perhaps it is not one that concerns it. Since poverty is a national problem it seems therefore that we need a nation-wide plan to combat it at the federal, provincial and municipal levels, which could incorporate most, if not all, of the following proposals.

(1) Full Employment

Full employment is a prime necessity for everyone able and willing to work. It is generally accepted that unemployment, under-employment, poor wages, and low earnings as a result of irregular employment are major contributing factors to poverty. In our present economic system there is no alternative to full employment, if poverty is to be alleviated. Long periods of unemployment and frequent interruptions in employment due to lay-offs lead to serious financial difficulties. The unemployed goes into debt. His household effects are repossessed. He moves to cheaper housing. He experiences dislocation of family life, and in general a lowering of the entire family's morale and self-esteem.

To meet the foregoing needs would require planning at the national level, and it may be that if the private sector cannot provide full employment then the government would have to provide jobs for those who are unemployed. The question may well be asked as to who is ultimately responsible for the well-being of all the people. Is this the responsibility of private enterprise, or is it the responsibility of government? Perhaps in twenty-five to fifty years time we may have to adopt a new concept of work, but for this and the next decade, work as we understand it, will still be necessary, if the incidence of poverty is to be diminished.

(2) Adequate Wages

A minimum wage that will provide an optimum standard of living for all is essential to serve as an incentive to work. In too many instances, the wages of the lower income worker are insufficient to maintain a reasonable standard of living, while welfare grants are higher. In a study on poverty in Ontario in 1964, the Ontario Federation of Labour stated that "approximately 30 per cent of the Canadian wage earners do not earn enough to pay income tax, and of those who do pay income tax, 55 per cent earn less than $4,000 a year, and 34 per cent or roughly one and a half million wage earners earn less than $3,000 a year." While wages have increased since 1964, it is assumed that the percentage of those not paying income tax is more or less the same. This situation helps to point out the need for a decent minimum wage.

(3) Adequate Unemployment Benefits

The lower income worker is most often the one who is frequently laid off. Because of his low income, he is unable to save up for that "rainy day". Present unemployment benefits rates can barely keep him from starvation, and the time lag in receiving it certainly adds to his difficulties in his efforts to survive. Unemployment benefits should be no less than 75 per cent of regular wages. It should also be noted, however, that large numbers of those who are unemployed do not qualify for unemployment insurance.

(4) Training Programmes

It is essential to train the untrained for available jobs. This may be done through existing Manpower programmes and/or training-on-the-job. The latter would require the willing cooperation of industry. Trainees would need to be given adequate living allowances so that they or their families would not have to go hungry while they are being trained.

(5) Relocation Allowances

Industries should be located within easy access of workers. However, there will be times when a worker may have to relocate in order to obtain work. Relocation allowances should be provided.

(6) Adequate Social Insurance or a Guaranteed Annual Income

Even if we could achieve full employment, there will be times when some people will be unemployed. This may be due to old age, sickness, disability, death, or displacement due to automation. An adequate income is needed to replace lost earnings. Perhaps a guaranteed annual income may be more appropriate to take care of the needs of the worker and his family as this would prevent anyone from using up all of his savings before becoming eligible for assistance as is more or less the case at present. An adequate guaranteed annual income would also enable our older citizens to retire in a measure of comfort.

(7) Adequate Housing

Mr. Leon H. Keyserling in his study on poverty has this to say about bad housing: "The slums are off-shoots of poverty, but slums are also at the roots of poverty, because they affect the health and morale and behaviour of those who live in them." Poor quality housing and overcrowding which form part of the culture of poverty contribute to poor health and low morale. Low rental housing that meets good public health standards is needed.

(8) Full Medical and Hospital Coverage

Sickness, whether due to disease, accidents, or any other reason, contributes to poverty. Every man, woman and child should have full access to medical and hospital treatment, and all of the auxiliary services that may be needed to keep him in or restore him to maximum health.

(9) Special Educational Facilities and Techniques

The children of the poor are the ones who have the highest drop-out and failure rates in our school system. Contributing to this is, perhaps, their inability to adapt to the middle class oriented school system, and the failure of middle class teachers to understand the ways and needs of these lower-class children. Many of these children are from one parent homes—parents who can offer no stimulation to learning, and worse, many who view the present school system with hostility and fear after having experienced nothing but failure and frustration themselves. Teachers who are specially trained to understand the needs and value systems of the poor and who are sympathetic to their children are needed. Perhaps we may need to set up residential schools in order to remove these children from their present environment, if no radical change can be made in their home conditions.

(10) Family Service Agencies

Family Service Agencies in conjunction with Public Health Services can play a major role in re-educating the poor in mental hygiene, home economics, nutrition, cooking, sewing, homemaking, purchasing of food, clothing, household goods, the proper care of children, budgeting, proper use of time-recreation, work study, and family life in general. In short, what is needed is to introduce a whole new sense of values. This applies not only to the poor but to all segments of society. "Through unscrupulous advertising we have created a way of life that is lacking in moral and spiritual values." Our national heroes are show business people, ball players, hockey players, and pop artists. Financial help alone will not be enough, essential as that is, we must educate people to make sound choices in their life styles.

(11) Day Care Centres

The proportion of married women entering the labour force has been increasing steadily. It is estimated that of the number of women who are in the work force, married women comprise approximately 50 per cent of the total. As would be expected, the highest proportion of these working wives have husbands whose incomes are in the lower income groups. Invariably, working mothers cannot make satisfactory arrangements for their preschoolers. Usually some relative, or neighbour helps to keep the child, while a few lucky ones are sent to a day care centre or nursery school. In the majority of cases, the conditions under which the child is kept leave much to be desired. Day care centres can play a very useful role in the fight against poverty, if there are sufficient numbers of them with trained personnel who will offer not merely protective care to the children of working mothers, but who will also function in an educational capacity to the parents. A child's growth and emotional development may be stimulated or retarded depending on the kind of activities with which he is brought into contact. Parents should therefore be involved in their children's activities in day care centres in order that they may assist in their children's development and in their own understanding of child care. Day care centres should be either free or there should be some system of tax allowance to offset the cost.

(12) Work Shops

Since we are a work oriented society and believe that everyone who can work should do so, or be branded as shiftless, lazy and indolent no-goods, many of those who are handicapped either temporarily or permanently feel guilty and worthless because they are unable to enter or re-enter the competitive labour market. To meet the needs of the thousands of persons who at some time or another become temporarily handicapped or permanently handicapped, we need to have a system of work shop industries embracing the most simple to the most complex type of jobs on a progressively graded basis that would accommodate all levels of handicapped persons, and enable them to advance to the highest level or work for which they are ultimately capable.

Each handicapped worker should receive a minimum wage that would enable him to maintain the standard of living accepted and expected by society. Incentive payments should be given every time the worker's productivity increases and when he moves from a less complex to a more complex task. The ultimate aim of these workshops being to transfer as many workers back to the regular competitive labour market. The successful operation of such workshops would need the support of all levels of government, in particular the national government and the willing support of private industry and labour unions.

(13) Family Planning

It has been suggested that one of the problems that afflict the poor is the incidence of large families. Many a wage-earner with one or two children might be able to manage on a marginal income. But, with six or eight or even more children, all hope of survival economically or even socially steps out of reach.

A stepped-up programme of public information and education on family planning should be undertaken on a nation-wide scale by the Federal Department of Health and Welfare. Provincial Departments of Health through municipal boards of health could sponsor family planning clinics that would put this important tool to combat poverty within the reach of those who need it most and whose religious and conscientious scruples would permit them to use it.

The foregoing and many more services will be needed to combat poverty on a comprehensive scale. To be successful there will need to be close coordination and cooperation. This will involve the combined efforts of all levels of government and various agencies working in close collaboration, including Labour Councils, Employment Agencies, Canada Manpower Centres, Vocational Rehabilitation Services, Public Health Department, Family Counselling Services, Education Department, Welfare Department, Private Industry and the poor themselves.

CONCLUSION

Any society worthy of the support of its members must demonstrate a genuine concern and regard for its individual members and in particular, for its weaker, disadvantaged constituents. Canada, having entered upon its second century of national existence cannot hope to fulfill its destiny half slave and half free. The provision of a social, economic and political climate that will enable its people to reach the highest level of self-realization in a free society is an objective that should commend itself to all Canadians.

The Seventh-day Adventist Church in Canada wishes to make its contribution to the realization of a more equitable society that will give practical expression to the great Judeo-Christian principle of reverence for life with concern and compassion for the weak. We are confident that the report of this Committee will not only suggest the bold imaginative, legislative moves that Parliament can make to achieve this goal, but also delineate the role that private agencies and the Church can play to make Canada truly free for every Canadian.

We sincerely hope that the support for the work being done by this Committee under its distinguished Chairman as evidenced by the presentation of this Brief will serve to encourage the Committee in its work and commend the results of its efforts to our Country.

THE SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON POVERTY

EVIDENCE

Ottawa, Tuesday, April 28, 1970

The Special Senate Committee on Poverty met this day at 9.30 a.m.

Senator David A. Croll (Chairman) in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, this morning we have the Consumers' Association of Canada. On my right is Mrs. F. E. Jones, Vice-President, whose biographical sketch you have in front of you. She will introduce the persons who are here with her.

Mrs. F. E. Jones, Vice-President, Consumers' Association of Canada: On my right is Mrs. W. E. Brechin, from Etobicoke. She is Chairman of the National Studies Committee. Then there is Mrs. Frances Balls, Executive Secretary of the Association.

I think many of you are already acquainted with the Consumers' Association of Canada since we have been the national voluntary organization representing consumers' interests in Canada for the past 23 years. We want to stress that membership is open to any consumer in Canada for a nominal annual fee.

When CAC prepared this submission, we focused our attention on the particular needs of low-income consumers, but did not attempt to isolate the poor as any special group or to define precisely a poverty level or who are the poor in Canada. We have emphasized that consumer education should be given the highest priority, but we also emphasize that we are not proposing consumer education as the panacea or solution to the low-income consumer's problem in the Canadian marketplace. We particularly want to, as you will note at the end of item 2, emphasize four other needs; further consumer protection legislation, the need to grant additional authority to existing government agencies who have already been given responsibility to protect consumers, the need for more consistent and effective self-discipline of industry and business in accordance with their professed ethics, and, very important, the need for a stronger organized independent consumer voice speaking for consumers of all income levels.

Throughout our submission, we emphasize that we see grouping of all consumers of all income levels together as needing many of the same educational and protective services. We considered that we should face the question of do the poor pay more, and in an effort to answer this question, CAC proceeds to have the local associations throughout Canada undertake a survey to compare prices on certain grocery items, clothing and furniture in stores in selected high-income and low-income areas in their respective cities, during one week of January of this year. The very first finding, and it may be one of the most significant, in the survey revealed that the poor in Canada are hidden. In several of the towns and small cities the survey could not be completed, as the members of the local association could not distinguish high and low income areas. In view of the problem of making clear distinction in income levels between the clientele of different stores, the general finding that there was no identifiable pattern of differences in prices between the sample stores in the high and low income areas is not surprising. Generally, uniform prices on the same items were noted. Although there were occasional variations in prices of individual items from store to store, the price was sometimes higher in the low income area store, but just as frequently the opposite was true and none of the differences were large.

Certain exceptions merit attention. Although there was insistence that no distinction could be made between high income and low income shopping areas in either Yellowknife or Whitehorse, higher food prices were reported in the stores closest to the Indian settlements in both cities, and we draw your attention to similar findings of a recent study in the United States that was far more extensive and comprehensive.

We note that most of the proposals to help the low income consumer are limited to helping the individual cope more effectively with the existing market place. One finding in the CAC comparative pricing survey points up the potential of group action in affecting any consumer's purchasing power. Here we refer to the significant and consistent price variation on the majority of the items in co-operative stores as compared to the supermarkets, regardless of the income area in which the store was located. We note also the success of buying clubs for the poor, similar to Boston's Comarts, where the low income consumer derived learning and shopping skills from participating in the co-operative enterprise so that they could cope more confidently and competently in the open market, as well as receiving the additional benefit of reduced prices on specific items purchased through the co-operative.

We note also the introduction of low income buyers clubs, and the Winnipeg Buyers Association was drawn to our attention. We are aware that others are developing in other areas of Canada, but obviously initially help will be needed from other organizations for these low income buyers clubs to get started.

We suggest an alternative to developing exclusively low income buyers clubs or co-operatives, and suggest that existing co-operatives might be extended more aggressively to include low income consumers, again, in an effort not to segregate the low income consumer into a special group. We also point out that this would allow the low income consumer an opportunity to learn merchandising skills by working alongside other experienced members rather than starting with an inexperienced group. However, this suggestion does not mean that governments can evade their responsibilities in this area and assign these responsibilities totally to the co-operatives or to volunteer organizations.

We have noted that the low income consumer appears to be exposed to the same prices and, for the most part, to the same products as the high income consumer, but with concern we point out that he is exposed to the same blandishments to buy and to use credit and he enters the market place with severe restrictions on how he can purchase. We note also, as I know you have had drawn to your attention on numerous other occasions, the particular limitations of the low income purchaser. It is difficult for him to be a thrifty consumer, as we advise, when he cannot take advantage of end-of-season clothing sales or even special week-end buys. He does not have the resources to buy in bulk or quality for durability because he cannot afford the immediate larger cost and cannot do effective comparison shopping, as we continually advise the wise consumer, as his mobility is reduced because of the additional cost of transportation. His ability to shop around is further reduced by his lack of ready cash, as this directs his purchasing to specific stores that will supply credit and where the prices and choice may be less.

We note that this exposes the low income consumer to transactions with door-to-door salesmen, and here we note that the low income consumer is one who should particularly benefit under the cooling-off legislation, but we point out that this protection is useless to the low income consumer who is not aware that this protection exists. Where the information that the cooling-off period is allowed is not on the face of the contract, where the consumer does not have the confidence and the expertise to advise immediately he wishes to withdraw from the contract, such protective legislation has little value unless it is known and can be used. We note this in particular because this is one area where lack of information is an additional hindrance to the low income consumer.

We note too that the low income consumer is rarely eligible for the standard credit arrangement with department stores and has to buy credit at higher risk interest rates.

The low income consumer has the least confidence, ability or resources to seek civil redress for his grievances. Therefore, the federal and provincial government agencies already established to protect human interests should have their powers reassessed to ensure that they have adequate authority to act effectively on behalf of the low income consumer.

We note also that the sales tax operates specifically against the interest of the low income consumer, and given specific instances.

We had noted earlier the priority we place on consumer education, but this means that community institutions and organizations have a special responsibility for consumer education for the poor. We note particular groups in the community who enter the market place with the disadvantage of unfamiliarity and lack of knowledge.

We do tell you something of the efforts of the CAC in the area of consumer education, and share with you our question as to how much the low income consumer has been able to benefit from the public meetings, the group meetings in which CAC has provided speakers and leadership. We have confidence, however, that individual CAC members, frequently professional home economists, have made a contribution by assisting in giving courses to welfare mothers, training in homemaking, leadership in setting up debt counselling services, in developing programs for single parents and in assisting legal aid centres. Individual CAC members in cities across Canada have been involved in such projects.

In a number of cities in Canada CAC contributes to consumer education of an unidentified public, and we assume a large number of low income consumers, by providing weekly radio or television programs.

In addition, in three of the major cities—Toronto, Winnipeg and Vancouver—CAC has provided a telephone information service to consumers that is used extensively. We have made no distinction as to who of what level of income use the telephone service; probably a number of low income consumers have availed themselves of this resource. We do question how useful printed material can be to the low income consumer. Our major effort to educate and inform the members of the consumer's association has been through our bi-monthly publication "Canadian Consumer." We are concerned that only a portion of the public libraries of Canada subscribe to the Canadian Consumer, even though it is doubtful that low income consumers make extensive use of such references in libraries.

This brings us to our further suggestion as to the effective transmission of consumer information and education to the low income consumer. We do suggest that neighbourhood information centres modelled on the Citizens Advice Bureaux which have operated in Great Britain since early in World War II could be an effective base for the provision of consumer information and education to the low income consumer when he needs it and at a place where he can use it. Certainly the Consumer Information Service offered as one of the wide range of services provided by the Citizens Advice Bureaux has been extensively utilized by British Consumers. Our report published in 1968 indicated that the fastest growing category of inquiries handled by the CAB has related to such consumer problems as instalment buying agreements, high pressure doorstep salesmen, guarantees, and the quality of goods, which are all matters of concern of Canadian consumers and particularly of the low income consumers.

We point out also the advantage of integrating consumer information and education with other programs designed to relieve poverty. We note that volunteers from associations like the Consumer's Association would be an essential back-up to the provision of information services by neighbourhood centres.

In paragraph 15 we emphasize the fact that we are only suggesting ways of alleviating poverty. We recognize that the essential problem is one of lack of income.

There is one final point we wish to make on consumer education. We have devoted much energy and effort to pressuring for the introduction of consumer education into school curricula before the drop-outs leave school. You may have further questions on that point, and I suggest that Mrs. Brechin, in particular, might speak to it.

The Chairman: If there is nothing further that the other members of the delegation wish to say then I gather they are ready for our questions.

Senator Fournier: I am pleased to hear this morning that somebody is thinking of trying to do something about consumer education. I firmly believe that if we are going to be successful in removing poverty then consumer education is an essential part of that process.

As I read your brief yesterday I was struck by two statements. One is that the poor pay more, and I should like to have further explanation of that. I know that you have given some explanation, but this is a point for discussion. The other statement is that the poor are hidden and cannot be found. This is a point that I would like clarified. I am a poor man, while the chairman is a very wealthy man. When I go to a store does it cost me more than it does him to buy a pound of coffee or a pound of cheese

Mrs. Jones: No. This is a point we really discovered in our survey. In attempting to compare prices in the low income and the high income areas we found that you were lucky to be paying the same amount in each. We asked this question: Do the poor pay more? The actual price that they pay appears to be the same, but to the low income person it is a larger percentage of his disposable dollar.

Senator Fournier: Did you make a check as between the supermarkets and the local corner grocery stores?

Mrs. Jones: Yes, one of the reports from this survey, which was done by volunteers in the local associations, indicates that supermarkets are pretty generally available. We noted—and this relates to your other question as to the hidden poor—that in the small cities and towns of Canada everybody is likely to be shopping in the same areas. There was recognition of the fact that a different situation prevails in Montreal, Toronto, and Vancouver, and to some extent in Winnipeg where there seemed to be a mix as to where people shopped.

Senator Fournier: I am thinking of the supermarket where you have to pay cash, and the local corner grocery store which will give credit. Is there some advantage to the poor in either of these categories of stores?

Mrs. Jones: There did not seem to be any particular advantage offered by either the smaller store or the supermarket. We are certainly not suggesting that our survey proves there is not a difference, but from the limited number of stores that we compared there is not the significant difference that has been suggested in some of the other studies.

Mrs. W. E. Brechin, Chairman, National Studies Committee, Consumers' Association of Canada: The comment that came back to us from Toronto was that in the small stores the larger sizes, which give greater value for your expenditure, were generally not available. The small size was there, but there was not the choice available to the consumer. In one area which is generally considered to be a low income area there was only one supermarket but many small stores within walking distance. There was not a choice as between the supermarkets.

Senator Fournier: Would you agree that the women who are doing the shopping usually go for the small packages instead of the large ones? There are many reasons for that. For instance, there is the matter of transportation, and the large packages naturally are more costly.

Mrs. Jones: This is what we recognize when we say that the low income consumer cannot buy in bulk. As you say, they do not have the ready cash to take the larger package, and the fact that they have to carry the larger packages home is a consideration. When they do get them home they have no place in which to store them.

Senator Fergusson: Mr. Chairman, I should like to thank the delegation for appearing before us. I found their brief most interesting, and it touches on things that we have not gone into so deeply in this study.

You will realize why I am particularly interested in your work when I tell you that in 1923 I was a provincial president of the Council of Women, and one of the responsibilities of provincial presidents at that time was to try to organize throughout Canada what was then called the Canadian Association of Consumers, and which is now the Consumers' Association of Canada. It has retained the same initials, and it is generally known as the CAC. So, I have been extremely interested in your work, and I have remained so, and I have followed it through the years. You have had ups and downs, and I think it is terrific that you have been able to continue and are now in such an excellent position that you are recognized as a very important group in Canada. This is one reason why we are very glad to have you appear before us.

I would like to congratulate you particularly on your being able to continue the Canadian Consumer. I know that this has been a real struggle, but there is a terrific amount of information that would be very helpful to poor people if they knew about it. One of the things we have to do, I think, is see to it that this information gets wider circulation. Have you any way of putting the Canadian Consumer into the hands of people other than those who subscribe to it. I understand that you send it to libraries.

The Chairman: No, they sell it to libraries. They did not say they send it to libraries.

Senator Fergusson: The libraries pay for it, do they?

Mrs. Jones: Yes, this is one of our problems as an organization whose funds come from the membership fees. This, of course, is where we see that there can be greater government support which would enable us to extend service to people beyond the membership. At this point we are desperately struggling to do this. It is a major concern of our executive, whose meetings are under way now.

Senator Fergusson: Do you not consider it possible that you might circulate this to more people who need it, even though you do not have Government support?

Mrs. Jones: Yes.

Mrs. Frances Balls, Executive Secretary, Consumers' Association of Canada: This is done through the consumer education courses rather than actually giving them the magazine, which they may not read anyway. As we have pointed out, they probably do not use a great deal of reading material. Therefore, we are trying to introduce adult education courses of consumer education in the schools. This is where our manpower goes.

The Chairman: This is where your money goes is what you mean, is it not?

Mrs. Balls: Yes, both.

Mrs. Brechin: We reach the people in another way, not necessarily with the Canadian Consumer itself, but the material from it is reprinted by weekly and daily newspapers throughout Canada. We have a column entitled "News and Views" which is a condensation of articles prepared by one of our volunteer members. This is circulated to about 400 weekly and daily newspapers and used very extensively.

Senator Quart: I certainly echo Senator Fergusson's views with respect to the Consumers' Association of Canada, with which I am familiar. Would it not be possible to have volunteer speakers in high schools and universities?

Mrs. Jones: We do.

Senator Quart: Then I am a little late with that suggestion.

Senator Fergusson: In page 1 of your brief you state:

We refer to the need for further consumer protection legislation, the need to grant additional authority to existing government agencies who have been given the responsibility to protect consumers, the need for more consistent and effective self-discipline of industry and business in accord with their professed ethics, and the need for a stronger organized independent consumer voice speaking for consumers of all income levels.

I would like to know just what legislation you have in mind with respect to the need for further consumer protection. I find the reference to the need for more consistent and effective self-discipline of industry and business interesting. I have mentioned it once or twice in this committee without a very enthusiastic response. How do you visualize that this self-discipline could be brought about?

Mrs. Brechin: I cannot offer any suggestions as to how it can be brought about, except by a change in the general climate. The fact that many industries are publishing codes of ethics indicates that they see the need for self-discipline and probably are moving toward it. We feel that they might move toward it more rapidly. The fact that the larger ethical industry is more apt to be bound by these codes than some of the small, fly-by-night operators makes the low income consumers particularly vulnerable. Very often he lacks the confidence or financial resources to go to the large industry or retailer. This is something that business must do itself. However, as consumers we can create the climate in which business will feel impelled to discipline itself more.

Mrs. Jones: The reference to consumer protection is in the general area of contracts and warranties. We have not identified the particular legislation in the brief, but it is particularly related to protection under guarantees. This is a problem for the lower income consumer, who sometimes does not even have the competence to avail himself of the protection which may be there now. This waiving of his rights without his knowing it is a matter of real concern.

Senator McGrand: I am following the lines of Senator Fournier's question with respect to the poor paying more. The areas in which poor people are found today are usually not close to the shopping centres, which are strategically placed close to the middle class areas and where there is good bus service. Do you find that to be the case. If this is so, then do you think that the answer is to have market facilities brought into the low income areas, with proper 'bus service.

Mrs. Jones: We are wondering what you mean by shopping centres.

Senator McGrand: Our supermarkets are strategically placed where 'bus services come and go and in the middle of upper class areas. Are there proper marketing facilities, shopping centres, in the areas where the poor live. It seems to me that they do not have good 'bus service and some cannot afford to go to the shopping centres by 'bus. Is that one of the problems?

Mrs. Jones: This is certainly one of the concerns. The volunteers who at our request observed the clothing and furniture noted particularly that there were no outlets for clothing and furniture within low income areas. They did note the difference in quality in the merchandise that was available in those two particular areas. There was not as great a problem with respect to food and grocery items, which did seem to be available in any area. The problem remains how attractive it would be to bring a store to this kind of area. Our approach throughout has not been the need to support special shopping facilities for the poor, but to consider the problem of their having enough money to operate in the marketplace with everyone else. This is consistent with our other approach, that we should not consider that the amount of protection needed in the marketplace is that needed for the more sophisticated and able shoppers, but for the less able shopper.

Senator McGrand: Do the large chain stores co-operate in the consumer education of the poor, and in providing the poor with, perhaps not a lower standard of assortment, but something that is suitable to them. It seems to me that with competition between these chain stores they are after the dollars and are not concerned with anything else. On page 3 you say that higher food prices are reported in stores closest to the Indian settlements. Do you know of any reason for this.

Mrs. Jones: No. This is simply an observation that we make from the findings of the survey.

Senator Fergusson: Were the prices noticeably higher.

Mrs. Jones: They were consistently higher, but there was not that much difference. One other interesting detail in the findings is that in one of the stores near the Indian settlement the meat prices were not marked. The meat prices quoted by the store manager were lower than in any other store, but it is significant that the prices were not marked; this was the information given by the manager.

Senator McGrand: What about the quality of the meat? Was it as good?

Mrs. Jones: On the whole; the same brands seemed to be available in both. There was no comment on that.

Senator McGrand: What has been the success of the buying clubs in the Boston Co-Mart?

Mrs. Jones: Really successful. As we note, the participants graduated really from buying exclusively through the co-marts to being able to handle shopping adequately on the open market. We are looking at this as real education, learning from experience how to apply the results in a broader area.

Senator McGrand: This is how to apply consumer education.

Senator Quart: Senator McGrand has stolen my music about the buying clubs, which I had marked out as my area of interest. To follow his questions, might I ask if you have done anything very much along these lines in Canada? How did you approach it? Through the association of what? Again, what type of buying club is it, and how does it operate in Boston and Winnipeg? Have they a special locale, or something, where people go?

Mrs. Jones: Yes, in Winnipeg. The answer to the first question is, No. C.A.C. has not been involved in sponsoring or initiating any of these to date. We are looking at this. The Winnipeg Buyers Association, to which I refer, is a relatively new group, and is given some leadership by some of the voluntary welfare organizations in the city. It was brought to my attention by a member of the Welfare Council advising the Minister of Health and Welfare. Their last meeting was in Winnipeg and the existence of this association was brought to our attention through this council member. Since our brief was circulated to our board, other members of the board have drawn to my attention, without giving me enough detail that I can share with you, that there are other buyer associations being organized, directed particularly towards the low income consumer. What we want to emphasize is that we wish to look more closely at the alternative of encouraging existing buyers' clubs and co-ops to devise ways of bringing low income consumers into that group, rather than setting up another category of buyers' clubs for low income people and again setting them aside out of society.

The Chairman: Are you not setting them aside by merely talking about low income group shopping? Is our purpose to get away from that, as you have said, to provide them an income so that they shop like other people? If you continually talk about low income groups and making special provisions for low income groups they will be there perpetually.

Mrs. Jones: Always.

The Chairman: Then why do you people do that? Why do you consistently keep making that approach?

Mrs. Jones: I do not think we do. I would again point to our reference to introduce consumer education into the schools at an early level, when every child is still in the school, so that everyone has the same access to information. This is the idea of our suggesting neighbourhood information centres being available to everybody, not just to low income people. I think every one of our suggestions tries to include them.

Senator Quart: I believe you are doing a wonderful job. Yesterday afternoon I was out shopping with some ladies, and we found ourselves in a situation that I think you would appreciate. At the Billings Bridge shopping centre we went into a store and saw a handbag similar to one that one of my friends had with her, but we found that it was marked at $3 more than she had paid for hers. There seemed to be no reason for this, so we spoke about it to the saleslady, who said it could not be the same sort of handbag. We examined the bags thoroughly and discovered they were the same. The manager was not there, but I suggested that we pursue the matter a little further, although none of us wanted to buy the bag. The saleslady telephoned to another of their stores, after which we were told that probably an error had been made in marking the cost. I let fall the remark "Boy! I think the Consumers' Association should know about this," and we were then told that if we wanted to buy the bag we could do so at the same price that my friend had paid for hers. This led me to remark on the value of volunteers working in this respect, because I am a great believer in volunteers. If I might coin a phrase: hell hath no greater fury than a group of dedicated women volunteers who think the devil is trying to put something over on them. Of course, the saleslady had suggested that we might like to contact the manager, but I think that if more people did that sort of thing and dropped hints about referring it to the Consumers' Association, as we did yesterday afternoon, it might help you, and it would certainly help stabilize prices in different areas. This happened in the Billings Bridge shopping centre.

Mrs. Jones: This is the advantage of comparative shopping, but it involves being mobile enough to go from one area to another. It also involves having the time to do it.

Senator Quart: Of course. Certainly the poor have not the time nor the money to go around doing that. I think that from a humanitarian viewpoint Senator McGrand's suggestion of having the large shopping centres nearer the poor areas might be a good one, but as businessmen I do not think the promoters of the shopping centres would agree, they want to be near the buying public. Would you not think that was so? Have I made myself clear?

Mrs. Brechin: Yes. Perhaps you might be interested in an alternative to this, which is working successfully. A Consumers' Association group was responsible for obtaining a bus service for the residents of a low income housing group, who were segregated, put away from the rest of humanity, and did not have the facilities available. The CAC group were able to obtain a bus which on one day a week, on Thursday, after the Wednesday shopping group, picks them up and takes them to a large shopping plaza. Now before that bus comes, the group have a get-together where they have coffee and discuss the ads which have appeared the night before to determine which would be the best buys, and to help these people and to answer their questions, if it is possible. It is a way of educating as well as increasing their mobility. Granted it is only a drop in the bucket.

Senator Quart: I think it is much more than a drop in the bucket.

Mr. Jones: There is another example you might be interested in. The CAC group, by pressuring for re-zoning of a particular area, was able to ensure that there was competition for the one existing grocery shopping centre in a low-income public housing area. We successfully pressured for this and so there was an opportunity to compare prices, and it was not the trapped group of shoppers that had existed prior to that.

Senator McGrand: Do you think that you can successfully teach consumer buying to high school students? There was mention of the fact that this should be taught more in high schools. I am of the impression that most of the young people going through high school today care very little about consumer buying, and it is not until they have set up housekeeping and are confronted with a situation where they have only so much money to spend and so much food to buy that they become conscious of it. I am of the impression that many young women do not learn to cook until they get married.

Senator Quart: If even then.

The Chairman: I am sure Senator Pearson can correct us on that.

Senator Pearson: Referring to the question about the sales tax, you say in one part of your brief that the sales tax weighs more heavily on the poor than on others. Your idea seems to be that it might be well if the government concerned would cut out the sales tax entirely. But how would they recompense themselves for cutting this out?

Mrs. Jones: Well, we would see progressive income taxes as being one way of avoiding taxation of the really low-income consumer. Our concern with sales tax is where it applies to foods and necessities. You note that we refer to the sales tax on margarine.

The Chairman: But that is the only one.

Mrs. Jones: But it is also on children's clothing. We feel it is not realistic, particularly in relation to the size of today's children.

The Chairman: The one reason that it is still on margarine is that the government will not admit it is a food. The minute it admits that it is food, it will lose a terrific amount of money in tax.

Mrs. Jones: The only thing I do with margarine is eat it.

Senator Pearson: The other question I wanted to deal with was this co-ordination or consolidation of debts. Have you any program on that and how to overcome the advertising we see all the time about how to consolidate your debts and pay one person instead of paying half a dozen?

Mrs. Jones: I suppose this is a continuing battle around education on the use of credit, and some of our CAC members have given leadership in establishing credit counselling services and debt counselling services, but these are purely remedial measures for the person who is already in trouble.

Senator Pearson: But you have no definite program you are working on?

Mrs. Brechin: To curb the advertising, we have no definite program. But for the last two years we have been working on the whole aspect of credit and the training of consumers into realizing its costs and its dangers, and how to use it wisely, if they are going to use it. But we have not a definite program against the advertising.

Senator Pearson: How wide-spread is your organization throughout Canada? Can you get in touch with great blocks of people throughout the big cities?

Mrs. Balls: We have 52 local organizations and nine provincial organizations. Out of the 52 local organizations, we have three in the Northwest Territories and in the Yukon combined, so that those territories are covered.

Senator Pearson: But how many members?

Mrs. Balls: We have 40,000 members.

Senator Pearson: Do you keep in touch with these members? Is this part of your educational program?

Mrs. Balls: Yes, it is.

Senator Pearson: You keep in touch with them through circulars?

Mrs. Balls: Primarily through the Canadian Consumer, and we also send studies and information out to the local executives so that they can take these and work on them on their own area. This gives an opportunity for regional differences to be considered because a person in that area knows best how to present a particular program.

Senator Pearson: Are your members all volunteers?

Mrs. Balls: Yes, they are.

Senator Pearson: You are not quite sure of what you are driving at or whether you are going to get the program through.

Mrs. Balls: Well, we get reports back from the areas, so that we can analyze these and see if more information on one particular aspect should be sent to one particular area or if information on something else should be sent to another area, or if everybody should get more information on the same aspects.

Senator Pearson: So some areas may give you very few returns and you can then concentrate on seeing why you are getting so few.

Mrs. Balls: To a certain extent, yes. We are always trying to improve the areas where we don't have a very active group.

The Chairman: What is your membership fee?

Mrs. Jones: Three dollars a year, and that includes the Canadian Consumer.

Senator Fournier: How much does that cost you?

Mrs. Jones: Three dollars per year.

Senator Fournier: But to get it on the market?

Mrs. Jones: If you were buying an individual copy of the Canadian Consumer, it would be 60 cents, but it is mainly available to the members.

Senator Fournier: But how much does it cost you to have it printed?

Mrs. Balls: We cannot give a breakdown of that because we have not got the time-costs for our editor. The direct paper and printing costs are 10 cents a copy.

Senator Fournier: But I want the total in bulk. How much of that money is put to this?

The Chairman: How many copies do you use?

Mrs. Jones: The current Canadian Consumer has a run of 40,000.

The Chairman: That is 40,000 at 10 cents a copy.

Mrs. Jones: But that is just the paper and printing costs. The problem is that our editor has many other duties besides editing the magazine, and then there are the other administration costs and translation.

Mrs. Balls: And then there is postage also.

Senator Fournier: Your membership is $120,000 from 40,000 members. How much of that money goes towards publishing the magazine?

Mrs. Jones: We cannot give you that breakdown.

Mrs. Balls: We do not have the money to get an accounting firm to give us a breakdown.

Senator Fournier: You must pay somebody?

Mrs. Balls: We have an editor who has public relations duties and administrative duties in the office in addition to editing the magazine, and it would mean doing a time analysis to ascertain how much is actually spent on putting out the magazine, plus the time of the secretary who also covers these areas.

Mrs. Jones: We cannot even tell you the precise translation costs. The Canadian Consumer is published in English and in French in the same publication.

Senator Quart: To clarify things for you Senator Fournier: How many have you on staff, the entire executive staff?

Mrs. Balls: Eight people.

Mrs. Jones: But only two are executive staff, and six are clerical.

Senator Quart: Eight staff in all. Is it not fantastic what you do with eight paid employees?

The Chairman: Mrs. Jones, as I understand it, the membership is 40,000, at $3 a membership. That has risen in recent years, has it not?

Mrs. Jones: Yes, probably within the last five years; the last increase was probably about five years ago.

The Chairman: In addition to the money that you receive here, there is a Government grant?

Mrs. Jones: Right, through the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

The Chairman: We follow that up usually by the normal remark that: It is totally inadequate, but you take it just the same.

Mrs. Jones: Right.

The Chairman: For the moment we are dealing with the society as is, and we have in that society the poverty stricken. In trying to reach these people, in the main the bulk of them you will find within that four million group that we talk about, the 20 per cent.

Mrs. Jones: Yes.

The Chairman: Of course, you do not have to look far to find a very large number of them in the welfare web. That is correct?

Mrs. Jones: Right.

The Chairman: And the disadvantaged. Those lists are available to you without any difficulty. Having that large group—and I am talking now about the welfare poor, the disadvantaged, the blind, crippled, maimed and old, and the female head of family—they are all what we call below the poverty line. Now, have we them identified?

Mrs. Jones: Yes.

The Chairman: We will leave the working poor alone for the moment.

Mrs. Jones: Yes.

The Chairman: So these consist of about two million people. What have you done to reach these people who particularly have needs, as against trying to reach my wife or Senator Fournier's wife, who can use the information but it is not a matter of bread and butter?

Mrs. Jones: The point we are making is that it is more important to reach this group, and I think, like every other individual professional volunteer, we have not the answer as to how to reach them effectively. We think our use of television is one way of getting some information across, but we are convinced that it is the personal face-to-face contact that matters. That is why we say we have some confidence that we do reach that group through individual CAC volunteers working with identified groups in special projects. We have much more confidence that we can be effective in giving them the information they need through neighbourhood centres on a face-to-face basis.

The Chairman: I am not being critical of your organization, please understand that. We have been through it all in the consumer field. I think we know what it is all about, but I think the Government are taking the view that one of our difficulties is that there is not enough participation by the people who need it...

Mrs. Jones: Right, but it costs money to participate.

The Chairman: No, it does not—participation by the people who need it in positions sometimes of decision-making. Why have you not in your group 10 per cent of the 40,000 who are welfare participants, membership free? Do not forget, you are drawing money from the Government—not that you have a great deal, and we would like to see you getting more, and we will help, but you are drawing money from the Government and these are people who pay some taxes which, in part, go towards the money you receive.

Why have they not representation on the consumers' group in some form or another? Do you not have to reach out to these people rather than talk at them, and draw them into your group, on some basis, in the various organizations across the country? We have found in our travels about the country that where we have been able to bring these people into participation they have been very appreciative. Is that not your mission?

Mrs. Jones: Yes, it is very very much our mission.

The Chairman: Then why are you not doing it?

Mrs. Jones: We are trying. It is a tough job, as I was explaining. When I interrupted you a moment ago I said that participation costs money. You cannot go to a meeting without your bus fare. Who subsidizes that?

The Chairman: Oh, you mean the poor people have not the money to come?

Mrs. Jones: Right.

The Chairman: I agree with that.

Mrs. Jones: They need more money in order to participate. Our enthusiasm about this organization is related to the fact that it offers the opportunity for the low income consumer to be part of it. This is the thrust of our whole brief.

The Chairman: You and I, as chairman of the committee and on behalf of the committee, have talked for a moment about an identifiable group, and we identified some a few moments ago. These people receive cheques from the Government on a monthly basis. Does it not seem simple that a special attempt should be made by including some special information form the consumers' group, who are independent, to be presented with the cheque, saying: "There is information you ought to have which may help you to save money, or information that would be useful to you"? It seems to me that is not a very expensive proposition.

Mrs. Jones: I think it could be quite expensive, and you might not be giving them the information they need and could use at a given time. This is a sort of storage of information, and people can only use the information they need at a given time, and this is why we see the more effective way of getting information to these people is in the face-to-face neighbourhood information centre where we would see them becoming involved. It is where they are.

The Chairman: In the last three years we have had established the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, and almost every province in Canada has a consumer affairs department.

Mrs. Jones: Right.

The Chairman: Our problems seem to be increasing, so what has happened that has changed the picture?

Mrs. Jones: You are asking us to evaluate the Government departments?

The Chairman: Certainly.

Mrs. Jones: We are saying that they need to be stronger and have more resources, and that they should be ready to take or initiate action on behalf of the individual. They have limited much of their activity to handing out printed material that you have referred to, and we question whether that is really consumer education or adequate consumer education.

The Chairman: Most of the provinces have laws concerning this matter of buying on time payments.

Mrs. Balls: But even the well educated consumer does not know about them, let alone the low income consumer.

The Chairman: Then we get back to the problem that you are not involving the low income consumer; you are not reaching him somehow.

Mrs. Balls: Is it up to us? Yes, we try to educate them, but is it not part of the Government's responsibility to tell these people what the laws are?

The Chairman: You can tell the people what the laws are, but that does not help them too much. I can tell you that from experience. But, involving them is another matter. Involving them is not telling them what the laws are; involving them is helping them to live with the laws.

Mrs. Balls: I agree.

The Chairman: That is what I am talking about.

Mrs. Balls: But is not that partly the responsibility of government as well. I am not saying that we should not do that kind of thing—or that we are not doing it, because we are doing it in some areas.

The Chairman: But government can only involve them at pretty high levels, whereas you can involve them at all levels, because you are a consumer's association.

Mrs. Jones: But we have no resources with which to do it.

The Chairman: That is what you say, and I agree.

Mrs. Jones: And they need some resources to enable them to participate. Whatever is involved in this word "participation", it really means engaging in some exchange with another person. If that is not a forced engagement in an individual's home, then the individuals have to come out to our meetings.

Mrs. Brechin: We see the neighbourhood information centres as an involvement. Part of the lack of value in government services as we have them now is in the fact that they are fragmented. You have to go to this department and that department, and this agency and that agency. They are not co-ordinated. There is not one spot to which a citizen can go, and be directed to the means of solving his problem. We see the information centres as filling this need by providing one easily identifiable spot to which a consumer can direct his complaints, and through which he can participate and learn.

The Chairman: But has not the Department of Consumer Affairs attempted to make it possible for an individual to bring his problems to their attention?

Mrs. Brechin: Yes, but the Department of Consumer Affairs very often turns out not to be the department which is concerned with the particular problem. The problem may concern the Department of Agriculture, so the Department of Consumer Affairs merely refers the individual to the Department of Agriculture. Part of his problem may be solved there, but another part of it may concern the Department of Health, and so he is referred to the Department of Health. To the low income consumer this is a complete impossibility.

The Chairman: What are you suggesting as an alternative?

Mrs. Brechin: We suggest that the neighbourhood information centres could be a co-ordinating body of sources of information, using both volunteers and Government workers. Every one would be working together, each contributing his own strengths.

Mrs. Jones: We are concerned also about the accessibility to Box 99, to which you referred. This involves a stamp, and it involves getting a complaint form and filling it out. These are real barriers to the low income person, and this is concerned with making his problem known. We are expecting a certain level of education, but usually when a consumer gets to that level of education he can handle many things for himself. We want to help people who are below that level.

The Chairman: I have a feeling that despite what we have done in the field of consumers affairs, both federally and provincially, we really have not made any miles. That is the substance of the evidence you have given—at least, you cannot put your finger on any benefits that there may be.

Mrs. Jones: We do not feel that they have included the role of the voluntary organizations by any means.

The Chairman: No one is suggesting that they be excluded. Among consumers particularly they have a very important role to play, and they have always had that field. The feeling I have—and this is the second time that I have been through this mill, as you know—is that somehow you are not reaching the public. There is the very fact that your magazine, which is a very good magazine, is sold to libraries. I can understand why libraries are not buying it. On the other hand, it should be available at almost any place.

Mrs. Jones: Who is going to finance it, then?

The Chairman: Of course, that is another matter. The Government has indicated that it is prepared to spend some money to help your group. These areas in which they can be very helpful should be pointed out to them particularly. The Government spends a great deal on sending out real junk free of charge to many people. You could turn the matter over to them and tell them to pass it out to the libraries and to the universities, and to other institutions.

Senator Pearson: Mr. Chairman, there are many circulars going out from the Government and from consumers organizations, but in actual fact you will never get anywhere with this unless you do a salesman's job on it, and that means personal contact. The mere fact that information is sent out does not mean a thing, except that some people may read some of it.

The Chairman: How do we get personal contact?

Senator Pearson: That is the problem.

Mrs. Balls: We get it through our neighbourhood information.

Senator Fournier: You have covered a lot of ground in your brief, and it is very interesting. As I said a while ago, we have an unusual group before us this morning in that they are people who are doing something about helping consumers. Most of the subject has been touched upon, and I would be inclined to support Senator McGrand in what he said about training in schools. I would think that the young boys and girls would not be too interested in it, although you might do something in the home economics classes.

Mrs. Balls: No, the boys need it too. I think the extent to which they become interested in it depends upon the way in which it is presented. We can see it being used in the ma'h class in grade one where they are comparing the different costs of so many apples and oranges. It could deal with matters like insurance, how to buy a house and how to buy a car. These are things that the boys should know as well. They should know how to make a will. I think it would be useful to include both boys and girls in such classes.

I do not agree entirely with the statement that they are not interested in consumer information. They might not be interested in knowing how to buy groceries at that particular point of time, but they are interested in knowing how to buy clothes, because they like to have as many new and stylish clothes as possible. They can be shown how to make their money go further in that area, and they can be shown how to buy a car. A boy can be shown a breakdown of his income and how much he has to make payments on the car, because he will not have enough saved up to pay for it entirely, and how much he has left over to run that car.

Senator Fournier: I do not disagree with you, but I think you are facing a problem when you want to change the curricula.

Mrs. Balls: Yes, we are.

Senator Fournier: The time when a young couple realizes they need this type of training is when they are married and are having to face the music.

Mrs. Balls: But they should have it before then, you see.

Senator Fournier: Yes, I agree with you completely. I notice that you are not working too much with the welfare people. You have very little to do with the welfare people?

Mrs. Jones: Only through these individual volunteers.

Senator Fournier: There was a remark made here about transportation—the provision of buses, and so on. This is a good move, but it is my experience that people on welfare—and these are the people I refer to when I talk about the poor—do not hesitate to pay $5 for a taxi when they go shopping. This is a problem of which you may not be aware, but we are aware of it. It has taken place on many occasions. With respect to the hidden poor, we also find that it is not possible to find where the poor are, from the surface anyway, unless you go to the homes.

Mrs. Jones: That is really what we are indicating.

Senator Fournier: Sometimes they may not be as poor as we think they are, although inside the four walls of the little shack there may be some suffering. On page 1 reference is made to the need for more legislation, the need to grant additional authority to existing Government agencies. While I do not disagree with your recommendation, we have to keep in mind that every time we put more regulations into statutes we are cutting down the freedom of society, of which there is not much left now. We always must be careful of this. We receive recommendations from nearly everyone who appears here that there be more regulations. We are living in a democratic society and hope we can keep our freedom. However, every time we ask the Government to add another post to the fence already surrounding us we must be cautious. These needs can be met by education and the programs you are carrying out now, talking to the people, and always preserving freedom.

I do not want an answer to this; I am just making a remark with reference to your finances. You receive $120,000 a year, plus a grant of maybe $10,000. I hope it is.

Mrs. Jones: It is better than that.

Senator Fournier: So much the better; that aggravates the problem. You all work on a voluntary basis, yet you have no money. I am going to try to find out somehow where the money is going.

Mrs. Jones: One place...

Senator Fournier: You do not have to answer.

Mrs. Jones: A sizable amount this year paid for the increased postal rates, which cost us an absolute increase of $9,000 in one year.

The Chairman: Was the grant increased by that amount?

Mrs. Jones: No, it was not taken into consideration at all.

Senator Quart: You mention one of my pet theories for a co-ordinating council of some sort where people could go and not get the runaround that "we can do nothing for you here" without too much definite information as to where you go from there. The CAC is very close to the heart of all this poverty, because naturally buying comes into it to a great extent. Would it not be wonderful if through your Association co-ordinating councils were set up with probably one person for staff and volunteers helping out? That one person would be paid by the Government. I am going to be just as popular as a skunk at a garden party for saying this.

Mrs. Jones: Our title for this structure is neighbourhood information centres, which are modelled on the citizens advice bureaux in England. These bureaux are located right in the neighbourhood so to be accessible by walking and to the street for those who are handicapped. People come with what perhaps seem to be trivial questions, but they are the kind of questions that when answered today do not develop into a big problem tomorrow. They may be with respect to consumer problems at first, then the next stage is debt, followed by a family breakdown which goes back to the original problem. The centres would give education and direction on a whole range of services. We share with you real concern that there be voluntary direction of the centres. We are very aware that if this is going to be effective there needs to be Government support. We do see this as an opportunity for volunteers in the community to give service.

The Chairman: Is the service in Britain supported by the Government?

Mrs. Jones: Not totally, but there are Government grants. Initially it was started by volunteers during World War II, and there are not 489 centres in various sized cities, but in the neighbourhoods in Britain. There are similar centres in the United States, but we see the pattern that has been developed in England as more suitable on which to model. We are also very aware of the fact that we need to adapt the English system because our needs are different. Each locality in the country would develop its own particular kind of centre.

The Chairman: Are the British centres under the auspices of an organization?

Mrs. Jones: No, it has its own organization on a national level. It is the National Citizens' Advisory Bureau and Council.

Senator Quarr: It is the WVS, the Women's Voluntary Service; they are still going strong.

Mrs. Jones: Yes, and they probably contribute volunteer service. One of the differences in adapting to Canada is really the need for a staff person at the centres to ensure continuity and consistency. This is the kind of response we have to make to the complex world we live in, not only in low income areas, but in all income areas.

Senator Fergusson: The reference in section 15 on page 9 in block letters to "the essential problem is lack of income," I presume, is the income of people and not that of your organization?

Mrs. Jones: In this instance we mean the people. However, it is also our essential problem.

Senator Fergusson: In the event this problem of lack of income of people were taken care of, then there probably would be no need for the work you do. Is that so?

Mrs. Jones: No, we do not agree. There is great need for the consumer to be alert, informed and represented. We do not believe that it will be the best of all possible worlds when we improve the income level of the disadvantaged.

Senator Fergusson: But you do believe it is a basic aspect.

Mrs. Jones: Yes, we feel that is the starting point, then we can become more effective.

Senator Fergusson: But we still need services for people such as your organization provides, other than giving them money.

Mrs. Jones: Yes. The basis is more money.

Senator Fergusson: In page 4 of the brief reference is made to door-to-door salesmen. There are many people who have to depend on that sort of salesman. Do you not feel that they do supply a certain service?

Mrs. Jones: They can if there are these protections, and if the salesmen are licensed and responsible.

Senator Fournier: What about Avon?

Mrs. Jones: No comment.

The Chairman: But today all door-to-door salesmen are licensed by either a provincial government or the municipality, so that is covered.

Senator Fournier: Has the CAC been able to obtain more stringent regulations to cover these salesmen?

Mrs. Jones: As the chairman has indicated, in most provinces there are. I do not know whether Mrs. Brechin wishes to refer to circumstances she has been noting, where there is any such unsatisfactory coverage.

The Chairman: Are any provinces not covered?

Mrs. Brechin: I believe they are all licensed. There is always the problem of the fly-by-night who comes in without a licence, or of the licensed salesman who fails to deliver. Eventually they are out of business, but they can involve many consumers before they are put out of business. On the same subject, I should like to make a comment on Senator Fournier's reference to protective legislation. I do not quarrel with the assertion that all legislation limits freedom of choice and the citizen's freedom of activity, but we feel that even the existing legislation could be improved, strengthened and made more useful to the consumer. For instance, if under the present legislation the Government could take class action on behalf of consumers, which would fulfill a great need—there are many laws that have never been tested and to which the consumer does not have access, because of lack of money, expertise or time—it would strengthen the Government's present functions. Consumer protective legislation on door-to-door sales could be strengthened enormously with a requirement that the right of rescission must appear either immediately above the space for signature or on the face of the contract, so that everyone signing a contract would realize that he has this right. We sometimes do not go quite far enough.

The Chairman: Are you sure it does not appear on the contract in small letters, in Ontario?

Mrs. Brechin: No, it does not.

The Chairman: There is nothing to say that within a certain number of days the purchaser is allowed to do so-and-so?

Mrs. Jones: No, it is not required.

The Chairman: It is not required to be put on the agreement?

Senator Fergusson: Is it in any province?

Mrs. David Anderson, Publicity and Public Relations Chairman, Consumers' Association of Canada: It is in Manitoba.

The Chairman: It is required to appear in the contract in Manitoba?

Mrs. Anderson: Under new legislation.

Senator Fournier: If it is it must be in very fine print.

Mrs. Anderson: No, large print, sir. It is supposed to be there.

The Chairman: In Manitoba?

Mrs. Anderson: In Manitoba it is supposed to be in larger print that the print of the rest of the contract, on the face of the contract. It has just been introduced, as of March 7.

Senator Fergusson: Has it become law?

Mrs. Anderson: Yes, it was proclaimed as of March 7.

Senator McGrand: You have talked a lot about consumer education, and have done a lot of work on it, but how do you get this information into the homes of people. Through magazines, in information centres, and so on? You have a very effective competitor in TV advertising. A woman is in her home, sitting in front of the television hours and hours at a time, and sees advertisements in which actor demonstrators whip up excellent preparations in a jiffy. Who will get closest to her. There is your problem. In the work that you are carrying on, and will carry on, how would consumer education effectively reach the poor? By your volunteer groups? Or should the education be carried on by personnel of the Department of Welfare, whose people have access to the homes, who go in, supervise and help? Which could do the better job?

Mrs. Jones: My first response would be that I think the welfare recipient who has the welfare visitor is in the minority of low income consumers. I have grave doubts whether that would be the effective person to do the educating.

Senator McGrand: Tell me why?

Mrs. Jones: I think there are too many different problems, too many other responsibilities and roles to be played out between these two people, that it is just an additional one. Also, the skills, or perhaps I should say qualifications, of the welfare visitor do not necessarily include skills in consumer affairs.

Senator McGrand: They are all attached to sociology. There are a large number of people on welfare who feel that the money they get comes to them as a right, and they do not want any supervision, whether it comes from one group or another. I wonder whether the poor we are talking about who are just getting by, by one means or another, do not have that same feeling, that they will spend their money as they please? How do you reach them?

Mrs. Jones: We want to reach them only to show them how to spend their money most effectively. We do not reach them to tell them how to spend it. We only reach them to tell them how the can get the maximum satisfaction and the most out of their dollar.

Senator McGrand: You do not tell them how to spend it, but you suggest how they should spend it. What is the difference between telling them and suggesting?

Mrs. Balls: We show them how it can be done. They do not have to do it. We just show them how it could be done if they wish to do it. I think this is the same at all income levels. I do not necessarily spend my money in the way I know it should be spent, but at least if I know how it should be spent I can compare things and say, "Granted that product is less expensive, I like to look of this one and that is the one I am going to get."

Senator McGrand: That is the same thing. The woman in the home looks at the TV.

The Chairman: Is it not a little more than that? Are you not trying to tell them that one product has values that another product does not have? That is really what you are trying to get to them. You cannot teach these people who have been on welfare anything about shopping, and if you think you can, you are badly mistaken. They know more about it than any of you people around here do, because they have had to work on a low budget for a long time. But you can tell them about dietary values, health values and food values. Isn't that what you are doing or trying to do?

Mrs. Jones: We are in agreement.

The Chairman: You can take your choice of agreement or disagreement—that is up to you.

Mrs. Jones: We want the choice left up to the individual.

The Chairman: We are not suggesting you should force it on them.

Mrs. Brechin: It isn't a matter only of providing access to more information that they need and giving them motivation, but leaving the choice up to the individual.

Senator Fournier: Earlier we have been talking about credit cards. Do you think that credit cards have become a menace to the consumer?

Mrs. Brechin: That would have to be a personal opinion. I would think that the increase in the number of personal bankruptcies and the figures which are provided to us on the increasing load of consumer debts indicate that many more consumers are becoming overextended and that they are being used by credit rather than using credit wisely. Part of this may be a reflection of the inflationary tendencies of our times, but consumer credit and easy availability of consumer credit through credit cards is a relatively new thing in our society. Business has been using it for years and knows how to use it effectively, but consumers have not been trained in the use of it. Credit cards are offered holus-bolus to children just coming out of school, and as we have already noted, the schools give no training in consumer choice. Suddenly they have what appears to be inexhaustible credit on a card, or offered to them on TV by their friendly loan company, with no question of repayment appearing, and I think it is much easier now to become overextended because of the use of credit cards and the fact that they do not know how to use them wisely.

Senator Pearson: Would the fact of having a guaranteed annual income increase the spending in the credit area? If people knew they had a certain amount of money coming in all the time, would that increase their perspective? Would they try to get more and more and so result in going further into debt?

Mrs. Brechin: I cannot be sure of that, but I am sure of one thing, and that is that it will increase the necessity for education in the wise use of credit.

The Chairman: The experiment shows that they do not go further into debt, as you know already. I notice Mrs. Brechin was very cautious in answering that. But, the experiment in the United States indicated that these people who have these further moneys and credit do not go further into debt, but rather use their money wisely.

You said earlier, Mrs. Jones, that all these people need, and now we are speaking of the poor people, is an independent organization. Well, you are an independent organization. How are they benefiting from it? I agree with you that there are thousands of middle-class Canadians who are benefiting from it, but how are these poor people benefiting from your independent organization, the Consumers' Association of Canada?

Mrs. Jones: We think the protective legislation we have been involved in pressing for has assisted the low-income consumer as effectively or probably more effectively than it has assisted the middle-income consumer. We think that there has been some, maybe only a trickle down of consumer information and education that we keep pushing out to the absolute limit of our capacity. I don't think I can emphasize that enough. We know there is a very large job to do, and we are very much aware of how far we are from meeting the total task, but it is not for lack of effort, and I don't think it is from any underutilization of what resources we have. I think probably the television that we have been able to use has been one way of getting through. We have considerable confidence that the telephone service in the three cities I mentioned has been useful to the low-income consumer.

The Chairman: Please tell the committee about that telephone service.

Mrs. Jones: In Winnipeg, Vancouver and Montreal, volunteers operate a telephone information service where anyone who knows the number can call in and get directions and suggestions about consumer problems. I stress that these telephones are manned by volunteers which means certain limitations on when the service is available. The follow up and assistance is being given by volunteers if there is a problem to be tracked down. Many times there is a referral to government services as part of the suggestion and a solution to the problem. But even this service is costly to operate. In addition, there is such use of the service, particularly in Montreal, from recent reports, that they are confronted with the problem of how to expand the service.

Senator Fergusson: How would one get to know the right number to call?

Mrs. Jones: It is in the telephone book, but there again that is one of the problems. You have to know that you should look under Consumers' Association.

Senator Quart: May I ask one question? Have you ever given any thought to evaluating in terms of dollars and cents the amounts spent by volunteers in money, time and energy. It would be very interesting sometime to let the public know, because I imagine it would be four or five times the amount of grant you receive from the government.

The Chairman: Just while we were discussing the question of Consumer protection, I sent out for the Act because I thought I remembered it fairly well, the Ontario Act does provide executory contracts—the cost of borrowing, size, type of colour of lettering used in the provisional contract.

Mrs. Brechin: But not on the face or immediately above the signature.

The Chairman: No, but in the contract as presented, it has to have that under the regulations.

Mrs. Brechin: But only in the fine print.

The Chairman: I didn't say anything about the fine print, but the point is that it is there somewhere.

Mrs. Brechin: I am sorry if I misled you. the point I was trying to make was that we would see if it was on the face of the contract or immediately above the position for the signature as being a distinct improvement, and this is something we have been trying to press with Ontario. I am sorry I must have misunderstood you.

The Chairman: The lady, Mrs. David Anderson, said that in Manioba they had it all in bold letters and that, of course, is desirable. In Ontario, I knew they had it there someplace. You are trying to bold up the letters in the contract.

Mrs. Brechin: We are trying to make it easier for the consumer, because we realize that many consumers do not read the contract.

The Chairman: They do not have to be poor people.

Mrs. Brechin: No.

The Chairman: I have to get back to where we started, and try to have you somehow leave with the committee the impression that the benefits go to your members no others. What I cannot quite conceive is, since there is a large group of people in this country who need the information that you have, why you have not approached either the Department of Consumer Affairs or the Department of National Health and Welfare for special projects to direct to those people who need that information.

Mrs. Jones: I would say we have tried to indicate that we consider the Government contribution to be the source of funds for this kind of effort, but we need a lot more. We know we can only do so much with the resources we have.

The Chairman: But when Mr. English was here the last time we were holding these kinds of hearings he said that they were not receiving enough money, and we agreed. But what I am getting at is that here is a special need that is hard to meet. It is to the benefit of the Government, who are spending these vast sums of money, that this should be done. You say they are not doing it, and you can do it better than they can. How is it you cannot sell them the deal?

Mrs. Jones: We really did not say that.

The Chairman: Well, if you cannot do it better than they can, they are doing it.

Mrs. Jones: We see a task for us in supplementing what we are doing, and we do suggest we need Government support for the neighbourhood information centres, which we see as one of the new and promising approaches to this problem.

The Chairman: Have you approached them on it?

Mrs. Jones: Not specifically to support a specific centre. We made information about the usefulness of neighbourhood information centres available to both the federal and provincial staffs almost two years ago.

Senator Pearson: Do you receive any benefits from the provincial governments?

Mrs. Jones: Some associations on the provincial level do, but only in some provinces.

The Chairman: But the information level is a new idea and you think it has great possibilities. It has proved to be of considerable benefit in Britain too, but it is not being done here. How is it you have not made forceful representations with respect to that particular aspects?

Mrs. Jones: In co-operation with other voluntary agencies we have made forceful representations, I know in Ontario, to the provincial government, and also to the federal Government in relation to the one city I know about, Hamilton, and this has not been just the Consumers' Association, but the Special Planning Council representing, of course, a number of voluntary organizations.

The Chairman: With no luck?

Mrs. Jones: No. There was an interesting statement by the Provincial Secretary in Ontario, but I do not know the significance of his announcement.

The Chairman: What was it?

Mrs. Jones: It was a general statement reported in the press that there was going to be government support of neighbourhood information centres, but it did refer to them as Government neighbourhood information centres, which would not be consistent with the plan we are suggesting. That is only a press report, and I have had no opportunity to follow it up.

The Chairman: In connection with the problems raised about the poor paying more for their needs, you said it was difficult to recognize the poor, that they were hidden. It was not difficult to recognize poor Indians.

Mrs. Jones: That is a very good point, is it not?

The Chairman: Is that the reason you were able to bring us some views on that?

Mrs. Jones: This is simply the statement of the observation from the individuals who did the survey in those particular communities, but I think that our survey did go to people in the small cities and towns of Canada, and there is not the division in the residential areas between rich and poor that you get in the large cities.

The Chairman: Some of you have been associated with the Consumers' Association for some time. Do you remember the survey that was made by, I think, one of your vice-presidents in the Kitchener-Waterloo area on that particular aspect? When we were dealing with the price of food we had various studies made. I recall a survey made by a very clear woman who was one of our vice-presidents, who did it for us, and she came up with some startling answers. Do you remember?

Mrs. Jones: I am afraid I do not recall.

Senator McGrand: On the Indian question, you did not quite complete what I asked you. You said someone had made a survey of this situation.

Mrs. Jones: Yes.

Senator McGrand: Did they make any comments as to why this happened, did they merely report the fact, or was some investigation made as to why it happened?

Mrs. Jones: On the survey they simply reported the fact and referred to it being within walking distance of the Indian settlement.

Senator McGrand: I would think anybody making that survey would go a little deeper and ask a few questions as the cause of this.

Mrs. Jones: We have not been informed as to what follow-up the local association or individual doing it may have done, but as far as this study was concerned it stopped with the factual observation.

The Chairman: If there are no more questions, I say, on behalf of the committee, that your presentation here today is very significant to the study being made by the committee. The work you are carrying on is known to the committee, and we know it is important and appreciate that you are operating on a low budget and under difficult conditions, but that is the nature of the country today, and it will be for a while. On the other hand, I do think you ought to keep in mind the fact that you should be reaching out for those people who need your help very much. You ought to be forcefully pursuing the Government for such things as information centres at all levels, and other matters of vital concern to the poor people.

On behalf of the committee I thank you very much for your presentation. I thank also the other ladies who are present, and who have come from various parts of Canada, for their interest and concern.

Mrs. Jones: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The committee adjourned.

Special Senate Committee

Poverty

Consumers' Association of Canada

April 28th, 1970

The Consumers' Association of Canada is the national voluntary organization that has been representing consumers' interests in Canada at the national, provincial and local levels for the past twenty-three years. Membership is open to any consumer for a nominal annual fee.¹

In preparing this submission, CAC has not presumed to define poverty in Canada in order to isolate the poor as a special group, but has attempted to clarify how the low income consumer fares, relative to the rest of society by focusing on the every-day particular problems the low income consumer encounters in the market place. Frequently, consumer education is proposed as the panacea to the consumers' problems in the market place (certainly it has already been proposed to your Committee). Although CAC gives highest priority to consumer education (particularly from kindergarten to Grade ten) as the basic weapon for consumer protection, we suggest that even with extensive consumer education the struggle in the market place will continue to be unequal, particularly for the low-income consumer, unless other essential protective measures are developed. We refer to the need for further consumer protection legislation, the need to grant additional authority to existing government agencies who have been given the responsibility to protect consumers, the need for more consistent and effective self-discipline of industry and business in accord with their professed ethics, and the need for a stronger organized independent consumer voice speaking for consumers of all income levels.

In considering the statement "the poor pay more", CAC raised the question, "Do the poor have to pay more because of the conditions in the market place itself?" In order to answer the question, CAC proceeded to have the local CAC associations undertake a survey to compare prices on certain grocery items, clothing and furniture, in stores in selected high income and low income areas of their respective cities during one week in January, 1970. The first finding the survey revealed was that the poor in Canada are hidden indeed. In several towns and small cities, the survey could not be completed as there were no distinguishable high and low income areas. In most cities, only pockets of low income and high income residents could be distinguished and it was asserted that both income groups used the same stores and shopping centres. Although it was conceded that certain stores were in low income areas when low income residents predominated, only in the largest cities was there confidence in identifying certain stores as serving either predominantly low income or high income consumers. In view of the problem of making clear distinction in income levels between the clientele of different stores, the general finding that there was no identifiable pattern of differences in prices between the sample stores in the high and low income areas is not surprising. Generally, uniform prices on the same items were noted. Although there were occasional variations in prices of individual items from store to store, the price was sometimes higher in the low income area store but just as frequently the opposite was true. Certain exceptions merit attention. Although there was insistence that no distinction could be made between high income and low income shopping areas in either Yellowknife or Whitehorse, higher food prices were reported in the stores closest to the Indian settlements in both cities. A much more comprehensive and scientific study in the United States³ presented parallel findings of insignificant variation in food prices between high and low income areas.

Most of the proposals to help the low income consumer are limited to helping the individual cope more effectively with the existing market place. One finding in the CAC comparative pricing survey points up the potential of group action in affecting any consumer's purchasing power. Significant and consistent price variation on a majority of the items were reported in favour of co-operative stores as compared to supermarkets regardless of income area. The success of buying clubs for the poor has been demonstrated by Boston's Comarts⁴ (Consumer Markets) where the low income consumer derived such learning and shopping skills from participating in the co-operative enterprise that they could also cope more confidently and competently in the open market.

If low income buyers clubs (similar to the Winnipeg Buyers, Association for example) are to develop in other areas of Canada, initial help will be needed from other organizations. An alternative to developing exclusively low income buyers clubs or co-operatives might be to include low income consumers in co-operatives already organized. This alternative could avoid isolating the poor as a group in still another structure and provide the opportunity for the low income consumer to learn merchandising skills by working alongside other experienced co-op members. However, this suggestion does not mean that governments can evade their responsibilities in this area and assign these responsibilities totally to co-operatives.

The low income consumer may be exposed to the same prices, the same products as the high income consumer, but he is also exposed to the same blandishments to buy and to use credit, and he enters the market place with severe restrictions on how he can purchase. With cash resources inadequate for even immediate necessities, he can not time his purchase like a thrifty consumer to take advantage of end-of-season clothing sales, or even special weekend buys. He can not buy in bulk—another recommended way of keeping regular basic costs down. He can not buy quality for durability and longterm savings, because he cannot afford the immediate larger cost. He cannot do effective comparison shopping, as his mobility is so reduced because of the additional transportation, and/or baby sitting costs that are involved. The ability of the poor to "shop around" is further reduced by their lack of ready cash, which may limit them to buying at stores which will supply credit. The cost of "going out shopping" also makes the poor particularly vulnerable to door-to-door salesmen. The low income consumer should be the primary group to benefit from stringent regulation of transactions with door-to-door salesmen, which CAC has long sought and endorsed, but they cannot benefit unless the provision of the cooling off legislation is known to them or unless they know how to utilize the protection. It is the low-income consumer who is most vulnerable to the consequence of disclaimer clauses in standard form contracts which take away the implied conditions of fitness provided by the Sale of Goods Act, as he does not have the resources for the replacement or the repairs for the faulty merchandise. Even when the guarantee would offer protection, his inability to discern his rights or his lack of mobility to make still another trip to the store to present his case can hinder or prevent his securing redress. The lack of adequate legislation to regulate acceleration and forfeiture clauses in sales contracts affects him most adversely. The low income consumer is rarely eligible for the standard credit arrangements with the department store, but has to buy his credit as high risk interest rates, and then faces increasing and overwhelming credit costs in continued debt consolidation arrangements.

The low income consumer has the least confidence, ability, or resources to seek civil redress for his grievances in the marketplace. Therefore, the Federal and Provincial Government agencies,⁵ established to protect consumer interests, should have their powers reassessed to ensure they have adequate authority to act effectively on behalf of the low income consumer.

A factor in the market place that operates specifically against the interests of the low income consumer is the sales tax, particularly on staples and necessities. The outstanding example of such discriminatory and inadequate tax is the Federal Sales Tax on margarine. Since 1963, the Consumers' Association of Canada has made repeated requests to the Federal Government to remove this federal tax without success. Rigid size-based, rather than age-based Provincial tax on children's clothing also adds an undue burden to the low-income group. The consumer attempting to economize in this area, through sewing skills, pays the penalty of sales tax on yard goods, patterns and notions.

As noted earlier, CAC has always considered consumer education essential preparation for any consumer for competent performance in the contest in the marketplace. Obviously, consumer education is needed even more by the low income consumer whose additional handicaps in the marketplace have been outlined. Frequently he is excluded from even the most general resource for elementary consumer education—the family—since, in the many cases where poverty has become institutionalized, the poor cannot learn the market skills from their own families on how to cope adequately with meagre resources. Community institutions and organizations therefore, have a special responsibility for consumer education for the poor. In addition, migrants from rural communities and immigrants from countries with different levels of industrialization are faced with new and strange shopping problems with which they need help. It is vital to differentiate between ability to learn to be an adequate consumer and opportunity to learn in planning and developing consumer education for the low income consumer.⁶

⁶ Two statements in response to the CAC survey on comparative prices should be noted. Both originate from CAC (Winnipeg). "I have been impressed with the thrifty shopping habits of low income shoppers. They take advantage of the good buys, and indulge very little in ready mixes and such things. They buy cheaper cuts of meat and usually of commercial quality. I rarely have seen children and husbands doing the weekly shopping."

"The ladies (Indian and Métis groups in central Winnipeg) are very careful shoppers and know the right stores to go to for special items."

On the local level, CAC has devoted much of its energy and resources to consumer education—through public meetings, by providing speakers for community groups, through sponsorship of short courses on consumer issues, and by preparing educational displays. Although CAC-sponsored public meetings are usually without admission charge, or with only a nominal fee, and are largely attended by non-CAC members, there is question that many persons in the low income group have received consumer education through such a medium. It is questionable also that many low income people were reached through the Home and School meetings, church groups, service clubs, and Women's Institutes where CAC speakers were provided. CAC has more confidence that there has been significant contribution to consumer education for the poor through the participation of individual CAC members in different projects designed for specific low income groups in different cities across Canada. Individual CAC members (frequently professional home economists) have assisted in giving courses to welfare mothers, training in homemaking, leadership in setting up debt counselling services, in developing programmes for single parents and in assisting legal aid centres. In a number of cities CAC contributes to consumer education of an unidentified public by providing weekly radio or television programmes, and CAC leaders are invited by the media to comment briefly on specific issues of special concern to consumers.

The major effort of CAC to educate and inform its members is through its magazine, CANADIAN CONSUMER. Only a portion of the public libraries in Canada subscribe to CANADIAN CONSUMER and it is unlikely that low-income consumers make extensive reference to it even in the libraries where it is available. During the past three years, CAC has distributed more than one half million pieces of informative literature (buying guides, etc.) to non-members of the Association, but again, it is doubtful that low-income consumers have been widely represented amongst this group who have taken the initiative to write to the Association for some specific consumer information.

In each centre across Canada where they are organized, the local CAC association designates a Consumer Problems Chairman who deals with the complaints and problems of anyone who directs written and telephone inquiries to the Association. The majority of the inquiries are from non-members, but there is no way of knowing the income level of the inquirer. This volunteer service is sought and utilized in spite of extremely limited publicity (because of CAC's budgetary restraints) by such a volume of consumers on such a range of problems that it confirms the need for more visible and accessible local outlets for consumer information for the less persistent and less resourceful consumer. Neighbourhood information centres, modelled on the Citizens Advice Bureaux which have operated in Great Britain since early in World War II, could be an effective base for providing appropriate consumer information and education to the low income consumer when he needs it and where he can use it. Certainly, the consumer information service offered as one of the wide range of services provided by the Citizens Advice Bureaux has been extensively utilized by British consumers. A report in 1968 indicated that the fastest growing category of inquiries handled by the C.A.B. has related to such consumer problems as instalment buying agreements, high pressure doorstep salesmen, guarantees, and the quality of goods.

The advantage of consumer education and information being related to larger information and education programmes, is spelled out in a report of 1965, from the President's Committee on Consumer Interest.⁷ This same report emphasizes that consumer education should be a component of a set of programmes designed to deal with or combat poverty. In view of the difficulty experienced in capturing and holding the interest and attention of the low income consumer through the traditional media or the class-room approach to education, the potential in providing specific information on the inquirer's individual and immediate problem on a face-to-face basis for effective learning should be explored.

If the individual attention and follow-up required for successful and satisfactory handling of inquiries were to be given, Neighbourhood Information Centres would have to depend heavily on volunteers to assist in their operations, and follow-up on consumer problems would be tasks that CAC volunteers could undertake with enthusiasm and capability.

The best shopping skills, the most exhaustive consumer education and sophistication and a fair, open and protected marketplace can only alleviate some of the discomforts of poverty. THE ESSENTIAL PROBLEM IS LACK OF INCOME. Consumer education courses before the drop-out leaves school are important. Adequate protective legislation, stringently enforced, is essential. Knowledge by the poor of such legislation is an urgent need. Problems encountered by the average consumer in a complex, devious marketplace are only frustrations or setbacks; in that same marketplace, the same problems are, to the low income consumer, disasters. Only an increased income will change those disasters to hardships and hardships to frustrations.
